
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

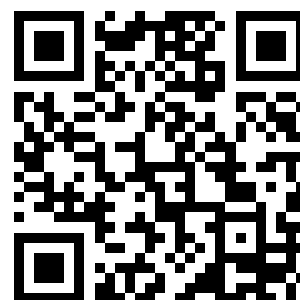

<https://books.google.com>

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

Literature

Henry Duff Traill

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

JUNE 29, 1901.

Literature

Published by

The Times.

VOL. VIII.

JANUARY 5 TO JUNE 29, 1901.

~~—————~~

LONDON

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY GEORGE EDWARD WRIGHT, AT THE TIMES OFFICE, PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE.

1901.

42505

AP4
.L7

10-10-02.

INDEX TO VOL. VIII.

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—		AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—		AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—		AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED—
PAGE		PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Abbott, Edwin A.	71	Chandler, Edmund	53	Etheridge, W. G.	538	Henry, Arthur	225
Ackworth, Mr.	37	Chang Chih-Tung	85	Evans, A. D.	359	Henslow, Prof.	568
Adcock, A. St. John	142, 185	Chatterton, G. G.	225	Everett, J. J.	125	Henson, Canon Hensley	204
Addison, Mr.	180	Chauvin, Victor	244	Farmer, J. L.	181	Heron-Maxwell, Miss	277
Ade, George	35	Chesterton, Gilbert	31	Fenn, Manville	447	Herring, P. E.	246
Adler, M. N.	125	Cheyne, Dr.	138	Findlater, M., and Findlater, J. H.	446	Hewitt, C. E. R.	538
Ady, Mrs.	143, 582	Childers, Colonel Spencer	13	Firth, C. H.	535	Hewitt, E.	249
Ainslie, Douglas	463	Cholmeley, R. J.	339	Fitchett, W. H.	121	Hill, G. Birkbeck	12
Ainslie, Noel	371	Christie, A. M.	318	Fitzgerald, Beresford	36	Hill, Headon	371
Alexander, Dr.	15	Christie, Cuthbert	163	Fitzmaurice, Lord Edmond	299	Hills, Maj. Gen. Sir John	101
Alexander, James	184	Churchill, Mr.	498	Fletcher, J. S.	51	Hoare, B. George	463
Alexander, Mrs.	182	Clark, Rev. F. E.	389	Forbes, Hon. Mrs. W. D.	294	Hobson, J. A.	235
Allchin, W. H.	536	Clarke, E. T.	286	Ford, Jor. C.	76, 420	Hocking, Joseph	158
Allcroft, G. H.	360	Cleave, Lucas	164	Foster, C. and F.	443	Hodgson, Lady	353
Allen, Alexander, G. V.	181	Coate, H. E. A.	127	Fowler, Rev. M.	249	Hogarth, Mr.	363
Allen, Grant	543	Cobb, Thomas	145	Fowler, E. Thorneycroft	181	Holcombe, Chester	220
Allen, Inglis	315	Cobban, J. MacLaren	299	Fox, Dr. Hingston	369	Holland, W. E.	163
Allen, Rev. Roland	144	Coit, Stanton	242	Fox, H. F.	416	Holmes, Thomas	35
Ames, Hugo	122	Coghlan, T. A.	164	Freeston, C. L.	564	Hoole, C. H.	141
Andler, C.	226	Collins, J. Churton	197	Fremantle, Dean	138	Hope, Graham	447
Androm, R.	226	Collins, W. G. W.	78	Frémieux, Mons. Paul	294	Hopkins, Tighe	396
Antrobus, Mrs. C. L.	185	Colville, Major-General H. E.	438	French, J. L.	54	Horder, W. Garrett	186
Archer, William	163	Compton, Mr.	127	Frust, George	540	Hornung, E. W.	33
Argyll, Duke of	415	Conder, Arthur R.	541	Fry, Dr. T. C.	538	Horton, Dr.	466
Aria, Mrs.	415	Conway, Sir Martin	555	Fuller, F. W.	470	Hosack, B. H.	266
Ashton, E.	142	Conway, Prof. R. S.	536	Gallon, Tom	180	Hough, E.	272
Ashworth, T. R., and H. C. P.	164	Cook, Herbert	16	Galloway, J.	55	Howell, C.	55
"Athol Forbes"	421	Coolidge, Rev. W. A. B.	563	Gardiner, Prof.	183	Howell, J. S.	537
Atkinson, A. G. B.	89	Cooper, E. H.	543	Gardiner, Colonel	219	Hudson, Prof. W. H.	221
Aves, W. O.	562	Corbett, J. S.	136	Gardyne, Colonel	342	Hueffer, O.	223
Babington, Rev. J. A.	317	Cornaby, W. A.	519	Garnett, Dr.	461	Hughes, Edward	299
Bachelier, Irving	272	Cornford, L. Cope	371	Garrice, Charles	299	Hume, F.	317
Bacon, Rev. J. M.	124	Corvo, F. Baron	271	Gaspary, A.	240	Hume, M. W. A. S.	93
Baddeley, J. J.	270	Coswain, George	185	Geldart, W. M.	533	Hunter, W. W.	181
Baddeley's Guide to Belgium and Holland	564	Coter, Mrs. F.	568	Gerard, Maurice	242	Hurt, Alfred	246
Bagnall-Stubbis, J.	104	Cotterill, H. B.	536	Gibbs, Philip	565	Hutton, Alfred	200, 384
Balogh, Richard	225	Coubertin, Pierre de	417	Gibson, Mrs.	244	Hutton, Edward	519
Baldon, H. B.	519	Courtney, Leonard	222	Gilbey, Sir Walter	36	Hyatt, Cuthliffe	420
Bailey, H. C.	293	Craigie, Mrs.	37	Gilchrist, Dr. J. G.	561	Ida, Leigh, Earl of	421
Ballard, Frank	236	Craik, Sir Henry	114	Giles, H. A.	68	Ida, Sir Courtenay	233
Baring Gould, S.	273, 296	Cramb, J. A.	258	Gilliat-Smith, E.	556	Ida, T. Dunbar, L.L.D.	47
Baron, David	367	Crane, Stephen	165	Gising, George	519, 557	Ida, H. B.	338
Barr, Mrs. A. E.	166	Crawford, F. M.	119, 129	Gleg, Charles	371	Jackson, Admiral T. Sturges	181
Barry, Dr. W.	247	Craven, Lady Helen	145	Glyn, Elmor	290	Jackson, Professor	341
Bartram George	463	Cresagh, Captain	184	Goldsie, Beryl	290	Jackson, T. C.	204
Bashall, H. St. John	267	Cresswell, B. F.	266	Golsworthy, Arnold	184	James, Henry	144, 296
Bates, Havergal	145	Cripps, Rev. A. S.	142	Gompertz, Prof. T.	267	Jebl, Prof.	180
Batterbury, H. O.	184	Crockett, S. R.	419	Gooch, G. P.	203	Jerome, Jerome K.	447
Batts, Rev. H. J.	245	Croker, B. M.	272	Goodlet, Robert	286	Jerrild, W.	558
Bayly, A. E.	127	Crommelin, May	105	Goodwin, Prof.	416	Jessopp, Dr.	322
Beard, Charles	212	Crooks, Major	125	Gordon, L. Duff	201	Jones, Dora M.	163
Beavan, A. H.	223	Crottie, Miss	418	Gore, Canon	340	Jones, E. O.	203
Beeching, H. O.	163	Crowest, F. J.	391	Gorst, Harold E.	539	Jones, W.	221
Beet, Rev. J. A.	71	Cunningham, Dr.	391	Goss, F. C.	248	Jourdain, Mons.	309
Begbie, Harold	15	Cust, Mrs. Henry	270	Graham, John W.	421	Keary, C. F.	146
Bell, C. F.	205	Dalbiac, Colonel	53	Grand, Sarah	270	Keating, J.	146
Bell, Mrs. Arthur	103	Dale, E.	266	Grant, A. J.	391	Keith, George S.	163
Bell, R. S. W.	470	Dale, Father	345	Green, Dr. S. G.	366	Keller, Prof.	125
Benger, G.	103	Dalton, W.	163	Green, Walford Davis	480	Kennedy, H. A.	465
Benoist, C. L.	122	Davenport, Cyril	370	Gregory, Lady	123	Kenyon, F. G.	357
Benson, A. C.	141	Davey Richard	161	Grieg, Mr.	164	Kernahan, Coulson	225, 444
Bernard, Dr.	70	Davids, C. Rhys	243	Grier, Sidney	542	Khan, Mir Munchi Mahomet	40
Besant, Sir Walter	283	Davidson, John	568	Griffith, George	371	King, Bolton	516
Beveridge, Hugh	125	Davidson, Prof. John	182	Griffiths, Major Arthur	125	Kingsley, Miss	181
Bickley, F. P.	265	Davies, Denis	463	Grogan, E. S.	120	Knight, Dr. William	241
Biddle, Miss V. P.	568	Dawe, Carlton	447	Gross, Dr. Charles	119	Knight, F. F.	444
Bigham, Clive	315	Dawe, W. C.	225	Grundy, G. B.	538	Knight, G.	55
Binyon, Laurence	15	Dawlish, Hope	299	Guillemaud, Dr.	199	Knight, James	164
Birdwood, Sir George	105	Dawson, A. J.	55	Guthrie, James	126	Knott, G. H.	204
Bitrell, Olive	106	Dawson, Sir William	164	Gwynn, Stephen	460	Lagerlof, Selma	345
Blasfield, E. H. and E. W.	557	Day, Rev. E.	243	Gwyther, G. M.	417	Lander, Henry Savage	467
Bleloch, W.	466	Dayot, Mons.	124	"Gyp"	372	Lank, Andrew	345
Bliss, Captain H. C. J.	223	Deer, Capt. H. P.	441	Haddan, Frank W.	53	Lank, Prof. Ruy	537
Blomfield, Reginald	247	Del Mar, A.	467	Haggard, Rider	395	Lawrence, C. E.	537
Blundell, Frances	541	Dennis, G. Ravenscroft	336	Hales, A. G.	185	Lawrence, Sir Henry	342
Boden, Rev. C. J.	447	Dickens, M. A.	407	Halliburton, Hugh	463	Layard, G. Somes	388
Bodkin, McDonnell	345	Dickinson, G. L.	246	Hall, A. Vine	142	Le François Emile	416
Boothby, Guy	269	Dickson, Harris	420	Hall, F. W.	535	Le Gallienne, R.	35, 184, 463
Borchgrevink, Mr.	104	Dickson, W. K. L.	53	Hallard, J. H.	537	Le Queux, W.	346
Boosey, Godfrey	369	Dix, Beulah M.	420	Halliday, G. E.	257	Le Strange, G.	414
Bourne, H. B. Fox	102	Dix, E. A.	78	Halliwell-Phillips, Mr.	315	Lee, Guy Carleton	179
Bowden, Ernest	143	Dixon, Charles	34	Hamilton, Lillias	57	Lee, John	164
Bowles, T. G.	270	Dixon, S.	243	Hamerton, J. A.	245, 247	Leese, Arthur F. J.	462
Bowley, A. L.	369	Dodd, A. B.	204	Händler, Rev. E.	102	Lehmann, R. C.	461
Bradley, A. G.	348	Dooley, Mr.	186	Hapgood, Norman	466	Leith-Adams, Mrs.	273
Brampton, Miss	418	Dormer, F. J.	183	Harbottle, T. B.	53	Lewis, Mrs.	244
Braunholtz, E. G. W.	186	Dounie, Mons.	53	Harding, Rev. John	204	Lewis, Rev. H. Elvet	74
Bray, Claude	540	Draper, W. H.	183	Hardy, C. F.	394	Lillie, Arthur	243
Briggs, Lady	494	Dreyfus, Captain	362	Hardy, Iza Duffus	298	Lindsay, Lady	140
Broadhurst, M. P., Henry	518	Drinkwater, Dr. H.	369	Hare, Christopher	421	Linton, Mrs. Lynn	541
Brooke-Hunt, Violet	177	Drummond, Dr. W. B.	539	Hare, Major F. C.	182	Litchfield, Mrs.	419
Brooke, Stopford A.	75	Drury, W. D.	565	Harrison, Rev. A. J.	445	Little, Archibald J.	161
Broughton, Rhoda	536	Duff, Sir Mount Stuart Grant	322	Hart, Sir Robert	314	Lloyd, F. M.	142
Brown, Prof. John	100	Duguid, Charles	247	Harte, Bret	344	Lord, M. I.	55
Bruce, E. I.	182	Durham, Lilla	337	Hartman, Dr. Martin	244	Lounsbury, Prof. T. R.	533
Bryden, H. A.	182	Dutoit, U. A.	538	Harvey, Rev. A. J.	74	Low, J. L.	71
Buell, Augustus C.	464	Dutt, W. A.	143	Hatton, Bessie	184	Lucas, E. V.	35
Bullen, F. T.	50, 222, 286	E. B. L.	53	Hauptman, Gerhart	34	Lucy, Mr.	183
Burleigh, O.	142	Earle, Mrs. A. M.	296	Hazlitt, W. Carew	393	Lugard, General F.	74
Burn, Dr. J. H.	182	Earle, Professor	465	Headlam, Cecil	264	Lyall, David	105
Burnet, I.	535	Earle, Walter	32	Headley, F. W.	316	Lyde, Lionel W.	538
Butler, A. G.	146	Edsby-Smith, J.	247	Hebbethwaite, James	463	Lynch, Hannah	203, 273
Cadogan, Captain	53, 86	Edsby, E. T.	164	Heinemann, J.	501	Lyons, Mrs.	273
Cadogan, Dr. Alfred	335	Edwards, Fred G.	52	"Helion Bumpstead"	293	Lyttelton, Robert	397
Callwell, Major	108	Edwards, Oman	182	Hemelrick, J. Van	466	Mable, Hamilton Wright	138
Canning, A. S. G.	247	Ellis, Miriam A.	52	Hemphill, Rev. S.	538	Macalister, Professor J.	162, 273
Cappou, James	465	Ellis, W. Clinton	421	Hemson, G. H.	76	McCarthy, Justin	321, 337
Carmichael, M.	183	Emery, G. F.	445	Henderson, T. E.	265	Macfadyen, D.	125
Carr, Mrs. M. E.	239			Hendry, Hamish	453	MacGregor	445
Carrère, Jean	389
Carrington, Dean	265
Carus-Wilson, Mrs.	74

AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	AUTHORS OF BOOKS REVIEWED— (continued)	PAGE	CONTRIBUTORS OF SIGNED ARTICLES, LETTERS, &c. (continued)	PAGE
M. Ivarra, J. N.	183	Rhys, Prof. Ernest	535	Wall, J. C.	266	Maxwell, Sir Herbert	497
M. Ivarra, Jean	420	Rice, Stanley P.	182	Wallace, A. E.	365	McCarthy, Justin	432
Mackern, H. V.	233	Richardson, C.	256	Wallpole, Rev. A. S.	534	McEwan, Egan	370, 552
Mackie, John	249	Richardson, Mrs. R.	267	Walsh, W.	71	Michelson, Alfred	323
Mackinnon, Major-General	269	Ripon, Bishop of	33	Walters, Cuming	273	Monson, Leonard	397
Macmillan, Michael	225	" Rita "	272	Ward, Professor Marshall	342	Murray, J. A. H.	208
Maeterlinck, Maurice	460	Roberts, Morley	248	Warden, Florence	372	Noyes, Alfred	403
Magnus, Laurie	264	Roberts, Prof.	245	Warden, Gertrude	299	Oakley, C. S.	447
Mahan, Captain A. T.	158	Robertson, J. M.	222	Warner, G. F.	121	O'Rell, Max	498
Maher, Mary	105	Robins, Edward	72	Warner, R. Townsend	417	" Oxonian "	323
Madmont, George	235	Robinson, F. E.	538	Warren, Charles E.	519	" Oxonian, Another "	357
Maitland, F. W.	238	Rockhill, Hon. W. W.	270	Warren, W. T.	360	Parke, Walter	227
Malcoum, Ian	102	Rodzewicz, Marya	468	Waters, W. G.	319	Paterson, William Romaine	423
Mallet, Sir Edward	179	Rollston, Colonel	181	Waters, Mrs. W. G.	540	Patterson, J. E.	5, 88, 168, 258
Manley, T. T.	417	Rollston, Lady Maud	466	Watson, H. B. M.	225	Phythian	206
Mann, Mary E.	346	Rollston, T. W.	177	Watt, W. A.	243	Pinkerton, Walter	227
Marchant, E. C.	536, 537	Rook, Clarence	249	Weale, W. H. J.	74	Pollock, Walter Herries	508
Margolouth, D. S.	70	Ropes, A. R.	538	Webb, W. H.	445	Poynder, F. C.	396
Martin, Jane	73	Round, J. Horace	178	Weekley, Ernest	416	Raleigh, Professor Walter	511
Marratt, C.	247	Rouse, W. H. D.	284	Wells, C. M.	419	Ransom, Arthur	378
Marsh, Richard	104, 126	Roxburgh, T. L.	342	Wells, D. D.	419	Ratchiffe, K. K.	38, 114
Martin, Dr. W. A. P.	52	Rumney, A. W.	267	Wells, F. M.	564	Reade, A. L.	571
Martin, Sir Theodore	72	Russell, Black	287	Wells, Mary E.	123	Reade, Compton	187
Masse, H. J. L. J.	103	Russell, S. M.	456	Wendell, Barrett	157	Roberts, Morley	306
Massy, Mrs.	141	Rutherford, Mark	35	Weston, J. L.	249	Rook, Clarence	134
Mathew, Frank	37, 184	Ryland, F.	143	Wetmore, Helen Cody	393	Salt, Henry S.	473, 522
Mathews, Shailer	467	Sackville, Lady Margaret	518	Whitcoat, Gordon Cuming	322	Sanders, Lloyd	380
Maude, Agnes	441	St. Clair, G.	202	White, Arnold	202	Sandys, J. E.	349, 374
Mawson, T. H.	556	Sandford, Prof. P.	536	Whitman, Sidney	73	Saton, Walter W.	497
Meade, Mrs.	346	Satgé, Oscar de	164	Whittaker, Thomas	316	Shaylor, Joseph	95
Meadows, Alice M.	420	Saunders, T. B.	341	Whittuck, Charles	246	Sichel, Miss F.	571
Medley, Rev. W.	71	Savile, Helen V.	273	Whynper, Mr.	563	Summerley, Mary	522
McIntyre, C. J.	153	Schofield, Dr. A. T.	236	Wilkins, Mary E.	542	Tarrell, C. C.	572
Menges, Mortimer	435	Schuckburgh, E. S.	534	Wilkins, W. H. C.	318	Tarrell, C. C.	66, 127
Meredith, George	517	Schnyder, Eugene	295	Wilkinson, E. G.	417	Taunton, Ethelred L.	374, 424
Methuen, A. M. S.	540	Scott, Dr. D. H.	52	Wilkinson, Frank	102	Thomas, Margaret	312
Michie, Alexander	159	Scott, W. R.	315	Williams, E. E.	467	Thring, G. Herbert	38
Miffin, Lloyd	141	Seed, Rev. T. A.	143	Williamson, Dr. G. C.	343, 557	Tollmach, Hon. Lionel A.	300, 350
Miles, E. H.	534	Seignobos, Mons.	290	Williamson, Mrs. C. N.	225, 542	Wakley, A. B. 10, 30, 47, 68, 96, 117, 177, 197, 212, 255, 256, 313, 557, 562, 564, 565	136
Millar, J. Guille	103	Selby, Thomas G.	466	Williamson, Mrs. C. N.	564	W. K. H.	246
Miller, Rev. G.	266	Sergeant, Adeline	322	Willoughby, Dr.	243	W. L. H.	345, 422, 446
Milligen, A.	142	Sharp, A. H.	120	Winnot, Hon. A.	535	W. M. F.	7, 29, 137, 141
Millis, T. B.	73	Sharp, R. F.	73	Wilson, H. W.	417	W. S. C.	180
Millis, Mrs.	565	Shaw, Bernard	101	Wilson, Richard	417	Wallace, William	44, 68
Millis-Horne, Mary F.	421	Shee, G. F.	245	Winbolt, F. E.	536	Warren, T. Herbert	385, 409
Mitchell, Edmund	140	Sheehan, Father	298	Windle, B. C. A.	561	Watson, W. G.	379
Moffatt, Jas.	31	Sheldon, Mr.	346	Wise, H. J.	463	Watson, E. H. Lacon	404
Money-Contts, Mr.	225	Sherard, R. H.	145, 445	Wood, Chas. W.	51	Waugh, Arthur	84
Montagu, Lily H.	540	Sichel, Ethel	533	Wood, Walter	181	Wedmore, Frederick	232, 283, 428
Montanaro, Lieut. Col. A. F.	204	Sichel, Walter	414	Woodhouse, W. J.	417	Wheler, Ethel	571
Moore, Dr. J. M.	144	Sidgwick, Mrs. A.	55	Woodroffe, Daniel	535	Whibley, Charles	226
Moore, Frankfort	38	Siebold, Baron A. von	394	Woodward, W. H.	535	Wilson, Beekes	570
Moore, Rev. Herbert	346	Sier, James	120	Wratlas, T.	119	Wilson, H. C.	208
Moore, Gerard	246	Silver, E. Norman	422	Wynne, C. W.	292	Wilson, Louis N.	208
Morrish, Herbert	31	Simmonds, Florence	221	Yate, Colonel C. E.	143	Wilson, P. G.	208
Morris, Sir Lewis	346	Simmons, Mr.	164	Yates, Lucy	34, 439	Wright, Edward	132
Mortyn, Rev. Sydney	53, 267	Simonson, Dr.	242	Yeats, W. B.	105
Moul, Duncan	223	Sims, G. E.	272	Yorke, Curtis	200
Moulton, R. G.	33	Sinclair, May	419	Young, Mr.	418
Mowbray, Miss	239, 443	Sladen, Douglas	101	" Zack "
Muller, Max	266	Sloum, Captain	346
Mullinger, J. B.	247	Smale, Fred C.	416
Murray, D. Christie	53	Smart, F. W. B.	183
Murray, Mary	101	Smouton, Oliphant	536
Nash, Vaughan	103	Smith, F. C.	248
Newbigging, T.	535	Smith, G. Barnett	36
Nicklin, J. A.	543	Smith, J. W.	164
Nisbet, Hume	322	Smith, Prof. G. A.	284
Norris, W. E.	76, 557	Smyth, Prof. H. Weir	33
Norway, Arthur	163	Sneath, Dr.	419
Odham, W. D.	201	Speight, T. W.	467
" Odyssey "	516	Spence, Catharine	537, 538
Okey, Thomas	343	Spencer, P.	538
Oldfield, Mrs.	269	Spruiting, Rev. F. W.	419
Oldham and Dodd, Messrs.	122	Spurr, Harry	199
Ollivier, Emile	464	Stadling, J.	180
Ormond, Prof. A. T.	316	Stainer, C. L.	416
Osborne, Christabel	341	Starck, Alfred	162
Ostrofsky, Bishop of	125	Steel, Richard	102, 466
Page, W.	538	Stevens, G. W.	467
Pancoat, H. S.	536	Stephen, Leslie	318
Pantlin, W. E. P.	161	Sternberg, Count	321
Parker, E. H.	563	Steurt, J. A.	363
Parson, C. E.	291	Stillman, W. J.	125
Paton, George	390	Stocker, R. D.	543
Paterson, W. Romaine	392	Stockton, Frank	365
Paul, Herbert	103	Stodart-Walker, A.	246
Payne, Rev. G. A.	536	Stretton, C. E.	145
Pearce, J. W. E.	146	Stuart, Esme	70
Pearl, F. M.	203	Stubbs, Dr.	460
Pearson, Karl	496	Sutro, Alfred	344
Peel, Hon. Sidney	242	Swan, H.	366
Peilington, Ferdinand	346	Swan, Myra	372
Pemberton, T. Edgar	157	Swete, Dr.	421
Perry, Lord	269	Taber, R. G.	536
Peikins, Rev. T.	103	Tarpey, Kingsley	313
Perowne, Dr. E. H.	53	Tatham, M. T.	346
Perris, G. H.	443	Taunton, Rev. Ethelred L.	313
Perry, Frederick	295	Taylor, Jenner	103
Philip, Rev. A.	468	Tennant, Pamela	462
Phillips, Mr.	270	Thackwell, C.	541
Phillips, Eden	203	Thaw, A. Blair	536
Phillips, C. B.	165	Thirners, Rowland	538
Phythian, J. Ernest	126	Thompson, J.	307, 334
Pickering, Sidney	536	Thomson, C. Linklater	163
Plaintow, P. G.	54	" Thormanby "	421
Præd, Mrs. C.	345	Thornton, J. and S. W.	418
Prescott, E. Livingstone	243	Threlfall, T. R.	49
Price, L. L.	183	Thynne, Robert	105
Procter, Zoe	421	Tollmach, Hon. L.	536
Prowse, R. O.	536	Tovey, Duncan C.	104
Purser, L. C.	445	Tracy, Louis	32
Putnam, Ruth	55	Trayes, F. E. A.	54
Radford, Mrs. C. H.	419	Treherne, P.	340
Raikes, Rt. John	368	Trench, Herbert	17, 271
Rait, Robert	102	Tucker, G.	76
Ralph, Julian	164	Turner, Professor	124
Ramsey, Professor W.	269	Tynan, Katharine	223
Randolph, Lewis	235	Tytler, Sarah	543
Ranome, Jessie	273	Vachell, H. A.	125, 142
Ravenscroft, B. C.	145	Van Dyck, H.	417
Rayleigh, Lord	51	Villar, Linda	17
Raymond, Walter	123, 467	Vielein-Marschl, General	543
Reed, Marcus		Viller, Frederick
Reynolds, Professor		Vivian, Herbert
Reynolds-Ball, E. A.		Walden, Allan F.
		Walford, Mrs. L. B.

CORRESPONDENCE—

"A" was an Archer	108
"A" Apple Pie	127
Abuse of the Possessive, The	57
Adapted Quotations	349
Aftertaste, The	187, 203
Apocryphal Stories	208
Bungalows and Bungalows	374
Canada in English Fiction	226
Central Circulating Library for Work- ing Girls Clubs	127
Cheam School Sixty Years Ago	498, 522
Child's Epitaph, A	571
" Crabs "	88, 127, 168
Decadent Motives	226
Decadents and Anti-Byronists	77
Dictionary of Quotations (French-Ital.)	522
Edinburgh Publishers	38
Edward Fitzgerald and T. E. Brown	251
Emus Head, The	497
English Versions of Foreign Poems	57
Enrolphine	423
Eternal Conflict, The	77
Evil, H. F.	397
Harbottle, Thomas B.	473, 497, 522
Hemymoon in Space, A	227
Humanitarian League, The	447
" Ivory Bride, The "	323, 353
Jingo	570
John Wesley	348, 374
" L'Amour "	208
Late Bishop of Oxford, The	571
Late Mr. F. S. Ellis	570
" Lucius Malet " on Fiction	77
Mr. Augustine Birrell	208
Mr. Procksniff and the Sirens	423
Mr. Wheatley's "Peeps" in America	77
Misattribution	208
Misquotation	374, 397
Napoleon and Mr. Elphinstone	300, 323
National Home Reading Union	147
Poetry of the Twentieth Century	448
Problem Novel, The	167
Prayer Age for a Wife, The	472, 498
Rapier and Dagger	423
Robert Burton and Venus and Adonis	77
" Robustious Comedy " of Shake- speare's Henry V.	38, 77
Richard II.	251
Rickett, Arthur	300, 323, 350
" S. or St. "
Society of Authors, The	349
Shakespeare's "Exercises"	38
Shakespeare First Folio, The	208
Shakespeare and the Gunpowder Plot	350, 374, 396, 424, 448
Shenstone's "Lines at an Inn at Henley"	397
Sir John Peter Grant	251
Songs of the Sword and the Soldier	423
Split Infinitive	167, 187, 208
"Seesaw" Dialect in Hall	546
Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler	108
Tennyson on the Signature in Criticism	571
Victor Hugo	163
Victorian Women Writers	323
"Women and Men of the French Renaissance"	571

Digitized by Google

NOTES—(continued)	PAGE	NOTES—(continued)	PAGE	BIOGRAPHY—(continued)	PAGE	EDUCATIONAL—	PAGE
Puck's "Club"	2	"Warwick Edition" of George Eliot's Works	151	Francis Letters	309	Æschylus, Eumenides	417
Punch	431	Wheeler, Miss E.	232, 428	From Suffolk Led to London Merchant (J. Harvey)	74	Books of Reference for Students and Teachers of French	416
Purcell's "Fairy Queen"	453	White v. Constable	256, 280	Further Memoirs of Marie Bashkirtseff	442	Chemistry	416
Puttick and Simpson's Sale	256, 381	Widows as Biographers	323	Gladstone, Talks with Mr.	143	Child, The: His Nature and Nurture	539
Queen Victoria	81	Widows	323	Granville, Later Life of Harriet Countess	342	Contes et Mélanges	416
Queen Victoria's Library	273	Winklebury Camp	451	Gray, The Letters of Thomas	399	Contes Français	416
Queen Victoria, "Lives" of	78, 171	Woolwich Librarian	146	Hare, Memoirs of Edward	182	Course of Education, The	539
"Quo Vadis"	211	Wright, Dr. J.	89	Harley, William, a Citizen of Glasgow	182	Demosthenes on the Crown	416
"Rambler," The	172, 540	Wycliffe's Translation of the Bible	437	Harrison, Joshua Clarkson	74	Dent's School Grammar of Modern French	164
Radcliffe Library	544	Yonge, Miss, Memorial to	453	Herschel, William, and His Work	182	Elementary Geography of England and Wales	538
Reading Tables in Parks	544	Zola and the Novel of the Future	41	Hunter, William	369	Euripides, Bacchæ	417
Recessional	279			Joachim, Joseph	333	Famous Englishmen	535
Remuneration of Authors	323			Jones, Paul, The Founder of the American Navy	464	French Correspondence by Easy Stages	416
"Repertoire d'Épigraphie Sémitique"	323			Last of the Great Scouts, The	393	French Language Drill	538
Reprints from American Papers of 1801	453			Laurenson, The Memoirs of Arthur	467	French Picture Primers	416
"Resurrection"	232			Little Memoirs of the Eighteenth Century	291	German Unseens	538
Reviewed	231			Lord Lilford	34	German Without Tears	538
Revoked Daughter, The	526			Lynn Linton, Mrs.	388	Græcia	538
Richebourg, E.				Lord Monboddo and Some of his Contemporaries	241	Handbook to the Pentateuch	164
"River and the Girl, The," by W. F. Harvey	452			Macarthy, M.D., F.R.S., The Memoirs of James	162	Herodotus IV	417
Robinson, Mr., and "In Memoriam"	353			My Autobiography (Max Müller)	239	History of English Literature	535
Rochester Edition of Dickens Works	377			Napoleon Præsonnier	294	History of Rome, A	535
"Romance of Science"	112			Notes from a Diary, 1889-1891	393	History of South Africa	536
Rosenger, Peter	522			Old Highland Days	445	Introduction to the Study of Physics, An, Vol. I.	417
Rossetti, G.	522			Petrie, Irene	74	Latin Course	536, 537
Rostand, M.	475			Popular Royalty	223	Le Bloeus	538
Royal Geographical Society	429			Roberts as a Soldier in Peace and War	53	Little Arthur's History of Greece	535
Royal Literary Fund Dinner	428			Roberts of Pretoria	53	London Matriculation Directory	535
Royal Navy, History of	354, 398, 477			Rosebery, Lord, Imperialist	247	Manual of Elementary Science, The	164
Rumania, Queen of	477			St. Anthony of Padua	182	Modern Chemistry	417
Ruskin	83			St. Louis	296	Notes sur l'Éducation Publique	417
St. Petersburg Library	146			Seventy Years at Westminster	33	Outline History of the British Empire	535
St. Theresa	581			Shifting Scenes	179	Poems of English History	535
Sala, G. A.	92			Steinart, The Reminiscences of	73	Practical Book-keeping	204
Salamon, C. K.	549			Stories of the Queen	162	Præcis and Præcis Writing	539
Salvation Army and Dramas	152			Tait, F. C.	173	Primer of French Literature	416
San Francisco Public Library	105			Talk, F. C.	162	Questions of King Henry V.	164
Shakespeare, Mons.	2			Talk, F. C.	162	Readings in Welsh History	535
Sardou, M.	502			Talk, F. C.	162	Rise of Hellas	417
Saturday Openings of Libraries	372			Talk, F. C.	162	School History of England	535
Schmetterlingsnacht	152			Talk, F. C.	162	Secondary Teaching and Elementary Teaching and Sick Nursing	164
School System	212			Talk, F. C.	162	Short History of the Greeks, A	534
Scott, Sir W.	523			Talk, F. C.	162	South America	538
Scottish History Society	378			Talk, F. C.	162	Temple Molière	538
"Secret Rose," The	572			Talk, F. C.	162	Thucydides	416
Segantini	572			Talk, F. C.	162	Waterloo	538
Seriales	132			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare and Bacon	42, 378			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare Festival at Stratford-on-Avon	353			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare Quarto, Sale of	173			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare, Folios	388, 428			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare's House, Sale of	428			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare's Statue at Weimar	2			Talk, F. C.	162
Shakespeare's Tomb	192, 211			Talk, F. C.	162
Shaw, B.	185			Talk, F. C.	162
Shepherd, J.	231			Talk, F. C.	162
Shorter, C.	475			Talk, F. C.	162
Siddons, Mrs.	59			Talk, F. C.	162
"Sieges of Limerick and Derry"	522			Talk, F. C.	162
Sigerson, Dr.	550			Talk, F. C.	162
Sir William Fraser Chair in Edinburgh University	350, 501, 549			Talk, F. C.	162
Sixpenny Reprints	131			Talk, F. C.	162
Six-shilling Novels	378			Talk, F. C.	162
Skeat, Professor	42			Talk, F. C.	162
Small Type in America	149			Talk, F. C.	162
Smith, Dr. W. C.	279			Talk, F. C.	162
Smith, J. R., Biography of	42			Talk, F. C.	162
Society of Authors' Fund	172, 378, 437			Talk, F. C.	162
Society of Spiritists	322			Talk, F. C.	162
Sotheby's Sale	327			Talk, F. C.	162
"Source Books," History	91			Talk, F. C.	162
South Wales Libraries	325			Talk, F. C.	162
Spencer, H.	168			Talk, F. C.	162
Split Infinitive, The	152, 476, 525			Talk, F. C.	162
Spring, S.	256			Talk, F. C.	162
Spring Announcements	3			Talk, F. C.	162
Stage Society	78			Talk, F. C.	162
Stainer, Sir J.	146			Talk, F. C.	162
Standard English Works in America	378			Talk, F. C.	162
Stanford, E., Change of Address	146			Talk, F. C.	162
Steeple Claydon Library	378			Talk, F. C.	162
Stephen, L.	327			Talk, F. C.	162
Stevenson, Biographies of	153			Talk, F. C.	162
Stevenson's Letters	372			Talk, F. C.	162
Stockill, R.	112			Talk, F. C.	162
Stokes, Miss, Library of	19			Talk, F. C.	162
Student Special Number	429			Talk, F. C.	162
"Studies in Style"	172			Talk, F. C.	162
Sully-Prudhomme, M.	428			Talk, F. C.	162
"Sunset Sonnet," by Ethel Wheeler	428			Talk, F. C.	162
"Sur l'avenir du Clergé"	403			Talk, F. C.	162
"Symbolist, The," by A. Noyes	325			Talk, F. C.	162
Synic Lexicon	304			Talk, F. C.	162
Tabernacle, The, "by F. G. Bowles	549			Talk, F. C.	162
"Tatler," The	526			Talk, F. C.	162
Temple of Minos	1			Talk, F. C.	162
Tenniel, Sir J.	328			Talk, F. C.	162
Tennyson as a Plagiarist	111			Talk, F. C.	162
Tennyson's Works (American Edition)	381			Talk, F. C.	162
Thackeray, New Editions of	476			Talk, F. C.	162
"Thrush," The	302			Talk, F. C.	162
Titus	256, 329, 429, 476, 502			Talk, F. C.	162
Toktoy, Count	132			Talk, F. C.	162
Tony Lumpkin	273			Talk, F. C.	162
Tottenham Library	544			Talk, F. C.	162
Transfer Tickets in Libraries	58			Talk, F. C.	162
"Travail"	551			Talk, F. C.	162
Travel, The Literature of	273			Talk, F. C.	162
Travelling Libraries	508			Talk, F. C.	162
Turnbull, W.	73			Talk, F. C.	162
Tyler, Dr. Moses Coit	149			Talk, F. C.	162
United States Copyright Laws	56			Talk, F. C.	162
United States Free Libraries	172			Talk, F. C.	162
Vale Press Publications	476			Talk, F. C.	162
Velasquez	256			Talk, F. C.	162
"Venice," by J. E. Patterson	428			Talk, F. C.	162
Verlaine	453			Talk, F. C.	162
Vernes, Jules	289			Talk, F. C.	162
Villemeuve, Guyot de	453			Talk, F. C.	162
Virgil, Monument at Mantua	472			Talk, F. C.	162
Virtue, Change of Address	475			Talk, F. C.	162
Vistas of Futurity	429			Talk, F. C.	162
Voght, Marquis de	429			Talk, F. C.	162
Wallace Collection, The	429			Talk, F. C.	162
Ward, Dr. A. W.	476			Talk, F. C.	162

CTION—(continued)	PAGE	FICTION—(continued)	PAGE	LITERARY—(continued)	PAGE	ORIENTAL—	PAGE
o of Romance	126	Time's Fool	371	Oswald von Wolkenstein	223	Bibliographie des Ouvrages Arabes	244
Rival Claimants	543	Tragedy of a Pedigree	144	Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare	315	Buddha and Buddhism	243
neymoon in Space	371	Traitor in London, A	299	Pages from a Journal	35	Buddhist Manual of Psychological	243
Familiar Foe	345	Trinity Bells	166	Religious Spirit in the Poets, The	32	Ethics of the Fourth Century A.C.	243
Own Father	222	Troddles and Us	226	Robert Buchanan, the Poet of Modern	364	Imitation of Buddha, The	102
Lordship's Whim	322	Twist Devil and Deep Sea	225	Revolt	227	Leider der Lydischen Wüste	244
ils of the Fell	421	Understudies	542	Robert Louis Stevenson	227	List of Photographic Negatives	244
imitable Mrs. Massingham, The	127	Under the Redwoods	543	Roots Essayists	183	Palestinian Syriac Texts from Palimp-	244
the Palace of a Woman	126	Vaulted Chamber, The	419	Selected Essays	285	est Fragments	244
ner Shrine, The	105	Vereker Family, The	106	Shakespeare, William, Poet, Dramatist,	138	Social Life of the Hebrews, The	243
rades, The	105	Verity	196	and Man	32	Voices of the Past from Assyria and	244
or-Bride, The	207	Veronica Verdant	207	Shakespeare Sermons	220
any of the Villa	55	Villa Ruben	249	Sir Walter Scott	35
hn Charity	76	V sits of Elizabeth, The	86	Sleeping Beauty	30
hn Townley : A Tale for the Times	418	Vizier's Daughter, A	37	Studies in European Literature	30
idith	145	Voyage	421	(Taylorian Lectures 1889-1899)	163
die, a Study of a Girl	207	Warden of the Marches, The	542	Study of Poetry	163
aven of Love, The	298	Wastrel, The, and his Times	104	Welsh Poets of To-day and Yesterday	540
esser Evil	238	Wayside Wood, A	208	Where is Your Husband?	444
esson for Life, A	249	Whittonville Stories	185	Wise Men and a Fool	444
est We Forget	420	White Cottage, The	418
esters of Her Mother to Elizabeth	470	Wizard's Knot, The	247
fe Romantic, The	184	Woman's Burden, A	289
ne Star Rush, The	420	Yolande, the Parisienne	54
et Land, The	418
ve of Comrades	37
ve in our Village	106
ve and Honour	298
ver's Replie to an Englishwoman's	469
Love Letters, The	470
ove the Laggard	185
uck of Private Foster, The	396
ylbeth	345
ladame Marie, Singer	248
ladness of David Baring, The	127
laking of Christopher Ferringham, The	55
lan Who Forgot, The	207
lan with the Parrots, The	346
lany Days After	249
larrriage of True Minds	469
Mary Bray, Her Mark	184
Master Passion, The	321
Master Sinner, The	143
Mayor of Littlejey, The	165
Minder, The	37
Minor Canon, The	249
Missing Hero, A	346
Missing Replie to an Englishwoman's	469
Love Letters, The	184
Miss Spinney	321
Mononia	143
Monsieur Bergeret à Paris	165
Monster, The	37
Morrison's Machine	419
Moving Finger Writes, The	145
My First Voyage : My First Lie	345
My India Queen	59
My Lady of Orange	298
My New Curate	206
My Son Richard	419
Narrow Way, A	229
Nance	225
Naomi's Exodus	184
New Master, The	371
Northborough Cross	372
Northern Lights and Shadows	147
Number One and Number Two	447
Observations of Henry, The	55
Obstinate Pariah, An	421
Odd Fish	568
On the Other Side of the Latch	17
One of Ourselves	104
Order of Isis, The	420
Our Family Portraits	519
Our Friend the Charlatan	239
Outcast of the Family, The	419
Outcast Emperor, The	76
Parious Times	541
Parson Peter	372
Pastorals of Dorset	166
Patched-up Affair, A	248
Peccavi	145
Prettiness of Fools, The	420
Pride of England	104
Prince Rupert	420
Princess of Arcady	346
Pro Patria	165
Quality Corner	543
Queen's Mate	248
Redemption of David Corson, The	447
Rogue in Love, A	144
Rosa Amorosa	371
Royal Sisters, The	76
Running Amok	225
Sacred Fount, The	541
Scholar of His College, A	207
Scoundrels and Co.	541
Seal of Silence, The	207
Second Love	541
Second Youth of Theodora Desanges,	299
Secretary of Legation, A	104
Sen and the Unseen, The	421
Sentence of the Court, The	346
Sea	419
Shadow of Gilead, The	346
Ship's Adventure, The	298
Shylock of the River	299
Silver Skull, The	418
Small-Part Lady, The	146
Soldier of the King, A	322
Son of Austerity, A	55
Soul of the Countess, The	248
Story of Ronald Kestrel, The	225
Straight Shooter	419
Strange Experiences of Mr. Verschoyle	447
Strange Happenings	145
Strength of Straw, The	299
Syndicate of Sinners, A	248
Taken by Assault	448
Tales that are Told	225
Tales of Indian Chivalry	385
Tangled Trinites	386
Tapu of Bander	322
This Body of Death	322
Three Days Terror	345
Three Friends, The	145

REPRINTS—(continued)	PAGE	SUPPLEMENTS (continued)	PAGE	THEOLOGY—(continued)	PAGE	TOPOGRAPHY, &c.—(continued)	PAGE
In Praise of Folly	52	Latin Self-Educator in	6	Body of Christ	341	Half Hours in Japan	36
Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson ..	125	Livy Book I. and Book XXI	7	Book of Peace, The	103	Harrow	417
Lyra Apostolica	343	Miltiades and Epaminondas	8	Christian Conference Essays	69	Helwan and the Egyptian Desert ..	125
Memoir of My Life and Writings (Gibbon)	12	Plato, Selections from	6	Christ an Egypt	181	Highways and Byways in East Anglia ..	143
"Methuen's Little Library"—Lavengro ..	343	Pliny, Selected letters of	8	Christ the Truth	71	History of the Midland Railway, The ..	247
Pendennis, Pride and Prejudice	343	Scale Tertius	7	Clue	71	Holiday Leaflets	563
Nut-Brown Maid	52	Sallust : Catiline	7	Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans	71	Homeland Handbooks	555
Pilgrims' Way, The	562	Tentamina	7	Confession and Absolution	204	Indian Border, The	220
Poems of James Thomson	343	Tully's Offices	6	Counsels for Church People	162	In Tibet and Eastern Turkestan	441
Poe's Poems	236	Xenophon, Anabasis	7	Dissent in England	204	In Tuscany, Tuscan Towns, Tuscan Types, and the Tuscan Tongue ..	183
Psalms of David	343	ENGLISH :-		Encyclopedia Biblica	139	Italian Cities	557
Sartor Resurtus	343	Arithmetic, Business, Elementary Stage ..	10	Facsimiles of Biblical Manuscripts ..	367	Itinerary of the English Cathedrals ..	551
Shakespeare :- Julius Cesar and Two Gentlemen of Verona	52, 538	Astronomy, Primer of	10	Fatal Opulence of Bishops, The ..	102	Jerusalem and its Environs, Practical Guide to	467
Spanish Conquest of America	52	Botany	10	Flora of the Sacred Nativity	155	Kebbleland	550
SCIENCE—		Civilization of the East, The	11	Genesis	358	Khurān and Sistan	232
Chemistry an Exact Mechanical Philosophy	52	Continental Geography Readers	11	Hudbrook to Old Testament History, A ..	356	Little Tour in France, A	295
Electricity	125	Daniel, The Book of	10	History of Confession to 1215	204	Living Races of Mankind, The	246
Forty Years of Work in Canada	164	Dynamics, Treatise on Elementary	10	History of the Roman Movement in the Church of England (1833-1864) ..	71	Madagascar, Mauritius, and other East Indian Islands	125
Scientific and Educational	52	Easy Lesson on Israel in Egypt	10	Huldreich Zwingli	341	Malvern Country, The	561
Human Ear, The	340	Geometry Book, A First	10	Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, An	366	Manchuria	465
Modern Astronomy	340	Greek Drama, The	11	Joshua	538	Modern Abyssinia	142
Scientific Papers	51, 295	Handbook to the Gospel according to St. Matthew	10	Lines of Defence of the Biblical Revelation	70	Mount Omi and Beyond	161
Studies in Fossil Botany	52	Hydrostatics, The Elements of	10	Miracles of Unbelief	293	Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford	103
Studies, Scientific and Social	365	Plant Life and Structure	10	Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament	366	Naples, Past and Present	557
Treatise on Zoology	51	School Management and Methods of Instruction	11	Poet of Home Life, The	103	Narrative of General Venables, The ..	121
SOCIOLOGY.		Scott : "Ivanhoe," "Old Mortality," "Woodstock"	9	Pro Patria	70	Natives of South Africa, The	318
Occasional Essays on Native South Indian Life	182	Scott Readers for Young People	9	Savonarola	53	New Way Around an Old World	353
SPORTS AND PASTIMES—		Shakespeare : Henry V	9	Sermons on Faith and Doctrine	138	Oxford, Alden's Guide to	553
Bridge Whist—Bridge Abridged	163	Scott's "Ivanhoe," "Old Mortality," "Woodstock"	9	Soothsayer Balaam, The	341	Pages from the Journal of a Queens-land Squatter	164
By Land and Sky	124	Scott Readers for Young People	9	What is Christianity?	341	Paris in its Splendour	123
Eight Duke of Bedford and the Badminton Hunt	435	Story of Thought and Feeling, The ..	11	With Christ in Sailor Town	296	Pearson's Gossipy Guides	561
English Turf, The	296	Temple Continuous Readers	11			Philip's Guides	562
From Gladiator to Persimmon	223	Temple Girls' Readers	11			Picturesque History of Yorkshire, A ..	443
Kings of the Rod, Rifle, and Gun ..	307, 334	Temple Literary Readers	11			Play and Politics in Malaya	343
Laws and Principles of Vint, The ..	53	Temple Nature Readers	11			Romance of Spain, The	51
Outdoor Games : Cricket and Golf ..	390	Twentieth Century New Testament ..	11			Romance of the South Pole, The ..	35
Secrets of the Sword	66					Rouen	202
Sixty Years on the Turf	519					Rumania in 1900	103
Wildfowler in Scotland, The	103					Sailing Alone Round the World	101
SUPPLEMENTS—						Seaside Watering Places	563
March 16th, 1901—Publishers' Spring Announcements						Short History of Sierra Leone	125
Feb. 2nd Educational Supplement.						South Africa a Century Ago	318
CLASSICAL—						Story of Assisi, The	201
Alceste	7					Sunny Days at Hastings and St. Leonards	369
Athenian Drama, The—						Survey (County Guides)	553
Aeschylus : The Oresteian Trilogy ..	4					Survey of London, The	303
The Captivity of Plautus	5					Switzerland, Guide to	563
The Odyssey	5					These from the Land of Sinim	314
Catiline	7					Through Siberia	199
Cicero, Letters of	6					Traveller, The	564
Cicero on Old Age and Friendship ..	6					Traveller's Colloquial French	564
Cicero, Orations of	6					Travels in the East of Nicholas II., Emperor of Russia, when Cesarewitch, 1890-1891	285
Demosthenes against Meidias	7					Vagabond in Asia, A	53
Demosthenes, Olynthiacs	7					Voyage of Robert Dudley	121
Greek Unseen	8					Ward, Lock's Shilling Guides	561
Latin Course, Preceptors	8					West African Studies	181
						Winchester	417
						Year in China, A	315
						Zermatt, Guide to	563

Literature

Published by

The Times.

No. 168. SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	1, 2, 3, 4
PERSONAL VIEWS—"Decadent Metres," by J. E. Patterson	4
FOREIGN LETTER—The Literary Year in France	5
OLD BOOKS IN 1900	7
THE INTERNATIONAL CATALOGUE OF SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE, by Professor A. W. Rücker.....	8
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	10
REVIEWS—
The Life of Abdur Rahman, Amir of Afghanistan	10
Gibbon's Memoirs	12
The Baroness de Bode	13
Happy Suffering	14
Recent Verse—
The Finding of the Book, and other Poems—Pooms, Chiefly Sacred
—The Handy Man—More Anagrams—Odes	14, 15
Giorgione	16
One of Ourselves—A Daughter of the Fields—By an Unseen Hand
—A Twofold Silence.....	17
ART NOTES	16
AMONG THE MAGAZINES.....	17
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for.....	18, 19
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	20

NOTES OF THE DAY.

It is perhaps not too much to say that the great journalistic event marking the close of the century is the retirement of Sir John Tenniel from the staff of Punch. For fifty years he has pictured weekly the best side of the popular feeling of the moment on current events. Admirable draughtmanship and dignity of treatment—these are not always certainly the first merits required of a caricaturist. But Sir John Tenniel is not really a caricaturist; he has never been indeed first-rate in the art of catching a likeness. But as the great artistic interpreter of national sentiment, now humorous, now pathetic, but always felicitous, he has probably had no equal in any country. His successor, it almost goes without saying, is Mr. Linley Sambourne.

Few standard authors have been so largely represented among recent reprints as Sir Walter Scott, and the first two volumes of yet another edition of the Waverley Novels have just reached us from Messrs. A. and C. Black, of a handy size, very clearly printed, in a tasteful binding, and unencumbered with modern comment. We shall publish next week a full-page reproduction of Sir Edwin Landseer's portrait of Sir Walter Scott now in the National Portrait Gallery, which our readers, we hope, will like to possess, and will find suitable for framing.

The new practice of compiling history source books, some of which we have noticed recently, is a vivid way of recovering the past; and better than most surveys of the period is the "Source Book" of the past century which The Times has Vol. VIII. No. 1.

published this week in the form of extracts—representing each year since 1801—from its own columns. We not only have facts recalled, but—what is more important—points of view. Almost every really great event is brought to our recollection in an intensely interesting way. In the last fifty years poetry is prominent, and the half-century leads off with Thackeray's fine "May Day Ode" in 1851. "Letters to the Editor" are, of course, included. We have a letter from Carlyle, June 19, 1844, on Mazzini's letters, which shows how powerfully he could write even when his mannerisms were forgotten; and we have Dickens' fine protest against public executions on Nov. 14, 1849. How Carlyle's mannerisms first affected his public appears from a review of his "French Revolution" which Thackeray wrote for The Times on Aug. 3, 1837. For Thackeray, the "choking double-words" and other eccentricities of Carlyle's "mar his subject and dim his genius." But he gets more used to them as he reads on, and is full of praise of the historian's impartiality.

We shall publish next week some extracts illustrative of literary criticism during the century. One of the most familiar observations of the present day is that the real art of criticism is dead. Criticism, of course, suffers from over-production; but we should fancy that, so far as well-informed reviewing is concerned, the criticism of to-day—when it gets away from photographs of authors and their birthplaces—has, on the whole, improved, simply because the general standard of culture is a little bit higher. The critics praised, and justly praised, the recent books of Lord Rosebery and Mr. Morley; but they were perfectly aware that "Napoleon: the Last Phase" did not add anything to history regarded as a congeries of external facts, and that Mr. Morley's "Cromwell" did not pretend to strike the world by a new view of the Protector.

There will not [be so many] centenaries of great writers to celebrate this year as last, when the excitement was divided between Chaucer, Cowper, and James Thomson, and might have been extended to Dryden, Hooker, and Macaulay. The 21st of February next will be the hundredth anniversary of John Henry Newman's birth, but the treacherous ashes, not yet cold over the fires kindled by the Oxford Movement, demand wary walking. The 9th of August will be the centenary of G. P. R. James' birth, but in James' ashes the fire, it is to be feared, is out. When, however, Mr. Stephen Phillips ventured in Herod to refer to "a solitary horseman," criticism, it appeared, had not forgotten that that venerable figure was a property of G. P. R. James. Or there is the two-hundredth anniversary of the death of Sedley, to whom, according to the Merry Monarch, nature had given a patent to be Apollo's viceroy, and his style would be the standard of the English tongue. Apart from this encomium he lives in literature as the Lisideius of Dryden's essay, and as the author of the charming lyrics to Chloris and Celia. But Sir Charles Sedley's is scarcely a name to conjure with to-day.

Enthusiasm that the public can spare for literary anniversaries may, however, be concentrated on the millenary of good King Alfred.

* * * *

Mr. Thomas Hardy has written verses at odd moments for some thirty years; and he collected them, it will be remembered, a little more than a year ago in "Wessex Poems and other Verses." He is by no means the only novelist who takes to poetry in the intervals of fiction. Besides Mr. Meredith, Mr. Conan Doyle has given us some stirring verse; and his "Who's that Calling?" is about the best Imperial song we have had. Mr. Hardy has recently appeared in the Sphere with a rhymed legend called "The Lost Pyx," and in the Graphic with a poem on the new century—a curious contrast to the large and rather vague imaginings of the Poet Laureate in his "The Passing of the Century" published in The Times of Monday. Mr. Hardy is unambitious and strictly lyrical. He is dreaming over fate rather pessimistically when a thrush's sudden note rouses him to hopefulness and to song. We commend this idea to the editor of the new poetical periodical which we notice elsewhere.

* * * *

The Poet Laureate buries the old year in four stanzas, and greets the new in two. We quote the last stanza to show his metre and his manner.

Yet mind her dawn of the dark, for she,
She too must pass 'neath the lych-gate porch;
And give to her keeping the vestal Torch,
That may off-time smoulder, and sometimes scorch,
But rebrilliantens and burns eternally:
The beacon on land and the star at sea,
When the night is murky, and the mist is dense,
To guide us Whither, remind us Whence,
The Soul's own lamp through the shades of sense.
She must tread the Unknown the dead year trod;
Though rugged the road, yet the goal is God,
And the will of all-wise Omnipotence.

* * * *

The Morning Post has opened a subscription list with the object of helping the local authorities of Stratford-on-Avon to pay for the repairing of Shakespeare's tomb.

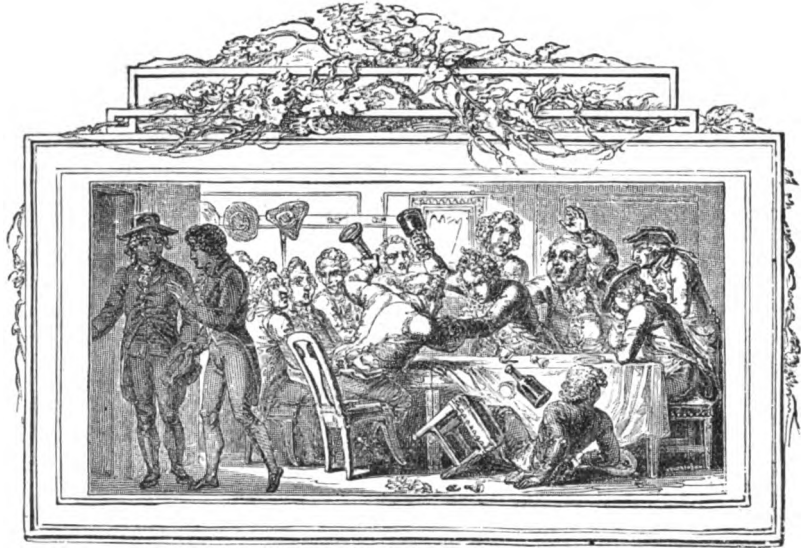

* * * *

Do the late M. Sarcey's observations on Shakespeare in the most recent volume of the famous critic's "Quarante Ans de Théâtre" illustrate, as most of M. Sarcey's criticisms did the attitude of the average French mind? To M. Sarcey King Lear was a "horrible nightmare"; Hamlet he could not understand, nor did he believe any one else could. A Midsummer Night's Dream pleased him, on the whole, not because of its delicious poetry, but because Shakespeare with his incomparable stage knowledge and instinct knew exactly how to mix the fairy and the comic elements. The Merchant of Venice was not a piece to be taken seriously, but an operetta "avec cette réserve, que les espaces qui sont chez nous réservés à la musique dans l'opérette le sont ici à la poésie." Much Ado about Nothing appeared to M. Sarcey to be a "marivandage" combined with melodramatic elements. It must be remembered that M. Sarcey had little English, no more, he admits, than was necessary "pour deviner un article de journal." Even so, his opinions are surprising in their frank inability to grasp the inwardness of Shakespeare's genius. What would be said in France if one of our foremost dramatic critics were to treat Molière or even Racine in this fashion?

* * * *

Some very interesting examples of old woodcuts are reproduced in a recent reprint published by Mr. Freemantle, and the pictures are a good example of book illustration of the older school. The book, well got up with gilt edges, and a picture in gilt line on the cover, is "The Club," that forgotten work of James Puckle, Notary Publick, who died in 1724, in which he embodied, in the form of a Dialogue between a Father and Son, "Maxims, Advice, and Cautions," and called it "A Grey Cap for a Green Head." Mr. Austin Dobson introduces this "hotchpot of maxims and aphorisms, some of which are wise, some quaint, some shrewd, and some (inevitably) commonplace," with a preface on Puckle and the bibliography of his books. The inclusion of the designs of John Thurston, a well-known draughtsman at the beginning of this century, make up for whatever may be to seek in the interest of the text. We reproduce his picture of the Club, the proceedings of which, as reported by the "Son," were the occasion of the sage observations of the "Father."

[From "The Club" (Freemantle).]

* * * *

Sir Thomas Clark, whose death was announced the other day, was not the first publisher to fill the highest position which the city of Edinburgh can offer—that of Lord Provost. Mr. Adam Black (who founded the firm of Adam and Charles Black in 1807 and made it famous in connexion with the Encyclopædia Britannica and the Waverley Novels) became Lord Provost in 1843. He held the office for six years, and subsequently went to Westminster as representative of the city. The house of T. and T. Clark had been founded a quarter of a century when Sir Thomas entered it, and he became sole partner when his uncle, the founder, died. His name is associated with many important theological and philosophical series, including The Foreign Theological Library, The International Theological Library, and The International Critical Commentary. Dr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible," which Messrs. Clark also publish, is in its third volume, the fourth volume being in the press. Sir Thomas's elder son, Mr. John Maurice Clark, who succeeds to the title, is now the senior partner of the firm.

* * * *

Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, whose death is announced, was a well-known American politician—Governor, Congressman, and Senator of his native State, Minnesota. It is a pity that his name will be remembered as that of a literary "crank" instead of a capable politician. By a series of almost entirely arbitrary rules and calculations he evolved a cypher code in the First Folio of Shakespeare (printed some years after Shakespeare's death), and extracted from one of the plays, by sheer violence, the sentence: "Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans, wrote these plays in his spare time, when he had any, and generously presented them to one William Shakespeare, actor." That there was no Viscount St. Albans living in Shakespeare's lifetime did not trouble Mr. Donnelly.

Nevertheless, he found a sufficient following to ensure, at any rate, the record of his "discovery" in the history of literary curiosities.

* * * *

Though the Covenanters continue to be held in great veneration north of the Tweed, and it is regarded as almost criminal to hint that any of them were less than perfect, a vast amount of ignorance exists concerning them. Men speak with pride of "the Covenanters" who could not name the leading men among them, who know nothing of their principles, and who probably never even heard of the "Queensferry Paper" or the "Sanquhar Declaration." Only the other day, when the "Covenanters' House" at Queensferry was sold, some, otherwise well-informed, Scottish newspapers described it as the place where Donald Cargill, "one of the writers of what was known as the 'Queensferry Paper,' received the blow which caused his death." As a matter of fact Donald Cargill was executed in Edinburgh, where, in the language of the day, he "glorified God in the Grassmarket"; the person who received his death-blow at the Queensferry hostelry was Henry Hall of Haughhead. In the latest volume of the "Heroes of the Covenant Series" (Paisley: Alexander Gardner) an excellent account is given of "The Life and Times of Donald Cargill, Minister of the Barony Church, Glasgow." The author, the Rev. W. H. Carlaw, writes as a partisan; but he gives much valuable information regarding an important period in Scottish history. Cargill was the minister of the congregation which worshipped in the Laigh Kirk or Crypt of the Cathedral of Glasgow, described in Scott's "Rob Roy" as the place where Francis Osbaldistone was taken by Andrew Fairservice, and where he received a private warning from Rob Roy. For refusing to take part in the public thanksgiving for the Restoration, and for other causes, Cargill was banished beyond the Tay. He was one of the more extreme men, and after the battle of Bothwell Brig, where he was wounded, drafted the "Queensferry Paper" in which the King and the Government were rejected "from being our King and rulers." The story of Cargill's life during the 19 years after he was expelled from the Barony Church is most interesting, and is well told.

* * * *

From America:—

The successful American man of business seems likely to have a new field for his ambition. He is, so many people are beginning to think, the proper man to preside over a University. There might be the same scope for him in England if it were not for ancient endowments. Dr. Gilman has resigned the office of President of the Johns Hopkins University of Baltimore, and a well-known financier of New York and Baltimore has been suggested as his successor. The fact that the Johns Hopkins University has need to increase its funds may have something to do with this proposal. Other Universities are in the same predicament. The Brown University at Providence, R.I., is trying to raise a second sum of a million dollars for endowment. The University of California is contemplating an expenditure of ten million dollars in buildings, and the budget of Columbia College, New York, just issued for the coming year, provides for the expenditure of nearly one million dollars for educational and administrative purposes, and of 170,000 dollars, or thereabouts, for interest on bonds and the expenses of management. These pecuniary requirements are often a proof of the lack of good business management. The trustees have other businesses to look after, and are efficient only as an advisory committee. The same talent that builds up a mercantile or financial institution is required to manage the complicated business of a University, and many people are beginning to think that what is wanted is a man of affairs, with a competent knowledge of business and finance, and a larger knowledge of the world than is usually found in distinguished scholars.

The management of a "University" on business principles has sometimes another side. A flourishing industry has just received its death blow by the conviction of "Dr." James Armstrong, President of the Metropolitan and Independent Medical Colleges and the Illinois Health University. The work of his University was entirely confined to the selling diplomas to applicants for cash down. There is a simplicity in this method of conferring degrees which proved highly attractive. The Post Office authorities, however, intervened on the ground that the learned doctor was using the mails for fraudulent purposes, and his career of usefulness has been brought to an untimely end.

During the past year in America the historical novel has held its own. Miss Johnston's "To Have and To Hold" comes first by a long way, then Mr. James Lane Allen's "Reign of Law," while closely following on this is Mr. Churchill's "Richard Carvel" and Mr. Paul Leicester Ford's "Janice Meredith." Their sale in England has been limited almost in every case owing to their local colouring. In belles lettres one book stands out from the rest, Mr. Edmund Clarence Stedman's "American Anthology," only recently published. Mr. Stedman some three years ago collected together a volume of poetry entitled "A Victorian Anthology," and the American people, indeed all Anglo-Saxons, cannot feel too appreciative to Mr. Stedman for his persevering labour. Mr. Seton-Thompson's books are very popular, and Messrs. Scribner have sold 71,444 copies of his "Wild Animals I Have Known." Mr. Wyckoff's two books on "The Workers of the East and West of the States" have maintained a steady sale, as also have Mr. Hillegas' two volumes on the South African embroglio, particularly "Oom Paul's People." A volume that appeals chiefly to Americans has found a ready public; it is "Nooks and Corners of Old New York." Other books constantly asked for during the year were the Dooley Books, Josiah Flynt's tramping volumes, Mr. Fiske's works, and Julia Ward Howe's "Reminiscences." Other volumes of importance have been:—Mr. Hudson's two volumes, "Psychic Phenomena" and "The Divine Pedigree of Man," a translation of Hauptmann's "Sunken Bell," Savage's "Life Beyond Death," Captain Slocum's "Sailing Alone Around the World," and McClay's "History of American Privateers." In the "fall" of the year the volumes which succeeded were "Love Letters of a Musician" and "Later Love Letters of a Musician," Julian Ralph's "Towards Pretoria," Van Dyke's "Fisherman's Luck," Lloyd's "Country Without Strikes," "China's Open Door," by Mr. R. Wildman, and Roosevelt's "Oliver Cromwell." The books of the last few weeks of any importance have been "With Both Armies in South Africa," "A Literary History of America," "The Fields of Dawn, and other Poems," by Lloyd Mifflin, Buell's "Paul Jones," and "American Fights and Fighters," by Cynes Townshend Brady.

Another book which has sold well shows the popularity of limited editions of standard English works among the cultured classes in America—viz., Pepys' Diary, edited by W. H. Wheatley. It was published in three forms, each set containing 18 volumes—the Magdalene College Edition of 75 copies; the Bampton Edition of 250 copies; and the limited Library Edition of 1,000 copies. The orders now received by the publishers, Croscup and Sterling, exhaust the issue.

Among the book collectors of America who can afford high-priced volumes the method of issuing limited editions with each set numbered is becoming more and more the fashion, and there is a keen competition to get early numbers. In this way the "Life and Works of Lord Tennyson," in 14 volumes, was recently disposed of almost as soon as it was issued, in a royal edition of 26 lettered sets, and a limited edition of 50 numbered sets, the prices ranging from £16 to £35.

Mr. W. J. Bryan intends to find consolation for his recent defeat in newspaper work. He is starting a weekly paper, the Commoner, which will defend the principles of the Kansas City platform. "Through such a paper," he says, "I shall be able to keep in touch with social and political problems . . . and provide an income for my pecuniary needs." If he hopes to convert the American public to free silver he will have an uphill fight; though he can, doubtless, obtain financial backing for the purpose.

Sir Walter Besant's familiar causeries in the columns of the Queen came to an end last week. They have had many readers, even among those who do not regard the Causeries. greater part of the contents of that excellent newspaper as written for their learning; and in reading the farewell comment on "The Passing Show" one had the sensation of parting with a friend. The sensation disarms cavil and compels a favourable verdict. From certain points of view these weekly instalments of gossip about things in general were no doubt open to criticism. One critic might object to their staccato style, and another might wish that they harped less continually on the wickedness of publishers—a theme no less capable of palling through undue iteration than the wickedness of cooks and parlourmaids. But every man has a hobby-horse of some sort that he wants to ride—more especially every man whose personality is strong and well-defined; and in a causerie it is personality far more than literary skill that tells. Many brilliant writers, justly famous in other fields, have failed lamentably as causeurs. We are thinking of two eminent contemporary novelists who essayed the art, abandoned it, and confided to their friends that it bored them. Possibly they were not the only persons whom their endeavours bored. Their conception of a causerie was a periodical display of literary fireworks, and fireworks are things that dazzle more than they delight. One may begin by admiring them, but their continuance by no means engenders the feeling that intimate personal relations have been established between the spectators and the man who lets them off. Fireworks, in fact, are impersonal. The essence of the causerie is that it introduces into the circle a new friend who gradually becomes an old friend, whose temperament we know as well as his opinions, whose defects we get to like as well as his qualities, whose good stories we are willing to hear a second time. And as these conditions are not fulfilled by the causeur who merely lets off fireworks, so also they are not fulfilled by the causeur who merely entertains us with anecdotal reminiscences of his illustrious friends. We all know such causeurs. Of one the sole raison d'être may be that he has sometimes supped in the past with Sir Henry Irving and Mr. J. L. Toole; of another the causeries may be little more than a diary of his visits to and conversation with contemporary men and women of letters; a third may leave us weekly with the impression that there never was a literary man before who was on such intimate terms with so many hotel-keepers in all corners of the United Kingdom. This kind of thing is not a causerie in the proper sense of the word. From the literary point of view it ranks with the gossip in M.A.P. The true causerie is the natural and easy expression of an individuality and an outlook upon life. The individuality need not even be attractive; the point of view need not be that of the reader. But the point of view must be clear and the individuality must be strong. It was this precision of thought and this evident force and originality of character that accounted for the wide interest taken in the causeries contributed by J. F. Nisbet to the Referee. Many of his readers must often have resented things he said; but they looked forward, nevertheless, to their weekly meeting with that iconoclast, laying about him with a sledge-hammer, and smashing up the idols of the market-place. He knew what he wanted to say; you could not predict it; but when he had said it, it was just what you would have expected him to say. Grant Allen was another causeur of the same type. He was like an old friend, dropping in once a week to advise you to nationalize your garden, burn your Bible, and prefer the minor to the major poets. You might have no intention of following his advice on any of these points, but you found it more interesting to follow his breezy arguments in favour of these extravagant proceedings than to be told of a joke cracked by Mr. J. L. Toole at the supper table. Similarly with other causeurs—even with those who have not, as a rule, laid themselves out to prove things. Whenever they have been conspicuously successful it has been in virtue of personal rather than literary qualities, the spirit rather than the letter giving life. It was so with James Payn, whose delightful bonhomie so quickly cheered the readers who had been depressed by the contents of the commonplace books of "G. A. S." It is so with Mr. Andrew Lang, from whom, in consideration of his buoyant spirits and his flippantly cynical attitude towards the popular idols of the hour, we accept a good deal more folk-lore than we really want. It has been so with Sir Walter Besant, who will understand that it is not disparagement but praise to say that his causeries have made him a host of friends, not because of their literary merits, but because his readers learnt to like him.

Personal Views.

DECADENT METRES.

Many things are needed to make up the full totalled signs of the times. Nature, in her everlasting moulding and remoulding, requires even the most insignificant items to complete her continual changing whole; and, with the wilfulness of an imperious mistress, she takes whatever she wants. Thus that most abused of penmen, the "minor poet," is brought in to play his infinitesimal part in the great plan. Take him where we may, in our day he is serious—with, perhaps, the one notable exception of Mr. Seaman, not forgetting Mr. Kipling's occasional under-lying vein of humour. "The curse of stress is on us all"; and not only are our bards damped with the weighty problems and burdens of modern life, they—a proof of their having some artistic faculty—show their over-pressing seriousness in the very metre they use; the iambic, for it is practically the one metre of to-day.

True, it is the ideal one—in English—for earnest work; yet as to its flexibility we have but to refer to honest Ben's song "To Celia," Dryden's "Alexander's Feast," Pope's "Ode to St. Cecilia," that beautiful little lyrical gem of Waller's "Go, lovely rose!"—and to many others, some written in pure iambic lines of equal length, and some in pindarics. But that in which the poets of this day seem particularly to exhibit their stress is in the almost entire disuse of the anapæst and dactyl. In English we have only four proper metres, the two just mentioned, the tripping trochee, and the stately iambus. All others are—so to write—but illegitimate variations of the legitimate.

Thus the two most musical measures we have are dying of cold neglect. And why this return to a too liberal use of the metre that marked our literary history when learning was in fashion? Why make it the favourite now when learning is not in vogue, even in cultured circles?—or, rather, when science is the learning of the day. Why? Because our poets have been asleep on the way, had foul dreams, and forgotten their mission now they have arrived. Beauty and melody in words are being slain by the iron sledge of the stress of life. Just as we have no true lyricist of a high order, so are we barren of the bards who write because they must, and paint mental pictures as with an Eastern brush and the virility of our Northern clime. The bard of to-day, with his poor ludicrous dignity, is

Cooped in a narrow academic cell,
Where horror rules, and sadness loves to dwell,
Life's choicest hours inglorious doth waste,
And leaps, "in search of truth," the bounds of taste.

And what, but the ugly toads and such, which we do not want, does he bring us back from his leaping beyond the pale of beauty?

True, the bard who knows and strives to compass his birth-right can give us as rich beauty in iambic as in any other measure—even more so; but for melody he must quit this cold-state beating out of lines, and either use a pindaric vehicle in which to carry his fancies into our stressful minds or the more lilting means of the dactyl or anapest. Passion accompanied by melody is a forceful power; but—if it may be so expressed—the cold-heat passion of our modern poets is an exasperating quantity of which they would be truly ashamed were they not so blinded by their mask of smile-begetting dignified seriousness. Well could one cry: "Oh, come again—"

Ye frolic Sternes, with Nature's genuine ease,
Who laugh, and talk, and write whate'er you please;
Who wage with solemn form eternal war,
Wit's brighter meaning glimm'ring thro' a star;
Yet 'mid digression's wild meanders scan
Each fond caprice that marks the soul of man.

There are those who would say to the bard, as a critic said to a young versifier some years ago, "Beware of the dactyl as you would of —." In the presence of ears polite the name gives us pause. But is not this the mere duck-and-drake skimming of criticism? What of the "Boat Song" in The Lady of the Lake? or of "Where shall the lover rest," and other songs of Scott's? What of the haunting melody and beauty of Hogg's "Skylark" and of Byron's "Song of Saul before the last Battle"? These—and others almost as good—are written in true dactyl measure; despite the fact of its being one that will "run away" with its writer, one more adapted for those who write with greater ease than depth of thought. But then, in addition to thought, virility and enthusiasm are needed for good work in dactyls; to-day the second is at a large discount among bards, while their enthusiasm is all given to guesses at the landscape in the fog of science.

When we turn to our other lilting metre, the anapestic, we are confronted with scores of pieces which are truly poetical in all that makes poetry—in the idea, its rendering, and the sideward glimpses made up of imagery, metaphor, sentiment, and passion. Moore has been dubbed the poet of fancy. But added to his gift of pretty notions, he possessed the artistic faculty, the sense of construction, talent to tell an interesting tale and project characters on to his canvas; while for the first three of the just mentioned four encrusting beauties of poetry no one need go further than his "Irish Melodies." Passion he certainly had not. But, ah, what pathos, what an amount of genial humanity is found in the lettered Irishman, and—last and greatest—what melody he did have! Shall we ever have another lyrist of his kind? No. For the times which moulded him and his genius into what they became will never be again. One would not be far wrong were he to say, "If Tom Moore could have exchanged his irresistible vein of sadness for some of the passion of his 'noble contemporary,' he would have written in dactyls, and have given us a very wealth of stirring war and sporting songs in the place of these love and wine-loving melodies."

But Moore is not the only one who has given the world such splendid work in anapests. Scott and Byron could use the metre as well as he; and while the Border-bard could infuse it with the power that comes of lofty images, Byron instilled into it the passion which a writer in the Spectator some time ago tried to prove the be-all and end-all of poetry. In addition to these, look at the pastorals and elegies of Shenstone and Brerewood, Beattie's "Hermit," and a host of commendable pieces by other writers. The poets of our day have sufficient thought, and among them are those who see life with both eyes. Then why do they not rivet some of their efforts with the melody that keeps a piece in one's mind after the book is put down?

There are those who go so far as to say that poetry must die—that the unavoidable materialism of coming days must naturally kill it. This one is privileged to doubt. Were not the Romans, in their way, as material and practical as any race the world has known? Yet poetry flourished with them as it does not with us to-day. But if poetry in idea dies not, it seems that melody in words will come very near its death-bed, for it is already sickening that way. What greater proof of this could one have than the continual complaint of musicians—that they are unable to set the lyrics of our poets, for the one reason that such pieces are so unmelodious as to be outside the pale of that which may be sung? Pretty in idea many of them are—pretty enough to please any healthy mind; but with that ends all their attractiveness. Mere prettiness will not make a song that is worthy of the name. They are unlyrical. Not that they are more overburdened with thought than the lyrical little beauties of bygone days. A passing glance is sufficient to show that the old-time songs, still alive and likely to live, have earnest thought and pretty images, united with verbal melody—a singableness, so to write, which, more often than not, is gained solely by a judicious use of the dactyl and the anapest.

J. E. PATTERSON.

Foreign Letter.

THE LITERARY YEAR IN FRANCE.

The last twelve months of this closing century in France have been wanting in what Frenchmen call "literary events." Yet, before attempting a rapid summary of the literary output in Paris during the past year, one may indicate three or four salient literary features of the period. It is, for instance, the year of "l'Aiglon," the year, therefore, of a bubble reputation and a name. "L'Aiglon" was a great "success," it still remains so; but, in spite of the critics who wrote before the publication of the text, it had little to do with literature. The appearance of the volume proves that France has still to wait for a great dramatic poet capable of distinguishing emphasis and rhetoric from the finer resonances, even of such verse as that of "Hernani." M. Rostand is the slave of his verbal images, and not the master of his words. Hailed as a great poet, he is not even a good writer; his work, I repeat, does not directly belong to literature.

At a moment when all the streams of artistic sensibility converged towards a vast World's Fair, verses so sonorous and a play so spectacular responded admirably to the taste of the general spectator. In fact, no estimate of this year's literary work can be made without recalling the predominance of the Exhibition in the preoccupations of Frenchmen. If the Dreyfus affair has seemed in many cases to paralyse the finer sensibilities of certain French writers, if a Lemaitre and a Coppée have produced only scurrilous literary pamphlets, the Exhibition, too, has undoubtedly interrupted the steady flow of books. There is not a bookseller in Paris who will not assure you that never was there a year in which his sales have been so unsatisfactory. If any proof were needed of this it could be found in the increased price of French publications—a change attributed to the publisher, but no doubt accepted eagerly by the bookseller. The buyer grumbled only for forty-eight hours, and finally saw little hardship in having to pay 3f. instead of 2f. 75c. for a book that he had made up his mind to possess.

But the first persons to profit by this rise in the price of books have not been Frenchmen, but foreigners. And this brings us to another feature of the year—namely, the success of a half-a-dozen foreign novelists, the sale of whose books has far exceeded that of native writers. Count Tolstoi's "Resurrection" was bound to obtain instant recognition. Its influence is now being every morning shown in a striking manner in the early pages of M. Zola's new novel, "Travail," which has just begun as a feuilleton in the Aurore, and which must be considered one of the important productions of 1900. But Tolstoi is an old story, and it is not to such as he that I referred. The new authors revealed this year to Frenchmen are conspicuously the Pole Sienkiewicz; the Tyrtæus of the Anglo-Saxons, Mr. Rudyard Kipling; and the anonymous compiler of the "Arabian Nights." Not merely "Quo Vadis," but many another novel by the same eloquent pen has been on every salon table. Not even M. Georges Ohnet, who still continues, in novels like "La Ténébreuse" (Ollendorff), to appeal to the prejudices and primitive tastes of the lower middle class, has ever reached the sale attained by this foreign romance, which, with M. Mardrus' translation of the "Arabian Nights" (Revue Blanche), has been one of the great "successes" of the year. The Mercur de France, moreover, which has introduced the Norwegians to the boulevards and recently undertaken a translation of Nietzsche, has rendered Mr. Kipling also the service of continuous translation. It thus completes the efforts of writers like Mme. Bentzon, M. Abel Chevalley, and M. André Chevrillon to interpret the literature, as Frenchmen call it, "of the North." Mr. Kipling has interested Frenchmen as a type; his writings are studied as a document; but he has entertained them as well. While such men as Mr. Meredith and Mr. Hardy and Mr. Wells are also known and cultivated here, it is Kipling who stands as the representative of English fiction, and this is mainly the result of the efforts of a few critics during the past year. Even M. Brunetière has admitted him to his Review, acting in the spirit of its title, "Review of the Two Worlds," an ideal in which he has no more intelligent assistant than Mme. Bentzon, whose latest novel, "Tchelovek" (Calmann-Lévy), is one of the half-a-dozen best stories of the year.

French fiction, in fact, has been this year relatively meagre in quantity and quality. It has been drowned in the effulgence of the Exhibition, and, to use the classical image of the father of literature, only the very brightest luminaries still remain visible near the moon. M. Huysmans, whose peculiar light would always attract attention, has published nothing. He has been occupied with a book which must be now nearly ready, "L'Oblat," the history of one more stage on his route towards Roman Catholicism. We have had posthumous Maupassants and Daudets, which will add nothing to, but will not detract from, the reputation of these writers. We have had, also, the usual output from the great purveyors of average fiction—M. Ollendorff and M. Fasquelle; but on these long lists there are but half-a-dozen volumes which should be mentioned and read—for instance, M. Muhlfeid's "La Carrière d'André Tourette," M. Octave Mirbeau's "Le Journal d'une Femme de Chambre," and MM. Rosny's "La Charpente." There remain only the names of Barrès, Bourget, and Prévost. From them much is always expected, and they have in large measure fulfilled their silent contract with their admirers. M. Barrès, whose ironic, irritable, and highly-cultivated temperament allows him to preserve a cool detachment, has brought out, in the second volume of his trilogy, "L'Appel au Soldat," a sequel to the suggestive, but chaotic, book "Les Déracinés." This volume is worthy of the author of "Le Jardin de Béatrice," and is one of the best books of the year. M. Bourget's fecundity is astonishing. Throughout the year there have appeared successive volumes of the so-called definitive edition of his works, pruned and Bowdlerized so as to bring them into harmony with his new philosophy of life. At the same time he has brought out three other volumes of tales. These have been noticed in Literature, save the very best, "Un Homme d'Affaires" (Plon)—one of M. Bourget's most satisfactory productions. More and more he is confronting frankly, like a Dumas *fil*s, the general problems of civilized men in society. He has apparently quitted for good the perfumed air of "Mensonges" in order to deal, on a wider canvas, where the perspective of social manners can be kept more true, with the questions which would, nowadays, have interested his master, Balzac. M. Marcel Prévost, after having achieved in "Le Jardin Secret" a little masterpiece of subtle psychology, redolent rather of the eighteenth century than of the epoch of Flaubert, Zola, and Bourget, has been this year obviously under the influence of English fiction, which he admires and knows well. He now appeals to a larger public, and adopts a manner less distinguished, but more really human, and in two volumes published by Lemaire, "Léa" and "Frédérique," he discusses the feminist problem with a completeness and seriousness disconcerting to some of the admirers of his "Lettres de Femmes." Such is the substance of French fiction during the past year, and we may pass hastily over some other works recorded with more detail from time to time in Literature, such as Madame Bertheroy's "Lucie Guérin," Monsieur Le Roy's "Jacques le Croquant," the new volumes of MM. Theuriot and Léon Daudet, of Henry Gréville, Hugues Le Roux, and Madame Lesueur, all of whom have an audience which their excellent literary craftsmanship deserves. The book of M. Le Roy appeared, like M. Le Braz's "Le Gardien du Feu," in Calmann-Lévy's "Revue de Paris." More and more do the readers of the great reviews and the learned periodicals find in them the best among the books produced in this country. Nine-tenths of what really counts in contemporary literature appeals to the public first through the magazines.

A conspicuous exception to this statement is, however, found in the literature of Memoirs and Biographies. This is mainly the specialty of two houses, Calmann-Lévy and Plon, although, of course, other establishments like that of MM. Hachette, with its "Life of Pasteur," by M. Vallery-Radot, often produce important works of the kind. A special word is due, even in so rapid a summary as this, to the conscientious account, by the son-in-law of the great savant, of what may be called the origins of Pasteur. Its importance depends on the fulness of detail in regard to his heredity and early life, quite as much as on the clear exposition of his discoveries. But it is chiefly to MM. Plon and Calmann-Lévy that the large number of Frenchmen who delight in historical memoirs—a larger number than in any country in the world—go for the pleasure that the compatriots of Saint-Simon know so well how to evoke. We have had this year, published by MM. Plon, and edited by M. Biré—who has just finished his edition of Chateaubriand's "Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe" (Garnier)—an edition of "Les Mémoires du Général d'Andigné," in which the American wars, as well as the chouannerie, are related with fresh details by an eye-witness and actor. Plon has given us also Baron de Comeau's "Souvenirs des Guerres d'Allemagne," the story by an émigré, appointed by Napoleon as the representative of Bavaria on the Imperial Staff, of Austerlitz, Jena, Wagram, and other great days of the épopée, which no one was better fitted to describe than he. Of no less value is the discovery by the same house of the souvenirs of a once famous Dutch general under the First Empire, the Baron de Dedem, whose impressions of Frenchmen and Napoleon and the state of Europe are among the most piquant documents of this period that have been unearthed in recent years. More remarkable still is the latest book published by the Academician, M. Vandal, entitled "Le Voyages du Marquis de Nointel." Here we have the history of what was, perhaps, the most brilliant mission (1670-1680) ever despatched by France to the East—the mission to which we owe Galland's translation of the "Arabian Nights," the enrichment of the Louvre and the royal galleries with the spoils of the Orient, and the famous collection of drawings of the Parthénon attributed to Carrey. M. Vandal, in a long note, proves that these drawings were the work of a young Flemish painter whose name is unknown, but who drew under Nointel's direction. Of much less serious significance, but no less entertaining, is the volume published by Calmann-Lévy for M. Paul Lafond, of the sparkling little Basque, the singer Garat, without whose presence no fête at Versailles or the Trianon or in the town was worthy of the name. Garat was a Don Juan of the eighteenth century, about whom pironetted in its last graceful contortions the vanishing society of the old régime. He was the most brilliant of all the French singers; no one trilled with rich spontaneity and success, and nothing could have been happier than the idea of showing this moment of Parisian life as seen by the most engaging personage who figured in it.

At the present moment, just as in the old feudal days, when, gathered about the fireside, they capped each other's stories in the famous legendary gab (gaber was the word in old French for his amœbean amusement), the French are the masters of the conte and the anecdote. In spite of the efforts of the University, as seen in the rigorous method of a Seignobos and Lavissee and Langlois (witness the new History of France now appearing from the house of Hachette), to shackle the playfulness of the French story-telling temperament, their historians remain charmers and artists. The recent compilation by M. Pierre de Ségur, entitled "La Jeunesse du Maréchal de Luxembourg" (Calmann-Lévy), covers ground already worked by men like Cheruel and the late Duc d'Aumale, but it is singularly brilliant in its style. The same is true of Comte Ducos' "La Mère du Duc d'Enghien" (Plon). M. Gauthier Villars has studied, moreover, with extraordinary detail, after Comte Fleury (whose book Literature noticed some months ago), "The Marriage of Louis XV."—this is the title of the book—with the luckless King of Poland's daughter. M. Gauthier Villars has discovered fresh documents which throw a search-light up the back-stairs of the Royal palaces at this hideous moment of Court life in France, and the lovers of Royal gossip will find enough to entertain them here. There is a purer air in the remarkable study by M. Lacour Gayet, "L'Éducation Politique de Louis XIV." (Hachette). "L'hommage est dû aux Rois, ils font ce qu'il leur plaist" was the sentence which the young Louis XIV., while learning how to write, copied in his large, childish hand. It was a sentence he never forgot. He was taught Latin by Perefex, the historian of Henry IV., and this professor evidently left a lasting impression, for if Louis XIV. rarely alludes in his despatches to his father or to Richelieu, he often enough mentions in defence of his own policy that of his grandfather, Henry IV. The author has swelled his book with a study of contemporary opinions on the regal power. If he had been acquainted with a book like M. Gooch's "History of Democratic Ideas in the Seventeenth Century," he would certainly have modified his views on the reasons for the acceptance by the Calvinistic theologians of the theory of Divine Right.

I have mentioned the double appearance, in periodical and book form, of the best that is thought and said in belles lettres in France. There is a parallel phenomenon when we come to works of erudition. In view of the vast misunderstanding which exists abroad as to the perspective, as it may be called, of French letters, it would be culpably unfair in a review of the literary year not to give proper space to scientific criticism and philosophy. The foreigner should never forget that the Seine divides Paris into two almost separate worlds—the world of the boulevards, with the fashionable quarters of the Champs Élysées, for whom such books as we have so far considered are produced, and the world of the vast University, where the intellectual life is as agitated and complex as it was in Alexandria of old—the Alexandria which also possessed its Cleopatra. More than half of the lectures given at the Sorbonne or the Collège de France, as well as the theses handed in for degrees, must take rank as literature. In the past all the best products of the Taines, the Renans, and the Claude Bernards were offered to the public in this form, and the same is true to-day. As M. Bouché-Leclercq, professor at the Sorbonne, says in his "Leçons d'Histoire Grecque" (Hachette):—"This volume is not a book . . . it consists of opening lectures, that is to say, programmes of public courses of which the subject and plan are here sketched out with the intention of drawing special attention to the general ideas which are to be proven in detail in the subsequent lectures." The same thing might be said of the incomparable works of Gaston Paris, of a book like the "Rousseau and Literary Cosmopolitanism," by the late M. Joseph Texte, whose death was, perhaps, the greatest loss to French literature during the year. It is also the case with the numerous works of M. Ribot, whose "Essai sur l'Imagination Créatrice" is, probably, the last serious effort which we shall have from the head of psychological studies in France, and perhaps the most suggestive analysis of the conditions of creative work, either in the artist or the man of science, which any country has as yet produced. With this should be read the little volume by M. Paulhan, entitled "Psychologie de l'Invention," dealing with the same subject and containing many facts illustrating the artistic constructive temperament, collected from the masterpieces of Englishmen as well as of Frenchmen. These works cover fields where any cultivated reader may take an agreeable promenade. More special in their solidity as monographs are M. Georges Dumas' startling revelations, in "La Tristesse et La Joie," of the relation between the emotions and the purely physical conditions of arterial tension, and Dr. Paul Sollier's lectures delivered last year at Brussels, now published under the title of "Le Problème de la Mémoire." All these books are published by Alcan, from whom come yearly some two or three hundred original works in philosophy, psychology, biology, or history—the latest researches of men like M. Tarde, from whom we had recently "Les Transformations du Pouvoir"; of Gustave Le Bon, the famous author of "La Psychologie des Foules," who now gives us "Psychologie du Socialisme"; translations of foreign works, English, Italian, or German; or original studies like M. Lechartier's "David Hume, Moraliste et Sociologue," &c.—works which redound immensely to the honour of French literature and thought. The French publishers, in general, specialize much more than the English. The result is that outside France it is too often only scholars who realize the importance of French intellectual activity. A new book by M. Zola or M. Bourget receives immediate publicity. Such a work as "La Culture des Idées" (Mercure de France) of M. Remy de Gourmont, who is a fearless thinker and an accomplished writer, or a volume like that just mentioned of M. Ribot on the creative imagination, tends to pass unnoticed by the great public of cultivated readers who are not specialists. This is not as it should be, but, no doubt, the publishers of such works have themselves to blame, for they spend much less than British publishers in bringing the attention of their works to a public capable of appreciating them, being content with the suffrages of the professional readers of the special reviews. They are largely responsible for the popular illusion in Anglo-Saxon countries that France is a nation where only a Rostand or a Brunetière finds a suitable milieu.

When I have mentioned the completion of the great work of MM. Thomas, Darmesteter, and Hatzfeld, the "Dictionnaire Général" of the French language, a vast and admirable effort of lexicographic erudition, and, in another order of ideas, the failure of the "Société d'Édition Artistique," which disappeared suddenly, engulfing the translators of Ruskin and many another author, who, no doubt, will come to the surface next year and seek more experienced hands to launch their craft, there remains little to be said as to the literary life of Paris during the past year. I have alluded only, and as fairly as I can, to what is most significant and most valuable, indicating at the same time the more obvious differences between a "literary year" in Paris and a "literary year" in London.

December 28, 1900.

W. M. F.

OLD BOOKS IN 1900.

The sale of old books last year suffered at least as much as the publication of new ones. It would, perhaps, be no exaggeration to assert that the varying fortunes of the African campaign are faithfully reflected in the records of the auction rooms. During December, 1899, and the first two months of the new year announcements of "untoward incidents" came to hand with distressing regularity, and it is beyond question that at that time old books were practically neglected; the market fell to such an extent that the auctioneers held libraries back rather than run the risk of loss. For three months the book market was at its lowest ebb, both as regards the quantity and the quality of the works for sale.

The first signal of reviving interest was made in March when a portion of the library of Sir Percy Feilding and other properties were sold at Sotheby's. This fine collection realized nearly £7,000, but it damped the ardour of the Kiplingites who found, to their alarm, that the war, or some disturbing influence, was playing havoc with their choicest possessions. The event of the year, as a whole, has been the great depreciation in the value of quite modern books upon which fashion had hitherto set inflated prices, some of these "books" being mere leaflets, or pamphlets, which the authors themselves do not regard as additions to their literary credit. On the other hand, there has been no back-sliding in the quest of those traditionally expensive books which are finding their way to the public libraries in an ever diminishing stream. These are of the kind that were most in evidence at the Inglis sale held in June. Some large prices were paid—£175 for an edition of the St. Albans' Chronicle (Machlinia, c. 1484, imperfect); £79 for Lindewoode's "Constitutiones Provinciales Ecclesiarum Anglicanarum," Wynkyn de Worde, 1496; £300 for Hampole's "Explanaciones Notabiles," Oxford, c. 1481-86. Another library rich in books of this coveted kind was that formed by the late Mr. Newnham Davis. This was sold on November 26 last, when Littleton's "Tenures," London, Lettov and Machlinia, c. 1483, realized £400, and Glanville's "De Proprietatibus Rerum," 1496, £212 (imperfect). But works like these have been unusually scarce this year. No even fairly perfect First Folio of Shakespeare's works has been seen, though a sound copy sold in New York in March for $5,400. This reminds us that several very important works relating to America have been disposed of, notably at the Ashburton sale in November, when Captain John Smith's "Advertisements for the Inexperienced Planters," 4to., 1631, sold for £160. Old books relating to, but not necessarily printed in, the United States, are still rising in value, and the same remark applies to scarce editions of the English classics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. As an instance of this we have the large paper copy of "Gulliver's Travels," 2 vols., 1726, £88, and Colonel Francis Grant's collection of original editions of the works of De Foe, Pope, Swift, Sterne, Dr. Johnson, Goldsmith, and many other lights of past centuries. The prices realized at this sale were very high. On the other hand, the Kelmscott books have received a check, though it may not be for long, while the Badminton series, even on large paper, has fallen, in some cases as much as fifty per cent. Original editions of the works of the Elizabethan dramatists are almost unprocurable. That is true as a general statement, though an altogether unusual number made their appearance during the year, many at the Harvey sale in June. The Vale Press books are rapidly rising in the market and so are all works containing autograph inscriptions by authors of repute. One of the most interesting volumes seen for a long time contained three of Blake's phantasies—"Europe," "The Song of Los," and "The Daughters of Albion," which, with several water-colour drawings, realized £225 at Puttick's in November. This "Song of Los" had not appeared in the auction rooms for at least fifteen years. Another very instructive volume was the autograph MS. inventory of the effects of Mme. de Pompadour, 2 vols., folio, in their original green vellum binding, £133; the "Eloge de Henri II.," 1560, 8vo., formerly belonging to Mary, Queen of Scots, which Mr. Dowell sold at Edinburgh for £170, and a Bible, once the property of Prince Charles (Charles II.), which on that account realized £84. Of late years original editions of the works of Dickens and Thackeray have only been sought after when in the best possible condition, or in the original parts. On May 31st an important collection of Dickens' works, mostly in parts, was sold at Christie's. The twenty-four entries in the catalogue produced £320, the ten monthly numbers of the 1846 edition of "Oliver Twist" realizing the altogether unusual sum of £23.

On the whole, the last year of the century was not at all remarkable for the importance of its book sales. Probably many high-class collections are even yet being withheld in the hope that they may participate in the coming "boom" which is so anxiously awaited.

THE INTERNATIONAL CATALOGUE OF SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE.

[By PROFESSOR A. W. RÜCKER.]

The work of preparing a catalogue of the scientific literature of the nineteenth century was undertaken many years ago by the Royal Society. The catalogue is arranged in the order of the authors' names, and six large quarto volumes cover the period 1800-63. The labour involved in collecting the titles of the communications to all scientific periodicals, in distinguishing between originals, translations, reprints, abstracts, and the like was very great; but as the end of the century approached the task became more formidable. For the first sixty years an average of one volume per decade sufficed. Two were required for the period 1864-73, while three are barely adequate to deal with the output between 1874 and 1883. This rapid rate of increase proved that the task of producing a similar catalogue for the twentieth century would be beyond the strength of a single society, and yet it was felt that what was being done was inadequate. Scientific workers required not merely an authors' catalogue but also a subject-index of the literature of science. At the instance, therefore, of the Royal Society, her Majesty's Government invited foreign Governments to send representatives to a conference to discuss the possibility of the production of a catalogue of scientific literature by international co-operation. This conference met in London in July, 1896, approved the project in principle, passed some general resolutions as to the scope and object of the work, and then remitted the whole question to the Royal Society to prepare a detailed scheme.

A strong committee, of which Professor Armstrong, F.R.S., was chairman, was entrusted with the work of preparing a report, which was presented in March, 1898, and was considered at a second international conference held in the October of that year. Certain fundamental principles were accepted, and various details were referred to a small committee which assembled in London in the summer of 1899. The scheme thus matured was finally approved by a third conference in June, 1900, and it was then decided that the financial prospects of the undertaking were sufficiently good to warrant an attempt to begin publication in 1901. All difficulties were not, however, as yet surmounted. The Governments of various countries undertook to subscribe for a certain number of sets of the catalogue with the right to dispose of them by sale or gift. The Royal Society undertook to subscribe for this country. Altogether sales to the extent of £2,771 a year were guaranteed during the meeting of the conference, while representatives who were not empowered to commit their Governments made statements which showed that subscriptions amounting to an additional £600 a year might be expected. Further support was promised after the meeting had dispersed, but in July it was evident that 90 more sets of the catalogue must be placed before the enterprise could be undertaken safely.

At this critical point success was secured by the action of a well-known Fellow of the Royal Society. The Government of the United States had declined to subscribe, but the Smithsonian Institution was known to be willing to do all in its power to support the catalogue. The gentleman in question therefore offered to guarantee the Royal Society against loss if it would subscribe for an additional 45 sets, provided that (1) subscriptions for 45 sets were secured in the United States; and (2) that as subscriptions from other countries came in the additional subscription of the Royal Society was reduced by a corresponding amount. When this offer was communicated to the officers of the Smithsonian Institution they bestirred themselves so actively that in the course of three months 68 sets were subscribed for in the United States. Subscriptions from other countries have also been promised, so that the additional subscription of the Royal Society is now reduced from 45 to seven sets. It may interest readers of Literature to see the subscription list which, at present, is as follows:—

United States	68	sets	Brought forward	267½	sets
Great Britain (R.S.)	45	„	Norway	5	„
„ (additional)	7	„	Mexico	5	„
Many	45	„	Cape Colony	5	„
„	35	„	Canada	4½	„
„	27	„	Hungary	4	„
„	15	„	Greece	2	„
Norway	7	„	Portugal	2	„
Denmark	6½	„	South Australia	2	„
„	6	„	Western Australia	2	„
„	6	„	Victoria	1	„
267½			300

Each set consists of 17 volumes this represents a guaranteed fund of 5,100 volumes. Negotiations are in progress with three countries which have either not given in their adhesion, though otherwise favourable, have not as yet stated the number of volumes they intend to purchase.

The Royal Society has undertaken to be the publisher of the catalogue, to advance the necessary capital as a loan, and to make the contracts for printing and for doing part of the publisher's work by a firm acting as the agents of the Society. Considerable financial responsibility is thus involved, her Majesty's Government have guaranteed the Society against loss to the extent of £1,000 a year. The whole undertaking is to be treated as an experiment for five years, and the various subscriptions and guarantees are promised, in the first instance, for a period only. An International Council has been appointed, and has in turn nominated an Executive Committee, consisting of representatives of the Royal Society (Professor Armstrong), Sir M. Foster, Dr. Mond, and Professor Rücker) together with representatives of the four largest subscribers—Dr. Milkau (Germany), Professor H. Poincaré (France), Dr. Nasini (Italy), and a representative of the Smithsonian Institution, who has not as yet been named. Dr. H. Forster (editor of "Watts' Dictionary of Chemistry") has been elected Director, and the work of collecting materials for the catalogue began on January 1.

Each country taking part in the enterprise is establishing at its own expense a Regional Bureau to prepare (in accordance with specified rules) the entries in the catalogue which are drawn from its own literature. These will be forwarded to the Central Bureau, edited and prepared for publication by a Central Bureau.

The constitution of the Regional Bureau is very different in different countries. The Germans are establishing one in Berlin which, it is understood, will cost about £1,500. In England the work has been undertaken by the Royal Society. In the first instance the total number of entries is not to exceed 100,000 a year, and it may be increased beyond 200,000 without the special leave given by the International Convention. The slips sent in by the Regional Bureaus are to be marked so as to indicate their importance, and the Central Bureau has authority to reject less important entries in order to keep within the limits of its capacity.

Books are to be catalogued as well as memoirs, and papers are to be included in so far as they are of scientific interest. The catalogue will be arranged both by authors' and as a subject-index; and if a memoir covers several distinct branches of science it will be catalogued under each. It is hoped that an average of two entries per paper—one in the authors' and two in the subject-index—will suffice. The entries may be either in English, German, Italian, or Latin. The titles of papers published in languages which will be given in the original if it can be printed in any type, and will also be translated into whichever of the recognized languages the Regional Bureau may prefer. The rules of the sciences for the subject-index will be drawn up by the Central Bureau.

Seventeen volumes are to be published annually, one for each of the following sciences—viz., mathematics, mechanics, physics, chemistry, astronomy, meteorology, mineralogy, geology, geography, palæontology, general biology, botany, zoology, human anatomy, physical anthropology, physiology (including experimental psychology, pharmacology, and experimental pathology), and bacteriology. Each volume will be annual, but they will be issued in three groups of four and one of five volumes in January, April, July, and October. To the subscribing bodies the price of the set of seventeen volumes of about 6,500 pages will be £17, but separate volumes will be sold separately at prices ranging from 10s. to 35s. To the public the price will be little, if at all, higher.

The above rather bald statement of facts hardly gives a fair idea of the difficulties which have been overcome. The task of preparing schedules for the subject-indices of the different sciences to which all the world would agree was not easy. Thus three countries submitted drafts for the schedule of physics. One divided that science into 100, another into 250, and a third into 1,000 parts. Different countries group the sciences in various ways, and curious differences exist in the allotment of subjects among teachers in the Universities at home and abroad. After long discussion schedules have been agreed upon, not necessarily as the best, for probably no two persons could be found to agree as to what would be the best for any given science, but as a workable compromise. They will be published in all the four recognized languages in the order of the subjects and also in alphabetical order. No alterations, except necessary intercalations, are to be made for five years.

During the earlier stages of the discussion the issue of a card catalogue was contemplated, and the question of "registration," or the marking of the cards to indicate the subject with which they dealt, was hotly debated. Since it has been decided not to issue a card catalogue at present, this question has become of secondary importance. The registration symbols will now only serve as directions to the Central Bureau, and to enable the references to any particular subject to be given in the index by means of an invariable symbol instead of by the number of a page. The system adopted has therefore been the simplest possible. Each science is represented by a letter, and each sub-division by a number with four figures. Only about one-fortieth of the whole number of figures thus available has been employed, so that large numbers of symbols are unused and can be appropriated if additions are required. In the case of sciences, such as zoology and botany, in which a double reference is needed to the nature of the animal or plant referred to and to its geographical distribution, special symbols are employed. It is probable that these schedules will affect scientific nomenclature by the use, in many cases, of one only of several synonymous terms.

Several of the eminent foreign men of science who attended the recent meeting of the International Council expressed the opinion that no scientific undertaking of equal difficulty has ever been attempted by international co-operation. The principles that each country should deal with its own literature, and that no subvention to the Central Bureau should be made except in the form of a promise to purchase copies, have smoothed away difficulties which might otherwise have been insuperable. Direct subscriptions to institutions established in a foreign country are never popular. There is less objection to the purchase of books in the production of which local effort has assisted. I may perhaps be allowed to add that the respect felt abroad for the Royal Society has not only been very evident throughout the long negotiations, but has been a factor of no little importance in producing the final agreement.

The enterprise is now launched. The first volumes dealing with the literature of three months only (January-March) will be issued in July, and it remains to be seen whether the catalogue will fulfil the hopes of its founders, and in particular whether the scientific institutions and scientific men of this country will support the only international scientific undertaking which has its seat in England. France has the Bureau Internationale des Poids et Mesures, Berlin the International Geodetic Institute, and now the Central Bureau of the International Catalogue of Scientific Literature has found a home in London.

THE DRAMA.

"KING HENRY THE FIFTH"—"THE SLEEPING BEAUTY AND THE BEAST."

No doubt the revival of King Henry the Fifth at the Lyceum is an event of importance. The long cast, headed by Mr. Lewis Waller as the King, is in one or two cases brilliantly and in no case incompetently filled. Mr. Hawes Craven's scenes of the English line in Picardy and the camp near Agincourt are both pictures of great beauty. The Chorus has been restored and Miss Lily Hanbury, looking superb in her classic Greek robes, declaims Shakespeare's splendid poetry with great effect. Mr. Sidney Lee has written an occasional handbook to the play, which is an admirable piece of Shakesperian exegesis. In short, neither skill nor expense has been spared to produce a first-rate performance of what, in the judgment of Hazlitt, and, I should suppose, of everybody else, is one of Shakespeare's second-rate works.

The great thing just now is that the play strikes the patriotic note, resounds with "drums and trappings," is an early classic of khaki drama. And probably few who witness it are perturbed by the reflection that it is no more a picture of actual warfare in the Agincourt period than a modern military drama is of actual warfare in our own. The troops assault a walled town in an ordered procession like a body of excursionists waiting their turn at a railway booking office. They are continually suspending their military operations to stand in a circle round the King who harangues them by the half-hour. In the thick of a battle (notoriously fought in very dirty weather) the knights keep their armour as spick-and-span as though it were under a glass case in the Wallace collection. But, of course, no dramatist, even though he be William Shakespeare, and no stage-manager, even though he be Mr. Arthur Coe, can give anything but a fancy picture of a military campaign. It is for the sake of this fancy picture that the Lyceum will be crowded every night.

That very "showy" hero, Henry, who, if Shakespeare is to be believed, was remarkably fond of hearing the sound of his own voice, is played with evident enjoyment by Mr. Lewis Waller. The sound of Mr. Waller's voice the public, too, are fond of hearing, and pour cause, but for lack of modulation it becomes a little tiring to the ear. It is always giving forth trumpet notes—even in the King's courtship of Princess Katharine. And sometimes this King seems to be not merely maintaining his dignity in the presence of his subjects, but striking attitudes for the gallery. Indeed, in more respects than one he seems to be a model to a crowned head of our own day. Fortunately Henry lived before science had made it possible for him to send congratulatory telegrams! After all is said, however, it is difficult to name any other English actor now on the stage so fitted to play Shakespeare's Henry V. as Mr. Waller. Mr. Gerald Lawrence, who not long ago played the Dauphin in King John, plays another Dauphin here—being apparently, like a famous impression of the classics, dedicated in usum Delphini—and others who stand out well from the cast are Mr. Norman McKinnell, as Exeter, and Mr. J. H. Barnes, as the soldier Williams. Mr. William Mollison's Pistol is a clever piece of grotesque fantasy, but I cannot think Mr. E. M. Robson a happy choice for Fluellen. Some one has recently labelled him a "bantam" Fluellen, which means that we have a wholly ludicrous Fluellen, a Fluellen without a trace of the dignity and gravity undoubtedly to be found in the part and well brought out by Mr. Weir in Mr. Benson's revival of the play a year ago. There is a very dainty Katharine in Miss Sarah Brooke, a Katharine of what the French call "troubling" beauty; but the humour of the courtship scene would, I venture to think—if Shakespeare had not signed it—strike the candid spectator as rather schoolboyish. Perhaps, after all, that is what Mr. Sidney Lee means when he calls the comedy of this scene "robustious."

At Drury Lane the pantomime of The Sleeping Beauty and the Beast is, I think, a good one. I say I think, because I am unfortunately far too old to know. Keats once criticized a Drury Lane pantomime, when "devilling" for his friend John Hamilton Reynolds (Don Giovanni, Christmas, 1817—the "notice," contributed to the Champion, is reprinted in Mr. Burton Forman's "Keats," 1889, vol. III., p. cxxxix.), and remarked:—"As to the pantomime, be it good or bad, a child should write a critique upon it." One feels that about all pantomimes. If I may timidly offer an adult opinion, I will say that the spectacle at Drury Lane this year, "Beauty's Awakening" (a masque of the Seasons), and "The Enchanted Crystal Garden" are exceedingly beautiful, that those twin pantomimists Messrs. Herbert Campbell and Dan Leno are funnier than ever, and that the "principal girl" (Miss Madge Lessing, from New York) is for once really girlish.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

ABDUR RAHMAN.

THE LIFE OF ABDUR RAHMAN, AMIR OF AFGHANISTAN. Edited by MIR MUNSHI SULTAN MAHOMED KHAN, of Christ's College, Cambridge, Secretary of State of Afghanistan, barrister-at-law. With portrait, maps, and illustrations. Two vols. (Murray. 32s.)

This extraordinary book is the oddest mixture of medievalism and modernity, of crude barbarism and the improvements of science, of daredevilry and the new diplomacy. In the first six chapters we are taken through a series of adventures and catastrophes that recall the career of the last Shah of Khwarizm, as related by Gibbon, or still more the early life of Baber, the founder of the Moghul empire. This is the period of the Amir's adversity. The next six chapters show him on the throne, but a throne so precarious that four critical wars had to be fought before it could be regarded as stable. Four more chapters reveal him in the character of a civilizing reformer, introducing scientific inventions and modern methods among his wild subjects. Finally, yet another four chapters expound his views on foreign policy, in relation to England and Russia, with an outspoken temerity which even a Secretary for the Colonies might admire. The first volume might have been written by Baber or Tamerlane: the second reminds us of Peter the Great. The first is above all a story of adventure, as romantic and improbable as ever astonished a Christmas publishing season. The second is a record of statesmanship unparalleled in the East since the days of Akbar. The first appeals to every one who can appreciate deeds of derring-do, and amazing ups and downs of fortune, encountered and dominated by an invincible resolution. The second, though its facts may in some cases require correction, is a study for politicians on the Central Asian problem.

No one can read the record of the Amir's early life without a shock of surprised admiration. Few, indeed, had any notion of the tumultuous waves of misfortune and strife through which he made his way to the throne, or of the splendid qualities of courage, endurance, self-reliance, and unquenchable hopefulness he displayed in the most calamitous reverses of fortune. From the very first he exhibited a spirit that boded ill for interference in his plans. A governor of a province at the age of fifteen, he resigned his office because his father refused to ratify some politic concessions to the subjects. He declined to govern except in his own way. There were jealous courtiers about his father Afzal—a weak and unsuccessful son of the famous Dost Muhammad—who realized the formidable character of the young Prince and undermined him in his father's heart, such as it was. An attempt to run away from perpetual repression and reproof led to a year's imprisonment; but so little was the boy's spirit broken by severity that, when at last the father was induced to send for him and give him a trial, he says:—

I came straight from prison to appear before my father, without dressing my hair or washing my face, wearing the same clothes in which he had last seen me, with chains round my ankles. The moment he saw me his eyes filled with tears, and he said, "Why do you behave like this?" I answered:—"I have done no wrong; it is the fault of those who call themselves your well-wishers that I am in this condition." While I was speaking it happened that Abdur Rahim appeared in the Court, and on seeing him I continued—"This is the traitor who has placed me in chains; time will prove which of us is in the wrong." At this Abdur Rahim changed colour with anxiety and anger, but he could do or say nothing. My father addressed himself to all the military officers, saying,—"I appoint this, my lunatic son, to be General over you."

So Abdur Rahman became Commander-in-Chief of Afzal's army, exactly as he would have done in the "Arabian Nights." He went to the bath, and immediately set about remodelling the army, which was soon "so thoroughly organized that neither before nor since has it been in such good order." If the army was good, its young commander was better. In his teens he was fighting set battles and besieging forts, and his talents as a tactician were rewarded by repeated victories. In the battle of Narin, which lasted all day, and was obstinately contested by 40,000 Kataghan rebels:—

My losses (he says) were very slight on account of the skilful order in which the army was arranged. . . . I was proud of my army that day. The manner in which they fought was worthy of admiration; only those persons can appreciate this who know what it is to be attacked by such a large body of men, and not lose courage. The appearance of 40,000 men on a desert plain is like the movement of a mountain.

The successful usurpation (as he thought it) of Shere Ali on the death of Dost Muhammad in 1863 put an end to the period of Abdur Rahman's triumphs, and then followed a series of perils and misfortunes such as rarely happen outside romance. How the young prince seized the boats on the Oxus and fled to Bukhara, only returning to carry on the struggle; how he marched over mountain passes with the snow waist-deep, and fought his way into Kabul, when he plundered Shere Ali's treasury for three glorious days; and how, after all his efforts, his men deserted and his general throw away the last chance, all this makes up a moving novel of real life. The final catastrophe was near the fort of Zanakhan, which it was essential to capture before Shere Ali could take it. Abdur Rahman sat in the snow all night, having sent his general, Nazir, up the hills with most of the army to intrench the guns. He also sent to his uncle Azim for reinforcements, but the uncle said he would come "directly it got warmer."

Owing to the intensity of the cold, General Nazir drank a great quantity of wine and spirits, and fell asleep before the guns had been placed on the hill tops or any intrenchments made. At sunrise a sowar came galloping to me with the news that Shere Ali had arrived with all his army. I had only forty sowars with me, and I galloped with these men to the hills, only to find all the guns in the valley, with no gunners, artillery [?], or magazines. I climbed the hill, and found Shere Ali's army quite close, in good fighting order, and General Nazir still in an intoxicated sleep. I awoke him, saying, "Why have you done this? You are responsible for your behaviour. Where are the gunners, the soldiers, the transport animals?" He replied, "It was so cold, I permitted them to sleep in the camp; they will arrive directly." I said, "You will see directly what will happen." He replied, "I will tear Shere Ali's mouth." In spite of my depression and disappointment, I could not help laughing, seeing he was drunk. As we had no army to fight, and those few who were with me had fled in all directions, the enemy proceeded to take our guns. Being anxious to escape and the enemy being all round me I joined some of their sowars who were chasing a small body of [my] men, calling out "catch them." In this way I travelled two miles, and directly I was able I disguised myself, and joined a few of my sowars, who were looking for me. With a few of these men I turned my steps towards Maimana, where I met my uncle, and explained to him all that had happened, saying,

"If you had only listened to me, I should not be in this plight now." I then inquired for twenty loads of gold coins which I had left in his care. He replied that he did not know, as he had fallen asleep while the treasurer was moving the loads. I said I had left the money with him and not with the treasurer, and now we were defeated and had no money. . . . Towards night we reached the fort of Zurmat, tired, ruined, and broken-hearted.

The many adventures he went through before he found a refuge in Russian territory are told with the same dramatic simplicity, and with a sense of humour which evidently supported the young Prince—he was still but 23—in his worst experiences. Here is a passage that might have come out of Baber's Memoirs:—

On the eleventh day we arrived early in the afternoon at a village in the Kakar country, where my followers laid in provisions for themselves, and I was looking about for a fat young sheep for myself. Finding one, I paid twenty rupees Kabuli for it, the price agreed upon, to the owner. When we were about to kill it the owner said he had changed his mind and wanted it back, but when I said he could have it he changed his mind again, so it was killed for me, at which he threw my money at me, demanding that I should make his sheep alive. I replied that I had not sufficient power to do this, but he could have the dead body of his sheep as well as his money. He refused again, insisting on my performing the miracle! At this I was obliged to resort to a trick, and turning to a priest who was standing near, I told him the man had been cursing him all the time. At this the priest turned his face to the owner of the sheep, to whom I said, "Curse me if you like, but do not insult the wife of this holy man, who is a prophet." The priest was naturally furious, and called the man a pig for insulting his wife, and the sheep-owner cursed him in return. At this they began to fight, and I took both sheep and rupees away, leaving them to settle their little difference. Half the inhabitants were on the side of the priest, and half on the side of the sheep-owner, and after a good fight the people interceded. An hour or two after the sheep-owner brought me two jugs of custard, two trays of bread, and one young baked sheep, offering me salaams. I said to him, a little time ago he was rude, and now he was respectful, and noticing from his conversation that he was quite reasonable, I asked him why he had made the sheep an excuse to pick a quarrel with me. He replied that Sarwar Khan had treated him badly when at Kandahar, and therefore he took his revenge on me. I replied, "Sarwar Khan is here himself, why do you quarrel with me instead of with him?" and he explained that as I had appointed Sarwar Governor of Kandahar he held me responsible. We talked for some hours until he returned home, and I went to sleep.

The eleven years spent in exile in Transcaspiia are naturally far less fruitful in incident than the early years of struggle, but the Amir has a good deal to say about Generals Kaufmann and Abramof and their methods of annexation—e.g., of Shahr-e-Shebz, which will not be agreeable to Russophiles. At one time General Abramof talked of conquering Afghanistan and asked Abdur Rahman to accompany him; but the wily Oriental was not to be caught with such chaff, and told the Russians that he was quite happy hunting at Samarkand, but if they went he would pray for them! Eventually he had to steal horses and make his escape—not without Russian connivance—and the story of how he recovered Kabul is fully as exciting as his manner of losing it.

The account of his policy and improvements given in the second volume could not, of course, be as interesting as the hair-breadth escapes of his Wanderjähre. Yet there are few spectacles more extraordinary than that of this uneducated, rough-bred man, seated at last on a throne of absolute Oriental despotism, but scorning the delights of Eastern luxury, living laborious and ascetic days in the effort to improve his kingdom.

I have always liked to keep myself occupied day and night in working hard at something or other, devoting only a few hours to sleep. . . . It is no trouble to me to work hard ; on the contrary, I love it, and I never feel tired. . . . The more I see of the people of other nations and religions running fast in the pursuit of progress, the less I can rest and sleep ; the whole day long I keep on thinking how I shall be able to run the race with the swiftest, and at night my dreams are just the same. There is a saying that the cat does not dream about anything but mice ; I dream of nothing but the backward condition of my country, and how to defend it, seeing that this poor goat, Afghanistan, is a victim at which a lion from one side and a terrible bear from the other are staring, and ready to swallow at the first opportunity.

The account of his methods of developing his country is full of that native shrewdness which is one of the Amir's most valuable qualities. When he imports European or Indian teachers of handicrafts and mechanics, he binds them not to go home until their pupils are qualified to carry on their work. When he secured the services of a surgeon-dentist, he gave him a native apprentice whom he threatened with terrible punishments if he did not learn dentistry before Mr. O'Meara returned to India, and as the dentist was in a hurry, never did pupil learn so assiduously. The Amir caught a skilled leather-worker on his way to make the pilgrimage to Mekka, "argued with him and proved by all the traditions that to do service to other human beings was far better than going to Mekka," and induced him to stay and teach the Kabuli's how to make leather beltings for the Amir's machines. "Praise be to God that I was always fond of machinery and manufactures, and knew their full value ! I knew that it was a case of having steel to cut steel, and that if I wanted to fight an enemy on equal terms I must meet him with weapons of the newest pattern." The Amir is a trained gunsmith, has made rifles himself, and has taught his men to turn out Hotchkiss guns. His aim has been to make his country independent of foreign help, and he cites a hundred instances where Afghanistan now supplies the raw materials and the finished product which formerly came from abroad. Not only guns and machinery, but tanning, bootmaking (a Royal cousin heads the boot trade at Kabul), soap and candlemaking, tailoring, and many other sorts of industry are now successfully worked under the Amir's keen eye, and those who knew Kabul before his accession can scarcely recognize it now in its new phase as an industrial centre. How far all this is permanent, it is difficult to say. It depends largely on the personal energy of an old man. But the Amir has brought up his sons to follow in his steps, and if there is no quarrel over the succession (about which he is obviously anxious) his heir may be able and willing to carry on the excellent labours of the father. The Amir shines as an administrator even more than as a soldier and adventurer. His work as a ruler may challenge comparison with anything accomplished in the East by an Eastern, and considering his education and the materials he had to work upon it is little short of miraculous.

Abdur Rahman appears in these pages in a third character—neither soldier nor ruler, but diplomatist. His comprehension of the political situation is as acute as his grasp of the economic and industrial problems presented in Afghanistan. He is keenly alive to the danger from the Russian side, and is apparently sincere in desiring the friendship of England. He is troubled by the uncertainty of English party government, but much more by the changing policies of successive Viceroys of India, and he resorts again and again to his earnest wish to be permitted an envoy in London who shall have direct access to the Secretary of State. He entertains a natural abhorrence of the "forward policy," and is no friend to Lord Roberts. Lord Ripon's policy was obviously more to his mind, but he has also grateful memories of Lord Dufferin. The startling frankness with which the Amir writes on Russian diplomacy and on certain Viceregal measures is curiously unoriental, but one must remember that in this part of the book the Amir's words are reported by his secretary and editor, who has been educated in England, and might almost be an elector of Birmingham, if apparent candour be the test. The Mir Munshi, however, professes to have taken down the actual words, and we doubt if he has done more than throw the Amir's obiter dicta into literary form. This he has done very well, and only now and then does a word or phrase betray the foreigner. Indeed the Mir Munshi is much better trained in English than in Persian or Turki, to judge by the misspelling of Oriental names. But this is a trifling defect, and, as Mr. Murray observes, the names are generally recognizable. One does not expect scholarship from an Afghan ruler, and it is sufficiently astonishing that this powerful statesman, soldier, and organizer should have put forth so full and candid a record of his wonderful career. Whether he is always truthful is another matter ; his memory seems occasionally to play him convenient tricks. Nevertheless, one closes the book with genuine admiration for the genius—the unquestionable and superlative genius—of its venerable author. The Amir is a great man, great in adversity and even greater in success (as Easterns are not wont to be), and the pity is that the invocation cannot be realized, "O King, live for ever !"

"MR. GIBBON."

MEMOIRS OF MY LIFE AND WRITINGS. By EDWARD GIBBON.
Edited by G. BIRKBECK HILL. (Methuen. 6s.)

We must not, it is said, look a gift horse in the mouth. It is gratifying to have an edition of Gibbon's Autobiography with an introduction, footnotes, and appendices incorporating the supplementary information which the reader desiderates, but could only acquire, without the help of an editor, at the cost of much time and labour. Thanks are due, therefore, to Dr. Birkbeck Hill for the trouble he has taken ; and it seems unfair to cavil because he approaches the subject in the temper of an antiquary rather than of a man of letters, or even because some of the side issues of the subject are inadequately treated by him. But the inadequacy is there. What Gibbon and Dr. Johnson thought of each other, and what Boswell thought of both of them we are, of course, told in great detail ; and there is plenty of detail in the appendices relating to Gibbon's experiences at Westminster School and Magdalen College. Sufficient attention is also paid to the controversy with the theologians whom the "Decline and Fall" displeased. On the other hand, the annotations on Swiss topics are often unsatisfactory. Some reminiscences published serially, a good many years ago, in the Revue Suisse, might have been drawn upon to advantage. To these we owe the witty Frenchman's graphic account of Gibbon's corpulence :—"When I feel the need of exercise I walk three times round Mr. Gibbon—je fais trois fois le tour de M. Gibbon." And the articles contain many other anecdotes by which Dr. Birkbeck Hill's pages might just as well have been illuminated. Nor does Dr. Hill seem to us to have made all the use that he might have made of the letters bearing on Gibbon's love story, published by Vicomte d'Haussonville. He only quotes scraps from them, leaving the impression that Gibbon behaved very badly. The full correspondence shows that, however badly he may have behaved, Mademoiselle Curchod threw herself at his head with a striking absence of maidenly reserve.

In some of the impersonal notes we find Dr. Birkbeck Hill even more inadequate. It was not necessary for him to throw in an appendix about English scholars at Swiss Universities ; but as he did so, he should not have confined himself to generalities, but have told us something about the scholars and their mode of life, as he does in the case of the Magdalen undergraduates. A certain chapter in the Life and Works of Benjamin Stillingfleet would have furnished material for a very interesting excursus. Benjamin Stillingfleet was at Geneva with the young students who discovered Chamonix. They formed a "common room" there, and regaled the citizens with amateur theatricals. But Dr. Hill tells us nothing of all this. It was not necessary, again, for Dr. Hill to annotate Gibbon's statement that, in 1755, "the fashion of climbing the mountains and viewing the glaciers had not yet been introduced." But what is the use of a note like this ?—

In the index to the Gentleman's Magazine, from 1731 to 1786, I cannot find a single entry referring to the glaciers or mountains of Switzerland, or to mountain climbing.

If the Gentleman's Magazine does not deal with the subject, the Philosophical Transactions do at an even earlier date than 1731, and there was an extensive literature of the subject long before 1786, and a certain literature of the subject even before 1755. Windham and Martel's pamphlet about Chamonix was published in 1744; two books about the Grindelwald Glaciers, by two Berne professors, Altmann and Gruner, appeared respectively in 1750 and 1761, and soon after 1770 appeared Deluc's account of the first ascent of the Buet, and Bourrit's book about the glaciers which was translated into English and reached a second edition—a book which Dr. Hill should certainly have known of, as Dr. Johnson was one of those who subscribed for it. The case, in short, was one in which, if the editor commented at all, it should have been for the purpose of correcting his author.

These, however, are details. Our chief complaint against Dr. Hill is that he dislikes Gibbon and tries to make us dislike him too. Because Gibbon was on the wrong side in politics, because he only went into politics in order to obtain a sinecure, because he wrote a cynical letter about an intrigue with a married woman, because he drank more Madeira than was good for his gout, and because he does not always write without lubricity, Dr. Hill expects all the world to be "set against him." The world is no more set against him for these reasons than it is set against his great contemporary, Dr. Johnson, because he drank too much tea and shouted people down in argument. If he has not a place in the affections of posterity akin to that of Dr. Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith, the reason is quite different and quite obvious. He was not a Bohemian as they were, and he did not wear his heart upon his sleeve. One cannot picture him carousing in taverns with men who called each other by their Christian names. On the contrary, he is the fine gentleman of letters, who stands upon his dignity and keeps you at a distance. Any one can like Goldsmith, and almost any one can like Dr. Johnson; but with Gibbon you always have the feeling that you are not quite sure that you know him well enough to presume to like him, though certain eloquent passages of his writings—those passages in which the poetry of his nature flashes out—inevitably make you wish you did. The test then must be:—In the small circle admitted to his intimacy, did he make friends, and could he keep them? And the answer undoubtedly is that he did and could. Lord Sheffield was devoted to him. So was Deyverdun. In the latter case he was patron and benefactor as well as friend, and the friendship which survives the lending of considerable sums of money without security is notoriously founded on a rock. Madame Necker forgave him for having jilted her in her youth, and fell in love with him again in her old age. He had been, she wrote to him, both her first love and her last, and she did not know whether the earlier or the later friendship was the more precious to her. Her daughter, Madame de Staël, proposed with childish naïveté to marry him in order to secure her father and mother Mr. Gibbon's society for ever. It is incredible that there can have been nothing lovable in the character of the man whom so many different people loved so well. If they could all forgive him for taking the wrong side in politics, and for getting ludicrously fat, so, whatever Dr. Birkbeck Hill says, can we.

A FEUDAL LADY.

The Memoirs of THE BARONESS DE BODE, 1775-1803, edited by William Childe-Pemberton (Longmans, 12s. 6d.), are no less interesting as a picture of the times of the French Revolution than as a piece of self-revelation of the character of the writer and of the class to which she belonged. They are particularly interesting to us from the fact that she was an Englishwoman and a member of the untitled aristocracy of England.

Somewhere about the year 1774, a gay little party of friends set off for a tour in Flanders, under the chaperonage of Lady Ferrers, and the escort of her husband, the fifth earl. This was the Lord Ferrers whose brother, the fourth earl, had been hanged some fifteen years previously for the murder of his steward, Mr. Johnson. The young ladies of the party included Miss Horneck, Oliver Goldsmith's "Jessamy Bride," and Miss Mary Kinnersley, the heroine of the present book. Among the gentlemen were Lord Byron, great-uncle of the poet, who had killed Mr. Chaworth in a duel, and Lord Bristol, whose wife, the notorious Miss Chudleigh, was about to be tried for bigamy with the Duke of Kingston. It will be seen that, if foreign travel failed to suggest interesting topics of conversation, the little party had among themselves highly-seasoned items of personal history to fall back upon.

Miss Kinnersley, however, soon discovered an interest all her own, for she met at Dunkerque a certain Baron de Bode, fell in love with him, and nothing would do but she must marry him. It was the one rash step of her life, the one solitary instance in which she, the daughter of a Staffordshire squire of ancient lineage, failed to think, speak, and act as the rigid unwritten laws of her class prescribe. And hence, indeed, came all her misfortunes. The Baron de Bode was a German by birth, although a soldier in the service of Louis XVI. After his marriage he took his wife to live at the Court of Saarbrück-Nassau. Here, to be in the fashion, she finds herself obliged to take to rouging. "I put on very little," she writes to her sister, "but you can't think what an addition it is to me, and I should be quite particular without it." She, likewise, has the honour of playing to the Princess of Saarbrück upon one of the cheapest pianos we have ever heard of, even though it was "made in Germany." "After coffee she (the Princess) desired me to play upon the pianoforte, which was a very good one. She had it made at Deux-Ponts, and the cost but seven guineas." Our amazement is mitigated when we remember that these were the days of seigniorial rights, and the Princess was probably able to commandeer all the materials for her piano, as well as to force the workmen to give her their labour for nothing. The Baroness was soon to enjoy such privileges herself, for in 1788 the Baron thought to improve the fortunes of his already numerous family by purchasing the fief of Soultz in Alsace. This fief was held first under Louis XVI. and secondly under the Episcopal Elector of Cologne, the fat and gross-feeding youngest brother of Marie Antoinette, and the Bodes thought themselves amazingly lucky to secure the prize. "Every one is surprised—so many great people contending for it." They gladly agreed to pay the Archduke Bishop Elector an eight thousand guinea fee, which the Baroness then had to borrow from her English relatives, and which, of course, was never paid back. For the year 1788 was to prove an amazingly unlucky year in which to invest money in seigniorial rights. During a short time, however, the Bodes enjoyed their money's worth; and their position at Soultz, their right over the life and death of their subjects, the tithes which they could levy, the vexatious corvées which they could exact, never for one instant appear other than wise and just to this daughter of Staffordshire squires. Listen to her complacent enumeration of some of their rights:—

'Tis impossible to tell you all the rights we have. We hardly know them ourselves yet. . . . The tenths both great and small belong to us. Our subjects are obliged to furnish us with a quantity of hens, chickens, and capons, and more corn and hay and potatoes than it will be possible for us to consume. . . . Every wife is obliged to spin me two pounds of flax or hemp every year, and every male and female is obliged to work ten days for us. Every cart and wagon to work ten days every year for us.

But the rumour of the States-General was already in the air. The Bodes had been just one year at Soultz when the States-General met on May 4th, 1789. Exactly three months later (August 4th) the Three Orders were vying with one another in the abolition of tithes, seigniorial dues, gabelle, privilege, immunity, and feudalism root and branch. Alas ! for the Baron and Baroness. June, 1790, finds them shorn of 10,000 livres which their subjects owe them and scandalously refuse to pay. The vintners will no longer hand over that Eighth Pot of Wine of all the wine sold on the seigneurie and worth to the Bodes two hundred guineas per annum. The butchers refuse to pay the tax upon their shops. Seven hundred fowls are withheld from them, and their four thousand subjects have the audacity to insist on keeping the fruits of their labour for themselves. Truly, it had proved an unpropitious moment for the investment of other people's capital in the fief of Soultz. During the following months things went from bad to worse, until, at last, a Bode requiring a pair of shoes, the village shoemaker had the insolence to answer "We will do nothing for you, nor sell you anything, on credit." He went unscathed, too, that impudent cobbler. Four years later the revolution was successful, and the Bodes ruined.

From henceforth the Baroness, accompanied by her eldest son Clement, now a young man, drifts across Sweden and Germany to Russia, where the Empress Catherine has offered land in the southern provinces to such French émigrés as care to settle there; while the Baron, by a curious reversion of rôles, remains in a convent in Germany looking after the ten or twelve younger children. And, finally, in the Crimea, the Bodes settle down again to the enjoyment of a fief and of serfs, who, better broken in than even those of Soultz, are obliged to work two days in every week for the master to whom they belong. Even under these ideal conditions, however, the Bodes do not appear to have made farming pay. But what, indeed, was Mary Kinnersley doing in any such galère? To us her career is an example of the vanity of human wishes. She was made to "get on" in society, to become a patroness of Almack's, to settle nice questions of etiquette. She loved great company and had hosts of titled friends. Yet she died a pensioner on the bounty of the Empress of Russia, and Clement, the son for whom she plotted and planned so untiringly, died poor and lonely in 1846, having spent thirty miserable years in litigation with the English Government for a sum of over £500,000 which he considered his due. And all the trouble, vexation, and weariness of spirit of the poor lady and her children grew out of that chance meeting in [Dunkerque] so many years before. Yet, no doubt, could we but foresee the ultimate consequences of falling in love, we should continue to fall in love just the same.

LITERARY "CONVERSIONS."

HAPPY SUFFERING (Rivingtons, 3s. 6d.) is the book in which M. François Coppée tells the story of his resumption, on the sick-bed, of the beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church. It is translated by Miss Catharine M. Welby, and has an introduction by the Rev. W. H. Hutton, who founds upon it a discourse on the religious awakening of France, exemplified by the recent spiritual vicissitudes of certain well-known men of letters. The subject thus viewed as a whole obviously has more interest than the isolated fact of M. Coppée's conversion. Regarded without reference to other phenomena, the religious convictions of M. Coppée are not of extreme importance. Looked at as a symptom of the spiritual life of France, and examined in conjunction with the simultaneous religious developments of Verlaine, and MM. Bourget, Brunetière, and J. K. Huysmans, they naturally claim closer attention. Mr. Hutton observes them and welcomes "a remarkable phenomenon in the religious as in the literary world":—

After decades of satire and scorn, of criticism mingled with contempt, it is undeniable that there is a tendency among men of letters to revert to the Christian ideal of life. It is not a submission to hierarchical assumption, but a response to the perpetual claim of the Incarnate God. They go not to Canossa but to Calvary.

And again:—

All this, too, it should be observed, is not merely a Catholic reaction. It is the expression of a tendency towards moral effort, courage, renunciation, patriotism.

These observations, it may be cheerfully admitted, are most creditable to Mr. Hutton's heart. They are the observations that would naturally suggest themselves to a broadminded clergyman who generously desires to recognize the value of the work done in other corners of the vineyard besides his own. But they are also the observations of a critic who is imperfectly acquainted with the facts—facts which are very far from warranting the conclusions which he desires to draw from them.

To begin with, a fair proportion of the conversions which Mr. Hutton considers so significant, are merely the ordinary sick-bed conversions of timid minds. M. Coppée does not attempt to conceal the fact that his conversion was, like Verlaine's, of that nature. Those who have closely followed the writings of M. Huysmans will hardly attach much more significance to his change of attitude. Such "conversions" are always going on, to a greater or less extent, in every country. To rejoice over them is right and proper. But no one is entitled to point to them as signs of the times, or as indications of an increasing spirituality on the part of the community at large. The conversions, in short, of these two or three individuals of peculiar temperament are no more representative of the general tone of French thought than was the course of life which gave the conversions their raison d'être; and the converted individuals themselves are no more representative Frenchmen than are writers like Anatole France, who win public respect while they adhere to the religion of Voltaire. Moreover, so far as the inward grace can be judged by the outward signs, the return to Catholicism in France is not by any means the same thing as a return to the temper of Christianity. M. Coppée must be judged not only by his emotional confessions, but also by his overt acts—and these have mainly consisted in joining seditious leagues and helping M. Drumont to hunt down the Jews and Protestants. Mr. Hutton rejoices over the conversion of M. Brunetière as that of "the most learned of living Frenchmen." Yet M. Brunetière's most notable public utterance since he was converted has been an expression of opinion that a victim of popular passion ought, whether innocent or guilty, to be kept in prison.

Conversions of this kind in so far as they are sincere are not spiritual phenomena, and they are not literary phenomena, though they are associated with the names of literary men; they are simply political phenomena. Roman Catholicism in France has become the badge of a party of reaction. Clericalism is the enemy of the Republic; it stands for Nationalism, and the Nationalists claim to have a monopoly of patriotism. The idea is spread abroad that a Frenchman cannot be "bon Français" unless he goes to confession and to mass. If conversions are freely made the inference to be drawn is not that the French nation is becoming spiritually minded, but that the Nationalists are gaining ground. The alternative inference cannot possibly be drawn by any reasonable man until the Roman Catholics dissociate themselves from party politics generally, and from Antisemitism and Anglophobia in particular.

RECENT VERSE.

Noticeable among some volumes of verse before us is the Primate of All Ireland's collection of poems, THE FINDING OF THE BOOK, AND OTHER POEMS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), partly rewritten, as he tells us, and largely augmented. Dr. Alexander says he has found the time insufficient for deep poetic conception or careful finish; to us, at any rate, his conceptions seem sufficiently impressive, while lack of care is the last defect of which we should have accused him. The following sonnet well represents his attitude towards his gift of verse, and it is one which makes all for the improvement of any poet :—

I never yet heard music, howe'er sweet,
 Never saw flower or light, ocean or hill,
 But a quick thrill of something finer still Filled me with sadness. Never did I meet
 Any completeness but was incomplete ;
 Never found shapes half fair enough to fill
 The royal galleries of my boundless will ;
 Never wrote I one line that I could greet
 A twelvemonth after with a brow of fire.
 Thus then I walk my way and find no rest—
 Only the beauty unattained, the cry
 After the inexpressible unexpressed,
 The unsatiated insatiable desire
 Which at once mocks and makes all poesy.

The last three lines attract attention to Dr. Alexander's proclivity towards carefully wrought phrases and the multiplication of syllables in his five-foot lines. Here the thing is finely said, nor does the thought lose dignity by the curving of the line, as it were, into anapaestic waves, but occasionally this tendency is exaggerated—as is also, perhaps, the tendency towards over alliteration even in such fine lines as—

And all the dim magnificence of seers
 And all the sighs and silences of saints.

But the poems are far from being exclusively sacred. They are full of life and fire as well as devotion, and the profane verse is noticeable for its enlightened sympathy. Witness the stanzas upon Burns, and the admirable poem upon "A Minor Latin Poet Improving Virgil" with this for its last word :—

As to the boy's deep ruth and tender prayer
 For Virgil, be there silence grave and wise.
 The mother of the Master was aware
 How the first woodland walk through which we rise
 To the precipitous mountain-peak of truth
 Is love—the sunlit heresy of youth.

We also like "Sir Tescelin's Remonstrance."

A slimmer but hardly less interesting volume is that of the Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, entitled POEMS, CHIEFLY SACRED (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s. n.). Through most of Dr. Chadwick's verse runs a certain seriousness well sustained in lyrics of which the cadences sometimes suggest organ music played with a full use of stops. In a less intense mood are poems such as "A Psalm of Death," a fresh and quiet little piece in clear cut rhymed couplets. The poem on Schubert will please a devout reader ; "Saul" is pathetic and impressive ; and from "In Desolate Places" we may quote

In the lonely and desolate places where no man hears or sees,
 Still the river murmurs, and still laments the breeze.

Afar in the mountain gorges, in the lonely tracts unsought,
 The splendours of dawn and sunset and of driving mists are wrought.

There do the torrents thunder, and the horns of the blast are blown,
 Nor ask for an ear to hearken to their mighty music lone.

It was so ere man was moulded to play his part in the plan,
 And so should it be to-morrow if to-day were the last of man.

Yet, kneeling by this turf mound, my God ! it is strange, how strange,
 That still the earth bears roses, that the heavens disclose no change.

We are upon other ground when we come to Mr. Harold Begbie, who has lately reprinted his HANDY MAN, and added other verses of a similar calibre, spirit, and vigour. "Both Arms" has already appeared in Literature, but we make the acquaintance of the rest for the first time. Mr. Begbie's Army ballads have for accompaniment such a jingle and rattle of accoutrements, his verses devoted to the "handy man" are so rollicking, that one is a little apt here and there to lose sight of the fact that war is not all a song. We do not mean to suggest that our author forgets it. The half-a-dozen stanzas of "An Incident" would negative any such statement. It reads like a rendering into verse of some battle-corner sketch by Stephen Crane. But cheeriness predominates, and in this connexion there is nothing better in the book than "A Song in Camp," which goes with a ring and should be set to music. In its own way, too, "The Deserter" is capital—a really masterly little character sketch with a pleasantly ironic flavour. (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. n.)

By way of an interval let us quote at random from a small booklet of anagrams which has recently found its way to us. This one will serve :—

If—ere first the Boers rebelled,
 Could but a—hand have got ;
 We might not now have been compelled
 The issue to—to shot.

The answer is—but on second thoughts the answer is to be found at the end of MORE ANAGRAMS, by Some Minor Poets (Spottiswoode, 6d.).

Some writers, but poets more often than others, are labelled at the outset with epithets which cleave to them ever afterwards whatever the change in their work. Mr. Laurence Binyon was originally said to be "cold and serene" ; coldness and serenity are predicted of him at each fresh appearance. And this is true—superficially—of his ODES, just published by the Unicorn Press (2s. 6d. n.). The subjects are remote, perhaps too remote : "The Dryad" ; "The Bacchanal of Alexander" (a scene on his return from his Indian conquests) ; "Asoka," containing the philosophic soliloquy of an Indian Prince—a sort of "Empedocles on Ætna" in brief ; "The Death of Tristram" ; "Amasis," or the Nemesis falling on Poly-crates. But it is no criticism to posit the remoteness of the themes. "Alastor" was remote enough, but we would not, therefore, condemn it, as we would not condemn Sohrab and Rustum for containing a translation from Virgil. There is, if not a school, a small body of "artists" who would protest against the popular style of literature known as "striking"—against the flashy phrase, the realistic jerk, the purple patch, the dramatized passion. Mr. Binyon means to be classical, to let the thought dominate the versification, to prevent the part damaging the whole. To us it seems that he has gone a little too far ; the verses would benefit by more emphasis on the dramatic elements. They are too philosophic ; but they are poetry, and this, after all, is what matters. He has the artist's skill in giving the impression of atmosphere. In this respect the opening lines of "The Dryad" are excellent :—

What hath the ilex heard,
 What hath the laurel seen,
 That the pale edges of their leaves are stirred ?
 What spirit stole between ?

Was it the wind that parted your light boughs,
 Some odour to recapture as he strays,
 Or some fair virgin shape of human brows
 But lost to human gaze ?

The concluding lines of the piece have the not common quality of being easy to remember whether we would or no :—

Thou shinest with the charm and with the power
 Of all that wisdom loses to be wise.

"The Death of Tristram" is the most ambitious ode, and, on the whole, the best. The scenes are painted with extraordinary vividness in spite of the chastened simplicity of the language, the thought is well sustained, and the long dialogue between Tristram and Iseult is classical in the best sense of the word. None of the odes lend themselves to brief quotation ; and this is a good sign ; nothing is so easy to wrest from its context as a bit of a music-hall song. In respect of the rhythm there is a manifest tendency to follow an example excellently revived by Mr. Robert Bridges—on the lines set by Langland six hundred odd years ago—to substitute regularity of stress for equality of syllables.

ART.

GIORGIONE. By HERBERT COOK, M.A., F.S.A. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) (Bell. 5s. n.)

The name of Giorgione da Castelfranco has not lost its old charm, and the volume which Mr. Herbert Cook has devoted to the life and works of this master, who died all too soon for the glory of Venetian art and the joy of the world, will find many readers. Mr. Cook is already well known as a careful student of Italian art, and is a recognized authority on the Lombard school. But we were hardly prepared for the bold and independent line which he takes in the present work. The rigorous criticism of modern connoisseurs has of late years reduced the sum total of what are considered to be the genuine works of Giorgione to a very limited number. Morelli, who, to his great credit, was the first to recognize the master of Castelfranco's hand in the perfect Venus of the Dresden Gallery, only admits nineteen; M. Berenson brings down the list to seventeen, in which he includes the much repainted "Storm Calmed by St. Mark" in the Academy of Venice, and the damaged "Christ Bearing the Cross" at San Rocco. Now Mr. Cook, the disciple and follower of the last-named critics, moved by a sudden revulsion of feeling, raises the number of genuine Giorgiones to upwards of forty, and accepts several others, as he says, "tentatively and with reserve."

No doubt, as Mr. Cook remarks, modern criticism has declined to recognize Giorgione's hand in anything but the very best and finest art, and has rejected many pictures as "not good enough for him." We confess that we ourselves cling to this theory and fail to recognize Zorzo da Castelfranco's exquisite fancy and delicate art in such works as the Glasgow picture of "Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery" or the "Judgment of Solomon" at Kingston Lacy. Still less can we see his hand in the "Venus and Adonis" from Hamilton Palace or the "San Liberale" of the National Gallery. On the other hand, the charming little picture which Mr. Cook calls "The Golden Age," and which is evidently one of those romantic renderings of classical themes in which the young Venetian excelled, seems to deserve the position assigned to it both by Mr. Cook and Signor Venturi; while the "Judith" of the Hermitage overcomes all doubts by her own incomparable beauty. Again, the little-known portrait of a man at Temple Newsam, in Yorkshire, has a strongly Giorgionesque character and is closely allied to the Bertin youth and the poet Broccardo's portrait at Budapesth. Once more Mr. Cook, we have little doubt, is entirely right in his surmise that in the noble Venetian lady of the Crespi collection we have the missing portrait of Caterina Cornaro, Queen of Cyprus and Lady of Asolo, who was one of the earliest of Giorgione's patrons. Whether the picture in question was, as our author holds, actually painted by the master's hand, or is, as M. Berenson maintains, a copy of a lost original, a comparison of the Crespi portrait with the bust of Caterina Cornaro in the Pourtales collection at Berlin and with Gentile Bellini's portrait at Budapesth is sufficient to prove the lady's identity.

Another group of pictures with which Mr. Cook deals are the Giorgionesque works generally ascribed by modern critics to Titian. Among these are the famous Pitti "Concert," the lovely "Gipsy Madonna," the so-called "Physician Parma" at Vienna, and that magnificent portrait at Cobham which goes by the name of Ariosto. All of these Mr. Cook now assigns to Giorgione. But although in these early works Titian, to a great extent, adopted the style of his friend and comrade, and in Vasari's words "imitated Giorgione so closely that his pictures were often taken for those of that master," his individuality already asserts itself in the types which he uses, in the less spiritual beauty of the Virgin face, in the finely-modelled head of the young Augustinian player which bears so marked a likeness to his undoubted masterpiece "L'homme au gant" in the Louvre. As a matter of fact, all Giorgione's contemporaries in Venice were strongly influenced by the genius of this short-lived master. Each in turn caught a spark of what Vasari calls the "fuoco Giorgionesco," and strove to imitate the new manner which he had made popular, the softness and richness of his colour, the romantic charm of his landscapes, the fire and passion of his conceptions. But it was the painter of Cadore on whom the largest portion of his spirit fell. He it was who took up the banner when it dropped from the dead master's hand and bore it forward to fresh heights and new achievements, far on into the next century.

We have said enough to show how many problems, both old and new, Mr. Cook's interesting study has suggested for discussion, and how many points in Giorgione's history are still in need of the fresh light which Dr. Ludwig's researches in the Venetian archives will, it may be hoped, throw upon the career of Zorzo da Castelfranco.

There are fashions in art as in everything else, but none can imagine that the fame of George Romney will be materially assisted by the exhibition of a further selection of his works which now occupies the Grafton Galleries, for an exhibition of works by this great English portrait-painter which does not include the "Wood Nymph," the "Calypso," the "Mrs. Yates," the "Mrs. Tickell," "Mrs. Billington," or "Mrs. Thornhill" can only be regarded as a poor complement to the previous collection. Now that the gaps on the walls and in the catalogue have been filled—notably by a full-length portrait of "Charlotte, daughter of Henry Pierse," in the large gallery—we are able to judge the completed collection. There are a few good Romneys, some fairly representative portraits, and more than one downright bad example. Most of them—good, bad, and indifferent—however, demonstrate the three characteristics of "the man in Cavendish-square"—the severity of his taste, the manliness no less than the simplicity of his drawing, and his insight into character. As illustrating the last quality the present exhibition is possibly more interesting than the previous collection, for, with the exception of the pictures of the "divine" lady whom Romney considered superior to all woman-kind and the "Serena" series, the pictures at present exhibited are more illustrative of Romney than of his sitters. For one whose ideal—so Edward Fitzgerald considered—was "neither high nor fixed" the stately and almost heroic portrait of "Mrs. Verelst" (now exhibited for the first time) and the large and reposeful "Serena in the Boat of Apathy" are sufficiently remarkable. It would add much to our pleasure if Mr. Harry Verelst would have the fine portrait of his great-grandmother properly washed, for it is apparently very dirty. The rich portrait of "the Hon. Charles Yorke," the unfinished portrait of Lady Hamilton reading a Gazette recording one of Nelson's victories, the pearly "Mrs. Robert Trotter," and the delightful child-portrait to which we have already referred, make the large gallery noteworthy. The empty spaces in the centre gallery have been filled with a strange and stiff portrait of "Elizabeth Geary" and a very indifferent sketch or copy of "Lady Hamilton as a Bacchante." The centre gallery, however, contains a strong portrait of "Thomas Walker," the very fresh "Lady Hamilton as a Bacchante" which was purchased by Sir William Hamilton from Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the beautiful portrait of Lady Hamilton as a Bacchante, leading a goat. Here, too, is the Rembrandtesque portrait of "Mrs. Whateley" belonging to Canon Whateley, which deserves to rank amongst the most interesting portraits by this artist, who "wanted but education and reading to make him a very fine painter." What our most popular portrait-painters of to-day would be without reading or education we shudder to contemplate.

The Royal Academy opens its winter exhibition on Monday. It will consist of English pictures executed during the past fifty years. The winter exhibition at the Institute opened this week; and the exhibition of the collected works of Sir W. B. Richmond opens immediately at the New Gallery. The opening of the black and white exhibition at South Kensington has been still further postponed in order to make it—what it promises to be—the most complete exhibition of its kind that has ever been attempted.

Next week also opens an interesting exhibition in the rooms of the Fine Art Society. It has been designed to illustrate on a small scale the water-colour art of the nineteenth century, and will include drawings by Mrs. Ansell, Charles Green, Rossetti, C. B. Boyce, George Frupp, David Cox, De Wint, Turner, Sandby, A. W. Hunt, H. J. Hine, Sir Francis Powell, Frederick Walker's "Harbour of Refuge," and the two "Pied Pipers" by Pinwell. The modern water-colour painters represented include J. W. North, Mrs. Allingham, Thorne Waite, Walter Severn, Goodwin, Sir J. D. Linton, Fulleylove, Whistler, Herkomer, Aumonier, Alma Tadema, Holman Hunt, W. L. Wyllie, Alfred Parsons, Tuke, T. C. Gatch, and Alfred East. Sir J. D. Linton has written a short introduction to the catalogue.

FICTION.

If Mrs. L. B. Walford has not surpassed her previous efforts in ONE OF OURSELVES (Longmans, 6s.), she has given us a very entertaining story. Into her accustomed milieu of quiet domestic life which she delineates with her wonted tact and felicity of phrase, the authoress has introduced a villain of the most repellent type. William Farrell is a finished hypocrite, and the ease with which he hoodwinks his partners and his fair admirers is depicted with much skill. The light-hearted heroine, her sisters, and Mrs. Tom, with her matchmaking propensities, are also among the happiest of Mrs. Walford's creations. The men of the novel are, with the exception of William, disappointing; Lionel, the priggish brother of the Colvin girls, is a dull dog, and his uncle, the peer, a hopeless caricature. Mrs. Walford's dialogue is as brisk as ever and her plot is dramatically worked out; but the closing scene seems to us unnecessary and inartistic.

One has learned to expect true and tender pictures of Irish life from Katharine Tynan, who achieves her usual high level in A DAUGHTER OF THE FIELDS (Smith, Elder, 6s.). If we except a tendency to fall back upon such hackneyed names as Bridget and Pat, and a resort to danger by fire and water to permit the hero to prove to the heroine how much stronger a man is than a woman, there is little that is conventional in the treatment. Meg O'Donoghue, with her ill-fitting masculine garment of agriculture, and Gervase Fitzmaurice, with his family traditions and high sense of honour, are good people to live with for a few hours. The writer's gift of humour and its obverse of melancholy assist to render very acceptable this wholesome and tender idyl.

By AN UNSEEN HAND, by Edwin Hughes (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.), is "A story of the Secret Society known as The Ragged Thirteen." The two titles speak for themselves, and those who like them may also quite possibly like the book. There are we forget exactly how many murders in it, and of these the somewhat colourless narrator commits one—or something very like one. The finale is rather exciting, though we are rather sceptical about that revolver. It burst; and we breathed again. Well, it is something to be able to do that. The villain didn't! A TWOFOLD SILENCE (same price, publisher, and author) is hardly worth the trouble of breaking. It is difficult to take much interest in the disappearance and silence of a most unheroic hero, whose acquaintance we make only on reaching the end of the book. The plot, such as it is, is unskillfully worked out. And about his villainous Mr. Hughes seems of a very "twofold" mind. Possibly that is why he has her killed.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

In the Fortnightly we naturally turn first to the retrospective article which relates the history of the Review. It is largely composed of extracts from Anthony Trollope's reminiscences and Mr. John Morley's valedictory address; and the writer is rather tantalizing in drawing attention to mysteries which he declines to solve, hinting at but not disclosing the identity of the Fortnightly's men in iron masks. "Who is E. B. Lanin?" he asks; but leaves the question without an answer. And this is hardly more satisfactory:—

The number of May, 1880, contained a very remarkable article on "The Conservative Collapse," meaning the rout which the Tories had just sustained at General Election. It was in the form of a letter "from a Liberal to an old Conservative"; it began with all form, "My Dear Sir," and it closed equally in accord with the forms of correspondence, "My Dear Sir, Yours Sincerely, Index." Now, at the time, as our oldest inhabitant very clearly recalls, this article was generally attributed to Gladstone, and the belief appears to have received no contradiction. Mr. Morley gave it a place of honour in the Review, and to read it now is to be reminded of the style—the grand style—of the Grand Old Man. Even there is a classical quotation, not from Homer though, but from the Æneid. More cannot be said.

Does this mean that Mr. Gladstone wrote the article? The question is the more interesting from the fact that the retrospect is signed M., and that Morley is one of the names of which M. is the initial letter. Turning to the other articles we find that a pseudonymous "Calchas" raising the question "Will England Last the Century?" and taking a gloomy view of our national prospects, and "Diplomaticus," once a veiled prophet suspected of being Lord Curzon, but now known to be a journalist, discussing "The Concert in China," and papers on "Lord Rosebery's 'Napoleon,'" by Judge O'Connor Morris, on "The Painters of Seville," by Mr. Arthur Symonds, on "Sir Arthur Sullivan," by Mr. Vernon Blackburn, and on "Maurice Hewlett," by Mr. Frederic Harrison, who exclaims that "At last we have a fine writer of romance—of historical romance in the old meaning of that somewhat languishing art." It was Mr. Harrison, it will be remembered, who, being asked by the editor of a contemporary to name two good books published in 1900, replied that the year had only produced one good book—to wit, "Richard Yea-and-Nay."

The Nineteenth Century takes a new title, and is to be known henceforward, not as the "Twentieth Century"—a style appropriated by the editor of another periodical—but as the Nineteenth Century and After. A special frontispiece, designed by the President of the Royal Academy, represents an aged and experienced philosopher turning his back upon a beautiful young woman. Mr. Knowles has resisted the temptation to offer reminiscences about the origin of his Review. The contributions are no fewer than seventeen in number. Among them is a poem by Mr. Stephen Phillips, entitled "Midnight—the 31st of December, 1900," though our knowledge of the practical conditions of putting a paper to press forbids us to believe that it was really written at that particular hour of that particular day. We may quote a few lines:—

Lo! I come, I hasten, I set my procession in order,
In order of triumph I come;
At the wheels of my chariot pacing, like alien captives,
Anguish and Time and Death,
Through a multitude out of the uttermost spheres assembled,
With a shout of delivered stars.

"Current politics" are discussed from opposite standpoints by Sir Wemyss Reid and Mr. Sidney Low. Mr. Edmund Robertson, late Civil Lord of the Admiralty, inquires what his successors in office are prepared to do for him in the matter of submarine boats. As a remedy for Hooliganism Mr. John Trevarthen proposes a freer use of truant, industrial, and reformatory schools. A "day of purification" is Mr. Henry Jephson's suggestion as a good twentieth century idea, and he is apparently quite serious in remarking that "a day in spring would be preferable, many people's minds being already attuned to the idea of a spring cleaning." The Nicaragua Canal question is considered in all its bearings by Mr. Robert Bromley; the Catholic (i.e., Roman Catholic) Doctrine of Indulgences is expounded and justified by the Bishop of Newport; and Dr. Jessopp compares the conditions of the peasantry at the beginning and at the end of the century. "The agricultural labourers of to-day," he says, "are certainly better clad, more luxuriously fed, have more leisure, are better educated, and are rapidly becoming better housed than their forefathers a century ago." On the other hand, those forefathers "had incomparably more laughter, more amusement"; and as for the future, Dr. Jessopp is "inclined to doubt seriously whether before another century has ended there will be any such thing as an agricultural labourer to know."

The editor of the Contemporary does not pay much attention to the new century. The articles, however, though none are retrospective, cover a wide range. "Togatus," writing of the War Office, contrasts English with German military administration. Mr. Stephen Gwynn praises Mr. Stephen Phillips, and declares, perhaps with more enthusiasm than accuracy, of Mr. Tree that "no one has staked so much on the conviction that the playhouse is not merely a place in which to go and be amused after dinner." Surely Sir Henry Irving has done as much, not to mention Mr. John Hollingshead, who brought the Comédie Française to London, and Mr. F. R. Benson. The Chinese question is dealt with by Dr. E. J. Dillon, who brings serious indictments against European soldiers. "Cycles and Motors in 1900" are written of by Mr. Joseph Pennell, who predicts that "in a few years everybody will be riding some form of motor," and that "the motor will have a far greater revolutionary effect on the traffic of the world than the bicycle has ever had." M. Auguste Bréal assures French and English readers that if they knew each other better they would like each other more.

The critics of the twentieth century would do well to peruse an article in Blackwood's Magazine on "The Foible of Comparative Literature." The writer thinks the "comparative method" set forth by M. Brunetière at the "Congrès International" much too narrow. That method is simply the old "historical method" tracing the influence of one period or one national literature upon another. The writer in Blackwood's would go much further and find analogies in works which have no historical connexion, such as between the French and the Hindoo Epic—an interesting inquiry for the critic of the future. The South African question is touched upon in an article on "The Last Session of the Century." Sir Alfred Milner's position is compared with that of Lord Canning in India after the mutiny, with one important reservation—"Lord Canning had supreme authority, military as well as civil, in India, whereas no one exactly knows what power Sir Alfred Milner has over Cape Colony or Natal." The writer leaves out one important question—viz., how the war is to be paid for. Another side of the war is brilliantly treated by "Linesman" in a paper called "Marooned," a graphic description of the incursions made by small commandos of Boers on the British "lines of communication." "More Problems of Railway Management" sets us thinking on one of the most likely changes of the new century—the triumph of electricity over steam; and we trust that the clear summary of the advantages of electric traction will prove consolatory to those who may happen to have been recently entubed in the tunnel by Notting-hill-gate. Mr. C. Hanbury Williams, in his reminiscences of "Fifteen Hundred Miles of Fresh Water," is able to add something to our impressions of the much photographed Niagara.

The National Review, as usual, goes straight for the topical and actual. "The Surrenders in South Africa" are considered by Mr. H. W. Wilson. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that he demands that the facts necessary to the due consideration should be published, declaring that "it looks as though the nation would be put off with carefully doctored despatches and reports in which all things unpleasant are mercilessly suppressed." Dr. T. M. Maguire offers some slashing comments on "The Technical Training of Officers" and the official attitude towards that subject:—

Leave is given for Ascot and refused for purposes of study. I have known officers who were refused leave to study for the Staff College but got leave for Ascot Races, and spent that leave in study notwithstanding. . . . A British subaltern who, like him [Napoleon], had mastered the art of war by self-denial and strenuous toil, would also be a reproach to no small number of his official superiors in and out of the Army. Perhaps this is partially disproved by the rapid professional advancement of such student soldiers as Sir Francis Wingate and Colonel Girouard. The literary article is by Mr. Leslie Stephen, who gives a critical estimate of James Anthony Froude, with special reference to his treatment of Carlyle. This is the vindication:—

He seems to have expected that his readers would be as ready as himself to condone Carlyle's faults of temper, and regard his posthumous confession as so "supremely honourable" as to be an ample atonement for the offence. He, unluckily, succeeded in exaggerating the faults, without carrying his readers along with him in the implied apology. They did not appreciate the charm, which to him was so obvious, of the despotic side of Carlyle's character.

The Magazine of Art has a beautiful frontispiece—a coloured reproduction of "An Orphan of Amsterdam," by Gabriel Nicolet. There is another fine reproduction of a Greuze; and altogether it is a good number, with an article on the new Hogarths in the British Museum by Mr. Austin Dobson, and on "Humour in Black and White" by Mr. E. T. Reed, and other illustrated articles of interest.

The Art Journal starts the year with a new cover in black and orange, and Mr. Claude Phillips begins an illustrated account of the Wallace Collection. Besides other more usual features, there is an interesting note by Mr. Lewis Lusk on "Charles Keene and Pretty Women," in which he takes a picture from Punch, April 13, 1872, and compares Keene's Irish girl leaning against a gatepost with a figure in Velasquez's "Las Hilanderas" as both expressing in a masterly way the easy unemphasized suggestion of beauty.

The Imperial and Colonial Magazine is this month more imperial and colonial than ever. Professor Keane's new series of papers on "The Struggle of the Races" promises to be interesting. The first instalment deals with the negro question in America; a discussion of the alleged Yellow Peril is promised to follow. Mr. C. de Thierry's hints on "How to Make a Career in South Africa" will probably appeal to a wider public. The poem on Australian Federation by J. Brunton Stephens, the well-known Australian poet, has appeared in the Australian papers. It deserves to be quoted from:—

The Charter's read; the rites are o'er;
The trumpet's blare and cannon's roar
Are silent, and the flags are furled;
But so not ends the task to build
Into the fabric of the world
The substance of our hope fulfilled—
To work as those who greatly have divined
The lordship of a continent assigned
As God's own gift for service of mankind.

The prolific Mr. S. R. Crockett is the author of one of this year's serials in Temple Bar, and the other is by Agnes and Egerton Castle. "Memories of Frank Buckland," by George C. Peachey, contains some entertaining anecdotes, and there is a doctor's diary of the siege of Ladysmith.

Cassell's starts Mr. Kipling's new story which we mentioned last week. The story is well served by illustrators, for besides the artists we mentioned Mr. H. R. Millar contributes his quota of drawings. The number is in other respects a good one, with stories by Mr. Pett Ridge, Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe, Mr. Neil Wynn Williams, Mr. Max Pemberton, and others, and well-illustrated articles, including one on Falconry and one on "The Novelist as M.P."

The Thrush starts its career with a sonnet by Dr. Garnett on Shelley, a little poem by Mr. Henley, a sonnet by Miss Emily Hickey, and a long poem by Mr. Mullett Ellis called "The Thrush." We do not find any pre-eminent merit in these poems, but no periodical should be judged by its first number. We only hope that the editor will rest his venture on merit rather than on names. That, we are sure, is the way to interest lovers of poetry. The editor gives us rather an ecstatic preface, inviting us to "scan the horizon, for the day is breaking," and to "go to the gardens where the harpers sing." We only hope that he is right in venturing the assertion that "a rare melody is in our ears, the intense and tremulous voicing of great aspirations."

We have not noticed the Christmas number of the Poster, which reached us a little late. The magazine is to be somewhat enlarged in scope, and if it develops on the lines of this number it should do well. Its reproduced posters and title pages are full of interest, and it will now include bookplates, prints, book-bindings, and all the other curious productions that attract the artistic collector.

We have also received, but have no space to notice at length, the Antiquary, the Genealogical Magazine, the Penny Magazine, which is full of little histories of the century, Munsey's Magazine, the Girl's Realm, the Lady's Realm, St. Nicholas, and Little Folks.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Sir Edward Malet has been writing his reminiscences since he retired in 1895 and these will be published by Mr. Murray in the spring. Few men have seen service in more countries than the late Ambassador to Berlin. From his first appointment as Attaché at Frankfort in 1854 he went successively to Brussels (1858); Rio de Janeiro (1861); Washington (1862); Lisbon (1865); Constantinople (1868); Paris (1868); Peking, as Secretary to Legation (1871); Athens (1873); Constantinople (1878); Egypt, as Agent-General and Minister-Plenipotentiary (1879); Brussels (1883); and Berlin, as Ambassador (1884). He was in charge of the Embassy at Paris during the Commune; was Minister-Plenipotentiary at Constantinople at the close of the Russo-Turkish War; was in Cairo in the same capacity during the Egyptian War of 1882; and was British Representative at the African Conference at Berlin in 1885, signing the treaty which resulted from it.

The same publisher promises the Life and Letters of Lady Sarah Lennox, by the Countess of Ilchester, for the spring. It will probably throw new light on the love affair between the captivating daughter of the second Duke of Richmond and the youthful George III. Lady Sarah was a great grand-daughter of Charles II., and George III. seems to have fallen in love with her when she was seventeen years old. "A few months before his marriage," says Walpole, "he was remarkable for his attentions to this young lady; and it is said he would have married her but for the influence of his mother." In the year following the King's wedding she married Sir Charles Thomas Bunbury, M.P., the celebrated racing baronet, but was divorced from him in 1776 by Act of Parliament. In 1782 she married Colonel Napier (6th son of the 5th Lord Napier), who commanded a Yeomanry corps in the Irish Rebellion of '98, and died in 1804. George III. settled £1,000 a year upon her after her husband's death, and she died, full of years and totally blind, in 1826. She was the mother of a family of famous sons, among whom were Sir Charles Napier, the conqueror of Scinde, Sir George Thomas Napier, general and Governor of the Cape of Good Hope from 1837 to 1843; Sir William Francis Napier, the historian of the Peninsular War; and Captain Henry Edward Napier, of the Navy, who wrote a "Florentine History from the Earliest Authentic Records to the Accession of Ferdinand the Third, Grand Duke of Tuscany," in six volumes, 1846-1847. Leigh Hunt suggested that Lady Sarah was the original "Lass of Richmond Hill," and that the ballad was written by George III. This is generally regarded as very improbable.

A work which the Cambridge University Press has almost ready for publication is the first volume of a "Catalogue of British Books (1475-1640) in the University Library, Cambridge," arranged chronologically under the names of the printers, by Mr. C. E. Sayle, of St. John's College. Mr. Sayle's original idea was to make the catalogue a contribution to the history of literature under authors, but it will also be a contribution to the history of English printing and bookselling. The text includes the addresses of printers and publishers, as well as descriptions of devices and ornaments. There are to be three volumes, the first of which begins with Caxton's first edition of the "Dictes or Sayings of the Philosophers"—the first book printed in England—ending with a collection of books printed by Felix Kingston early in the seventeenth century.

Mr. Murray begins his new year publishing on the 15th inst. with the illustrated volume on "Tuscany" by Mr. Montgomery Carmichael, British Vice-Consul for West Tuscany; and Mrs. Ady's book on "The Painters of Florence from the Thirteenth to the Sixteenth Century" will be ready about the same time. The fifth volume of the Byron Letters, 1820-1822, may also be expected within the next fortnight, to be quickly followed by the fourth volume of Poetry, which will include "Manfred," "Prisoner of Chillon," "Beppo," "Mazeppa," and "Vision of Judgment." Among the theological books to be published shortly by Mr. Murray are Jowett's "Sermons on Faith and Doctrine" and Canon Moberly's volume on "Atonement and Personality." These will be followed in Lent by Canon Gore's book on Holy Communion, originally announced under the title of "The Breaking of the Bread," but now altered to "The Body of Christ." It appears that another publisher has a book under the first name, and Mr. Murray withdrew in his favour. Mr. E. H. Parker's "China: Her History, Diplomacy, and Commerce, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day," will be published by Mr. Murray this month. General Mackinnon's diary of his experiences with the C.I.V. may be expected in the early spring.

Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Watts-Dunton, and Mr. George Gissing have consented to write for a special number with which the Student, the magazine of Edinburgh University, will celebrate the beginning of the twentieth century. Among other well-known men of letters, both in England and Scotland, William Archer, John Davidson, Jerome K. Jerome, Lionel Johnson, Evelyn Abbott, Gilbert Parker, Neil Munro, Sir George Douglas, Cyril Maude, Cutcliffe Hyne, Laurence Binyon, John Buchan, I. Zangwill, Morley Roberts, and Louis N. Parker will contribute.

Mr. Heinemann's first publication in the new century will be "A Political History of Contemporary Europe," by Professor Seignobos. The author begins at the year 1814, and treats the Napoleonic period as a result of the Revolution.

The Gentlewoman has a "century" Christmas number which is thoroughly well conceived, and certainly deserves commendation to our lady readers. There are articles on various sides of woman's life in the century by ladies who speak with the highest authority on each subject; an abundance of portraits of notable women of the century; and some very interesting illustrations of fashions since 1800. The century is exhaustively treated from the feminine point of view; and, what is more, it shows how the subject can be made attractive without a trace of vulgarity or triviality.

The January number of the Temple Classics will be Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living," and the next additions to the Temple Primers will be "The Child: Its Nature and Nurture," by W. B. Drummond, and "Australia, the Commonwealth and New Zealand," by Arthur Jose. Messrs. Dent are also about to add an illustrated volume on Alfred the Great, by the Rev. D. Macfadyen, to their Saintly Lives Series—in good time for the millenary celebrations.

Messrs. Sonnenschein are making an early start this month with a new series of cookery books on novel lines. The first two volumes are "Picnics and Suppers," by Colonel Kenney Herbert ("Wyvern"), and "Vegetables and Light Diet," by the same author.

The Nuova Antologia is publishing a new novel, entitled "Piccolo Mondo Moderno," by Antonio Fogazzaro.

We have just received the first number of a new Monthly entitled Man, published under the direction of the Anthropological Institute, and we are asked to state that should the copies of this issue prove too few in number, a second impression will be produced for subscribers who apply to 3, Hanover-square, W., not later than January 15th.

Messrs. Miller and Gill have opened new premises as booksellers in Charing-cross-road, the former having spent seventeen years with Mr. Denny in the Strand.

Owing to pressure upon our space we are compelled to hold over our review of the Library Year until next week.

Books to look out for at once.

LITERATURE—

"William Shakespeare, Poet, Dramatist, and Man." By Hamilton W. Mabie. Macmillan. 21s. net.

[Tells the story of Shakespeare's life in the same spirit in which the biographies of contemporaries are written. Illustrations.]

"Macaulay." By Sir Richard Jebb. Camb. Univ. Press.

[A lecture delivered at Cambridge on August 10, 1900, in connexion with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students.]

"The Kipling Reader." Macmillan. 1s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

"A Present Day Advent, and other Sermons." By Rev. E. B. Speirs. Blackwood. 6s. net.

"Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek New Testament." By E. Nestle. Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d.

"Old and New Certainty of the Gospel." By A. Robinson. Williams and Norgate. 2s. 6d.

- "Jesus Christ and the Social Question." By F.G. Peabody. Macmillan. 6s.
- "Cairo Genizah Palimpsests," from the Taylor-Schechter Collection. Edited by Dr. Taylor, Master of St. John's College, Cambridge. Cam. Univ. Press.
- [Including a fragment of the Twenty-second Psalm according to Origen's Hexapla. With facsimiles.]
- TOPOGRAPHY.
- "Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate." By Guy L'Estrange. Oxford Univ. Press. 16s. net.
- "Old Virginia and her Neighbours." 2 vols. By J. Fiske. Gay and Bird. 32s. net.
- FICTION.
- "Germinal; or, Master and Man." By E. Zola. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.
- "A Missing Hero." By Mrs. Alexander. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
- "A Pair of Knaves and a Few Trumps." By M. Douglas Plattery. Gay and Bird. 3s. 6d.
- "The Fading of the Light and other Stories." By A. Dunn. Scott. 3s. 6d.
- EDUCATION.
- "England's Neglect of Science." By Prof. J. Perry, of the Royal College of Science, South Kensington. Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.
- "School Management and Methods of Instructions." By G. Collar and C. W. Crook. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
- MEDICAL.
- "Diseases of the Thyroid Gland." Part I. By G. R. Murray. H. K. Lewis. 7s. 6d.
- "Atlas and Epitome of Gynecology." By O. Schaeffer. Saunders. 15s. net.
- "Atlas of the External Diseases of the Eye." Saunders. 13s. net.
- "Atlas and Epitome of Diseases caused by Accidents." By E. Golebiewski. Saunders. 16s. net.
- "Atlas and Abstract of the Diseases of the Larynx." Saunders. 12s. net.
- "Atlas of Diseases of the Skin." By F. Mracek. Saunders. 15s. net.
- "Atlas of Legal Medicine." By E. von Hofmann. Saunders. 15s. net.
- "Atlas and Epitome of Operative Surgery." By O. Zuckerkandl. Saunders. 13s. net.
- "Atlas of Methods of Clinical Investigation." By C. Jacobs. Saunders. 13s. net.
- MISCELLANEOUS.
- "Studies in Peernage and Family History." By J. Horace Round, M.A. Constable. 12s. 6d. net.
- "Practical Electro-Chemistry." By B. Blount. Constable. 15s. net.
- "Chopin: The Man and his Music." By J. Huncker. W. Reeves. 10s.
- "Complete Course of Needlework, Knitting, and Cutting Out." By T. M. James. Longmans. 6s.
- "The Language of Handwriting." By R. D. Stocker. Somerschein. 3s. 6d.
- "Dynamo Electric Machinery; its Construction," &c. By S. Sheldon and H. Mason. Lockwood. 10s. 6d. net.
- "Modern Plumbing, Steam and Hot Water Heating." By J. J. Lawler. Lockwood. 21s. net.
- NEW EDITIONS.
- "Taxes on Knowledge: The Story of their Origin and Repeal." By C. D. Collett. Fisher Unwin.
- "A Master Mariner: The Life of Captain Robert W. Eastwick." Edited by Herbert Compton. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.
- [New volume in the "Adventure Series."]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

- BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.
- "Mother Nature's Children." By A. W. Gould. 7½x5½in., 291 pp. Boston, U.S.A. Ginn & Co.
- CLASSICAL.
- "Lives of Miltiades and Epaminondas." Ed. by A. E. Roberts. 6x4in., 127 pp. Rivington. 1s. 6d.
- EDUCATIONAL.
- "The New Atlantis." By Francis Bacon. (Pitt Press Series.) Ed. by G. C. Moore Smith. 7x4½in., 72 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 1s. 6d.
- "Robinson Crusoe." (Pitt Press Series.) Ed. by J. H. B. Masterman. 7x4½in., 308 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 2s.
- "King Henry V." (Pitt Press Shakespeare.) Ed. by A. W. Verity. 7x4½in., 250 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 1s. 6d.
- "Outlines of the History of the English Language." By T. N. Toller. 7x5in., 294 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 4s.
- "A Primer of Astronomy." (Cam. Science Series.) By Sir R. Ball, LL.D., F.R.S. 7x6½in., 183 pp. Cam. Un. Press.
- "Le Chien du Capitaine." Par Louis Enault. (Pitt Press Series.) Ed. by Margaret de G. Verrall. 7x4½in., 172 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 1s. 6d.
- "Die Journalisten." Von Gustave Freytag. (Pitt Press Series.) Ed. by H. W. Kve. 7x5½in., 183 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 2s. 6d.
- HISTORY.
- "Political Theories of the Middle Ages." By Dr. Otto Gierke. Trans. by F. W. Maitland, LL.D., D.C.L. 10x6½in., 197 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 10s.
- MISCELLANEOUS.
- "The Calendar of Empire. A Tribute to Lives, Deeds, and Words that have gained Glory for Great and Greater Britain." By Ian Malcolm, M.P. 7x6in., 375 pp. Blackwood. 6s.
- "Pionies and Suppers." By Col. A. R. Kenney-Herbert (Wyvern). 7½x5in., 250 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d. n.
- POETRY.
- "As the Wind Stirs," or, Poems in Many Moods. By E. G. Hoare. 7½x5in., 252 pp. Simpkin, Marshall. 4s. 6d.
- "The Wisdom of Nathan Gray, and other Poems." By Denis Davies. 8½x7in., 139 pp. Liverpool: Howell. London: Simpkin, Marshall.
- POLITICAL.
- "Commercial Federation and Colonial Trade Policy." By J. Davidson, Ph.D. 7½x5in., 155 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.
- SCIENCE.
- "Lectures on the Lunar Theory." By J. C. Adams, F.R.S. Ed. by R. A. Sampson. 9x6in., 88 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 5s.
- "Scientific Papers." Vol. II. 1881-1887. By Lord Rayleigh. 11x7½in., 598 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 15s. n.
- THEOLOGY.
- "Thoughts. From the Writings of W. R. Barbour. 6x3½in., 153 pp. Blackwood.
- TOPOGRAPHY.
- "A Picturesque History of Yorkshire. Part XVI. Dent. 1s. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CIX.
By J. C. J. WAINWRIGHT, U.S.A.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White mates in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CX.
By AAGE MEYER.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White mates in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 111. by A. Troitzky. White (6 pieces)—K at Q B 3; Q at Q R 2; B at K R 2; pawns at K R 3, K Kt 3, Q R 3. Black (6 pieces)—K at K 5; Q at K R 3; R at K B 4; Kt at Q Kt 3; pawns at K Kt 4, K B 6. White to play and win.

NOTES AND NEWS.—One of the most remarkable features of the last century, from the chess player's point of view, is the advances made during the last fifty years. Very much credit is due to the late Howard Staunton, who, nearly sixty years ago, commenced the chess column in the Illustrated London News, organized the first tournament (1851), and published the Handbook and several similar standard works. Probably no man really contributed so much of real value in the interests of the game. It met the needs of the rank and file.

There was a chess club or two in existence about 1850, but the real history of English chess and its progress dates from about that period.

A tournament for amateurs was due last Monday at the Hydro, Llandudno, but the programme was too long delayed to admit of a large entry though £50 in all were offered as prizes. Messrs. Burn, Bellingham, Atkins, and Gunston are the entries for the Craigsidde cup contest.

Another coming event, due February 1, is a tournament at Monte Carlo, limited to twelve players. The prizes are, in francs, respectively 5,000, 3,000, 2,000, 1,000, 800, and 500, besides £500 for best game, given by Baron Rothschild, and £250 for the most brilliant game, given by Professor Rice.

A small tournament at Simpson's Divan, our oldest chess resort, ended, as was expected, in favour of the professional, Herr Teichmann.

GAME No. LIV.—Played by correspondence:—

RUY LOPEZ.		RUY LOPEZ.
WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
C. Behting (Riga).	S. Lebedev (St. Petersburg).	C. Behting (Riga).	S. Lebedev (St. Petersburg).
1. P-K 4	P-K 4	13. B-Kt ch	B-Q 2
2. Kt-K B 3	Kt-Q B 3	14. Castles	Kt-K 2
3. B-K 5	B-K 5	15. B-B ch	Q-B 3
4. P-Q B 3	B-R 4	16. Q-Kt 3	P-Q Kt 4
5. Kt-Q R 3 (a)	B-Kt 3	17. Q-Kt-K 5 (f)	P-Kt
6. Kt-B 4	P-Q 3	18. Kt-P	Q-Q 5
7. P-Q 4	PxP	19. K-B P ch	K-Q sq
8. P-Q B 4 (b)	PxP (c)	20. QxP	R-K Kt sq
9. P-R 5	B-Q B 4	21. Q-B 6	QxP
10. P-Q Kt 4	BxP	22. R-Q sq ch	B-Q 3
11. Q-K 4	B-Q B 4	23. B-K Kt 5 and wins.
12. P-R 6 (d)	P-Q Kt 3 (e)

WHITE. BEHTING.

Black to play his 12th move.
(f) Again a brilliant move! If Mr. Behting had played this game in the Paris Tourney, he would have been a successful contestant for one of the two brilliancy prizes. In any case, we consider this game to be of greater brilliancy than the game between Mieses and Janowski.—Notes from Deutsches Wochensach.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 169. SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	21, 22, 23, 24
PERSONAL VIEWS—"A Plea for the Consideration of Walt Whitman," by H. F. Carlill	25
REVIEWS OF THE CENTURY.—SOME EXAMPLES	26
"THE DEATH-KNELL OF FRENCH SYNTAX"	29
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	29
REVIEWS—
Studies in European Literature	30
Recent Verse.—II.	31, 32
Shakespeare Sermons—The Religious Spirit in the Poets—Alfred Tennyson: A Saintly Life—The Mind of Tennyson—Seventy Years at Westminster—The Wisdom of the Wise—The Shadowy Waters— Michael Kramer—The Story of the Birds—Our Bird Friends— My Birds in Freedom and Captivity—A Year with Nature—Lord Lilford—Domesticities—Sleeping Beauty—Pages from a Journal— Pictures and Problems from London Police Courts—Mr. Dooley's Philosophy—Fables in Slang—Wellington's Men—Cash and How to Invest It—The Romance of the South Pole—Half Hours in Japan—The Animal Painters of England	32, 33, 34, 35, 36
ART NOTES	37
Morrison's Machine—Love of Comrades—A Vizier's Daughter—The Minder	37, 38
LIBRARY WORK IN 1900	38
CORRESPONDENCE—The "Robustious Comedy" of Shakespeare's Henry V. (Mr. Sidney Lee)—Edward Fitzgerald and T. E. Brown— The Society of Authors (The Secretary)	38
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for	38, 39
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	39

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a "Personal View" on "The Poetry of the Twentieth Century," by Mr. T. Herbert Warren, President of Magdalen College, Oxford.

With three new editions beginning simultaneously, Scott, whose portrait we give this week, begins the century with a brave flourish. We mentioned last week a new edition of the Waverleys just beginning to appear from the house of Messrs. A. and C. Black. This week yet another re-issue, handy and well printed, is launched upon its career by Messrs. Nelson in their "New Century Library" with "Waverley," giving us—as in the case of Messrs. Black's edition—Scott and nothing but Scott; and next Tuesday Messrs. Macmillan will follow suit with the first two volumes—"Waverley" and "Guy Mannering"—of their new issue of the Border Edition, edited by Mr. Lang, which they took over from Mr. Nimmo last year, and will publish at the rate of two volumes a month.

One critic has asserted recently that Scott "often wrote a style cumbrous and diffuse; that he was tediously analytical . . . that he was tiresomely descriptive," and that he was quite right to be all this, since "the generation which he wrote for was duller than this; slower witted, aesthetically untrained, and in maturity not so apprehensive of an artistic intention as the children of to-day." Another critic, and no less an admirer of Scott than Mr. Lang, thinks just the opposite—viz., that we have declined in intellect, and that the decline dates from the Waverley Novels, which engendered a love of fiction. Whichever is right, there can be no doubt that Scott, who began to write at the beginning of the nineteenth century, maintains his supremacy at the beginning of the twentieth.

VOL. VIII. No. 2.

We are printing, this week, a number of extracts showing how the reviewers practised their art in the earlier years of the century. On the whole they do not seem to have "spotted" the coming men as often as one could wish, or to have had a very keen eye for the promise displayed in the early works of writers of genius—though the recognition of the merits of "Timbuctoo" by the Athenæum and of "The Shaving of Shagpat" by the Saturday Review furnish striking exceptions. Perhaps the critics of the future will be able to bring a similar reproach against the critics of the present; but, on the whole, we are inclined to think that criticism has improved and is improving.

There is always a tendency for criticism, when confronted by a work of striking originality, to resent its defiance of old rules and precepts; but the tendency is not so pronounced as it used to be. The contemporary critic has the experience of the Edinburgh and Quarterly reviewers, as well as his own experience, to guide him. He has been brought up to perceive merit in many antagonistic schools of poetry and fiction, and has observed that many slashing reviews have only represented some superseded school resolved to die in its last ditch. This inherited experience must necessarily help, in some measure, to eliminate the personal equation. It is not to be expected—or even hoped—that that personal equation will ever entirely disappear. If it did criticism would lose in interest a good deal more than it would be likely to gain in any other direction.

Mr. Swinburne shows in his poem "1901," published in the Saturday Review, how far apart he stands from the other poets who have undertaken to inaugurate a new era. It is terse, musical, and full of fine thoughts, and it shows the characteristic tendency to sacrifice meaning to music.

An age too great for thought of ours to scan,
A wave upon the sleepless sea of time
That sinks and sleeps for ever, ere the chime
Pass that salutes with blessing, not with ban,
The dark year dead, the bright year born for man, Dies; . . .

The second and third lines are magnificent; but the whole sentence is a pretty exercise in parsing.

The Daily News, it is understood, is to become the organ of a party for which at present no satisfactory title seems to have been found. At any rate the new Daily News will, on military and foreign affairs, not agree with the old Daily News. With its politics, present or future, we have no concern. But the paper has always taken a high literary standard; and its editorial articles have appealed to those who look too often in vain for wit and culture among the penny and halfpenny morning dailies. We welcome the appointment as editor of Mr. Rudolph Lehmann, an excellent representative of "liberal" education in the non-political sense, famous at Cambridge alike for his journalism, his oratory, his oarsmanship, and his boxing; a scholar who knows the world, an athlete who has edited a voluminous law book, and a politician who has contributed to Anglo-American fraternity by coaching the Harvard eight. We may hope then that the Daily News, if it changes its views, will not alter its style and manner, and that its motto will be—Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose.

* * * *

The venerable art of parody in verse is always with us, but if we perhaps except Mr. Owen Seaman, it has no very brilliant exponents. Mr. Anthony C. Deane in his "New Rhymes for Old" (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.) has one good idea. In the old days when every young reciter gave an "imitation of Irving," no variety entertainment was successful without a "Sir Henry Irving edition" of "Three Blind Mice." Mr. Deane has rather happily turned this idea to a new purpose. Thus we have—"contributed by Mr. William Watson"—

Three mice—three sightless mice—averse from strife,
Peaceful descendants of the Armenian race,

&c., and—from Mr. Henley—

Calm and implacable
Eyeing disdainfully the world beneath
Sat Humpty Dumpty on his mural eminence, and from Mr. Stephen Phillips—

Little Jack Horner sat in an anglé meditating and from Mr. Newbolt a naval ditty, "I saw three ships come sailing by," which closes thus:—

Patriotism is ruling high—
Possibly that's the reason why
I saw three ships come sailing by—
Sailing by, sailing by;
I saw three ships come sailing by
On Christmas Day in the morning!

Mr. Deane derives his inspiration—with almost too much suppression of himself—from one source, both in his parodies and his original verse. The late Mr. J. K. Stephen went to the same fountain head. We need not, therefore, be too hard upon Mr. Deane. What that source is will be quite clear from "The Cult of the Celtic":—

When the eager squadrons of day are faint and disbanded,
And under the windswept stars the reaper gleams
The petulant passion flowers—although, to be candid,
I haven't the faintest notion what that means—

Mr. Deane is far from the inevitableness, the terseness, and maturity of his master. But his verses will serve to dip into.

* * * *

The same may be said of a little book from India, "At Odd Moments," by Dum Dum ("Times of India" Press), who gives us, of course, Kipling and Omar, and even ventures his skill on Shakespeare and Gray. He is a little more racy and elastic than Mr. Deane. His best effort is "To Mandalay—Greeting," by Waltyard Whipping—a truly complex undertaking.

Why do you not return to Mandalay, O soldier?
Do you not remember the boats, and the paddles as they chunked outside the boats?
Do you not remember the elephants, the mighty elephants, strong, mysterious, huge, impalpable (no not impalpable), thick-skinned (so am I), and the way in which they would take up trees or parts of trees, branches, logs, beams, planks, . . . &c. . . in their trunks (the beams carefully supported at their centre of gravity, the logs carefully supported at their centre of gravity, the elephants without a smile at their centre of gravity)
From Rangoon to Mandalay?

For

On the road to Mandalay the flying fishes play,
But there are no omnibuses to ply.
Is there not a thirst here, and are there any ten commandments?
O you commandments! you first, second, third . . . and tenth commandments! is not Mandalay the shop for you, and especially for one of you?

The prose parody is represented by Mr. W. H. Helm. There are two kinds of parody—the kind that makes you laugh and the kind that only makes you smile. Mr. Helm, in his "Studies in Style" (Heinemann, 3s. n.), is as excellent in the latter genre as Mr. Bret Harte and Mr. F. C. Burnand were in the former. His studies are something more than imitations, but something less than caricatures; he imitates the style and only caricatures the subject. He is particularly successful in parodying Mr. Stanley Weyman and Mr. Frederick Wedmore. This is exactly what we should have expected Mr. Wedmore to write if he had gone to Mr. Helm for the synopsis of his story.

He had been talking the night before—at Ramoni's while her husband was paying the bill—of his weekly visit to the eternal seaside, and—an instinct perhaps had decided—she had said three words to him he would remember for ever, "Take me, too," and he accepted her suggestion. In his thoughts he had, perhaps, intended to make it himself. She had gone in a white "Putney" omnibus from Earl's Court to Victoria, where Jack had already arrived in a yellow "Ship-ton" from Park-lane, Stoke Newington—"my remote corner at Mayfair," as he called it—and they had travelled down together. Side by side. And he smoked his pipe. And the train rolled along. Rolled, rolled. They had bathed—far apart—from machines, had been for a row in a boat about as far as the head of the pier, had lunched—where and how we know—had driven to the fosse du diable and back in a char-a-banc, and had returned by the 5.30 express, the last possible occupants of a carriage which plunged heavily on the metals, probably because, like the English climates, its springs were defective.

And this, again, has all the characteristics of Mr. Weyman in a medieval mood.

It was on a warm morning in the third month of the year that I, Gil d'Epingle, Captain of the King's Guard, left my ancestral home, 'twixt Loire and Cher, to attempt the perilous task which my dear Jocrisse had entrusted to me. The dangers that lay before me would have deterred many a man whose title to bravery none would dare dispute, but a d'Epingle, above all when the reward of love's bright eyes awaits him, is fearless as the wild hare in the Royal forest of Vincennes, and as I mounted my trusty mare Bronchade, the gift of my old maternal uncle, the Baron de Cauche de Mar, who had ridden her during forty years in war and peace, I felt that all the desperadoes in France could not stop me in the accomplishment of my mission. As the white mistral melted away before the rising sun, the smiling valleys of lovely Touraine opened out before me in all the glory of their verdant corn. Onward and onward I galloped along the dense forest paths. Time was of supreme importance to me.

* * * *

Speaking of parodies, is one justified in sniffing a savour of parody in "An Englishman's Love Letters," announced by the Unicorn Press? The title can hardly be a coincidence.

* * * *

There has been an immense deal of conjecture about "An Englishwoman's Love Letters," which we noticed when it came out last November, and very little has come out of it. The answers to the questions, Why did he break it off? and Who wrote the letters? still remain the exclusive property of those numerous persons who "could an if they would"; and perhaps a little reaction is only to be expected. The demand began to exceed the supply in December, and as "Arthur Pendenys," the editor of Hatchard's "Belinda's Book List," remarks, "many people therefore spent a much more cheerful Christmas than they otherwise would have done." The same humourist has been interested in noticing the attitude of man towards this book:—

Men have been seen to buy the book and give it to their sisters as a present. It is inexpensive. . . . Mr. Andrew Lang, who usually signs his reviews in the Daily News, when reviewing this book in that excellent journal omitted to sign his name. He attacked the book, and, as it were, fled; but scholar and brilliant man that Mr. Lang is, there is one thing he cannot do—he cannot be anonymous. Mr. Lang's opinion as to the authenticity of the book is worth noting. He says that the book is no more authentic "than the first chapter of a novel." Now Mr. Lang, it is well known, plays golf regularly with the publisher of "An Englishwoman's Love Letters," and what is the good of playing golf with a publisher (or playing golf at all) unless you get to know better things than how to play golf?

The public has had lately an orgie of love letters, and is, no doubt, waiting hungrily for Bismarck's. Perhaps there is more than meets the eye in this little bit of sound advice which Arthur Pendenys presents to his readers. "When my friends asked me to try and intervene to obtain copies, I said I was powerless, and bade each one amuse herself with her own love letters for a few days longer, and so not bother about other people's."

"Sir Walter Besant thinks editors should review only two novels each week. Can any one pretend, asks Sir Walter, that there are more than one hundred novels every year which are worthy of serious treatment? According to the returns annually made by the "Publishers' Circular" there are some thousand new novels published every year. How is the busy editor to discern which are the hundred that deserve to be reviewed? Will his staff read all those that are not worth reviewing? And if he goes slavishly for the well-known names many a tame performance would find its way into the favoured few, while the editor would abandon the most essential part of his duty—the discovery of new merit. And after all the short reviews are much the most valuable ones, in the interest at any rate of those who are on the look out for books worth reading."

The Irish Literary Theatre, founded by Messrs. Edward Martyn, W. B. Yeats, and George Moore for the purpose of purifying the Irish stage, seems on the eve of disintegration. The play by Mr. Yeats and Mr. Moore, based on an old Celtic tale, which was to have been produced this year in Dublin, has been bought, we are informed, by Mrs. Patrick Campbell, and will be produced by her instead of by the Irish Literary Theatre. Unless Mr. Martyn steps into the field and produces a play of his own besides the short piece in Irish promised by Dr. Douglas Hyde, it is difficult to see how there is to be the usual week's performance in Dublin next May. Dr. Hyde's play is founded on the old Irish legend of "The Twisting of the Rope," so admirably told by Mr. Yeats in his "Secret Rose."

The ethics of book borrowing is a subject on which men are apt to change their minds according to whether they are borrowers or lenders. Sir Walter Scott, who observed that his friends were "excellent book-keepers," seems to have been on the side of the lenders. "Anchoret" in Literature the other day gave his spirited support to the borrowers. The editor of Kürschner's "Jahrbuch"—a work to a certain extent corresponding to our "Whitaker"—realizes the weaknesses of both lenders and borrowers. In his edition for 1901 he provides a page for entries of books borrowed, and another for books lent, to whom, and when returned. At the foot of one of the pages are some remarks from Felix Dahn, a few of which we translate:—

It is not fitting for a person to use patchouli and other fragrant perfumes and to read dirty volumes from a lending library; to cut up volumes with the fingers even although they may be clean; to have scissors for cutting off coupons, but no paper knife; to get books from a bookseller for inspection and send them back cut up.

There is a popular impression that authors are much better remunerated nowadays than they used to be. This is hardly confirmed by Mr. George M. Smith's article in Cornhill. In the matter of serial rights, at all events, the successful authors of the sixties did far better than those of the nineties. For his serial contributions to Cornhill Thackeray got £350 per instalment—the equivalent of about £25 per thousand words. Trollope's price for a serial was £2,000, though he tried to stand out for £3,000. George Eliot might have had £10,000 for "Romola" if she would have complied with certain conditions as to the number of instalments, and actually got £7,000. For serials in Household Words both Wilkie Collins and Charles Reade were paid, we believe, as much as £5,000. Does any contemporary novelist get such "compensation," as the Americans call it, for his serials—even when they are serialized separately in England, the United States, Canada, India, and Australia?

The reason for the decline of prices is presumably that the serial is no longer, as in the early Cornhill days, the feature by which a magazine stands or falls. A magazine may have a very large circulation without publishing any serial at all, and the series of connected short stories of the Sherlock Holmes and Captain Kettle type is often preferred to the serial proper. Moreover, really good work is not easy to serialize, so that the writer whose work is of inferior quality probably is better off than he would have been forty years ago. But in the matter of book rights the balance of advantage is with the moderns. Circulations are larger, and the old "half-profit" system has disappeared to their benefit. A really popular author may get a royalty of 33½ per cent. on the published price of a six-shilling novel in England and the colonies, and nearly as much in America, and the advertisements boast of circulations ranging from 100,000 to 400,000 copies. A simple calculation shows what this may mean in the way of profit for the novelist.

Mr. Thomas Wright, of Olney, encouraged by his success in forming a Cowper Museum at Olney, now wants a Dickens Museum. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, interviewed by the Daily Chronicle, promises to discuss the matter with the Boz Club, and suggests the purchase of Gadshill Place. If we are to have a museum at all Gadshill is too inaccessible. There is a more appropriate building in Rochester itself, Eastgate House—the Nuns' House of "Edwin Drood"—a most picturesque Elizabethan structure in the High-street, now used as a club for working-men. But London has superior claims, and it has been suggested that the only Dickens residence (of the two or three now surviving) that possesses the necessary qualifications is No. 48, Doughty-street, Mecklenburgh-square, to which we recently called attention as deserving a tablet recording the fact of its being a home of Dickens, where he wrote a part of "Pickwick" and nearly all "Oliver Twist" and "Nicholas Nickleby." As to Mr. Fitzgerald's second suggestion—viz., the erection in London of a statue of Dickens, statues do not take kindly to London smoke; and such a memorial seems to be in direct opposition to the clause in the novelist's will, in which he conjures his friends on no account to make him "the subject of any monument, memorial, or testimonial whatever." In 1892 Mr. F. E. Elwell, an American sculptor, offered to the London County Council an excellent statue of Dickens with Little Nell, but it was declined for this reason. The statue was afterwards exhibited at Earl's-court, and has since been returned to America.

The newly-organized Pension Fund of the Society of Authors has received donations to the extent of £1,276 15s. 6d. and the promise of £100 18s. 6d. in annual subscriptions. It is arranged that two-thirds of the subscription money shall be transferred to the capital account. The income, therefore, will allow of the granting of a first pension of about £50. The Pension Fund Committee at present consists of Sir Michael Foster, Mr. A. W. & Beckett, and Mrs. Craigie. Three other members will be elected at the general meeting.

The newest magazine is Celtia, the official organ of the Celtic Association, intended to foster sympathy between the five Celtic nations. It publishes a Celtic grammar and dictionary in instalments, as though its conductors intended it to fill the place of a Celtic Popular Educator. Other pages are devoted to pan-Celtic aspirations, to be realized when the Celts have duly learnt their languages. Then "the smallness of their numbers will be outweighed by the strength of those subtle moral and intellectual forces which gave the Greeks the victory at Salamis," and "the Celt will have to prepare himself not merely for a leading position in his own country, but also for a great mission in the world at large." This is an ambitious programme, but though we doubt whether the mission will be particularly helped by the implied threat to harangue the world at large in Celtic, Celtia proposes to use English as its "chief weapon of war," and thinks that every Celt ought to be bi-lingual. This is sensible, and Celtia generally seems an intelligent practical organ.

* * * *

We noted last week the need of funds in some American Universities. The close of the term for the Christmas vacation has shown the interest of the American millionaire in the advancement of learning. Mr. J. D. Rockefeller gives £300,000 to the University of Chicago and £3,000 to the Vermont Academy. Wellesley College, Mass., receives £20,000 from various donors, and Ripon College, Wisconsin, comes into possession of a handsome building for scientific study, the gift of Mr. O. H. Ingram. The Universities have, on the whole, done well by the millionaires. Here is a summary of the largest endowments and their givers:—

Chicago University ..	J. D. Rockefeller ..	$9,133,874 ..	£1,902,848
Gerard College ..	Stephen Gerard ..	7,000,000 ..	1,458,333
Pratt Institute ..	Charles Pratt ..	3,600,000 ..	750,000
Johns Hopkins Univer.	Johns Hopkins ..	3,000,000 ..	625,000
Drexel Institute ..	A. J. Drexel ..	3,000,000 ..	625,000
L. Stanford University	Leland Stanford, jun.	2,500,000 ..	520,833
Cornell University ..	Ezra Cornell ..	1,500,000 ..	312,500
Vanderbilt University	The Vanderbilts ..	1,100,000 ..	229,166
Columbia University ..	Seth Low ..	1,000,000 ..	208,333

But there are millionaires outside of America, and the list may at any rate be taken as an example pour encourager les autres.

* * * *

M. Coquelin writes on "Molière et Shakespeare" in the January number of La Grande Revue. Molière, he thinks, was more essentially the actor than was Shakespeare. He notes that Molière "had no esprit," in contrast with the bubbling but extraneous wit of Shakespeare. Both poets he calls "sublime," but Shakespeare's appeal is rather to the "pathetic," Molière's to the "comic." Shakespeare a les entrailles, Molière a la tête. Moreover, "Molière's personages are, whereas those of Shakespeare become," i.e., Molière's characters are invariable, they behave logically according to their temperaments; Shakespeare's are more diverse; they shift according to the play of circumstance; they are richer and more living. That as a constructive artist Molière was the more expert M. Coquelin has no doubt, although Molière, unlike Shakespeare, neglected his dénouements. As a pure lyric poet, and in humour, Shakespeare is superior. Molière confines himself to humanity; Shakespeare places man in the proper setting of nature. M. Coquelin sums up his views thus, "Shakespeare teaches us to think, but Molière teaches us to live."

* * * *

In view of Mr. R. H. Sherard's letter on the authorship of "Premier Voyage, Premier Mensonge," which appeared in Literature of Dec. 8, it is amusing to find that eloquent psittacist, M. Gaston Deschamps, discoursing in the Temps on Alphonse Daudet, and taking that book as his text under the impression that it is an authentic work of the author of "Tartarin de Tarascon." Mr. Sherard was, in his own language, responsible for the "construction and writing," though not of the plot, of the story, the French text being a "translation from Mr. Sherard's English manuscript." He will find M. Deschamps' comments both flattering and amusing. "This innocent 'tartarinade,'" he says, "is related with an exquisite art. The ascent of the Rhone, the halts in the towns, the incidents aboard are the occasion of a series of pictures that amuse the eye, while the heart is already charmed by the seductions of this light, singing, winged prose."

The editor of the Publishers' Circular, having a taste and talent for figures, makes annual calculations of which the results are as interesting as the process of arriving at them must be laborious. We owe to his toil our knowledge of the fact that the books of 1900 were 418 fewer in number than the books of 1899, and that these again were 410 fewer than the books of 1897. A little sum of our own, starting with shows the rate of decline in the twelve months just completed to have been at the rate of a little more than $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; and it would not be difficult for a practised mathematician to demonstrate that steady decrease at this pace would, before very long, reduce our literary output to the 693 volumes which, as we mentioned a fortnight ago, was the figure in the last year of the eighteenth century. It certainly looks, at the first blush, as though we might see the fulfilment of the late Mr. J. F. Nisbet's prediction that newspapers would take the place of books until these in their turn were superseded by the tape and the phonograph. The prophecy, however, is pessimistic, as modern prophecies usually are; and as the sagacious Scotch say, "It is no good bidding the Devil good morning before you meet him." In the meantime we note, with mixed feelings, that the diminished activity of men of letters (or of the publishers who refuse to publish for them) is confined to a few departments of literature. In some branches of the art there has been even more than normal diligence. Surgery is one case in point—thanks, partly, no doubt, to the new problems raised by the war. Law books, also, have increased in number, and so have works of history, biography, travel, science, and social and political economy. In fact, if it were not for theological publications—of which there were only 579 last year as against 590 in the preceding year—we should be able to say that, in a year of wars and rumour of wars, and grave national perils and anxieties, the reading public has shown a tendency to turn aside from works of imagination and seek comfort in the literature of thought and of the established fact. At any rate, it is the works of imagination that show the most noticeable falling off. Novels have dropped from 1,825 to 1,563; poems from 317 to 296; and works of belles lettres from 290 to 289. The circumstance cannot be wholly due to accident; and at the same time it would be hard to ascribe it to any single cause. It would be cynical to say that the frequent presence of fiction in telegrams from the seat of war has obviated the need for other kinds of fiction, but it would not be entirely untrue. It would not be in the least cynical, and it would be quite true, to say that the papers have often been so interesting that it has been difficult for the weaver of plots in London to compete with the weaver of rumours at Shanghai, and the narrators of daring exploits in South Africa. De Wet and Prince Tuan have been formidable rivals to Captain Kettle and Herod. But this has not been the only influence at work. In all likelihood the most potent cause of the temporary eclipse of the novel has been of a purely economic nature. There has been more income-tax to pay. Tobacco and tea and wine have all been more expensive; and so have coal, and oil, and general groceries. To meet the additional outlay it was necessary to economize somehow; and the two trades which first suffer from the economies of the public are notoriously the hat trade and the book trade. People do not, of course, go without hats, but make the old ones last a little longer. In the same way we may suppose that they do not go without books, but read the old ones over again. If that is their habit their economies may in the long run do them more good than harm. We trust they do pursue this policy, but the subject is one on which it is impossible to obtain statistics.

$$418 \times 100$$

$$\hline 7567$$

Personal Views.

A PLEA FOR A CONSIDERATION OF WALT WHITMAN.

The critic has his duties as well as his rights. He is allowed to say what he likes ; but there are subjects on which he ought to say something whether he likes it or not, and one of these is certainly the poetry of Walt Whitman. At present the world has not even begun to make up its mind about America's most original writer. No one knows what to think. Such opinions as have been recorded—Symonds', Swinburne's, Watts-Dunton's—differ outrageously. To one he is a foul-mouthed, half-articulate savage ; to another the cardinal poet and prophet of the age. At least, he makes an impression of some sort !—but what should be the attitude of the average reader towards him ? “ Leaves of Grass ” is a problem that cries for solution, and an essay on the merits of its author ought to be constituted the diploma work of every one who aspires to write criticism. For one thing, his influence on the vocabulary and syntax of English prose is already strong and may well become irresistible ; and were it only as a phenomenon to be somehow historically explained, as an object-lesson in æsthetics or pathology, he would deserve far more study than he has yet received. His personality, his ethics, his view of the world, his notions of art are all alike irritating and perplexing to the last degree.

Whitman owes nothing, or next to nothing, to the past. He invents his literary form, his system of ideas, his very language. What is more, he is from the first fully and unmistakably alive to his position, his purpose, and his qualities. His worst excesses are committed of malice aforethought and with a perfect consciousness of their effect ; until one recognizes this one has not even begun to understand him. To apply the ordinary standards of criticism to Walt Whitman is merely to beg the question. He denies the premisses. Admit everything against him ; draw up a list of the canonized poetic virtues and point to his utter lack of each and all—it is nothing ; the man himself in all his incorrigible naiveté is untouched. The terms that can do justice to his genius have yet to be invented. Our usual phrases have been so thumb'd and worn in the service of more conventional writers that they have lost all the gloss and sincerity of their meaning. For this strange being we want a vocabulary as strange as his own—“ fluid,” “ merge,” “ effuse,” “ a pallid float,” “ lambent tableaux,” and the like.

He is the most sensuous, the most realistic writer in the history of literature. Mere description may not be one of the highest forms of art ; there is no symbolism, no “ beyond,” in Walt Whitman ; “ having pried through the strata, analysed to a hair, counsel'd with doctors, and calculated close, I find no sweeter fat than sticks to my own bones ” ; but for giving the bare immediate impression there is no one like him. For a while he seems to talk incoherently and at random, and suddenly there emerges in mid stream, as it were, one of those “ countless clear and perfect phrases ” of which Symonds speaks :—

The tongue of his foreplane whistles its wild ascending lisp,
Rise after rise bow the phantoms behind me, Pleas'd with the Quakeress as she puts off her bonnet and talks melodiously,
Stretch'd and still lies the midnight,— and a hundred others. Where there is no word to hand he invents a new one with the ease and felicity of a child learning to talk. Metaphors, of course, there are ; but a metaphor in those powerful hands loses all its delicacy and suggestiveness, and becomes little more than a convenient synonym, an alternative sound for indicating a given thing.

So far the question is fairly simple ; but all beyond is doubt and contradiction. We are accustomed to think of a poet as first of all a creature of instinct, entering unawares into his kingdom, travelling freely by virtue of some obscure impulse over heights where a moment's self-consciousness means bathos and annihilation. But this American prophet “ shakes his white locks at a runaway sun,” and talks in the next breath about his digestion or his opinions on feudalism without losing his serene self-possession for a moment. Bathos there is, but somehow there is not the shock that one ought to feel. And this is because he makes a cult of “ the art of sinking in poetry.” One can imagine him saying :—“ Bathos, ma femme, I salute you. I do not despise you as others do ; for I perceive you are a part of the great watchword Ensemble ”—and hence to various conclusions on the subject of democracy or the manufactures of Chicago. This is one, at any rate, of Whitman's secrets. He does the most outrageous things, but always on purpose. In a sense his intention is the very denial of art. Does he write metrically ? He hastens to throw in a shapeless scrap of prose. Does he let slip an exquisite phrase ? In a moment he caps it with an outburst of heart-rending journalese. Again, in defiance of Aristotle, his work has neither beginning nor end. It is strictly a sort of philosophic panorama, structureless and spasmodic—undifferentiated literary protoplasm, so to call it. And not only is the form undefined ; the indifference with which the matter is chosen has something in it alien to one's ordinary notions of art. He “ does not call the tortoise unworthy because she is not something else,” and he thinks “ the tree-toad ” (in his nameless dialect) “ a chef-d'œuvre for the highest.” He bids us worship and glorify the world and all that is in it without distinction, and the half of him is given up to translating elementary sensations.

But then, what he admires in anything is its naturalness, its adaptations, its place in the vast unending process of the world. The ugly is that which contradicts its inborn purpose by weakness, malady, or vice. Morality is health, freedom, development, sympathy. Whitman's “ cosmic enthusiasm,” as Symonds calls it, is no cockney satisfaction with the surface-beauty of nature, but an overmastering sense of the living force, “ the procreant urge ” of the world. His lines are not seldom orderly and metrical ; when “ pensive and faltering ” he speaks of the dead, the tone is faultlessly and nobly sad ; but when his theme is life, the life of the unique, breathing “ democratic individual,” and of the world around, the traditional bonds of rhetoric fall away. In the heat of his emotion sentences run one into another or pass into a sort of luminous haze ; new words, new constructions are seen nantes in gurgite vasto, and the motion of the whole is invested with an unearthly, fluid, elemental vigour. It is Pre-Adamite art—and whether we are to call it poetry or prose is a question that can interest none but compilers of dictionaries. At least, it is powerful stuff—a medium as pliant and various as the heart of man could desire, and certainly the only possible form for Whitman's philosophy. The ordinary English of prose and verse is too clear-cut, too punctuated, too full of false distinctions to give the illusion of limitless force and magnificence on the one side, answered by vast and inarticulate feeling on the other.

The first virtue of a style is to be expressive, and to this extent Whitman's style is practically perfect. Whatever its faults, they are the faults of his whole character and outlook ;

the entire man must be judged together. Nor, again, can one pick out this or that part of his work and reject the rest. It is written :—" Do I contradict myself ? Very well, then I contradict myself (I am large, I contain multitudes) " ; and again, " I do not trouble my spirit to vindicate itself or be understood, I see that the elementary laws never apologize." If you admire " Whispers of Heavenly Death," you must educate yourself out of your distaste for " Children of Adam." Subjectivity in criticism may be sometimes the truest wisdom, but in the case of Whitman it is sheer folly, for what he said and felt about the end of life he was bound not only to feel but to say about its beginning also. " Leaves of Grass " is intellectually one and organic. Whitman himself compared its growth to the successive rings of a tree, and the comparison is a just one: only the tree, if one may say so, grew consciously and of set purpose. The paradox of absolute originality and absolute self-knowledge must be accepted at the outset. Others may grope and hesitate, but with Whitman doubt is a thing unknown. He seems to have understood what he was about from the very first line, to have started with his system of ideas ready made to his hand, and to have done no more than apply it persistently and impartially to the universe at large. There is scarcely a trace of development. The poem emerges, proceeds, ceases at the same level of serious enthusiasm and in obedience to the same dominant principle. What exactly that principle is to be called it is not easy to decide. " Physiological development," the poet's own phrase, does not carry one far ; but, at any rate, his purpose was to justify the ways of nature to men in general, and the United States in particular, from a wholly new point of view. To prefer the soul to the body is an accepted opinion, but it was not Whitman's :—

I have said that the soul is not more than the body,
And I have said that the body is not more than the soul,
And nothing, not God, is greater to one than one's self is,
And whoever walks a furlong without sympathy walks to his own funeral drest in his shroud.

This, perhaps, is his keynote—a boundless assertion of the individual, not standing aloof from nature, but palpably and indubitably centred in the very stream of the world, in touch with everything that sense can feel, inexhaustibly emotional, incommunicably alive ; not Carlyle's hapless unit poised between two eternities, but a whole universe, as it were, conscious at once of its past and its future, and grasping both in a triumphant present.

In short, " Leaves of Grass " makes immense claims, and the average reader ought to be given the chance of deciding how far its claims are justified. It is the average reader's point of view that the preceding remarks are intended to represent ; apart from his evident and unique power over language, Whitman remains at present something of a mystery, and it is surely time that our authoritative critics made some attempt to explain him.

H. F. CARLILL.

REVIEWS OF THE CENTURY.

SOME EXAMPLES.

WORDSWORTH.

[From a Review of " The Excursion " by Jeffreys. Edinburgh Review, November, 1814.]

Did Mr. Wordsworth really imagine that his favourite doctrines were likely to gain anything in point of effect or authority by being put into the mouth of a person accustomed to higgle about tape or brass sleeve-buttons ? Or is it not plain that, independent of the ridicule and disgust which such a personification must give to many of his readers, its adoption exposes his work throughout to the charge of revolting incongruity and utter disregard of probability or nature ? For, after he has thus wilfully debased his moral teacher by a low occupation, is there one word that he puts into his mouth, or one sentiment of which he makes him the organ, that has the most remote reference to that occupation ? Is there anything in his learned, abstracted, and logical harangues that savours of the calling that is ascribed to him ? . . . A man who went about selling flannel and pocket-handkerchiefs in this lofty diction would soon frighten away all his customers, and would infallibly pass either for a madman or for some learned and affected gentleman who in a frolic had taken up a character which he was peculiarly ill-qualified for supporting.

KEATS.

From a Review of " Endymion " by John Wilson Croker. Quarterly Review, April, 1818.]

This author is a copyist of Mr. Hunt, but he is more unintelligible, almost as rugged, twice as diffuse, and ten times more tiresome and absurd than his prototype, who, though he impudently presumed to seat himself in the chair of criticism, and to measure his own poetry by his own standard, yet generally had a meaning. But Mr. Keats had advanced no dogmas which he was bound to support by examples ; his nonsense, therefore, is quite gratuitous ; he writes it for its own sake, and, being bitten by Mr. Leigh Hunt's insane criticism, more than rivals the insanity of his poetry.

BYRON.

[From a Review of " Don Juan." The British Review, 1819. By William Roberts. The reference is to the lines—

For fear some prudish readers should grow skittish,
I've bribed my grandmother's review—the British.

I sent it in a letter to the Editor,
Who thank'd me duly by return of post—
I'm for a handsome article his creditor ;
Yet if my gentle Muse he please to roast,
And break a promise after having made it her,
Denying the receipt of what it cost,
And smear his page with gall instead of honey,
All I can say is—that he had the money.

Byron afterwards replied to Roberts in a sarcastic " Letter to the Editor of my grandmother's Review," published in the Liberal in 1819.]

No misdemeanour—not even that of sending into the world obscene and blasphemous poetry, the product of studious lewdness and laboured impiety—appears to us in so detestable a light as the acceptance of a present by an editor of a review as the condition of praising an author ; and yet the miserable man (for miserable he is, as having a soul of which he cannot get rid) who has given birth to this pestilent poem has not scrupled to lay this to the charge of the British Review, and that, not by insinuation, but has actually stated himself to have sent money in a letter to the editor of this journal, who acknowledged the receipt of the same by a letter in return, with thanks. No peer of the British realm can surely be capable of so calumnious a falsehood, refuted, we trust, by the very character and spirit of the journal so defamed. We are compelled, therefore, to conclude that this poem cannot be Lord Byron's production : and we, of course, expect that Lord Byron will, with all gentlemanly haste, disclaim a work imputed to him, containing a calumny so wholly the product of malignant invention.

CHARLES LAMB.

[Review of " Elia " in The Times, Dec. 21, 1822.]

A little volume of essays has just been published, with the title of " Elia," most of which had already appeared, we believe, in one of the magazines. They well deserved to be collected, for they have that in them which ought not to be buried among the usual trash which necessarily goes to the filling up of a periodical work. The admirers of the Spectator and Tatler (and who does not admire those classic volumes?) will be pleased with the lucubrations of "Elia"; they will often be reminded of the quiet and elegant humour of Addison, and of the fanciful and pathetic eloquence of Steele.

FASHIONABLE NOVELS.

[From The Times, July 7, 1828.]

Here is a specimen of the slip-slop with which so many thousand reams of paper have lately been spoiled. "Tea was announced, and the ladies adjourned to the saloon, Lady Harriet and Lady Charlotte discussing, as they went in together, the difficult question, whether it was or was not an improvement in modern arrangements to have tea en buffet. One of its advantages the ladies were perfectly aware of—namely, that it afforded a point de réunir for both beaux and belles, which is always so much wanted before the music begins; and calculating on this important circumstance, Lady Charlotte possessed herself of the chair which was the most accessible of the whole group. Miss Mortimer, with equal foresight, stationed herself at the fire: 'Good generalship,' whispered Lady Hauteville to the Duchess, as the two experienced matrons communicated together sur les petites ruses, which the actors fancied were unperceived," &c. This is an actual quotation, and by no means an unfair one, from one of the most popular novels of the day. Strange that such trash should find readers; stranger still that young noblemen should, for a few paltry pounds, write and put their names to such degrading absurdities.

TENNYSON.

[From a Review of "Timbuctoo." Athenæum, July 22, 1829.]

We have accustomed ourselves to think, perhaps without any very good reason, that poetry was likely to perish among us for a considerable period after the great generation of poets which is now passing away. The age seems determined to contradict us, and that in the most decided manner; for it has put forth poetry by a young man, and that where we should least expect it—namely, in a prize poem. These productions have often been ingenious and elegant, but we have never before seen one of them which indicated really first-rate poetical genius, and which would have done honour to any man that ever wrote. Such we do not hesitate to affirm is the little work before us; and the examiners seem to have felt it like ourselves, for they have assigned the prize to its author, though the measure in which he writes was never before, we believe, thus selected for honour.

[From a Review of "Poems Chiefly Lyrical," by Christopher North. Blackwood's Magazine, 1832.]

One of the saddest misfortunes that can befall a young poet is to be the Pet of a Coterie; and the very saddest of all, if in Cockneydom. Such has been the unlucky lot of Alfred Tennyson. He has been elevated to the throne of Little Britain, and sonnets were showered over his coronation from the most remote regions of his empire, even from Hampstead Hill. Eulogies more elaborate than the architecture of the costliest gingerbread have been built up into panegyric piles in commemoration of the Birth-day; and 't would be a pity, indeed, with one's crutch to smash the gilt battlements, white, too, with sugar as with frost, and begemmed with comfits. The besetting sin of all periodical criticism, and nowadays there is no other, is boundless extravagance of praise; but none splash it on like the trowel-men who have been bedaubing Mr. Tennyson. There is something wrong, however, with the compost. It won't stick; unseemly cracks deform the surface; it falls off piece by piece ere it has dried in the sun, or it hardens into blotches; and the worshippers have but discoloured and disfigured their Idol. The worst of it is, that they make the Bespattered not only feel, but look ridiculous; he seems as absurd as an Image in a tea-garden; and, bedizened with faded and fantastic garlands, the public cough on being told he is a Poet, for he has much more the appearance of a Post.

CARLYLE.

[From a Review of Carlyle's "French Revolution." Athenæum, May 20, 1837.]

Originality of thought is unquestionably the best excuse for writing a book; originality of style is a rare and a refreshing merit; but it is paying rather dear for one's whistle to qualify for obtaining it in the university of Bedlam. Originality, without justness of thought, is but novelty of error; and originality of style, without sound taste and discretion, is sheer affectation. Thus, as ever, the corruptio optimi turns out to be pessima; the abortive attempt to be more than nature has made us, and to add a cubit to our stature, ends by placing us below what we might be, if contented with being simply and unaffectedly ourselves. There is not, perhaps, a more decided mark of the decadence of literature than the frequency of such extravagance.

The applicability of these remarks to the History of the French Revolution, now before us, will be understood by such of our readers as are familiar with Mr. Carlyle's contributions to our periodical literature. But it is one thing to put forth a few pages of quaintness, neologism, and a whimsical coxcombry; and another to carry such questionable qualities through three long volumes of misplaced persiflage and flippant pseudo-philosophy. To such a pitch of extravagance and absurdity are these peculiarities exalted in the volumes before us that we should pass them over in silence, as altogether unworthy of criticism, if we did not know that the rage for German literature may bring such writing into fashion with the ardent and unreflecting.

DICKENS.

[From a Review of "Martin Chuzzlewit." The Spectator, January 7, 1843.]

The evils of periodical publication, in a species of work whose value must eventually be tested by its merit as a whole, are obvious. Everything must be sacrificed to immediate effects; each successive part must be made to tell by itself; and the result, as Marryat has remarked, will be that when all the parts are brought together the general character is glaring, overdone, and disconnected; whilst either from the climax being virtually reached at an early period, or the necessity of attracting the reader no longer stimulating the author, the interest, as Dangle tells Sir Fretful, rather falls off in the fifth act, the end wearing the appearance of being huddled up by negligence or hurry. This sacrifice of art to the profit of the artist is so common, not to say universal, in the present age that it is hardly an imputation upon anybody to do what almost every one would do if he could; yet it is a sign of the genius of Boz and the literary character of Trollope to find that they more systematically pursue this method than any other writers—Boz, indeed, having in a certain sense given it the fashionable currency.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

[From a Review of "Jane Eyre," by G. H. Lewes. Fraser's Magazine, December, 1847.]

After laughing over "The Bachelor of the Albany" we wept over "Jane Eyre." This, indeed, is a book after our own heart; and if its merits have not forced it into notice by the time this paper comes before our readers, let us, in all earnestness, bid them lose not a day in sending for it. The writer is evidently a woman, and, unless we are deceived, new to the world of literature. But, man or woman, young or old, be that as it may, no such book has gladdened our eyes for a long while. Almost all that we require in a novel she has: perception of character, and power of delineating it; picturesqueness; passion; and knowledge of life.

[From a Review of "Jane Eyre." The Examiner, November 27, 1847.]

There can be no question but that "Jane Eyre" is a very clever book. Indeed, it is a book of decided power. The thoughts are true, sound, and original; and the style, though rude and uncultivated here and there, is resolute, straightforward, and to the purpose. There are faults, which we may advert to presently; but there are also many beauties, and the object and moral of the work is excellent. Without being professedly didactic, the writer's intention (amongst other things) seems to be to show how intellect and unswerving integrity may win their way, although oppressed by that predominating influence in Society which is a mere consequence of the accidents of birth or fortune. There are, it is true, in this autobiography (which though relating to a woman we do not believe to have been written by a woman) struggles, and throes, and misgivings, such as must necessarily occur in a contest where the advantages are all on one side; but in the end, the honesty, kindness of heart, and perseverance of the heroine are seen triumphant over every obstacle. We confess that we like an author who throws himself into the front of the battle as the champion of the weaker party.

[From a Review of "Shirley." The Times, Dec. 7, 1849.]

It would be unjust to the fair authoress—for lady she is, let who will say to the contrary—if we did not allow that at times the talk is worthy of her genius, and that gems of rare thought and glorious passion shine here and there throughout her volumes. But the infrequent brilliancy seems but to make more evident and unsightly the surrounding gloom. "Shirley" is not a picture of real life; it is not a work that contains the elements of popularity, that will grapple with the heart of mankind and compel its homage. It is a mental exercise that can bring its author no profit, and will not extend by the measure of an inch her previous well-deserved success. Millions understood her before—she may count by units those who will appreciate her now. "Jane Eyre" was not a pure romance. "Shirley" is at once the most high-flown and the stalest of fiction.

NOVELS OF THE SEASON.

[From The Times, Sept. 7, 1848.]

What shall we say of the three volumes—of 900 pages? There is something really oppressive in the thought that, whatever may be the ingenious novelist's subject, that particular compass he is required to fill. One wants to tell of an Irish row, another is anxious to give a philosophic view of the precise state of civilization among the ancient Finlanders; a third thinks it would be entertaining to show you how England looked in the time of King Stephen; a fourth would kindly instruct you by the example of a strong-minded girl, who overcomes all sorts of domestic disagreeables; a fifth would set forth the misery that ensued when an evangelical young lady turned Roman Catholic; a sixth would prepare a counter charm, by a Catholic young gentleman turned evangelical; a seventh would talk about balls and soirées, and grow eloquent about drawing-room furniture, without any story at all; an eighth desires to look a great way back, and to present you with a tale of Babylon, in which Semiramis is the heroine; a ninth would look facetiously forward and tell the aspect of the world in the twentieth century, and so on, and so on, and so on. But all these worthy individuals—the philosophical, the theological, the historical, the archeological, the domestic, the serious, the jocose, have the measure of three volumes set before them, and this the booksellers, sterner than fate, require them to fill. If their subject does not fit, it must be stretched; if no degree of tension will suffice, it must be eked out.

THACKERAY.

[From a Review of "The Kickleburys on the Rhine." The Times, Jan. 3, 1851.]

It has been customary, of late years, for the purveyors of amusing literature—the popular authors of the day—to put forth certain opuscles, denominated "Christmas Books," with the ostensible intention of swelling the tide of exhilaration, or other expansive emotions, incident upon the exodus of the old and the inauguration of the new year. We have said that their ostensible intention was such, because there is another motive for these productions, locked up (as the popular author deems) in his own breast, but which betrays itself, in the quality of the work, as his principal incentive. Oh! that any muse should be set upon a high stool to cast up accounts and balance a ledger! Yet so it is; and the popular author finds it convenient to fill up the declared deficit, and place himself in a position the more effectually to encounter these liabilities which sternly assert themselves contemporaneously, and in contrast with the careless and free-handed tendencies of the season, by the emission of Christmas books—a kind of literary assignats, representing to the emitter expunged debts, to the receiver an investment of enigmatical value. For the most part bearing the stamp of their origin in the vacuity of the writer's exchequer rather than in the fulness of his genius, they suggest by their feeble flavour the rinsings of a void brain after the more important concoctions of the expired year. Indeed, we should as little think of taking these compositions as examples of the merits of their authors as we should think of measuring the valuable services of Mr. Walker, the postman, or Mr. Bell, the dust-collector, by the copy of verses they leave at our doors as a provocative of the expected annual gratuity—effusions with which they may fairly be classed for their intrinsic worth no less than their ultimate purport.

MEREDITH.

[From a Review of "The Shaving of Shagpat." Saturday Review, Jan. 19, 1856.]

Little did we imagine that a work of genius was announced under the incomprehensible title which has, for many weeks past, met our eye among the advertisements of new books. "The Shaving of Shagpat"! What could it mean? "An Arabian Entertainment"! What might that be? It is very seldom that an announcement which piques curiosity is followed by a work which satisfies the curiosity; but in "The Shaving of Shagpat" a quaint title ushers in an original and charming book, the work of a poet and of a story-teller worthy to rank with the rare story-tellers of the East, who have produced, in the "Arabian Nights," the "Iliad" of romance.

GEORGE ELIOT.

[From a Review of "Adam Bede." The Times, April 12, 1859.]

It is only after much beating about, long intercourse with society, and many strange discoveries and detections that the truism which we never doubted becomes a great reality to us, and we feel that man is like to man even as face answers to face in a glass. It is in the enunciation of this difficult truism that Mr. Thackeray differs from all previous novelists. It is the supreme motive of all that he has written, and the key to all the criticism that has been poured upon him. . . . We do not mean for one moment to detract from Mr. George Eliot's originality when we say that after his own fashion he follows this difficult path in which Mr. Thackeray leads the way. He has fully reached that idea which it is so easy to confess in words, but so hard to admit into the secret heart, that we are all alike, that our natures are the same, and that there is not the mighty difference which is usually assumed between high and low, rich and poor, the fool and the sage, the best of us and the worst of us. In general, it is only matured minds that reach this state of feeling—minds that have gone through a good deal and seen through a good deal; and our author has precisely this broad sympathy and large tolerance, combined with ripe reflection and finished style, which we admire in Mr. Thackeray. Here the comparison ends. Mr. Eliot differs so widely from Mr. Thackeray in his mode of working out the philosophy which is common to both that some of our readers may wonder how we could ever see a resemblance between him and the great painter of human vanities and weakness. Whereas Mr. Thackeray is, to the great disgust of many young ladies, continually asserting that we have all got an evil corner in our hearts, and little deceitful ways of working, Mr. Eliot is good enough to tell us that we have all a remnant of Eden in us, that people are not so bad as is commonly supposed, and that every one has affectionate fibres in his nature—fine, lovable traits in his character.

DARWIN.

[From a Review of "The Origin of Species," by Bishop Wilberforce. Quarterly Review, July, 1860.]

Mr. Darwin writes as a Christian, and we doubt not that he is one. We do not for a moment believe him to be one of those who retain in some corner of their hearts a secret unbelief which they dare not vent; and we therefore pray him to consider well the grounds on which we brand his speculations with the charge of such a tendency. First, then, he not obscurely declares that he applies his scheme of the action of the principle of natural selection to Man himself, as well as to the animals around him. Now we must say at once, and openly, that such a notion is absolutely incompatible not only with single expressions in the word of God on that subject of natural science with which it is not immediately concerned, but, which in our judgment is of far more importance, with the whole representation of that moral and spiritual condition of man which is its proper subject-matter.

"THE DEATH-KNELL OF FRENCH SYNTAX"

We announced on October 13 the acceptance by the French Academy of M. Hanotaux's report on the reform of French syntax. The secretary of the Academy, M. Gaston Boissier, now states that the Upper Board of Education, who were the initiators of the reform, have acquiesced in the criticisms of M. Hanotaux, so that there will be no sensation like that aroused between the critics and the Academy in the old days over the merits of the "Cid." One may be consoled, however, by the thought that the Academy has insisted on its statutory right "to strive, with all the care and diligence possible, to determine fixed rules for the French language, and to make it pure, eloquent, and capable of treating of art and letters." The Academy recognizes that "there is something too subtle in certain prescriptions of modern grammarians." At the same time it doubts whether the principle of "tolerance" will be appreciated by writers, type-setters, proof-readers, or business men, who "need to know how words are written or how they agree; they are the first to ask for a rule in order to avoid uncertainty, discussions, and disorder."

The Report of the Upper Board of Education aimed at simplifying difficulties in examination questions. The Academy admits that to exact knowledge of delicacies of style is futile, but it agrees with M. Hanotaux that the subtler mysteries should be explained in the upper schools. As to the grammatical difficulties it wants to simplify, the Academy is even more radical than the Upper Board of Education. In phrases like "témoin des victoires que vous avez remportées" and "je vous prends à témoin" it insists that the word "témoin" should be invariable, as written. It will allow no variation in the following past participles:—"Approuvé," "attendu," "ci-inclus," "ci-joint," "y compris," "ôté," "passé," "supposé," "vu," and "étant donné." As to the use of the word "tout," the Academy is not so lax as the Commission, and insists on keeping the distinction between "ces femmes sont tout heureuses" and "ces femmes sont toutes heureuses." Plurals and singulars puzzle the Academy a little; for it the choice between such forms as "des confitures de groseilles" (or "de groseille") is unimportant. As to the gender of words like "aigle," "amour," "orgue," "délices," "enfant," "gens," "orge," "œuvre," "hymne," "Pâques," "période," the Academy can but urge conformity with the habits of the best speakers. For instance, the form "les aigles romains" it strikes out in place of "les aigles romaines"; nor will it yield to "les fous amours de Cléopâtre" instead of "les folles amours de Cléopâtre." In composite words like "garde-forestier" the Academy thinks that the reforms introduce unnecessary complication. It has no objection in general to the suppression of the hyphen, admitting that words like "grandmère," "grandmesse," "grandroute" have become single words. In fact, it hesitates to anticipate usage, preferring to follow it. It accepts the "toleration" of the subjunctive present in place of the imperfect in subordinate sentences dependent upon conditional verbs, as, for instance, "il faudrait qu'il vienne ou qu'il vint."

The question of past participles is one which agitates the mind of the foreigner. M. Hanotaux says:—

To alter the rule of the agreement of participles is to deal a most serious blow to French literature as a whole. It is to make all poetry written hitherto by one fell blow archaic.

Were the present rule to disappear many verses could no longer be regularly scanned. Moreover, the importance of feminine rhymes in French poetry is such that the suppression of the e mute at the end of many verses would abolish not only the harmony, but also even the rhythm. French poetry has not at its disposal resources so abundant that it can be compromised thus light-heartedly. The reform proposed would have, for our classics, consequences like those of the reform of de Vaugelas in the case of the poets of the sixteenth century. Soon, men of erudition alone would be able to feel all the force of verses like these of Corneille:—

Va, néglige mes pleurs, cours et te précipite
Au-devant de la mort que les dieux m'ont prédite.

or the charm of these verses of Racine:—

Non, Arsace, jamais je ne l'ai moins haïe or

Lieux charmants où mon cœur vous avait adorée.

The rhythm of Victor Hugo's line:—

Près des meules, qu'on eût prises pour des décombres would have to be explained. And strophes like this, from Alfred de Musset, would be cruelly altered:—

Celui-là sur l'airain a gravé sa pensée
Dans un rythme doré, l'autre l'a cadencée;
Du moment qu'on l'écoute, on lui devient ami.
Sur sa toile, en mourant, Raphaël l'a laissée;
Et, pour que le néant ne touche point à lui
C'est assez d'un enfant sur sa mère endormi.

We have not been able to agree to such sacrifices. It seems to us that the rule of agreement of the past participle with the auxiliary "avoir" is so simple that children can really learn it without difficulty. There are cases even in which the application of this rule avoids ambiguities. For instance, "la clause de l'armistice que vous avez acceptée"; likewise in "Bérénice," the line where Antiochus, speaking of Bérénice, says:—

Titus l'aime, dit-elle, et moi je l'ai trahie.

Most often the gender assumed by the participle helps to clarify and solidify the phrase. We ask you, therefore, to insist on the maintenance of the rule of agreement of past participles constructed with the verb "avoir" and of the past participles of reflective verbs.

The Academy leaves a writer free, however, to say "la femme que j'ai entendu [or 'entendue' feminine] chanter," as well as "les sauvages qu'on a trouvé [or 'trouvés'] errant [or 'errants'] dans les forêts," and similar cases.

This agitation, therefore, has ended in a compromise. The Academy has been obliged to affix its belated imprimatur to certain alterations in the French language which the public, according to the good old principle of usage, had, in spite of the tradition, insisted upon. In this, however, there is no surrender—only a reaffirmation of the great principle on which a language develops—namely, usage. The definition by de Vaugelas of "good usage" was as follows:—"C'est la façon de parler de la plus saine partie de la Cour, conformément de la façon d'écrire de la plus saine partie des auteurs du temps." His book was submitted in 1704 to revision by the Academy, which published its "Observations" thereon. Much water has flowed under the "Pont des Arts" in the last two centuries, and these "Observations" have had, in their turn, to be partly revised.

W. M. F.

THE DRAMA.

"THE TAMING OF THE SHREW."

Seeing that the Benson company contrived to make The Merry Wives amusing to a modern audience, one had no doubt of their success in The Taming of the Shrew, which is in every respect—in theme, in plot, in characterization—a far better work. To enjoy either of these farces the playgoer of to-day has, no doubt, to make a certain effort. Their humour seems a little Boeotian, their frolic a little Fescennine. One does not particularly want the scent of the buck-basket brought over the footlights; the ear is fatigued with the cracking of Petruchio's whip. Probably the playgoer's frame of mind is one of mild surprise when he finds himself laughing at the rough-and-tumble business. He goes home saying to himself "Well, after all, I was only bored now and then . . . such and such a thing was really funny . . . evidently Shakespeare at his worst is still Shakespeare." That, I will admit, was my own mood over the Falstaffian farce; but out of The Taming of the Shrew I got almost unqualified pleasure. I say "almost," because, in seeing the Benson company, I could not dismiss from my mind the strong impression produced by the Daly performance, with the gallant Petruchio of John Drew and the superb Katharina of Ada Rehan. Nothing like this performance has been seen in our time; and, for all sorts of reasons, the Benson company cannot hope to rival it. But they do very well—Mr. Benson and Mr. Weir particularly well. Mr. Benson's Petruchio I saw during his tenancy of the Globe in 1889, and I will venture to quote what I then said of it:—

Mr. Benson's Petruchio is a bawling, overbearing bully. So, he may say, is Shakespeare's. But Petruchio is playing the bully, he is showing us how a man of spirit can get the better of a woman of spirit, he is a gentleman posing as a virtuoso in shrew-taming. All the while he should tip us the wink; he should seem to be saying, "Observe my virtuosity—isn't it good fun?—didn't I take that note well?—mark, I beg you, the humour of the thing." Now Mr. Benson's Petruchio is entirely serious; he displays no humour for us to mark. Well, a dozen years have passed, during which Mr. Benson (like the young lady in the anecdote) "has not been idle." He has learnt to tip us the wink, to be less terribly in earnest, to introduce little gestures, little odds and ends of "business," so as to give us the impression that Petruchio, while he is taming the shrew, by starvation, by "contrariness," by a general policy of "going one better," is really in love with her. That I am more than ever of opinion (after a dozen years! what luck!), is the right way to play Petruchio. Unfortunately, this is a game which it requires two to play at. If there is to be an undercurrent of love visible in Petruchio's treatment of Katharina, we of the audience must be permitted to see that there is au fond something lovable in Katharina. She must be a shrew worth the taming. Her "temper" must be little more than the defect of her qualities—the seamy side of an opulent, commanding temperament. Now I desire to speak with all respect of Mrs. Benson, a most earnest, intelligent, and versatile actress. But a lady who plays all Shakespeare's heroines in turn must fail in some of them, and Katharina, as I understand the part, is not one of Mrs. Benson's successes. She has not the rich physical endowment for the part (how odious the trade of histrionic criticism, which makes it impossible to avoid "personal remarks" about a lady!) and, further, she is not at the pains to suggest the fundamental charm beneath Katharina's shrewishness. Katharina should be a splendid maitresse femme, as the French untranslatably say, with a "devil of a temper." Mrs. Benson presents merely a spiteful vixen, with moments of downright hystero-epilepsy. So much so that when, ostensibly "tamed" in the fourth act, she delivers her gentle homily on dutiful wives, one suspects her to be up to another of her tricks.

But then for our delight there is the Grumio of Mr. Weir. This comedian is the very man for a stock company; he "grows upon" you. He is quiet, a rare merit in low comedians. He smiles slyly, when his fellows would grin through a horse-collar. There is a merry twinkle in his eye. For purposes of my own I have been lately looking into the records of a great actress of comedy in the first half of the last century, Mrs. Glover. Keats (in 1817) said her comedy was "round and comfortable." Leigh Hunt (in 1832) said it was "cosy." These are the very epithets for Mr. Weir. Miss Lillian Braithwaite is a pretty Bianca; Mr. Lyall Swete, as Gremio, is an absurdly youthful and lusty old gentleman; Mr. Frank Rodney is a properly "intense" and throbbingly amorous Lucentio.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

TAYLORIANA.

STUDIES IN EUROPEAN LITERATURE. Being the Taylorian Lectures, 1889-1890, delivered by S. Mallarmé, W. Pater, E. Dowden, W. M. Rossetti, T. W. Rolleston, A. Morel-Fatio, H. Brown, P. Bourget, C. H. Herford, H. Butler Clarke, W. P. Ker. (Clarendon Press. 7s. 6d.)

These eleven essays are not all equal in merit. Some of them are more pompous than informing, and only cover the obvious with a thin veneer—a habit of lecturers which it is no part of the critic's duty to encourage by pointing out that the truisms are true. But, of course, a few of them are on a higher plane. Walter Pater's lecture on Prosper Mérimée is, as one would have expected, good alike as a piece of prose and as a piece of criticism, though his audience may have wished that he had chosen a theme of higher interest and importance. Professor Dowden, too, who writes of "Literary Criticism in France," makes a good point in showing that some of the French critics, usually admired as most characteristically French, had really, with great pains, formed themselves on English models. The great instance is Sainte-Beuve—though Matthew Arnold, who did so much to popularize Sainte-Beuve in England, failed to perceive it:—

The fact is perhaps worth noting that while Mr. Arnold was engaged in indicating for our use the vices and the foibles of English criticism as compared with that of France, Sainte-Beuve was thinking of a great English philosopher as the best preparatory master for those who would acquire a sure judgment in literature. "To be in literary history and criticism a disciple of Bacon," he wrote, "seems to me the need of our time." Bacon laid his foundations on a solid ground-work of facts, but it was his whole purpose to rise from these to general truths. And Sainte-Beuve looked forward to a time when, as the result of countless observations, a science might come into existence which should be able to arrange into their various species or families the varieties of human intellect and character, so that the dominant quality of a mind being ascertained we might be able to infer from this a group of subordinate qualities.

The science has not come into existence yet. To call it into existence becomes more and more difficult, since books increase and multiply to such an extent that no one critic has the time to make the "countless observations" required before he has the right to generalize; the choice is between reference to authority and unabashed impressionism; and at the moment impressionism seems to hold its own even more securely in criticism than in the other arts.

From French criticism one passes by a natural transition to French fiction, and notes that M. Bourget's lecture on Flaubert, which is printed in French, is one of the most suggestive in the volume. M. Bourget not only sees, what every one can see, that Flaubert was conspicuous among novelists for his unflinching resolve to be "impersonal"—to keep his individual likes and dislikes and sufferings and longings out of his books. He also perceives that it was because he failed to do this that he has impressed the world. This original point of view taken by M. Bourget of Madame Bovary is more interesting at this moment, when, as we recently announced, a youthful effort of Flaubert's—Les Mémoires d'un Fou—altogether subjective and autobiographical in character, is appearing for the first time in the Revue Blanche. But the personal note in this early work belongs to a somewhat different mood. Flaubert, pouring out his soul in the exuberance of youth, was not yet the pessimist whom M. Bourget discovers between the lines of Madame Bovary.

Reprenez en effet cette "Madame Bovary" qu'il a prétendu exécuter de cette manière impeccablement objective, et cherchez à dégager la qualité qui en fait, de l'aveu des juges les plus hostiles, un livre tout à fait supérieur. Ce n'est pas l'exactitude du document. . . . Non. Ce qui soulève cette médiocre aventure jusqu'à une hauteur de symbole, ce qui transforme ce récit des erreurs d'une petite bourgeoise mal mariée en une poignante élogie humaine, c'est que l'auteur n'a pas pu, malgré les gageures de sa doctrine, se renoncer lui-même. Il a beau choisir un sujet situé aux antipodes de son monde moral, le raconter tout uniment et sans une seule réflexion, maintenir chacun de ses personnages à un même plan d'indifférente impartialité, ne pas juger, ne pas conclure, sa vision de la vie le révèle tout entier. Le mal dont il a souffert toute sa vie, cet "abus de la pensée" qui l'a mis en disproportion avec son milieu, avec son temps, avec toute action, involontairement, instinctivement, il le donne à ces médiocres héros.

And so the writer who set out to seek fame as the Dutch landscape painter of social life in Norman towns found it as the great pessimist of the West ; and his pessimisms may be found on almost any page of almost any of his books, though it is summed up, once and for all, in the "Oui, peut-être bien ! C'est là ce que nous avons eu de meilleur !" of the last page of "L'Education Sentimentale." It is a fine and penetrating criticism which points this out, and we cannot help regretting that M. Bourget did not pursue his subject further, and trace the evolution which began with a masterpiece which the author's subsequent work never equalled. It is an interesting critical theme, and one which has never received the attention which it deserves. Those who read Flaubert's three great novels of modern life in the order in which he wrote them will hardly fail to perceive two processes at work. The first is a steady and gradual decline from drama to panorama ; the second is a descent, even more rapid and striking, from portraiture to caricature. In Madame Bovary you feel that, given the premisses—the narrow country life, the well-meaning but unsympathetic husband, and the sentimental wife with the maladie de la pensée—the conclusion follows inevitably. Events march straight on towards calamity as though guided by the Nemesis that even the gods obey. In "L'Education Sentimentale" the connexion between conclusions and premisses is no longer inevitable, but is still reasonable and probable ; things might very well have happened as they did, though they might also have happened differently. In "Bouvard et Pécuchet" the connexion between premisses and conclusions is purely accidental. One feels that one might search Paris from end to end without finding two clerks who, coming into money, would be guilty of the follies perpetrated by these two foolish men. Such are the stages in Flaubert's development. He seems to have changed from the pained observer of life to its spiteful satirist ; and though it was impossible for him to write a bad book, his art suffered sadly in the transformation. To trace that transformation in detail is a task that still awaits the critic. We know of no critic who would discharge the task with more acumen than M. Bourget.

RECENT VERSE.—II.

Sir Lewis Morris has no occasion to apologize, as he almost does in his preface, for appearing before the public as a writer of the twentieth century. His poetical reputation has been established for some time, and his new and, it is said, his last, volume, HARVEST-TIDE (Kegan Paul, 5s.), will do nothing to injure it. The book contains a few pieces written on special occasions—Jubilees, birthdays, and the like—which have already been published ; but these, to our thinking, are not his best efforts, and we are inclined to prefer some of his minor poems as being more spontaneous and more poetical. An exception, perhaps, should be made in the case of the graceful and well-deserved tribute paid to the memory of the late Mr. Thomas Ellis. It is very much a matter of taste, but we should rank among the best in this volume the lines in praise of December evenings ; on a flock of birds flying south by night ; the spirited Sherborne School verses ; those which describe Welsh mountains and rivers ; and the following little poem called "Terra Domus" :—

Above the deep-set valley
The mountain-ranges rise ;
Above the clouded summits,
The boundless skies.

Beyond the crested surges,
Broad plains of ocean are,
Beyond the dim horizons
The evening star.

Beyond, above the limits
Of toil and pain and strife,
Gleams like a fitful beacon
The blessed life.

Beyond Earth's quick mutations,
Bright hopes and glooms of fear—
Ah ! but high heaven affrights us,
Our home is here !

It is impossible to say what posterity will think of Sir Lewis Morris. Probably, it will read his poems with pleasure, but without finding in them the memorable phrases, and the subtle felicities of thought, language, and music by which our greatest poets are distinguished.

We have praised Mr. Money-Coutts on a former occasion, but in his MYSTERY OF GODLINESS (John Lane, 3s. 6d.) he has scarcely risen to the height of his great argument. His argument, stated in a few prose sentences at the beginning of his book, is, that all religions contain the seeds of heresy by which they are disrupted ; that the heresy implied in the Christian religion is a disbelief in the story of the Fall, "on which that religion is based" ; that this heresy arises from imagination, the highest faculty of the mind ; and that imagination shows that the search for God must, from the very nature of the case, be eternal. We cannot discuss the author's theology, but would rather express our obligations to him for so clear a statement of his meaning. This large theme is elaborated in a series of sixteen-line poems of very uneven quality. They are thoughtful enough, but the metre is undistinguished and monotonous. If we do not quote Mr. Money-Coutts at his best, it is because he has written too many lines like the following :—

Protesting Churches may not choose
Among the Scriptures ; pleased or vexed,
They have no power to bind or loose
Plain meanings of the sacred text.

God either meant that Eve should eat,
And gave the serpent leave to plot,
Her education to complete—
God either meant or meant it not.

If he determined her to fall,
Then are the consequences His ;
But if He wished it not at all,
He is not God ; but Satan is !

Religion round the primal sin
May weave confusion, like a net,
And endless sophistry may spin—
Those cross-ways will confront her yet.

Recently we had the pleasure of reviewing an amusing work by Mr. Gilbert Chesterton, entitled "Grey-Beards at Play," and we therefore turned with delight to the author's new book THE WILD KNIGHT AND OTHER POEMS (Grant Richards, 5s. n.), but this, alas, comes to us with all the seriousness that grey covers and hand-made paper traditionally suggest. The mature and cautious humour of the former work is in "The Wild Knight" replaced by a rash sincerity and a quite juvenile earnestness. Mr. Chesterton, we fancy, anticipates something of the shock which his readers will experience at such a change, for he apologetically introduces himself in his new character as—

Another tattered rhymster in the ring,
With but the old plea to the sneering schools,
That on him, too, some secret night in spring
Came the old frenzy of a hundred fools.

To make some thing : the old want dark and deep,
The thirst of men, the hunger of the stars—

But, indeed, if one may forget his late gaieties, it can be acknowledged that there is the true stuff of poetry in many of his present verses. "The Wild Knight" tells an impassioned story in blank verse dialogue, full of fine lines and graceful turns of thought, and sounding a poetic note not common among our poets. A slightly different, but equally significant, side of Mr. Chesterton's work is shown in such a poem as "The Donkey"—

When fishes flew and forests walked
And figs grew upon thorn,
Some moment when the moon was blood
Then surely I was born ;

With monstrous head and sickening cry
And ears like errant wings,
The devil's walking parody
On all four-footed things.

The tattered outlaw of the earth,
Of ancient crooked will ;
Starve, scourge, deride me : I am dumb,
I keep my secret still.

Fools ! For I also had my hour ;
One far fierce hour and sweet :
There was a shout about my ears,
And palms before my feet.

It would be easy to find many another example of quiet strength and brilliant expression among Mr. Chesterton's poems ; if it were not for the haunting fear of losing a humourist we should welcome the author of "The Wild Knight" to a high place among the poets.

We are not sure that Mr. Herbert Trench has chosen a very interesting subject in DEIRDRE WED (Methuen, 5s.), with its strong flavour of Ossian, but he writes with a good deal of taste and imagination, and seems to understand both the Celtic spirit and the art of blank verse. There are touches of Tennyson in the movement of his verse, and a distinct reminder of the late Laureate in such a line as Heavily up the steep through the King's hedge.

Some of the shorter poems, too, are extremely graceful and musical, and indeed deserve higher praise. One of the best is the "Song for the funeral of a boy." It is too long for quotation, but it shows Mr. Trench's power and, it must be owned, his characteristic defect of a difficult style and an occasional lack of lucidity. There are at least two phrases in this fine poem which, we should say, will puzzle most readers :—

Up in her hold
The wide-wing'd Azure cold
Mantling in gyre on gyre shall mark him come.

And again :—

Let his head nigh
The chrisom violet lie.

Not in this poem, but elsewhere, we find a line which has no meaning at all, as far as we can see. What are Self-muttering cities that have lost horizons ?

We have read Mr. Trench's book with pleasure, in spite of these riddles and difficulties. He would be a better poet still if he would bear in mind that clearness of thought and simplicity of expression generally go together.

At the other extreme are the verse-writers whose ideas, being always simple and obvious, are expressed with much facility in an obvious way. In their case one suspects, not confusion of thought, but a mind that is content with only a moderate amount of intellectual exercise. Mr. Walter Earle, the author of HOME POEMS (George Allen, 10s. 6d.), observes all the rules of rhyme and grammar and writes intelligible but undistinguished verses. Sometimes, as in his treatment of the myth of Antæus, he has a happy thought and shows originality in working it out ; but his lines and reflections do not, on the whole, reach a high level. His patriotic poems on the South African war are as commonplace as any we have seen.

LOVE'S ARGUMENT AND OTHER POEMS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) derives most of its interest from the fact that it is from the pen of Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler. It helps to prove the truth also demonstrated by the poetical works of Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Lecky, and Mr. Thomas Hardy that a talent for prose does not necessarily imply a talent for verse. Miss Fowler's verses are rather obvious, and sometimes hard to scan. The following lines are fairly typical of their general tone and thought and their average standard of performance :—

Dearest, half my day is over,
Half my journey plodded through,
Yet I've found nor friend nor lover
That can be compared with you.

Half the joys of life I've tasted,
Drunk of pleasure not a few,
Yet I feel completely wasted
Was each hour not spent with you.

I have mixed in sweet confusion
Friendships old and friendships new,
And I've come to this conclusion—
There is nobody like you.

And so on. It might pass as a sentimental song for the drawing-room ; but it cannot be taken seriously as poetry.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Religion in the Poets.

"There is a religion of weekdays as well as of Sundays, a religion of cakes and ale as well as of pews and altar cloths." So philosophises the Dean of Ely in one of the happiest of eight SHAKESPEARE SERMONS (Longmans, 2s. 6d. n.) preached at Stratford-on-Avon, and now brought together in book form by the Rev. George Arbuthnot, the vicar of Stratford. The phrase hits off the kind of practical morality to be found in Shakespeare. He would have smiled had he been told that he would ever be preached about ; nevertheless, he supplied a surprising amount of good matter for the pulpit. No writer could draw a good woman without making her dull so well as Shakespeare. The names of Portia, Imogen, Cordelia, Miranda do honour to any pulpit, and they are not forgotten by Canon Ainger and the Dean of Ely. Apropos of Falstaff, Mr. Laffan shows that the bad characters have also their salutary effect. He does not go so far as Dr. Nicholson, who says that Shakespeare "never clothes vice in the garb of attraction," but he points out that whatever fascination Falstaff's escapades may have, his degradation in the end is mercilessly emphasized. Canon Ainger is less lenient. He thinks that had Bowdler confined himself to pruning Shakespeare's dialogue of its coarseness with judgment he would have accomplished "a laudable and useful task." But he recognises, of course, the high tone of Shakespeare's work as a whole. His is one of the best of the commendably brief sermons which Mr. Arbuthnot has reproduced.

In treating of THE RELIGIOUS SPIRIT IN THE POETS (Isbister, 5s.) there is a danger which the Bishop of Ripon has done well to avoid in his short but illuminating book on the subject. Religious sentiment cannot be taken so literally in poetry as in prose. A poet's figures of speech may often be taken as evidence of his religious spirit or of the opposite, according to the humour of the reader. When Chaucer introduces Nature as the "vicar-general" of the "Former principal," with the power

To forme and peynte erthely creature.

he may be taken to express his devotion for God, the "Former principal," or, on the other hand, as merely giving utterance to the kind of pantheism so nobly refuted by Cowper three centuries later :—

The Lord of all, himself through all diffused,
Sustains, and is the life of all that lives.
Nature is but a name for an effect
Whose cause is God.

And, similarly, while some critics attacked Tennyson as an atheist on the publication of "In Memoriam," the Bishop finds the poem full of religious feeling.

We must not, in fact, look for definite religious teaching in the highest poetry. The Bishop does not deal with poems definitely religious, and he avoids all questions of orthodoxy. The works to which he chiefly directs attention are "Piers Plowman," "The Faery Queene," "Dr. Faustus," "The Tempest," "Comus," "The Ancient Mariner," and "In Memoriam." The religious element in "Faustus," "Comus," "The Ancient Mariner," and "Piers Plowman" is not far to seek. As to "The Faery Queene," although some writers count the allegorical meaning that underlies it as a defect, it cannot be ignored. In illustrating the virtues suggested to him by Aristotle Spenser certainly superimposed upon them the ideals of Christianity. The Bishop rightly insists on a side of Spenser's greatness that has been too little emphasized. His manner may have been archaic; but, nevertheless, his poem breathed the new life of the Reformation into the old, out-worn forms of chivalry which Rabelais and Cervantes held up to scorn. But the attempt here made to trace a current of religious thought running through The Tempest is more ingenious than convincing. There are lines here and there which suggest religious ideas. But they are not particularly emphatic, and the lessons of the play—if we must draw lessons from it—might, we think, have been taught by a moral philosopher of no religious creed—the mutability of things and the final triumph of the good over the bad, the development of moral nature in man, and so on. "In Memoriam" proves a more fruitful field for investigation, and the many religious aspects of the poem are admirably brought out by the Bishop. Two matters of detail may be worth noting. Considering Milton's treatment of his family it is not quite felicitous to speak of him as "master in his own house." And it is incorrect to say that in "Comus" the brothers left their sister in order "to recover the track." They went to gather berries for her. The point is unimportant save for the amusing emphasis which Dr. Johnson laid on what he considered the "unreasonable conduct" of the brothers.

Few poets have been so fully discussed from the religious side as Tennyson. Dr. Horton, in ALFRED TENNYSON: A SAINTLY LIFE (Dent, 4s. 6d.), takes not so much the teaching of his poems, but the teaching of his life. The book is, of course, based on the present Lord Tennyson's memoir, which is used as "a quarry from which to dig," and which Dr. Horton thinks may be somewhat tedious to readers who may wish to know what manner of man Tennyson was. We doubt whether such a life as this will correct, as Dr. Horton hopes, the disadvantages under which a son who "hesitates to praise" must labour in writing a life of his father. The prepossessions of a son are only replaced by the prepossessions of a preacher. But, nevertheless, it may be conceded that Tennyson forms a fit subject to be included among "Saintly Lives," and Dr. Horton has from this point of view achieved his task with good taste and ability.

Nor is there very much that is new in THE MIND OF TENNYSON, by Prof. Sneath, of Yale (Constable, 5s. n.). It puts together on a systematic plan all the passages in the poems which bear on God, Freedom, and Immortality, and expounds in a rather professorial manner what is now generally accepted by lovers of Tennyson to be his "message" on those subjects. As a careful collation of references to passages which reveal Tennyson's thought, it will be useful. We are rather at a loss to understand exactly what is meant by a prefatory note stating that "this volume, in which the poem, 'Crossing the Bar,' is quoted at p. 188, is introduced with the kind consent and sanction of Messrs. Macmillan and Co., Limited."

Memories of the House of Commons.

The late Sir John Mowbray kept no diaries, and was always unwilling to write a formal autobiography; but he contributed three articles of reminiscences to Blackwood's Magazine, and from these, supplemented by many of Sir John's letters, his daughter has constructed a volume, SEVENTY YEARS AT WESTMINSTER (Blackwood, 7s. 6d.) which is a fitting memorial of a famous old Parliamentary hand. As the book is of moderate size, and is good reading from beginning to end, it compares favourably with the prolix and pretentious biographies that are too much the fashion. The seventy years include Sir John Mowbray's boyhood at Westminster School, and are broken only by his residence at Oxford. At College, and at the Bar, he was not exceptionally distinguished; but his marriage in 1847 changed not only his name, but his career also, and his local connexions. His West-country surname of Cornish became Mowbray, and he now formed closer ties with Durham than with his native Devonshire. In 1853 he first sat in Parliament for the City of Durham. He sat for Durham for 15 years, and then, from 1868 to the day of his death in April, 1899, for Oxford University. He had to go only once to the poll at a contest—on his first entry into Parliament. On the death of Mr. C. P. Villiers he became Father of the House, and was greeted as such by the Speaker.

The new members of the present House will learn its manners and customs more easily than its temper and its traditions. Its traditions are such that one would fain hope that they may never be forgotten or neglected. No one did more to keep them alive than Sir John Mowbray, who rendered the House great, but not conspicuous, services. He was not known outside the House as one of its prominent members. But inside the House, he performed for 25 years duties of great importance as Chairman of the Committees on Standing Orders and of Selection, and had more to do than any other man with the work done by Select and Standing Committees. The utility of a member is not to be measured by the length of the reports of his speeches. If it is true that "they also serve who only stand and wait," it is equally true that much of the best work done at Westminster never comes to the public notice at all. Sir John Mowbray spoke seldom, but spoke well. Nothing could have been more complete, or more suitable to the purpose in hand, than his speech proposing Sir Matthew White Ridley for the Chair in 1895. It was marked by admirable taste and old-fashioned geniality. He was overwhelmed with compliments and congratulations from both sides of the House. In truth, the House itself should have been congratulated on a speech the whole tone and character of which recalled its own best days. "A thorough House of Commons man" was Sir John Mowbray's verdict on Mr. Bradlaugh; not because there was the smallest resemblance between them, but because he recognized that Mr. Bradlaugh obeyed all the unwritten laws of the House. He was generous in his appreciation of the great leaders of both sides—there is no unkind word in his whole book; and he had the kindest possible feelings, not only for young men of promise, but also for the Labour members—not always young—who enter the House under certain disadvantages. He knew of no enemies, except when the two parties sat opposite each other in debate, or filed off into different lobbies. On all other occasions he steadily upheld the doctrine of liberty, equality, and fraternity among the members, and was himself almost as popular on one side as the other. To have maintained through a Parliamentary lifetime these pleasant relations with the whole House, without any compromise of his own principles, and to have lived to an honoured old age in the very midst of party strife, surely says much both for himself and for our political system. We recommend to our readers this modest and true record of a member of the old school. Miss Mowbray has undoubtedly added to the interest of the three original articles, and the book has the further advantage of a series of portraits of five Speakers.

Drama.

Whenever a play by an admittedly clever novelist falls flat on the stage, there is bound to be a chorus of "No good for acting, but how well it would read." Yet, as a matter of fact, most plays that do not act well have a trick of not reading well either. The novelist may not sacrifice quite enough of his peculiar aptitude to make his work dramatic, but he generally sacrifices too much to permit it to be read. On the stage THE WISDOM OF THE WISE (Unwin, 3s. 6d. n.) fails because there is not enough movement to hold an audience. In print the tenuity of the plot is not so apparent, but the thinness of the characters afflicts one more, and the unreality of the whole is more apparent. It is all very much up-to-date and fashionable in the extreme. The Duke writes articles for the Daily News, and the ladies play Perosi and Bridge (not Sir Frederick, but the game), and they all make desperate efforts to talk, not like real people, but like people in other plays. But this cannot dispel the air of tedious make-believe which rests stubbornly upon every page. The reflection that occurs to the reader is not "How true to life!" but "How lucky life isn't like this!" No wonder the men and women are listless. No one is ever allowed to sit still for five minutes together. "They have their exits and their entrances" with a vengeance. It would be as comfortable to sit in the hall of a large hotel as in the Pink Saloon at Chale House. And as for their conversation! If there are such vapid people in the world they can be of no use to the dramatist except to make fun of. And if Mrs. Craigie would urge that she intended to make fun of them we could only say that this kind of fun may amuse her, but that, unfortunately, it does not amuse us.

Mr. W. B. Yeats' poem THE SHADOWY WATERS (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.) is rather a slender affair to stand by itself in the form of a complete drama. It is short, and is so much broken up by dialogue that there are no sustained passages and speeches in it. It shows, however, a picturesque imagination, and pleases in spite of a certain want of substance. Mr. Yeats' blank verse is easy to the verge of carelessness. He employs many more anapaests than are desirable in blank verse, and does not scruple to add a hypermetrical foot or two when he finds it convenient. On the other hand, save for the repeated use of the word "druid" as an adjective equivalent to "enchanted," or "mystic," his English cannot be reproached.

The hero of MICHAEL KRAMER, Gerhart Hauptmann's new drama in four acts, is a painter. By mighty industry he has accomplished all that talent and soul can attain. He is a pure idealist. Art is his religion. His pupils worship him and all who come in contact with him feel the better for his influence. But he lacks genius, and he knows it. He knows also that what he lacks his son Arnold possesses, and this way tragedy lies, for Arnold is an idle, good-for-nothing fellow, a coward, and a liar to boot. Kramer does his utmost to rouse his son to a sense of his misdoing, to lead him to a new life directed to those higher ends for which his artistic genius fits him. But his efforts are futile. Arnold solves the problem so far as he himself is concerned by putting an end to his life. The last act is Kramer's elegy over the body of his son. Anything more poetical and imaginative and harmonious we scarcely remember in literature. Whether such a conclusion to an acting play fulfils the purposes of dramatic art is another question. We are regarding it only from the purely literary standpoint. This whole act wherein Kramer praises death, the goal and victory of life, is fine throughout. Love is strong as death, but death is gentle like love. Death is the gentlest form of life, the masterpiece of everlasting love. "When greatness once enters life, everything that is small, or trifling, is quenched. The small separates, the great unites. Death is always grent, death and love." "How many things," he cries, "are dead to me in life, how many who still live. Why do our hearts bleed and beat at the same time? Because they must love. That produces harmony everywhere, and yet the curse of destruction lies over us. We desire to let nothing go from us, and yet all goes as it comes!" Hauptmann here shows himself in a new light. He is, perhaps, becoming conscious of a new influence.

For there are on the German literary horizon faint signs, though only very faint as yet, of a reaction against the pessimism and negation that has lately played so large a part in literature and art—of an attempt to emerge into a fuller light, a deeper harmony where there will be no longer a necessary separation between knowledge and accomplishment, between the word and the deed, between emotion and action.

Birds.

Side by side with the huge pile of unnecessary biographies and valueless fiction which have turned book-making from an art to a vicious indulgence must rank, we fear, books about birds. Yet birds, like gardening which is in a similar predicament, form a harmless and even a wholesome subject to write about; and an hour passed with even the worst of the bird books now before us would be a less regrettable memory than half-an-hour spent over a society journal or a futile novel. The most solid of them is THE STORY OF THE BIRDS (Allen, 5s.) by Mr. Charles Dixon, a very copious writer on the subject, who here attempts with some success to give in eight chapters a popular sketch of the different aspects of bird life. Its chief defect is an absence of illustrations (other than a frontispiece) which are particularly requisite in a popular exposition of bird anatomy. As a general treatise on the subject, written in a readable way, the book has its value. Mr. R. Kearton's OUR BIRD FRIENDS (Cassells, 5s.) is, to use the author's own words, a "chatty" book for young readers, and is illustrated with a plentiful supply of photographs. Mr. C. Kearton is a pioneer in the use of the camera out of doors among birds and beasts, and some of the photographs here given show that his industry in this direction may produce something more than the merely pretty and sensational. Mr. Richard Kearton's "chat" has, at any rate, the virtue of enthusiasm. The Rev. H. D. Astley's MY BIRDS IN FREEDOM AND CAPTIVITY (Dent, 12s. 6d.) has some good advice about cages and aviaries and how to look after them; but so far as "birds in freedom" are concerned it seems to be wholly without merit save for the illustrations, which are meritorious original drawings by the author himself. The same may be said of Mr. W. Percival Westell's A YEAR WITH NATURE (Drane, 10s. 6d.) whose very commonplace and prolix observations are enlivened by many large and well reproduced photographs. Finally, we must mention a book of a wholly different type, which may, nevertheless, be regarded as mainly ornithological. This is the life of LORD LILFORD (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d.), by his sister. A life of this well-known and enthusiastic student of bird life, to whom English bird lovers are so much indebted, is, we understand, to be written by "a distinguished naturalist," but the present memoir gives us a pleasant personal picture of a man who, as the Bishop of London says in a preface, "was a remarkable example of the refining and ennobling power of suffering on a noble nature." The name of Lord Lilford is familiar to naturalists as that of the author of "Birds of Northamptonshire," and of the letterpress to Mr. Archibald Thorburn's "Coloured Figures of British Birds." He did not aspire to be a distinguished man of science; he was rather an enthusiastic naturalist, always ready to help the cause of ornithology with sympathy and with funds. We have ranked the memoir with bird books because a great and perhaps an excessive amount of space is devoted to correspondence about birds which does little more than illustrate Lord Lilford's tastes. But there is a great charm in the picture of the unpretentious, large hearted, cultured nobleman, whose interest in all that was good in nature and in man only grew warmer as his bodily powers became hampered by ill health, and the authoress will certainly have achieved her modest purpose of keeping his "memory alive in the family to which he belonged."

Facts and Fancies.

In these days, when the world is old and some of its inhabitants begin to think that there is nothing further left to be said on any subject, it is a bold thing for a man to address himself to the task of writing little essays on Tea, on Clothes, on Walks, on Letter-writing. There are no "new facts" here; no new gospel to preach. Yet the thing can be done, and done successfully. Mr. Jerome made a great hit by boldly attacking the commonplace in his "Idle Thoughts," and Mr. E. V. Lucas does the same in DOMESTICITIES (Smith, Elder, 5s.). He begins on "toast" and wanders on quite pleasantly and wisely through a number of what he calls household impressions; one charm of the book being that he says so many things which we have often thought ourselves but not given words to, and another that he says them in agreeable English, with a touch of culture and a quiet, unobtrusive humour.

More ambitious, but less companionable, is Mr. Le Gallienne's volume of Prose Fancies which are collected under the title which belongs to the first of them—SLEEPING BEAUTY (Lane, 5s. n.). They seem to be gathered up from many back pages of periodicals, and when we come to a little piece entitled "The Blue Jar," and see at its close a paragraph consisting only of the words "I remember only the little blue jar," one feels a sinking at the heart. It is like sitting through "In the gloaming" at a village concert. Others of the sketches, as those on Mr. Stephen Phillips, on the Jubilee, on Love Letters, seem to have grown a little musty with keeping. One or two others have some more good stuff in them, and the "Sleeping Beauty" itself is one of the best, while all display the writer's pretty gift of expression. But Mr. Le Gallienne had better be turning his hand to fresh work—say, in the way of literary appreciation. For this he has many qualities worth developing, and if he would give his mind to it he might say something the world would listen to.

It is impossible to characterize a book which, like Mark Rutherford's PAGES FROM A JOURNAL (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), includes about thirty different subjects in less than 300 pages. One is a short story; others are sketches that might be made into short stories; others are philosophical; others literary. The author discusses in turn Spinoza, Milton, Judas Iscariot, Goethe, and Byron, and fills the interstices of the volume with little essays which are provokingly short, considering the ability they show. Perhaps the gem of the oddly assorted collection is the clever correspondence between a young lady of advanced opinions and her old-fashioned and scholarly godfather. One wishes that there were more of these letters, and that, both here and in his other subjects, the author had pursued the matter further and had set himself a more serious task. As things are, the book affords pleasant, but extremely desultory, reading.

Police Court Philanthropy.

Mr. Thomas Holmes, the well-known police-court missionary, was assured not long since by a professor of phrenology that he ought to have been an actor or a writer for the Daily Telegraph. His book PICTURES AND PROBLEMS FROM LONDON POLICE COURTS (Arnold, 10s. 6d.) shows no particularly histrionic quality, but it is certainly written in a style and contains much information that might be welcome to "the largest circulation." Years spent in the attempt to alleviate the sorrows of the criminal and unfortunate have left Mr. Holmes cheerful and hopeful. The demented, the outcast, the utterly "bad hat" have still an adviser and often a hard-working friend, or agent, in the missionary—notwithstanding a thousand failures and misadventures. "It is in the sincere hope," he says "that the knowledge I have slowly gained of these individuals, of their characteristics and environments, may lead more influential persons to inquiry and study that I have written of them."

After an account of how he became a missionary Mr. Holmes writes with many new facts and wise deductions of such subjects as "Husbands and Wives," "Parents and Children," "Dipsomaniacs," "Criminals," and "Cranks." He is in favour of State reformatories for erring youth, and for criminals generally, "Short sentences; abolition of ticket-of-leave; interesting work and more of it; less time alone and more with the schoolmaster; gradual improvement in conditions as a reward for industry and good behaviour," and relaxations at intervals. He asks for no maudlin sympathy for criminals; he does not want them "coddled or patronized," but he does want punishment on common-sense principles. Mr. Holmes has made personal friends of the derelicts, has planned and schemed for them, studied their instincts, their desires. His pictures of the "record breakers," Jane Cakebread and Kate Hennessey, contain the bitterest note of pathos; his account of how the poor live and die should be read by all who lead a sheltered self-centred life, and by all practical philanthropists. Yet "Pictures and Problems" contains many amusing pages, and the author is ready to see the humorous side of a situation even if the laugh be against himself. His book will help forward social reform; can any work of man do more?

Moralists in Slang.

The latest Dooley book is Mr. DOOLEY'S PHILOSOPHY (Grant Richards, 6s.). It is wonderful how well the author keeps up his standard of wit and humour in spite of his great productivity. No doubt there will be a falling-off presently, but we detect no signs of it as yet. One can only review the book as one would review a plum cake—by cutting off and offering a slice. This, for instance, is Mr. Dooley's contribution to the servant question:—

I see be letters in th' pa-apers that servants is insolent, and that they won't go to wurruk unless they like th' looks iv their employers, an' that they rayfuse to live in th' counthry. Why anny servant shud rayfuse to live in the counthry is more thin I can see. Ye'd think that this disreputable class'd give annything to lave th' crowded tinimints iv a large city where they have frinds be th' hundherds an' know th' polisman on th' bate an' can go out to hateful dances an' moonlight picnics—ye'd think these unforchnate slaves'd be delighted to live in Mulligan's subdivision, amid th' threes an' flowers an' bur-rds. Gettin' up at four o'clock in th' mornin' th' singin' iv th' full-throated alarm clock is answered be an invisible choir iv songsters, as Shakespere says, an' ye see th' sun rise over th' hills as ye go out to carry in a ton iv coal. All day long ye meet no wan as ye thrip over th' coal scuttle, happy in ye'er tile an' ye'er heart is enlivened be th' thought that th' childher in th' front iv th' house ar-re growin' strong on th' fr-fresh counthry air. Besides they've always cookin' to do. At night ye can set be th' fire an' improve ye'er mind be r-readin' half th' love story in th' part iv th' paper that th' cheese come home in, an' whin ye're through with that all ye have to do is to climb a ladder to th' roof an' fall through th' skylight an' ye're in bed.

Mr. Dooley's view of the essentials of the Transvaal problem is hardly less interesting and acute:—

Kruger, that's th' main guy iv th' Dutch, a fine man, Hennissy, that looks like Casey's goat an' has many iv th' same peculiarities, he says, "All r-right," he says, "I'll give thim th' franchise," he says. "Whin?" says Joe Chamberlain. "In me will," says Kruger. "Whin I die," he says, "an' I hope to live to be a hundred if I keep on smoking beure breakfast," he says, "I'll bequeath to me frinds th' English, or such iv thim as was here beure I come, th' inalienable an' sacred right to demand fr'm me succissor th' privilege iv ilitin' an Aldherman," he says. "But," he says, "in th' manetime," he says, "we'll lave things the way they are," he says. "I'm old," he say, "an' not good-lookin'," he says, "an' me clothes dont fl't an' they may be marks iv food on me vest," he says, "but I'm not more thin half crazy an' annytime ye find me givin' annywan a chanst to vote me into a job dhrivin' a mule an' put in an English prisidint iv this raypublic," he says, "ye may conclude that ye'er Uncle Paul needs a guarjeen!" he says.

Altogether Mr. Dooley's new volume is likely to make him many new friends without losing him any old ones.

FABLES IN SLANG (Pearson, 2s. 6d. n.) is a quaint little work written in the very latest styles of American argot by Mr. George Ade, with bold and highly comic illustrations after the manner of the old woodcut by Mr. Clyde J. Newman. At the first glance the phraseology of the fables will seem something of caviare to the general critic. Such a title and opening as this:—"The Fable of How He never touched George." "A Comic Lover named George was sitting on the Front Porch with a good Side Hold on your old friend Mabel. They were looking into each other's Eyes at Close Range and using a rancid Line of Nursery Talk. It was the Kind of Conversation calculated to Jar a Person." But let the reader peruse his way through Mr. Ade's book, make the acquaintance of Mabel, and especially of Mabel's father, and he will find he is amused. "The Fable of Paducah's Favorite Comedians and the mildewed Stunt" is not a title that inspires any other emotion than that of curiosity. But the satiric history it tells of the music-hall "Artists" Zoroaster and Zendavesta is a vital piece of work; beneath its crude humour is the tragedy of two men who, by one note of a casual newspaper man, were puffed with pride, ballooned on to the "Vodeville" stage and then exploded, degraded, discharged. All the other fables, such as that of the preacher who flew his kite, the handsome Jethro who was simply cut out to be a merchant, the coming champion, the Bohemian, are queer satirical attacks upon American life as it is lived. Grasp the curious slang of the narrator, and you will find a rich mine of humour in this little book. It adds to our knowledge of America and of humanity, and we acquire our knowledge without exertion.

IN WELLINGTON'S MEN (Smith, Elder, 6s.) Mr. W. H. Fitchett is more editor than author. The book consists of extracts, suitably introduced and expounded, from four military autobiographies—Kincaid's "Adventures in the Rifle Brigade," "Rifleman Harris," Anton's "Military Life," and Mercer's "Waterloo." For one who follows the comparatively peaceful calling of a clergyman, Mr. Fitchett has a great turn for the sanguinary. In this volume he gets to very close quarters with it, giving us the depositions of eye-witnesses, and only intervening personally to link his excerpts together with a few appropriate words. The narratives are not in the least literary, but are not the less interesting on that account. They rank with those letters home from soldiers in Africa, which most of us have preferred to the more practised rhetoric of the professional war correspondents. The ground covered is the Peninsular War and the Waterloo Campaign; and Mr. Fitchett may be congratulated in his modest share in the work.

CASH AND HOW TO INVEST IT (Dawbarn and Ward, 1s. n.) is a handy manual of useful information concerning securities, speculation, bucket shops, and other matters of interest to those who have a little more money than they need to satisfy the exigent claims of the landlord, the butcher, and the baker. It is useful as far as it goes, but it only recognizes the investments which necessitate the employment of a stockbroker. There is nothing about mortgages or ground-rents, though these are, perhaps, the safest of all kinds of investments.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH POLE, by G. Barnett Smith (Nelson, 2s.), is a popular history of Antarctic exploration. It is not exciting, for the glamour of the Antarctic is notoriously less than the glamour of the Arctic. It has some good pictures, however, and might be an acceptable present for a boy with a taste for knowledge.

HALF HOURS IN JAPAN, by the Rev. Herbert Moore (Unwin, 6s.) is a brief account of the manners and customs of the inhabitants of the land of the rising sun. It is rather an unnecessary book, as there is no lack of literature on the subject, and the author has little, if anything, that is new to say. His pictures, however, are good, and there are more than seventy of them.

ART.

Sir Walter Gilbey has now issued, in two volumes, his ANIMAL PAINTERS OF ENGLAND (Vinton, £2 2s.), and we can congratulate him on a good conception which, so far as he has carried it out, is well and carefully realized. It breaks new ground in the history of art, but the exact limitations of the field which Sir Walter undertakes to cover remain somewhat obscure. His own inclination, we may perhaps say without disrespect, is towards the study of what may be called sporting art, shown particularly in the careful delineation of the horse which received a new impetus after the publication in 1766 of "The Anatomy of the Horse," and which has been practised successfully by a school of artists essentially English. This appears from the author's interesting introduction, in which, among other things, he points out the value to breeders of studying the equine pictures of the older artists. Regarded as a history of the artists of sport the book will be of great interest to all cultivated sportsmen, as it includes well-written lives of the artists, complete lists of their works, with portraits and illustrations. The list seems to be exhaustive, save that there is no mention, in connexion with John F. Herring, of the fact that he had three sons, also animal painters—a fact which it is not unimportant to bear in mind, since it sometimes gives rise to uncertainty as to the authorship of Herring pictures. But Sir Walter Gilbey has, we think unwisely, not confined himself to the sporting artist. The title he has given to his book indicated a wider intention which is not satisfactorily fulfilled. The inclusion of Stothard as specially an animal painter is a little surprising; but it is not so surprising as the omission of any mention of Ansdell. Perhaps the limitation of the artists selected to "painters" may be held to disqualify Bewick; but it does not help us to explain the neglect of Morland. The book does not include living artists, but there has been time since his death to include an artist, not widely known, indeed, but deserving special recognition among animal painters, viz., Charles Jones, who showed many pictures at the Academy and elsewhere twenty years ago, and of whose works a special exhibition was held in Pall-mall in 1895. The animal painters of England present, therefore, a subject still waiting to be exhaustively treated; but as a study of the painters of sporting animals Sir Walter Gilbey's book may be welcomed. This school of artists has flourished in England during the last hundred and fifty years. Its work is of interest to the sportsman as much as, perhaps more than, to the artist; but it is well worthy of such a record as the present work provides.

The Royal Academy of Arts, being a corporate body, is popularly considered to have no conscience; but since the pathology of conscience is by no means an exact science no one has yet been bold enough to decide whether it is better to drug or stimulate it. As a study in the Royal Academic conscience, the winter exhibition at Burlington House is instructive. Of the 200 pictures and drawings by British artists deceased since 1850 now being exhibited no less than 108 are by artists who were not members of the Royal Academy, and the list includes Sir E. Burne-Jones, Rossetti, Cecil Lawson, John Linnell, David Cox, Alfred Stevens, Albert Moore, H. G. Hine, A. W. Hunt, Ford Madox Brown, Birket Foster, George Pinwell, William Hunt, Ruskin, Prout, Charles Keene, John Leech, and G. du Maurier. It is a question, therefore, whether the inclusion of pictures by these great "outsiders" is a posthumous recognition of merit or a sop to an uneasy conscience. From the showman's point of view Burne-Jones and Albert Moore, Cecil Lawson and Pinwell could not have been omitted, whilst the most memorable portrait is unquestionably that of Mr. Morris Moore by Alfred Stevens, and H. G. Hine's are amongst the best—if not the best—landscapes. As a set off to these, much display is made of Fred Walker and of George Mason, two of the brightest lights in a period of rare artistic renaissance, and it would indeed be difficult to regard as unimportant an exhibition which includes "The Harvest Moon," "The Bathers," "The Evening Hymn," "The Wayfarers," "The Plough," and "The Fishmonger's Shop." On the other hand, it is difficult to imagine that Frank Holl, J. E. Hodgson, J. F. Lewis, Sir John Gilbert, E. M. Ward, P. Falconer Poole, Edward Armitage, Alfred Elmore, and Vicat Cole, amongst the reputations retrieved by this exhibition, have recaptured any jot of reputation from the ruthless hand of time. They are all decently buried and their works are not destined to live after them. Even Lord Leighton and Sir J. E. Millais gain nothing from what the Academy has done for their reputations this year, and it is difficult to imagine why so large a failure as "Winter Fuel" is re-exhibited. John Pettie stands the ordeal well, and nothing is shown to put the admirers of Hamilton Macallum, Henry Moore, Philip H. Calderon, and George Pinwell to the blush. H. G. Hine, a landscape painter with singular knowledge, demands affectionate study, but it is difficult to understand the amount of space given to works by Joanna M. Wells. The fact that she is the wife of an R.A. is neither excuse nor explanation enough. Those responsible for the exhibition should, moreover, explain why the visitor is treated so lavishly to works by Sir John Gilbert. Surely we need not be reminded that two at least of these pictures are the property of the Corporation of London. We should let bygones be bygones. The exhibition as it stands is a tribute to the artistic qualities of George Mason, Fred. Walker, and George Pinwell, with a very fine Stevens; no one at all interested in modern English painting can afford to miss it; and it will have a restraining influence upon some reputations and help to place one or two painters, John Pettie and H. G. Hine, for example, upon a higher plane than has been granted to them for some of their later work.

If so powerful a body as the Royal Academy has failed to get together an entirely satisfactory collection it is hardly to be expected that the Fine Art Society would fare any better. Their exhibition of the Water Colour Art of the nineteenth century is more remarkable for its omissions than for any new discoveries. Certainly the collection demonstrates—somewhat abruptly, as if the hangers became suddenly tired of the “old fogeys”—the extraordinary difference between water-colour painting, both in technique and choice of subject, as practised to-day and as somewhat sheepishly followed fifty years ago; and this is of great interest. There are, further, several water-colours in the second and third rooms, by Walker, Pinwell, Parsons, Whistler, Paterson, Aumonier, and Matthew Hale, which will well repay a visit to Bond-street.

FICTION.

IN MORRISON'S MACHINE (Hutchinson, 6s.) Mr. J. S. Fletcher tells, with a cunning which will be known to all readers of “The Paths of the Prudent,” the story of an inventor robbed, for a time at least, of the rewards of his wit and labour. Morrison's early sorrows, however, are at last transmuted into joy. His employer, Mr. Wridsdale, has succumbed to the temptation to appropriate the invention, under especially interesting circumstances. But he is eventually seized by that well-known stage disease of which the outward sign is that the patient lifts his hand to his heart and sinks heavily forward with a quick drawing of his breath. This happens, of course, when the game is up, and enables the author to record his confession and end an otherwise clever story in an atmosphere of convention.

LOVE OF COMRADES (John Lane, 3s. 6d.) is the engaging title of Mr. Frank Mathew's new book, but the story itself is not quite so pleasing. There is a fair outsetting when Margery Talbot starts forth “wearing big boots and a long sword at her side,” but halfway through one knows that Mr. Mathew has taken the line of least resistance, and contented himself with what is, artistically, ready-made and second-rate. Yet a seventeenth-century romance, with a girl in boy's dress and a huge captain in a scarlet coat, with fair curls and enormous moustache, is perhaps best handled in that fashion—if, at least, the author wishes to please the majority of readers.

To be Court physician to the Ameer of Afghanistan—whose life we reviewed last week—is a rare opportunity for a novelist, and Miss Lillias Hamilton is to be congratulated on making the most of it. In A VIZIER'S DAUGHTER (Murray, 6s.) she gives us, in the form of a novel, a graphic picture of many little-known phases of Afghan life, wisely subordinating ingenuity of plot to the delineation of her out-of-the-way characters. We are made to realize the corruption of the Court-life of Kabul, and the savagery of the Afghan nature. The tale is concerned with the grim episode of the Hazara rebellion, and the adventures of the local vizier's spirited daughter, who is driven from her village home by the Afghan invasion. She proves impervious to the threats or blandishments of numerous unworthy suitors, but, in the end, the nobility of her last master, the Ameer's chief secretary, wins her love. We are given occasional glimpses of the Ameer himself, whose character shines out in marked contrast amid the atmosphere of evil that envelops the heroine's adventures.

Mr. Ackworth knows Lancashire life and brings it before us vividly in THE MINDER (Horace Marshall, 6s.), a story of a young Wesleyan minister, which begins with his unexpected appointment as a “minder” at some twenty-five shillings a week at the new Bramwell mill. His character is developed slowly and with truth and force. Indeed, Mr. Ackworth has a good eye for character, and some of those he presents stamp themselves on the mind unmistakably. Wilky Drax, the deformed broker, is a figure that Dickens would have liked to draw—a more amiable and Methodistical Quilp. Max Ringley, the buoyant and impulsive, is excellent; and the whole Wheeler family are drawn to admiration. Here is Lancastrian Nonconformity drawn from the inside, and very well drawn too. “The Minder” is some way above the average of novels.

LIBRARY WORK IN 1900.

The Jubilee year of the public library, the last year of the century, has been a memorable one in the library world. Moreover the progress of the last ten years has been greater than that of the forty years preceding. May this progress be more than maintained during the new century! There have been important changes in public library administration. The London Government Act has materially altered the conditions of the metropolitan libraries. Previously the appeal had to be made to the ratepayers. This was often no fair test of the feeling in a parish. The claims of the library were ill-considered and imperfectly understood. Now the power to adopt the Acts is placed in the hands of elected representatives, and this should certainly produce a better state of things. Against this we have to set a failure—only a temporary one we hope. The Public Libraries Bill, which was dropped in the Commons after passing the Lords, would have strengthened the libraries in doubtful points of law, such as that of rating, and of libel, and helped to facilitate the adoption of the Acts. Its failure was from want of time and not through opposition, so we hope the bill is only deferred for a time. The question of rating and assessment is not satisfactory; there is room for numberless anomalies in practice. The question whether a public library is exempt from taxation is often left to parochial wisdom to solve.

We welcome the movement for providing free lectures in libraries. The expense of these lectures has, in some cases, been borne by private philanthropy, but other means of support will, of course, be necessary. The success of the lectures shows that they are worthy of it. The present library rate is already strained to its utmost, but grants might fitly come from the Technical Education Boards. The Daily News has pointed out that the wealth of our public libraries is to a great extent wasted for want of proper guidance in reading. All readers are not like the new fellow of Pembroke, Mr. Joseph Owen, who, from the age of 13 educated himself with the aid of the Free Libraries, and afterwards of the University extension. We have just received a list of lectures for January and February from the Bootle Free Library, which seems to show a good deal of enterprise in the matter. Other features of the year have been the new opportunities afforded for children's reading, and the books provided in several libraries for blind readers.

The British Museum has played its part in the library year. The proposal of the authorities to disperse files of local newspapers, and to destroy printed matter deemed superfluous, raised a storm of opposition, and the bill was very properly abandoned. Next came the controversy on the use of a Subject Index to supplement the Authors' Catalogue. Students generally consider the present catalogue with its cross references sufficient. The ordinary inquirer, with one subject to look up and no special knowledge, maintains the opposite. On the whole we think the authorities are well advised in beginning the work. It cannot fail to assist many readers other than scholars well used to digging about a library.

Of the various meetings of the year the International Conference for a Catalogue of Scientific Literature has been, perhaps, the most practical, as was shown by the article written by Prof. Rücker which we published last week. During the Exhibition there was a meeting of librarians at Paris, and a conference on bibliographical matters. But the scheme for an International Bibliographical Institute and a common classification is at present unrealizable. In England the Library Association met at Bristol. Sir Edward Fry issued a diatribe against pernicious books and deplored the excessive reading of worthless fiction. The Library Association of Australasia held a successful meeting in Adelaide, and the American Association visited Montreal with good practical results. These conferences are the best means of solving the difficulties of librarians and bibliographers confronted with the enormous output of books.

Correspondence.

THE "ROBUSTIOUS COMEDY" OF SHAKESPEARE'S "HENRY V."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your accomplished contributor Mr. A. B. Walkley, in his review of the performance of Shakespeare's Henry V. at the Lyceum Theatre, detects some schoolboyish traits in the courtship scene with which the play ends. Mr. Walkley at the same time suggests that when, in my "Account and Estimate" of the piece (on which he bestows most kindly commendation), I speak of the "robustious comedy" of the scene in question, I mean, with him, that it is comedy of the school-boy type. Mr. Walkley is, of course, well acquainted with the fact that I borrowed the epithet "robustious" from a passage in the play itself. I should have hesitated to use it had its usage lacked Shakespeare's authority. When in the French camp before Agincourt the French officers are discussing the character of Englishmen, and they are debating how far the men of England resemble English mastiffs, the Constable remarks, "the men do sympathize with the mastiffs in robustious and rough coming on" (Act III., Sc. VII., 163-5). This is the only occasion on which Shakespeare employs the word "robustious," and I believe that it and its context accurately characterize Henry V.'s mode of courtship. In fact I regard the courtship scene as a very practical commentary on this expression of opinion on the part of the French Constable respecting the English character. There are signs elsewhere in Shakespeare's work that the gibes of foreigners against Englishmen, which were no less common in Shakespeare's day than in our own, did not in his opinion always lack some justification.

Your obedient servant,

Jan. 5, 1901.

SIDNEY LEE.

EDWARD FITZGERALD AND T. E. BROWN.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—An article in the current number of Macmillan's Magazine is devoted to the elaboration of a parallel between Edward FitzGerald and T. E. Brown of the "Fo'e's'le Yarns." The writer is obviously under the spell of both poets, and his parallel, or contrast, is for the most part just; but, like other writers on FitzGerald, he falls into one curious blunder:—

The one was a Celt, feeling intensely, passionate in his love of beauty, and brimming over with delicate fancy; the other was a Saxon, equable, reticent, and almost phlegmatic.

In reality, FitzGerald was anything but a Saxon, and not even the fact—or accident—that he was born and spent nearly all his life in Suffolk is sufficient to make him one. Both his parents were Irish. Moreover, they were first cousins, his father being a Purcell, and his mother a brilliant and eccentric member of the FitzGerald clan. There may have been little of the traditional Celt in FitzGerald's whimsical and original nature, but such temperaments as his are assuredly not indigenous to East Anglia.

Yours faithfully,

S. K. RATCLIFFE.

THE SOCIETY OF AUTHORS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The attention of the Society of Authors has been called to the fact that persons who are not members of the Society have, from time to time, asserted to publishers, editors, and others that they would call in the aid of the Society of Authors to support their claims.

Any one having reason to suppose that an unauthorized use is being made of the Society's name should communicate with the secretary, and give him full details of the case. The secretary, on receipt of such a statement, will be glad to give information as to whether the persons using the name of the Society are in fact members, and, if they are members, whether they are acting with the knowledge or sanction of the Society.

Yours truly,

G. HERBERT THRING,

January 9, 1901.

Secretary.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

"A History of Chinese Literature," by Mr. H. A. Giles, Professor of Chinese at Cambridge and formerly Consul at Ningpo, will be published on January 18 by Mr. Heinemann in his series of "Short Histories of the Literatures of the World."

We understand that the last volume in Mr. Nutt's series of "Tudor Translations" is to be the authorized version of the Bible. Meanwhile volumes 2 to 6 of Berners' "Froissart" will probably be published before June.

Wilkie Collins is still popular. Messrs. Chatto are next week following up the new edition of "The Woman in White" with "The Dead Secret," bound in uniform style, and probably with other novels by the same author. The same publishers also announce Mrs. Meade's new novel, "The Blue Diamond," for February 21. This week they are publishing Mrs. Alexander's new novel, "A Missing Hero," and announce "Max Thornton," by Ernest Glanville, for February 14, and "The Lesser Evil," by Iza Duffus Hardy, for March 1; also "The Path of Thorns," by E. A. Vizetelly, who has edited and written an introduction to "The Honour of the Army and other Stories," by M. Zola, which Messrs. Chatto will shortly publish.

Early in the spring Messrs. Sands will publish "The Story of Mary I., Queen of England," as told by Miss J. M. Stone. There will be numerous illustrations and portraits.

Before the end of the month Messrs. Hutchinson will publish "Thormanby's" new volume, "Kings of the Rod, the Rifle, and the Gun"—a companion work to his "Kings of the Hunting Field," which went out of print very soon after publication. Another biographical work which Messrs. Hutchinson have held over from last year will be ready within the next two or three weeks—the late Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson's "Disciples of Æsculapius," in two illustrated volumes. Besides the biographies of forty-four distinguished medical scholars of the past, there is a memoir of the author by his daughter. "Pride of Race," by Mr. B. L. Farjeon, which touches upon the question of marriage between Jew and Christian, will also be published shortly by Messrs. Hutchinson.

"The Coming of Waterloo," a novel by Captain Cairnes, announced by Messrs. Constable, deals with the appliances of war and describes an imaginary campaign.

The Brothers Dalziel are preparing a record of their fifty years' work, 1840-1890. There will be selected examples of the work of the best men whose drawings came to them for reproduction, and autograph letters (some in facsimile) from Lord Leighton, Sir John Millais, Dante G. Rossetti, Sir E. Burne-Jones, Madox Brown, John Ruskin, and many others.

Mr. F. W. Maitland's articles in "Social England" on Early English Law attracted much attention in the United States, and are to be collected and published in one volume by Messrs. Putnams, of New York, and edited by Professor Colby.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co. announce "The Church and the New Century Problems," a volume of Lectures by the Bishop of Durham, Canon Gore, Rev. A. Chandler, Canon Scott Holland, Canon Barnett, and others, and also "Laity in Council," a volume of Essays dealing with questions which affect Churchmen. The following have already contributed to the volume:—S. B. Boulton, Mr. Creighton, Ben Greet, H. W. Hill, J. M. Ludlow, G. E. Mead, G. W. E. Russell, G. J. Talbot, and F. Sherlock.

One of Mr. Unwin's first novels for the new year is said to have run through 175,000 copies in the United States within the last three months—"Eben Holden," by Irving Bacheller.

Messrs. Stevens and Sons are publishing a revision of "Thring's Criminal Law of the Navy," under the title of "A Manual of Naval Law and Court-Martial Procedure." The scope of the work is enlarged and the size of the page increased. It will contain the latest revision of Court-Martial Procedure.

The first number of the Journal of Hygiene, the new quarterly to be published by the Cambridge University Press, is ready. The introduction by the editors—Dr. G. H. F. Nuttall, Dr. John Haldane, and Dr. Arthur Newsholme—includes a letter from Sir John Simon. Dr. Nuttall contributes one of a series of "Studies in Relation to Malaria," and Dr. Newsholme a paper on "The Utility of Isolation Hospitals in Diminishing the Spread of Scarlet Fever."

The New York Evening Post of to-day has a notable series of articles by well-known writers on thirty-eight main aspects of the nineteenth century, among which English Literature is treated by Mr. Edmund Gosse, and Evolution and Religious Conceptions by Mr. Leslie Stephen. The series will be subsequently published in book form by Messrs. Putnams.

Books to look out for at once.

- LITERATURE—
 "The Hoosier Writers." By Meredith Nicholson. Macmillan. 5s.
 [National Studies in American Letters.]
 "A History of Chinese Literature." By Professor H. A. Giles, Professor of Chinese in the University of Cambridge. Heinemann. 6s.
 ["Short Histories of the Literatures of the World."]
ART—
 "Hans Memling." (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) By W. H. J. Weale. Bell. 5s. net.
 "Painters of Florence from the 15th to the 16th Century." By Julia Cartwright. Murray. 6s. net.
TRAVEL AND FOLK LORE—
 "In Tuscany." By M. Carmichael, British Vice-Consul for West Tuscany. Murray. 9s. net.
 "Celtic Folk Lore, Welsh and Manx." By Prof. John Rhys. Frowde. 21s.
FICTION—
 "Morals and Millions." By Florence Warden. F. V. White. 6s.
 "The Leaven of Love." By B. Goldie. Routledge. 6s.
 "Eben Holden: A Tale of the North Country." By Irving Bacheller. Unwin. 6s.
 (See note under "Authors and Publishers.")
SCIENCE—
 "Text-book of Vertebrate Zoology." By J. S. Kingsley. Bell. 12s. net.
 "British Flies." Vol. 8. By G. H. Verrall. Gurney and Jackson. 31s. 6d.
MILITARY—
 "The Army from Within." By Author of "An Absent-Minded War." Sands. 3s. 6d.
 "Australia at the Front." By F. Wilkinson. J. Long. 6s.
 "The Biograph in Battle." By W. K. L. Dickson. Unwin. 6s.
 [The author took the biograph with Buller's force to Ladysmith and subsequently accompanied Lord Roberts's Army in the Transvaal.]
 "England's Armed Neutrality." By L. E. Henry. Young's Library. 6s. net.
EDUCATION—
 "Parlons Français: A Conversational Method of French." By F. Julien. Blackie. 2s. 6d.
 "Education and Life." By J. H. Baker, M.A., LL.D., President of the University of Colorado. Longmans. 4s. 6d.
 "Bookkeeping for Business Men." By J. Thornton. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
MISCELLANEOUS—
 "Eccentricities of Genius." By Major J. B. Pond. Chatto and Windus. 12s.
 [Memories of famous men and women of platform and stage. Portraits.]
 "Winchester." By R. T. Warner. Bell. 3s. 6d. net.
 [Handbooks to the Great Public Schools. Illustrated.]
 "How we got our Prayer-book." By T. W. Drury. Nisbet. 2s.
 "Practical Treatise on the Leather Industry." By A. M. Villon. Scott and Greenwood. 21s. net.

- "Epitome of the Law Relating to Charter Parties and Bills of Lading." By L. Duckworth. E. Wilson. 2s. 6d. net.
 "The Companies Act, 1900." By S. L. Wilkinson. E. Wilson. 3s. 6d.
 "Social Development under Christian Influence." By the Rev. M. Kaufmann. Kegan Paul. 5s.
 [The Donnellan Lectures. 1899-1900.]
NEW EDITIONS—
 "Waverley" and "Guy Mannering." Macmillan. 6s. each.
 [First two volumes of the new issue of the Border Edition of the Waverley Novels.]
 "The Dead Secret." By Wilkie Collins. Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

- BIOGRAPHY.
 "The Life of E. Herber Evans, D.D." By Rev. H. E. Lewis. 8x 5 1/2 in., 387 pp. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.
 "Lord Roberts as a Soldier in Peace and War." By Capt. W. E. Cairnes. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 331 pp. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.
 "Napoleon III. at the Height of His Power." By I. de Saint-Amand. Trans. by Elizabeth G. Martin. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 305 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.
BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.
 "Tales of Indian Chivalry." By M. Macmillan. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 223 pp. Blackie. 2s. 6d.
DRAMA.
 "Love's Disguises." A Book of Little Plays. By O. M. Hueffer. 8 1/2 x 4 1/2 in. Sign of the Rose. Hackbridge, Surrey.
EDUCATIONAL.
 "Caesar: De Bello Gallico, VII." (Cam. Series for Schools, &c.) Ed. by E. S. Schuchburgh. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 158 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 1s. 6d.
 "Xenophon: Anabasis, VI." (Cam. Series for Schools, &c.) Ed. by G. M. Edwards. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 100 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 1s. 6d.
 "A Second Latin Reader." By G. B. and A. Gardiner. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 184 pp. Arnold. 1s. 6d.
 "A Reading Book in Irish History." By P. W. Joyce, LL.D. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 220 pp. Longmans. 1s. 6d.
 "Macaulay's Essay on Pitt." Ed. by C. J. Battersby. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 112 pp. Blackie. 2s.
 "Macaulay's Essay on Warren Hastings." Ed. by J. Downie. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 208 pp. Blackie. 2s.
 "Tamango." By Prosper Mérimée. (Modern Language Series.) Ed. by J. E. Michell. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 66 pp. Blackie. 1s.
 "As You Like It." (The Picture Shakespeare.) 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 143 pp. Blackie. 1s.
FICTION.
 "The Wastrel." By Mary A. Dickens. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 348 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.
 "Northern Lights and Shadows." By R. G. Taber. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 235 pp. Greening. 3s. 6d.
 "A Vagabond in Asia." By E. Candler. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 294 pp. Greening. 6s.
 "The Passing of the Dragon." By F. Jay Cough. 7 x 5 1/2 in., 82 pp. Cassell.
FOLKLORE.
 "Songs and Sayings of Gowrie." By Rev. A. Philip. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 319 pp. Oliphant. 5s. n.
 "Lancashire Humour." By T. Newbigging. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 135 pp. Dent.
HISTORY.
 "A Political History of Contemporary Europe since 1814." 2 vols. Trans. from the French of Charles Seignobos. 9 x 6 in., 881 pp. Heinemann. 28s. n.
 "The Destruction of Ancient Rome." By R. Lanciani. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 279 pp. The Macmillan Co. 8s. 6d.
 "The French Monarchy, 1483-1798." 2 vols. (Cam. Historical Series.) By A. J. Grant. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 311-314 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 9s.
 "Canada, 1760-1900." (Cam. Historical Series.) 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 348 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 6s.
 "Western Civilization in its Economic Aspects." Vol. II. (Cam. Historical Series.) By W. Cunningham. D.D. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 300 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 4s. 6d.
LITERARY.
 "Henley and Burns; or, The Critic Censured." Ed. by J. D. Ross, LL.D. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 106 pp. Stirling. Mackay. 2s. 6d. n.
 "The Kipling Reader." 7 x 4 1/2 in., 214 pp. Macmillan. 1s. 9d.
MILITARY.
 "The Tactics of To-day." By Maj. C. E. Callwell, R.A. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 153 pp. Blackwood. 2s. 6d. n.
 "The Salvation Army at Work in the Boer War." By Adj. Mary Murray. 7 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 112 pp. Salvation Army.
 "The Sick and Wounded in South Africa." By W. Burdett-Coutts. 8 x 5 1/2 in., 280 pp. Cassell. 1s. 6d.
MISCELLANEOUS.
 "The Clergy Directory, 1901." 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 838 pp. Phillips. 4s. 6d. n.
 "Dictionary of Quotations." (French and Italian.) By T. B. Harbottle and Col. P. H. Dalbiac. 8 x 5 1/2 in., 545 pp. Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.
 "The Advertiser's ABC for 1901." By T. B. Browne. 10 1/2 x 6 1/2 in., 1,070 pp. Browne. 10s. 6d.
 "Mrs. Boston's Cookery Book." New Ed. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 311 pp. Ward, Lock. 1s.
 "The Language of Handwriting." By R. D. Stocker. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 257 pp. Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d. n.
ORIENTAL.
 "Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate." By G. Le Strange. 9 x 5 1/2 in., 381 pp. Clarendon Press. 16s. n.
POETRY.
 "The Lady Madeleine Wendmore; or, A Love from the Ideal, and other Poems." By A. Capleton. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 112 pp. Batts, Gresham Street. 3s. 6d. n.
 "King Marchaunt and His Ragamuffin." By Helion Bumpstead. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 66 pp. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.
 "Irene, and other Poems." By W. K. Honnywill. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 84 pp. "South-Eastern Herald." 1s. 6d.
 "Love Letters of a Fenian." By Mary Shorsa. 6 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 63 pp. Dublin. Gill.
 "Under Arms." By C. Doughy. 9 x 7 in., 30 pp. Constable. 1s. 6d. n.
REPRINTS.
 "Waverley." (New Century Library.) 6 1/2 x 4 1/2 in., 574 pp. Nelson. 2s. n.
 "Good for Nothing; or, All Down Hill." By G. Whyte-Melville. 8 x 5 1/2 in., 443 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.
 "Horse in Honeypot." By Hugh Haliburton. 8 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 237 pp. Blackwood. 6s. n.
 "John Keats. Poems, &c." Vol. II. (The Complete Ed.) Ed. by H. B. Forman. 7 x 4 1/2 in., 243 pp. Glasgow. Gowers & Gray.
SCIENCE.
 "Text-Book of Zoology." Part III.—Invertebrates. By Dr. O. Schmiedl. Trans. by R. Rosenstock. 9 1/2 x 6 1/2 in. Black. 3s. 6d.
 "National Life from the Standpoint of Science." By K. Pearson, F.R.S. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 62 pp. Blackie. 1s. 6d. n.
THEOLOGY.
 "Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the Greek New Testament." By E. Nestle, Ph.D., Th.D. (Theological Translations Library.) Ed. by A. Menzies, D.D. 9 x 5 1/2 in., 351 pp. Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d.
 "Jesus Christ and the Social Question." By F. G. Peabody. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 374 pp. The Macmillan Co. 6s.
 "Thoughts on Belief and Life. Sermons by H. J. Lawlor, D.D." 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 195 pp. Dublin: Hodges. London: Simpkin, Marshall.
TRAVEL.
 "Spanish Highways and Byways." By Katharine Lee Bates. 7 1/2 x 5 1/2 in., 448 pp. The Macmillan Co. 8s. 6d. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXII.
By X. HAWKINS, U.S.A.
BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CXIII.
By F. MEYER, Shrirardorf.
BLACK. 6 pieces.

WHITE. 7 pieces.
White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 114, by A. Troitzky.—White (4 pieces)—K at Q R sq; R at K Kt sq; Kt at K B 2; pawn at Q 6. Black (4 pieces)—K at K R sq; R at K R 7; Kt at Q Kt 5; pawn at Q Kt 2. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 115, by A. F. Mackenzie.—White (9 pieces)—K at Q R 5; bishops at K R 8 and Q R 8; Kts at K B 6 and Q Kt 7; pawns at Q R 4, K 3, K Kt 2, K R 2. Black (8 pieces)—K at Q B 3; Q at K Kt 4; B at K Kt sq; pawns at K B 2, Q 4, Q 5, Q B 2, Q R 2. White to play and win. First prize in British Chess Magazine tourney, recently concluded.

SOLUTIONS AND CORRESPONDENCE.—Problem No. 102, Varain (2), Q—R 8. Möller (3), 1. Q—Kt 8, R—R 6; 2. Q—Kt sq, &c. (See answers.) No. 104, Troitzky, White wins by 1. B—B 3, Kt—Q 3; 2. B×Kt, Kt—B sq; 3. B—Q 5 ch, K—R sq; 4. P—R 8 =Bishop, and must win the Kt and the game. End-game, Miles v. Biggs, White wins by 1. B—Kt 5, Q×B (if not, B×R wins); 2. Q×R ch, K×Q; 3. R×P mate. No. 105, Wainwright (2), B—K 2. No. 106, Pospisil (3), 1. Q—Kt 5, threatening mate by 2. B—Q 6, and 3. Kt—K 6, B—B 5 or Q×P mate. If 1. Q—Kt 5, Kt—Q 6; 2. Q×Q P ch, Kt×Q; 3. R—K 4 mate. No. 107, Behting, White draws by 1. K—R 6, K—B sq; 2. K—R 7, B—K 6; 3. K—R 8, B×P; 4. B—Kt 3, P—B 6; 5. B—K 6 ch and draws. No. 108, Zimmermann (3), 1. Q—Kt 7, K×Kt; 2. B—R 7 ch, &c. Or, 1. Q—Kt 7, R×Kt; 2. P—Q 3 ch, &c. Or, 1. R—R 5, B—K 6; 2. B—K 4, &c.

Correct Solutions:—R. M. Stiegmann (City), 102, 105, 108; R. W. (Hampstead), 105, 106; C. H. Waller (Kensington), 99, 102, 107; J. D. Tucker (Leeds), 99 to 102, 104 to 107; N. Buchanan (Hampstead), 99; Otto Würzburg (Grand Rapids), 93, 94, 96, 97, 99, 100; F. Harling (Stroud), 99, 102; C. R. H. (Paris), 99, 102; A. C. W. (Bromley), 102, 104 to 108.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A. C. W. and Others.—Q—B 6 in No. 103 is by far too obvious to be the key, but what everybody is sure to overlook is the subtle defence, R—R 8. This makes the problem especially notable and difficult. Thanks for useful notes.

W. H. M. and Others.—No doubt White can eventually capture the Kt in No. 107, Behting, but it is not assumed that this is possible in a move or two.

R. E. W.—Large diagrams would occupy all the space that can be devoted to chess. All that is necessary is that the positions should be readable and this seems always possible.

Several Correspondents.—If our form of solution is adopted, especially with names of authors, it will be much more convenient.

NOTES BY CORRESPONDENTS.—"No. 99 corrected seems to me most meritorious; there are near tries, especially notable being B—K 5."—C. H. W. "No. 108, a fine problem, and by no means easy. I am at a loss to say whether it is the more remarkable for unity or for variety."—A. C. W.

GAME No. LV.—Played between two masters:—

CENTRE GAMBIT.

WHITE. G. Maroczy.	BLACK. J. Mieses.	WHITE. G. Maroczy.	BLACK. J. Mieses.
1. P—K 4	P—Q 4	17. P×B	Q—Kt 2
2. P×P	Q×P	18. P—K B 4	P×P
3. Kt—Q B 3	Q—Q R 4	19. Q×B P	P—K B 3
4. P—Q 4	P—K Kt 3	20. K R—B sq	Kt—Q 2
5. B—K B 4	B—Kt 2	21. P×P	Kt×P
6. Q—Q 2	P—Q B 3	22. Q—K 5	Q R—B sq
7. Kt—K B 3	B—K B 4	23. P—K R 4	Kt—Q 4
8. Kt—K 5	Kt—B 3	24. P—R 6	Kt×Kt
9. B—Q B 4	P—K 3	25. P×Kt	R×R
10. B—K 2	Q—Q sq	26. R×R	B—B 2
11. Castles Q R	Kt—Q 4	27. H—Q 3	P—K R 3
12. Kt—B 4	Kt×B	28. R—B 6	Q—K B sq
13. Q×Kt	Castles	29. P—Kt 5	P×P
14. P—K Kt 4	P—K Kt 4	30. P—R 6	Q—R 6 ch
15. Q—K 3	B—Kt 3	31. K—Kt sq	Resigns (a)
16. Kt—K 5	B×Kt

(a) The Centre Gambit gives scope for much study and analysis. This game is prettily played. At the finish White threatens P—R 7 ch and there is no defence.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

On Tuesday Next. With 163 Diagrams. Medium 8vo.
Price ONE GUINEA net.

A PRACTICAL GUIDE
TO GARDEN PLANTS

BY JOHN WEATHERS, F.R.H.S.

Late Assistant-Secretary to the Royal Horticultural Society,
Horticultural Lecturer to the Middlesex County Council,
Formerly of the Royal Gardens, Kew, &c.

THE SPECIAL FEATURES OF THIS BOOK ARE:—

1. It deals with all Garden Plants—Flowers, Ferns, Fruits, Vegetables, Shrubs, and Trees—worth growing in the open air in the British Isles.
2. Every species is described, and information is given as to the methods of cultivation and propagation.
3. The species are arranged in their natural orders, and a full Index of English and Latin Names is given.
4. Practical Essays on the Life History of Plants and on the various gardening operations, illustrated where necessary.
5. A Glossary of Botanical and Gardening Terms, illustrated where necessary.
6. The Book contains 1,204 pp., medium 8vo., and the price is only ONE GUINEA net.

NEW ROMANCE BY MR. A. W. MARCHMONT.

In the Name of a Woman.

By ARTHUR W. MARCHMONT,

Author of "By Right of Sword," "A Dash for a Throne," &c.

With Eight Illustrations by D. MURRAY SMITH.

Crown 8vo., 6s.

[On Tuesday next.]

SAMPLERS AND TAPESTRY EMBROIDERIES.

By MARCUS B. HUISE, LL.B., Author of "Japan and its Art," "Greek Terra Cotta Statuettes," &c. Also THE STITCHERY OF THE SAME, by Mrs. HEAD; and FOREIGN SAMPLERS, by Mrs. C. J. LONGMAN. With 30 Reproductions in Colours, and 40 Illustrations in Monochrome. 4to. Two Guineas net.

* The Edition is strictly limited to 600 copies.

THE SUCCESSORS OF DRAKE. By JULIAN

CORBETT, Author of "Drake and the Tudor Navy," &c. With Four Portraits (Two Photogravures) and Twelve Maps and Plans. 8vo., 21s.

"Mr. Corbett's book is an extremely valuable addition to the history of the times, and is full of lucid information and of ripe judgment, marked equally by erudition and by the ability to group facts, and to give them their right proportion. The illustrations are good, and the volume should be widely read."—Army and Navy Gazette.

ST. KILDA. By NORMAN HEATHCOTE. With 80

Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs of the People, Scenery, and Birds by the Author. 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

"If Mr. Heathcote really wished to keep St. Kilda as a happy hunting ground for himself and his intrepid sister he should not have written such an attractive book about it, and, above all, he should not have packed his book with alluring illustrations."—Daily Chronicle.

EDUCATION AND LIFE: Papers and Addresses. By

JAMES H. BAKER, M.A., LL.D., President of the University of Colorado. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d.

[On Tuesday next.]

WORKS BY S. J. STONE, M.A.,

Late Vicar of All Hallows, City of London.

LAYS OF IONA, and other Poems. Crown 8vo., 6s.

THE KNIGHT OF INTERCESSION, and other Poems.

Seventh edition. Crown 8vo., 6s.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., London, New York, and Bombay.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 170. SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	41, 42, 43
PERSONAL VIEWS—"The Poetry of the Nineteenth Century," by T. Herbert Warren	43
SOME NATIONAL ACQUISITIONS, 1900	44
PANTOMIME	45
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	47
REVIEWS—
A Critical Examination of Irish History	47
The Letters of Thomas Gray	49
The Book of the Home	49
Sparks from Camp Fires—The Siege in Peking—With Christ at Sea—The Romance of Spain—The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam—Scientific Papers—Treatise on Zoology—Studies in Fossil Botany—Chemistry as Exact Mechanical Philosophy—The Human Ear—Reprints—Lord Roberts as a Soldier in Peace and War—Roberts of Pretoria—A Dictionary of Quotations—The Biograph in Battle—The Salvation Army at Work in the Boer War—The Journal of a Rabbit—A Vagabond in Asia—The Laws and Principles of Vint—Week Ends in Dickens Land—Savonarola—Études sur la Littérature Française—Lawyers and their Clients—Christ in Art—The Story of H.M.S. "Powerful"—Mother, Baby, and Nursery	50, 51, 52, 53, 54
Yolande the Parisienne—As a Watch in the Night—The Story of Ronald Kestrel—A Rogue in Love—Many Days After—A Son of Austerity—An Obstinate Parish—The Inner Shrine—Jenny of the Villa	54, 55
LIBRARY NOTES	55
OBITUARY—The Bishop of London—Mr. John Davis—Allen—M. Arthur Desjardins	57, 58
CORRESPONDENCE—"Ernulphe" (Ven. Archdeacon Cheetham)—The Abuse of the Possessive	57
MORE MAGAZINES	57
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for	58
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	59

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Punch this week is much devoted to literature, and perhaps that is the reason why its text reaches an even higher standard of humour than usual. We can forgive the harmless amiabilities of "my Baronite," of whom, as an individual, we confess to being a little weary, for such an inspiration as Mr. Owen Seaman's "The Schoolmaster Abroad."

A body of schoolmasters, it seems, has chartered the steam yacht Argonaut from Messrs. Perowne and Lunn for an "educative visit" to Sicily, Greece, and the Isles. Mr. Seaman sings in the metre of the "Isles of Greece":—

Lunching upon the self-same rock
Whence Xerxes viewed the wine-red frith,
They realize, with vivid shock,
The teachings of "The smaller Smith";
With bated breath they murmur—"This Is actually Salamis!"

Not theirs the course of crude delight
On which the common tourist wends,
From faith they move, by way of sight,
To knowledge meant for noble ends;
'Twill be among their purest joys
To work it off among their boys.

If Mr. Seaman, our chief of humorous verse writers, has written anything better than this poem as a whole, we would gladly know of it.

There is also an excellently funny dramatic sequel to Hamlet, in which Horatio, who has seized the vacant throne, is adding a new wing to the Castle of Elsinore. Scene ii. gives us two clowns, formerly grave-diggers, now builders, working on the structure in their best leisurely fashion. They reason thus:—

1ST CLOWN (in his best Elizabethan manner).—Nay, but hear you, goodman builder—

2ND CLOWN (in homely vernacular).—Look here, Bill, you can drop that jargon. There's no one here but ourselves, and I ain't amused by it.

We can assure—shall we say Mr. Anstey?—that we were much amused by it. And, finally, there is a "Letter to a Young Publisher" which is instinct with the spirit of the Authors' Society.

Several of our poets saluted the dawn of the new century; only one, we think, essayed to tackle in verse the distracting theme of the past century; and the Pope, who has many advantages for compendious observation, has not shrunk from this rather forbidding task. He has dealt faithfully with the nineteenth century (the century that saw the end of the Temporal Power of the Papacy) in fifty-six verses of Latin Alcaics, published in the Osservatore Romano, and distributed among the College of Cardinals. Is it too much to hope that Mr. Lang, forgiving his old grievance with the Index, will give an English rendering of his Holiness's Alcaics for the benefit of the many who have not the Latin in these days of universal and advanced education?

We are glad to notice that Mr. Stopford Brooke's health is now sufficiently good to justify his resuming his Browning lectures. The fund, by the way, required for the Stopford Brooke Lectureship, of which we gave a full account more than a year ago, is not yet complete, but a sufficient proportion of the whole (£10,000) has been received to justify some practical steps being taken for its establishment.

With reference to the play by Mr. George Moore and W. B. Yeats, mentioned in our last issue as having been purchased by Mrs. Patrick Campbell, it will, we understand, be first performed by Mr. F. R. Benson's company in Dublin, which has undertaken the production on the lines of the Irish Literary Theatre. Mrs. Campbell will afterwards produce it in London. The subject of the play is the same as that used in the opera of Diarmid, the joint work of the present Duke of Argyll and Mr. Hamish McCunn. The scene takes place in Ireland and Scotland. Mr. George Moore's non-election to the Irish Literary Society of London is, by the way, said to be due to the attitude he took up at the time of the Queen's visit to Ireland last year, when he wrote a letter to the Irish Press protesting against a cordial reception of "the English Queen."

At the beginning of the century it is natural to meet predictions of the Novel of the Future. The Author quotes an interesting opinion on the subject by M. Zola:—

Since, in the domain of science, ideas have enlarged, it would be singular if writers did not advance also—not towards more genius, but towards more truth. And if there be a dénouement it will be that of the art of reality. The oscillations of the pendulum of literature are more and more lengthened towards truth, more and more shortened towards error. For myself, I am inclined to believe that—if there be a return to idealism—it will be temporary. The future belongs to the novel of observation.

It is a disputable conclusion—Mr. Arthur Symons is one critic who will dispute it—but it is interesting as giving the view of the most eminent of the realists.

* * * *

A correspondent writes :—Notwithstanding the death of Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, noted in your columns recently, the pathetic delusion of which he was an eminent supporter has still a thousand lives. It is commonly supposed that the first attempt to dethrone Shakespeare was made by the writer of the article "Who Wrote Shakespeare?" in Chambers's Journal, 1852. This, however, is not so. The earliest-known Shakespearean sceptic was a New York lawyer and journalist, one Joseph C. Hart, who published, in 1848, "The Romance of Yachting," a colloquial account of a voyage to Spain, interwoven with discussions of various subjects. Hart's opinion was that Shakespeare could not have written the plays, though he cannot suggest the name of the probable author. The Baconian craze, of course, began with the articles by Delia Bacon in Putnam's Monthly during 1856. By-the-by, in Robert Burton's copy of the first edition of "Venus and Adonis," bequeathed to the Bodleian, there is no author's name on the title-page, but by the side of the printer's device is written "R. Burton," in his own handwriting. The words "by Wm. Shakespeare" seem to have been added later. Moreover, the then librarian of the Bodleian, in making a list of Burton's books, wrote over against the "Venus and Adonis" the mysterious words "His work." What should they mean? Surely, on the principles which commend themselves to esoteric criticism, that it was Robert Burton who wrote the Shakespeare poems and plays.

* * * *

The Society of Spiritists ^à has reason to believe "that the late Miss Florence Marryat is about to dictate a posthumous volume to a shoemaker in the Midlands, reputed to be a medium. It is certainly a sign of progress worthy of the beginning of a new century for the spirits of the departed to employ stenographers instead of guiding the hands of secretaries. Julia, we believe, never got so far. It promises to be an interesting question for the lawyers whether there can be copyright in a work thus produced, and in whom it would be vested. The Society of Spiritists certainly cannot claim copyright in the communication without abandoning their theory of its origin; but a recent decision might give colour to the claims of the shorthand writer.

* * * *

The John Carpenter Club is to celebrate its jubilee. The learned common clerk whose name it perpetuates was, after Richard Whittington and William Bury, one of the most liberal donors to the original library at the Guildhall. John Carpenter, who compiled the "Liber Aldus," bequeathed such good or rare books as might "seem necessary to the common library at Guildhall, and those discoursing to the common people." In the pages of John Stowe we find an account of the library and of how it was denuded by the Lord Protector. "Adjoining to the chapell on south side was sometimes a fayre and large librarie, furnished with bookes, pertaining to the Guildhall and Colledge; these bookes (as it is said) were in the raigne of Edward the 6 send for by Edward, Duke of Sommerset, Lord Protector, with promise to be restored shortly; men laden from thence three carriers with them, but neuer returned." Not till 1824 were steps taken by the Corporation to re-establish the library which to-day is of value to every student.

* * * *

The American correspondent of the Author mentions a new terror for authors and publishers. The other day, he says, a young and unknown writer, submitting a manuscript to a New York publisher, asked for a guarantee that, in case the book was declined, her ideas should not be stolen consciously or unconsciously by the "reader." The publisher was first amused and then puzzled, perceiving that the request was not unreasonable. Finally, as the shortest way out of the difficulty, he refused the manuscript. To prove that the author's caution was not unreasonable, the correspondent relates an experience of Mr. Bronson Howard's. Mr. Howard told him he had once innocently embodied in one of his own pieces an episode contained in a friend's manuscript play, which had been submitted to him for his advice. The play he had forgotten, but the incident stuck in a corner of his mind, and when he found it there many years after it had all the earmarks of an original idea. His angry friend accused him of treachery and theft; and he thereupon vowed never again to read another's manuscript play. If any literary person doubts the likelihood of Mr. Bronson Howard's experience let him re-read some of the books he read in his own early manhood. He will be surprised how many of his own pet personal ideas he will find there.

* * * *

Dr. Walter C. Smith, whose ministerial jubilee was celebrated on Monday, was, fifteen or twenty years ago, well known as a popular poet. His "Olig Grange" appeared in 1872 (the author's name being given as "Hermann Kunst"), and the critics were surprised to find that it was the work of a minister of the Free Church of Scotland. For it is marked by a liberality not characteristic of the Scottish Churches of that day. In 1874 "Borland Hall" appeared, and in 1878 "Hilda among the Broken Gods" created almost as great a sensation as "Olig Grange." "North Country Folk" is the title of another admirable volume which came later from Dr. Smith.

* * * *

The vogue enjoyed by foreign writers in France, notably by Sienkiewicz, Rudyard Kipling, Wells, Tolstoi, was mentioned in the review of the French literary year in France which we published recently. On the very day when the article appeared M. Lucien Descaves published in the Echo de Paris an article entitled "Whose Turn Next?" He rallies his countrymen for their passion for foreign novelists, and says of Mr. Kipling :—

After the deserved success of the charming "Jungle Books," we were disenchanted by the stories that followed. As fantastic story-teller or realistic novelist, Kipling seems distinctly inferior to our J. H. Rosny, and if he shows in his work something resembling the "Vamirehs" and the "Xipehuzs," I see nothing thus far comparable in mastery with "Nell Horn," "Bilatéral," or "L'Imperieuse Bonté." So that we seek outside of France in order to burn our incense to the original writers whom we are incapable of honouring at home.

Mr. Wells' stories are for M. Descaves merely the sort of thing with which Jules Verne has regaled two Continents. "Résurrection," however, so he thinks, "dominates the contemporary novel like a lighthouse with repeating lights which, after having illuminated the nineteenth century, are to fling their radiance over the twentieth," while he thinks the success of "Quo Vadis" due to the puerility and conventionality of its substance. "Who next?" therefore, he asks. We have had Sudermann and Pérez Galdos and Strindberg, but Austria, Turkey, Holland, Greece, Finland, &c., still remain unexplored. Who next? The Mercure de France has been one of the first to reply. In its January number it publishes a spicy preface to the novel by Demolder which it announces for immediate appearance.

Our "Personal View," this week, by the President of Magdalen College, Oxford, is a view down the vistas of futurity.

Mr. Warren predicts that the new century to which The Vistas of we are gradually accustoming ourselves will not Futurity. be destitute of great poetry; he gives his reasons for thinking so, and offers some interesting speculations as to its prevailing characteristics. Such prophecies are not, of course, intended merely to be filed for reference, but are also, and mainly, meant to stimulate thought and focus criticism; and this particular prophecy derives special interest from the fact that the accomplished author of "By Severn Sea" is himself poet as well as critic. The usual argument on the subject is that we are now passing through a period of storm and stress and crisis, and that periods of crisis in the history of nations are normally followed by golden ages of literature; but this rule, if it be a rule, is by no means a rule without exceptions. There are plenty of affirmative instances, such as the revival of English letters after the Napoleonic wars and the movement in German letters after Jena, and, perhaps, the revival of French letters after the année terrible. But negative instances are by no means lacking. The golden age of Athenian literature did not follow the Peloponnesian war, but preceded it; the Wars of the Roses stimulated no great writers for two or three generations; the golden age of Anne had no particular connexion with any clash of arms. Mr. Warren, however, does not adopt this popular generalization, and we need not pause to examine it further. He is sanguine of the spread of culture, sanguine of the elevation of the stage, sanguine that Empire and Science will furnish worthy themes of which the singers of the Twentieth Century will worthily avail themselves. As regards the elevation of the stage we are not sure that he does not generalize too rashly from a single instance, forgetting that one swallow does not make a summer; for the future only can show whether Herod will have as great a success as the poetical plays, emphatically inferior to it as poetry, of the late Mr. Wills. His arguments on the theme of Empire are more interesting:—

What is the poetry of Empire? Virgil and Horace sang the Roman Empire in. For about a century the provinces reinforced it. Then it sank into stagnation and silence. Will our Empire and its poetry go the way of the Roman? Tennyson, the English Virgil, was its first poet. Will he be the last? Hardly, for, unlike the Roman, it will have to struggle to maintain its existence. Unlike the Roman it rests not on the compelled obedience of tributary States, but on the spontaneous co-operation of young and growing daughter nations.

The line of thought here is not quite impervious to criticism; the parallel is not quite exact. There was notoriously a period at which the Roman Empire had to struggle to maintain its existence; and that was precisely the period when Latin poetry fell away from its old excellence. The golden age was actually the age of the Pax Romana. But, no doubt, that long peace did sap the energies of bards as well as of warriors, with the result that, when the hour of struggle came, the bards no less than the warriors were found wanting. That is the gist of Mr. Warren's argument, and it is sound; and it is also true that there are no present indications that the energies of those responsible for maintaining the supremacy of the British Empire will be allowed to rust for want of exercise. On the main point, therefore, we are in accord with Mr. Warren. Our readers will not fail to note, some of them perhaps with satisfaction, and some of them with disapproval, that he with apparent deliberation ignores the claims of Mr. Kipling among poets who sing of Empire. Mr. Kipling may not have many claims to be called the English Virgil; but one claim he certainly has. If Mr. Warren were asked to find a modern parallel to the famous—

Hoc tu, Romane, memento,

Hæ tibi erunt artes—paciisque imponere morem,
Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos, where would he find a better one than in the lines published in Literature on February 4, 1899:—

Take up the white man's burden—
Send forth the best ye breed—
Go bind your sons to exile
To serve your captives' need;
To wait, in heavy harness,
On fluttered folk and wild—
Your new-caught sullen peoples,
Half devil and half child.

Personal Views.

THE POETRY OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

The English poets of the twentieth century, who will they be, what will they be like, of what will they write? Is it possible to foretell? Hardly; but it is interesting to speculate, and there are some suggestions which may be thrown out. I do not speak, of course, of those living poets older or younger whom the new century inherits from the old, though they have their influence, and a very potent one, in determining the character of the next phase, but of those who will both express and mould that phase itself when it has begun definitely to take shape.

First of all, then, will there be any worthy of the name? The question may seem rhetorical and idle, but when Chaucer died in 1400 England had to wait not only for one century, but half the next, before she saw or heard again a great English poet or a great English poem. What was the reason? Chance, and the incalculable complexity of human affairs, or the Wars of York and Lancaster? To some extent the former, though that is hardly an answer, but largely assuredly the latter. Certainly not the fact that one century had ended and another begun, for the date with a new initial is merely an arbitrary land-mark in a continuous progress, a pile driven into the bed of the flowing stream of history. Yet it has often coincided with a marked change in human affairs, the beginning or ending of an era, some great war which has made a dividing line, the death and birth of empires, the rise and fall of dynasties, and when it has so coincided it has emphasized the change.

When Chaucer died no great contemporary survived to be carried over into the next age. When the fifteenth century in turn came to an end it could again hand on no great poet to the sixteenth, for it had none of its own. Very different was the case when the sixteenth century drew to its close. Two of the greatest poets, it is true, did not outlive it, but died on or near the stroke of its midnight hour—Marlowe in 1593 and Spenser in 1599. But the generation carried over Shakespeare and Jonson, Ford and Massinger, Fletcher and Beaumont, Daniel and Drayton, and many another. Queen Elizabeth, it is true, only survived to 1603, but the Elizabethan age passed on into and deeply tinged, nay dominated, the Jacobean. The quaint, to us almost ludicrous language of the time reminds us of this continuity.

Those flights upon the banks of Thames

Which so did take Eliza and our James.

The Swan of Avon continued his flights for another decade, nor was his death-song heard on his native stream till 1614, while the great Elizabethan impulse under which Milton fortunately fell was felt through him and others more than half through the century. The poetic link between the age of Queen Elizabeth and that of Queen Anne is, of course, Dryden. Like Chaucer, Dryden died in the closing year of his century; once again of poetry there was little to be carried over. Even if we do not subscribe to the paradox of Matthew Arnold that Pope, and Dryden too, are great prose writers, not poets at all, Pope's poetry is certainly poetry of a very limited type, and little true poetry was heard till Burns in 1786 published his first volume, and the century was waning fast.

The eighteenth century closed fitly enough with the funeral dirge of Cowper. But already the bells were ringing up for the first chimes of the new era, and their music had begun to gather strength. Burns who had come and gone was not strictly an English poet, anyhow belonged to no school and no century. His admirations were of the eighteenth century, Gray and Shenstone. His own genius was of no age, and, therefore, of all. But Wordsworth and Coleridge, though essentially poets of the new century, had taken their impulse from the great event which closed and broke up the old, and had published their first books in the eighteenth. With, and following them, there set in, as we all know, something like a hundred years of song which closed only the other day. The truth is that here again the old era ended with the century or a few years before. The change of date coincided with a real transition. Would it have been possible at the end of the sixteenth, of the seventeenth, of the eighteenth century, to predict the character of the poetry of the next age? To some extent it would. In 1600 the new era had already set in. In 1700 it would seem that from Dryden men might have predicted Addison, and Pope, and even Goldsmith and Johnson. In 1800 one thing which actually followed seemed clear to the poets, that the new age would be an age of freedom. The other characteristic, that it would be an age of material improvement, and applied science, was also dimly foreseen. Oddly enough the best prophecy came from one of the worst poets. It is one of the curiosities of literature that Dr. Erasmus Darwin, who published his poem in its complete shape in 1800 and died in 1802, foretold the triumph of steam—

Soon shall thine arm unconquered Steam afar,
Drag the slow barge or urge the rapid car.

He did not foretell, however, the triumphs of his own grandson, nor had the author of the "Botanic Garden" any inkling of the world in which the "Origin of Species" would produce so far-reaching a mental revolution. These are the things it is hardly possible to foretell.

Are we now again at the end of an era? Has an old order broken up; are we on the threshold of a new? The answer would seem to be that we are. The expression fin de siècle on so many lips ten years ago anticipated and discounted the real end of the century, because the era was even then already dead or dying.

When will the new age begin? What will it be like? Two things we seem to see, that it will be an era of Empire, or the struggle for it; an era perforce of larger national aggregations, and an era of scientific discovery, progressing in an accelerated ratio. An age of Empire. But what is the poetry of Empire? Virgil and Horace sang the Roman Empire in. For about a century the provinces reinforced it. Then it sank into stagnation and silence. Will our Empire and its poetry go the way of the Roman? Tennyson, the English Virgil, is its first poet. Will he be the last? Hardly, for unlike the Roman it will have to struggle to maintain its existence. Unlike the Roman it rests not on the compelled obedience of tributary States, but on the spontaneous co-operation of young and growing daughter nations. And Tennyson again—and it is another reason why, as the multitude of books being written about him show, he is still as popular as ever and is indeed, though dead, emphatically a poet of the twentieth century—was the first English poet of science. It was his view that in the development of science the poet of the future would have new material and more opportunity than the poet of the past. Such announcements as those of Mr. Tesla, even if premature, would have interested him profoundly. Once more he would have felt and sung how

Science reaches forth her arms
To feel from world to world, and charms
Her secret from the latest morn.

And poetry, again, like all art, is the expression not only of thought but of feeling—nay, even more of feeling than of thought. And it exists for delectation, even for amusement, yet more directly than for illumination, much less instruction. There are signs that the stage, which so many actors and managers have toiled to lift, has reached a really higher level and that it will bear and even welcome true poetry. There are signs, too, of a general elevation of the standard of literary technique through education. Such works as Professor Raleigh's on Style and on Milton are significant; significant in themselves, still more in their popularity. A new style will go with the new themes and tastes. Here then is much promise and certainly ample scope for poetry as fine, as great, as any we have heard before.

Mr. Stephen Phillips, one of the most gifted of the Victorian Elizabethans, in an ode of much dignity and grace, full of a solemn unearthly beauty, as of night and dream, has endeavoured to forecast what the new age will be. Happier, healthier—we shall have no war he tells us, and no death, or rather a death which will not be death, for it will not part us from our friends. But, alas! too probably we shall find that his is indeed a dream. Yet even so the reality of the morning may be less but also more beautiful. Happier times, happier poets; healthier lives, healthier song. Let us hope so. Anyhow the poets will be different and yet similar. For there are eternal canons in every art. The new poets may be different as Dante is from Virgil, Goethe from Sophocles, Wordsworth from Milton, Tennyson from Spenser, or Mr. Phillips, shall we say? from Marlowe; but perhaps not more different. Anyhow, let us hope that they will be yet happier and gentler, not less serious, not more voluptuous, but more "humane" voices of a serener world—

Ah earlier shall the rosebuds blow,
In after years those happier years,
And children weep when we lie low
Far fewer tears, far softer tears.

T. HERBERT WARREN.

SOME NATIONAL ACQUISITIONS, 1900.

If, in the minds of many, Thackeray be associated through his writings with the house in Manchester-square, where was opened last summer one of the most magnificent art collections ever bequeathed to the public, so, too, do other national accessions of the year derive interest from direct connexion with men of letters. At the National Portrait Gallery there is a rule which makes it impossible to hang a presentment of any living person, save only the ruling Sovereign or his or her Consort; moreover, should three of the trustees dissent, the portrait of a person deceased within ten years, even although accepted, need not be put on view till the expiration of that time. No objection was made, however, to the immediate exposure of portraits of several men of letters who died during 1900. For instance, soon after John Ruskin's death in January the trustees exhibited the late George Richmond's crayon drawing of him and the terra-cotta bust modelled by Boehm. Mr. G. F. Watts always shows eagerness to enrich our national collections, and to the National Portrait Gallery he has recently presented a portrait of James Martineau, painted twenty-six years ago; a fine presentment of the late Duke of Argyll, dating from 1860; and a portrait of Professor Max Müller, shortly to be hung. By an unknown hand is a portrait of Edward Young, author of "Night Thoughts," and there is a cast of Thomas Woolner's modelled medallion, 1855, of Thomas Carlyle, presented by the Curator of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery. The Shelley group in Room XXV. has received two noteworthy additions. Save for a miniature representing the poet as a child, there is known but one portrait of Shelley studied from life. It is by Amelia Curran, and was painted at Rome in 1819, but, unfortunately, never finished; indeed, Miss Curran is said once to have had the intention of destroying it. This portrait, by bequest of Jane, Lady Shelley, has become the property of the nation. There now hangs below it what Trelawney regarded as an excellent likeness—that executed by George Clint for Shelley's friend, Jane Williams, widow of Captain Williams who was drowned with the poet. It is a direct study from the unfinished portrait by Miss Curran, and the artist had the advantage, if advantage it be, of the criticism of some of Shelley's acquaintances. He is also said to have been influenced by a lost water-colour from the hand of Captain Williams.

If we turn to the Print Room of the British Museum we shall find another portrait of Shelley interest. It will be recalled that on the Ariel, or the Don Juan as it was originally named, Shelley set sail on July 8, 1822, from Leghorn for Pisa, his companions being Captain Edward Elliker Williams and the boy Vivian, "quick and handy, and used to boats," according to Trelawney. The story of the wreck of the boat, and of how the bodies of Shelley and Williams were cast up on the Italian shore, and three weeks later that of the boy, is well known. Williams had with him on board a water-colour portrait of himself, and this was found on the Ariel, with Keats' last poems, doubled back at "The Eve of St. Agnes," and a volume of Sophocles. The drawing has now been presented to the British Museum by a grandson of Captain Williams. During the year the Print Room has been enriched, too, by a portrait in black and red chalk of Samuel Rogers, from the hand of Lawrence; by 270 drawings of Thomas Stothard, designs for the most part for Rogers' "Pleasures of Memory" and "Italy"; and by many proofs in earliest state of the Liber Studiorum series, several of them not previously in the Museum collection.

Students of Italian art are by this time familiar with the incomplete book of drawings by a Florentine craftsman, for long supposed to be Benozzo Gozzoli. Executed about the year 1460, the series is characterized by Mr. Roger Fry as the lowest common denominator of the work of the scientific realists of that period. In 1873 the set was acquired by Mr. Ruskin for £1,000, and fifteen years thereafter, when Mr. Colvin at Brantwood laid stress on their historical importance, Mr. Ruskin generously agreed to pass them on to the Museum at cost price, although they were worth double that sum at the time. Of how many leaves the original volume consisted it is difficult to say; in any case several drawings had been lost, probably among them the first of the series. Mrs. Severn has recently given to the Museum four of the missing pages—that is, eight drawings, since both sides are used. Perhaps it may be possible to reproduce these for the benefit of those who possess the admirable "Florentine Chronicle," issued, with an introduction by Mr. Colvin, two years ago. Mr. Colvin attributes the drawings to Maso Finiguerra, a Florentine artist of the fifteenth century, to whom was falsely credited the invention of printing from engraved plates.

Of the 200 odd works bequeathed to the Victoria and Albert Museum by the late Henry Spencer Ashbee, several possess literary interest. Mr. Ashbee's preoccupation with all that concerned Don Quixote is responsible for the presence here of twelve water-colours and pictures representing Cervantes' hero. By Cattermole is a presentment of the Knight of the Woeful Countenance, seated in his study reading a volume, perhaps by his favourite author, Feliciano de Sylva; and there are other illustrative drawings by J. D. Watson, A. B. Houghton, Tony Johannot, and E. Gamba. Decamps' presentment of Quixote astride Rosinante, and Sancho Panza on his ass Dapple, riding through the cornfield, is particularly apt and delightful. By Michael "Angelo" Rooker, one of the early water-colourists, are half-a-dozen little drawings, reproduced in an edition of Fielding's works. This artist had a fund of inventiveness and a dainty touch.

The National Gallery of British Art, Millbank, has acquired a picture of rare beauty during the year. It is by Alfred Stevens, hitherto unrepresented as a painter in our public galleries, who is best known as the designer of the Wellington Monument in St. Paul's and of the lions of the British Museum. The portrait is that of Mrs. Mary Ann Collman as a girl, finely conceived by an imaginative artist, wrought to great pictorial significance—see how the browns of the drapery merge into amethyst in the higher lights!—a picture with the true creative impulse behind it.

PANTOMIME.

Pantomime had its place in the ancient drama. Aristotle justified the introduction of comic representations if conjoined to tragedy, and on the testimony of Apuleius of Madaura the Sophoclean drama was succeeded by all manner of grotesque "variety shows"—jugglers, antics, mimics, learned horses, and elephants on the tight rope! When the drama eventually came under the patronage of the Church, in despite of the authority of the Fathers—although Luther thought the sacred stage plays of his time more profitable than many sermons: which is very possible—the comic element occupied a large place. In the programme or proclamation of one of the Chester Mysteries, written by Done Rondali, the monk—

In Pagentes set fourth, apparently to all eyne,
The Olde and Newe Testament with livelye comforte;
Interminglinge therewith, onley to make sporte,
Some things not warranted by any writt,
Which to gladd the hearers he woulde men to take yt.

To secure the popular attention it was necessary to tickle the palate with coarse buffoonery—to capture the shouts of the multitude with a white elephant. The dictum of Orestes is as true to-day of ourselves as it was yesterday of the Romans: the "people" can only be won in two ways—by force of arms or force of trumpery. In one of these religious plays Noah's wife is made to affect an acquaintance with "Stafford blew"—a local small beer, presumably; and to swear by the Virgin Mary. In another stage story, representing the Deluge, the same lady stayed out of the Ark, with womanly perversity, until the last minute, and the monkish author makes Shem give her a box on the ear. Adam de la Halle, known as the Hunchback of Arras, in the first specimen of French comedy, the Marriage of Adam, a piece abounding in fantastic gaiety, introduces Hellequin, which many have thought to be the prototype of the modern Harlequin. Contrary, however, to our usage, where Harlequin is mute, Hellequin takes no effective part except to follow the three fairy queens Arsile, Maglore, and Morgane, and to sing a comic song, "Say, fits my hat well?"

English Pantomime, as we know it to-day, is, however, peculiar to this country, and of recent origin. The Pantomime of Rich is usually quoted as the first, though, really, there was a ballet produced at Drury Lane in the early part of the eighteenth century called The Loves of Venus and Mars, wherein the mythical story was intelligibly told by narration and gesture only, and which was thought by a generation of bucks to be "pleasing and rational." Comic masques, "in the high style of Italy," were publicly performed as early as 1700. The critics were very much alive then as now, only more so; and some furiously opposed the innovation, Cibber, as might be expected, describing the plays as "monstrous medleys," a title not inappropriate to the present pantomime; while caterers for the public taste, which went unmistakably in favour of pantomime, were politely likened to bribers at political elections, "outvying each other in expense to secure the majority of the multitude," which is very scornful writing, especially the sarcasm of that "multitude." Theatrical managers have not altered much, it seems, from the first of the order, those Imperial managers of ancient Rome, who had the true theatrical instinct and spent fantastic sums to get "the hands" of the multitude; they still outvie each other in expense, and their aim is still the same—the multitude, sometimes known as the “gods.” It is a commonplace that everything in the festival line came from Italy; just as our jokes now all come from America, and our Slys from Sheffield. The original ballet came from mediæval Italy, and the comic masques were borrowed from an Italian idea. So was the germ of the modern pantomime.

Rich's rivalry with Drury Lane was disastrous. He could not compete with the national house in the legitimate drama, so at Lincoln's Inn Fields he struck out a path of his own, the invention of the comic pantomime. He appears to have grafted his new policy on the old masques, which had become Englishized and really national, like the Moorish hornpipe which Handel considered characteristically English. The advertisement in the Daily Courant for 1717 names the pantomime as Harlequin Executed, and describes it as a “new Italian scene.” It was fashionable to like things from Italy, and the announcement gave the affair an éclat it would not otherwise have enjoyed. Anything really and absolutely English has always been taboo. The scene was of a “scaramouch, a harlequin, a country farmer, his wife, and others.” A description of this first pantomime is given in Davies' “Dramatic Miscellanies,” in which it is told that it consisted of two parts—one serious, the other comic. By the help of good scenery, fine habits, grand dances, appropriate music and decorations, Rich explained a story from Ovid's “Metamorphoses,” and interwove in the classical tale a humorous fable, consisting of the courtship of Harlequin and Columbine, with a variety of astonishing adventures and tricks produced by the wonder-working magic wand of Harlequin—“such as the sudden transformation of palaces into cottages, and cottages into temples.” The new pantomime came to stop. It successfully defied all soberer competition. Garrick reproached his patrons with want of interest in the drama, which they would not go to see, while they would Send three days before the time,

To crowd a new-made pantomime; which shows there was advance booking in the old days. Cibber was, as already noticed, specially severe. And Pope complains in his “Dunciad” that people went “twenty and thirty times” to see such extravagances as a

Sable sorcerer rise
Swift in whose hand a winged volume flies;
All sudden gorgeous birds and dragons glare
And ten-horned fiends and giants rush to war.
Hell rises, Heaven descends, and dance on earth,
Gods, imps, and monsters, music, rage, and mirth.
A fire, a jig, a battle on the ball,
Till one wide conflagration swallows all.
Thence a new world to Nature's laws unknown
Strikes out refulgent with a Heaven of its own;
Another Cynthia her new journey runs,
And other planets circle other suns.
Forests dance, the rivers upward rise,
Whales sport in woods and dolphins in the skies.

Garrick could not, with Shakespeare, hold his own against such extravagance, for the people would only go to the pantomime—

They in the drama find no joys,
But dote on mimicry and toys;

although certainly the aristocratic patrons would go to see a dance—

Thus, when a dance is in my bill,
Nobility my boxes fill.

In 1753, the World proposed that pantomime should have the boards entirely to itself, because “people of taste and fashion have already given sufficient proof that they think it the highest entertainment the stage is capable of affording.” The World, like Mark Twain, “rote sarcastic,” and it made a comic hit in expressing the hope that “Garrick, with his universal talents, will in time be able to handle the wooden sword with as much dignity and dexterity as his brother Lun.” Rich's performance, says an old chronicler, was something more than dexterous, and Garrick himself appears as an impartial witness to the genius of exposition and the eloquence of motion of the pantomimist—

When Lun appeared with matchless grace and whim,
He gave the power of speech to every limb;
Though masked and mute, conveyed his quick intent,
And told in frolic gestures all he meant.

Rich was a consummate artist, and in his time the parti-coloured hero was the leading part. His vagaries and antics delighted every eye. In the hands of his successors the Harlequin steadily declined, and the genius of Grimaldi elevated the Clown into the principal rôle. The Harlequinade, with its rampant fun, is gone, and the shadow which is left is only tacked on to the “variety show” now in vogue in deference to long-standing custom.

It is interesting, as giving an idea of the old pantomime, to recall John Kemble's suggestion of a pantomime to Dibdin. It was then, as will be seen, something better than the modern production. It could open, he suggests, with three Saxon witches lamenting Merlin's power and performing an incantation by which they create a Harlequin—like Goethe's Wagner creating Homunculus. Harlequin would be able to counteract Merlin in his designs against King Arthur. As they proceeded in their magical rites, “the sky might brighten and the rainbow stretch across the horizon, which, when the ceremonies are completed, should contract and form a figure of Harlequin in the heavens.” There is a transformation scene! Dibdin was a prolific writer of pantomimes. In Harlequin in his Element, performed at Covent Garden in 1807, we get an idea of his method. There is the incantation; Ignoso, the spirit of fire; Aquina, the fairy of the fountain; Aurino, genius of the air; Terrena, spirit of earth. All combine to produce a Harlequin from parti-coloured flowers—

TERRENA: This cloud to form shall grow,
AQUINA: With dew refreshed—
AURINO: With vital air,
IGNOSO: And warmed with magic glow.

Earth sinks into a bed of roses, the water spirit into the fountain, air ascends—leaving Harlequin with the magic sword,

The powerful weapon your wants will provide.

Columbine enters dancing, and Harlequin follows her round the fountain in a sort of pas de deux. Sir Amoroso Sordid (pantaloon) makes appearance, followed by the Clown as running footman (taken by Grimaldi) imitating the movements of his master. There is the courtship which the fairies foster, and, interwoven, a Harlequinade full of practical jokes and “take-offs” on the habits and follies of the day. It is a coincidence that “Joey” Grimaldi (it is perhaps the most lasting memorial of poor Grimaldi that ever since his day the Clown, in the top notes of Pantaloon, has always been called “Joey”) and Charles Dibdin lie close together in the burial-ground of St. James's Chapel, Pentonville, now a recreation ground. Dibdin was not only the author of most of the pieces in which Grimaldi acted, but the composer of nearly all the songs he sang. For many years after the premature death of the old pantomimist (he took an affecting farewell of the stage at forty-eight, and died not long after—a broken, crippled, forgotten man) no pantomime would have been considered complete which did not include a rendering of his famous “Hot Codlings”:—

A little old woman her living she got
By selling hot codlings, hot, hot, hot;
And this little old woman who codlings sold,
Though her codlings were hot, she felt herself cold;
So, to keep herself warm, she thought it no sin,
To fetch for herself a quarten of — —the missing word being roared out with gusto by the “gods.” The last to sing the ditty was Harry Payne, the last of the old order of Clowns.

The frolic of the early pantomimes soon became adulterated with coarseness. Writing in 1860, Chambers says, "the Harlequinade is left to the so-called pantomimist to arrange, and is nothing but noise; Columbine and Harlequin are mere posturers, and Clown an acrobat and buffoon." There is a still further decadence to be noticed from the days of peg-top trousers and crinolines. The modern pantomime would hardly be recognized by Rich who created it, or by Grimaldi who led it to its height.

THE DRAMA.

"ROBUSTIOUS"—THE CENSORSHIP.

In a letter published in Literature for last week Mr. Sidney Lee has courteously explained the point of his phrase "robustious comedy," as applied to the courtship scene in Henry V. He says he had in mind Shakespeare's own use of the word "robustious" in Act III., Scene 7—"the men do sympathize with the mastiffs in robustious and rough coming on." He regards the courtship scene as "a very practical commentary on this expression of opinion on the part of the French Constable respecting the English character," and adds "there are signs elsewhere in Shakespeare's work that the gibes of foreigners against Englishmen, which were no less common in Shakespeare's day than in our own, did not in his opinion always lack some justification." A cautious man will think twice before disagreeing with Mr. Lee on a Shakespearean question; nevertheless, I cannot subscribe to this opinion of his. He asks us to suppose that Shakespeare is deliberately presenting Henry in the courtship scene as the contemporary Frenchman's "comic Englishman," that we are to smile at Henry's "robustious" wooing as unconsciously bearing out the Constable's gibe, that the dramatist is making use of his hero to poke sly fun at an English weakness. In other words, Shakespeare is here writing in the vein of Mr. Bernard Shaw. Well, that is too "steep" for me. I can detect no irony in the scene, which seems to me to present, as every other scene in the play presents, the hero with the dramatist's absolute sympathy. Surely Shakespeare "wants the laugh" (as the theatrical jargon goes) for the King, not against him? Be that as it may, when I ventured to call the comedy of this scene "schoolboyish" I was thinking not so much of Henry's "robustiousness," as of the fun sought in the broken French and English. This linguistic fun is of the sort dear to schoolboys, i.e., persons who for the first time become aware that there are other languages than their own, and who begin by finding that simple fact extremely droll. A Frenchman to them (and to all illiterate persons) is comic by the mere circumstance that he does not speak English. In this respect the Elizabethan audience, and I submit Shakespeare himself, were in the school-boy stage. Linguistic fun abounds in Henry V. (the courtship scene, the French Princess's English lesson, Pistol and the French prisoner, Fluellen, the Scotch captain, the Irish captain), as it abounds in The Merry Wives and other plays. We all know why, we can all take the historical point of view, we can all find fun of this kind interesting as a "document," as a feature of Shakespeare's work and age; but can we nowadays frankly revel in it for its own sake? I, for one, cannot, "though Shakespeare had signed it a thousand times."

Harking back to the word "robustious," I note two very interesting statements in Mr. Lee's letter. The first is—that he would have hesitated to use the word "had its usage lacked Shakespeare's authority." If Mr. Lee consistently regulates his vocabulary on this principle I do not see how his life can be anything but one of almost continuous hesitation. But the second statement is by far the more important. It is, that this [i.e., Henry V., Act III., Scene 7] is the only occasion on which Shakespeare employs the word "robustious." In that case, will Mr. Lee tell us who wrote "O, it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious periwig-pated fellow tear a passion to tatters" (Hamlet, Act III., scene 2)?

The old and rather tiresome question of the Stage Censorship is, I see, still agitating many breasts. Mrs. Ormiston Chant lectured on it the other day before the members of the Brixton Literary and Discussion Society. She was for strengthening the hands of the Censor, and seems to have provoked Brixton to an outburst of free-and-easy sentiments—"Pagan, I regret to say," as Mr. Podsnap would observe—"la joie de vivre, ohé, ohé!" and so forth. In fact, Brixton became quite "robustious." Well, this is just the sort of question which I would willingly leave to the Brixton Literary and Discussion Society. But one gets dragged, willy-nilly, into the arena. Here is a country correspondent, Mr. Charles Heneage, writing to ask my support for his proposal that Parliament should be moved next Session to suspend the Censorship experimentally for a year, with a view to its total abolition. I can only express my regret to this gentleman that I am wholly unable to oblige him. The Censorship has its faults—like the gentleman's wooden leg in "Martin Chuzzlewit," it is "as weak as flesh, if not weaker." It has, e.g., passed at least two plays within the last twelve months which I think ought never to have seen the light without radical alteration. Nevertheless, I am for the Censorship quand même. It is of no use sitting on the fence; I "go baldheaded" for the Censorship "ticket." Mr. Heneage, and Brixton apparently, say the Press could do the business unaided. Yes, but at the best it could only do it a day after the fair. When a play has been once performed before some hundreds of people the mischief has been done. And Press protests do not, as a matter of fact, always, or often, extinguish naughty plays; they serve to advertise them, to create a succès de scandale. The stock argument that the Stage Censorship is anomalous, after the abolition of the literary censorship, is nonsense. People who say this overlook the essential difference between the effect of spoken words and visible deeds on a crowd and the effect of print on an isolated reader. I recommend them to look into Dr. Le Bon's "Psychologie des Foules," and then we ought to hear no more of their stock argument. Besides, there is another aspect of the case than that of public morals. There is a political and diplomatic aspect. Indeed, as we all know, but are apt to forget, Walpole's Licensing Act was established for a political purpose. Think of the case of a certain little amateur pantomime which has just been stopped in China. Further, I doubt if the abolitionists are aware of the number of absolutely impossible plays which are submitted to the Censor annually, and which, did he not burke them, would in many cases see the light by the aid of some "speculative" manager at some hole-and-corner theatre. No, I will never, never desert Mr. Mic—I mean, the Censor. But I shall keep my eye on him. The Brixton Literary and Discussion Society also has its eye on him. So has Mr. Charles Heneage. Evidently he will have to mind his p's and q's.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

ON THE TRAIL OF MR. LECKY.

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF IRISH HISTORY. Being a replacement of the False by the True, from the Elizabethan Conquest to the Legislative Union of 1800. By T. DUNBAR INGRAM, LL.D. In two volumes. (Longmans. 24s.)

The first two volumes of Mr. Lecky's "History of England in the Eighteenth Century" appeared in 1878, and the seventh and eighth volumes, which completed the work, in 1890. A cabinet edition of the history was published two years later in twelve volumes—the affairs of Ireland being separated from those of Great Britain, and dealt with exclusively in five of the volumes, entitled "Ireland in the Eighteenth Century." Mr. Lecky, influenced, no doubt, by his nationality, devoted what must appear to many readers as a disproportionate share of his great work to Ireland. It is, certainly, a curious fact that the two concluding volumes of the eight which make up what is called "The History of England in the Eighteenth Century"—as it originally appeared—should deal only with affairs in Ireland during the last eight years of the century, though, it is true, during that brief period two such momentous events as the Rebellion of 1798 and the Legislative Union occurred. At any rate, the feeling which generally prevailed with regard to these two volumes, on their appearance in 1890, was that the final word had been said on the Rebellion and the Union. At least it was conceded that the materials for the formation of a sound judgment upon these events were at the disposal of the public, and that no one would dream for many a long year of attempting another exhaustive history of the last years of the Irish Parliament.

But in the two substantial volumes named above—which are brought out by the firm that published Mr. Lecky's history—Mr. Dunbar Ingram covers practically the same period. The work purports to deal with Irish history for over two hundred years—from 1595 to 1800—but most of it is concerned with affairs in the Irish Parliament in the years immediately preceding the Union. It is, in fact, in the nature of a controversial and somewhat abusive foot-note to Mr. Lecky's volumes. The qualities with which Mr. Lecky is most credited as an historian are thorough research and scrupulous accuracy. But, in the opinion of Mr. Dunbar Ingram, Mr. Lecky may be a fine writer, but as an historian he is partisan and ignorant. "Mr. Lecky," he writes, "is the most respectable among the teachers of the doctrine that no good can come out of the British Nazareth, and conveys his opinions in a more polished style. He is also the fittest representative of them, for he is a firm believer in all that they preach, and shares, in full vigour, the one-sided credulity of these writers and their incapacity to recognize real authorities. Like them, too, he accepts every utterance, provided it comes from an anti-English source, as confirmation strong." "Partial writers who had not a particle of the historic spirit" is another of Mr. Dunbar Ingram's descriptions of the authorities by whom, he contends, Mr. Lecky has been most influenced. One of them is Henry Grattan, jun., who wrote a life of his father, the orator and statesman. Of this work Mr. Dunbar Ingram writes—

The declamatory production of the younger Grattan is one of the wildest and most extravagant books in the English language. The five volumes of which it consists make up one continued laudation of his father, vituperation of his political opponents, and abuse of the British Government. Worthless as the work is, and useless for the purposes of history, it converted Mr. Lecky, who considered it, as he tells us, "much the amplest and best history of the closing years of the Irish Parliament"—that is, from 1782 to 1800. Influenced by Grattan, Mr. Lecky enlisted in the ranks of the detractors of the English and British Government. He very soon proved himself an apt disciple of a crazy master, and devoted many years to demonstrate that the policy of the sister country in Ireland has been a selfish policy, which has prevented the prosperity and industrial development of the island.

It is the old story. Every writer of history who has set himself to controvert the work of another denies his rival the possession of "the historic spirit," or the faculty of dealing, philosophically, with the facts of history. One of the most trenchant criticisms of Froude's "English in Ireland"—that vehement appeal for the use of the mailed fist in Irish affairs—was written by Mr. Lecky for Macmillan's Magazine in 1873. Froude's "worship of success" was, according to Mr. Lecky, antagonistic to "the historic spirit." "No system," he wrote, "can strike more directly at the root of all that is noble and generous in human nature than this deification of success, this worship of force as the incarnation of right, this hatred of all that is weak and all that is unsuccessful. It makes it the function of history to stand by the scaffold and curse the victims as they pass." As for impartiality, Froude had not a trace of it. "No historian was ever less judicial," said Mr. Lecky. "His style quivers with passion. In describing the deeds and character of men who for centuries have mouldered in the dust he is as fierce a partisan as the most fiery debater in Westminster." In his "History of England in the Eighteenth Century," Mr.

Lecky protests that he has no case to make, no cause to plead, as an historian. "There is," he says, "a method of dealing with historical facts which has been happily compared to that of a child with his box of letters, who picks out and arranges those letters and those only which spell the words on which he has previously determined"; and he adds—"I have endeavoured to write this history in a different spirit." Mr. Lecky, in his turn, is now told that he has perverted historical facts in order to draw up an indictment against England for, as he conceives it, the misgovernment of Ireland.

Mr. Dunbar Ingram is the author of two other works on Irish history. In one, entitled "Two Chapters of Irish History," he aims at proving that the alleged violation of the Treaty of Limerick—by which the Catholics of Ireland were guaranteed their liberties and property after the Revolution—is an historical untruth; and in the other, "A History of the Legislative Union of Great Britain and Ireland," he contends that the Union was accomplished without the slightest taint of corruption. In his present work, his purpose—for Mr. Dunbar Ingram, like most historians, writes with a purpose—is to show that, despite the teaching of Mr. Lecky, Englishmen have no cause to hang their heads with shame—as, he says, they foolishly do—when the treatment of Ireland by England in the seventeenth century is mentioned in their presence. Going over a good deal of the ground which he has already traversed in his two former books, he protests that Irish industries were not destroyed by the English Parliament in response to the selfish appeals of jealous English manufacturers; that the penal laws against the Catholics, though undoubtedly passed, were extorted from an unwilling Government by the treasonable designs of the Catholics, and were never rigorously enforced; that the Irish Parliament was a worthless and incompetent assembly; that the rebels in '98 were not "the kindly and social Irish Celts," but "men of the mixed race in whose veins ran English and Scotch blood"; that the Union was opposed only by about half the Anglo-Irish Episcopalians, and that it was carried by the unbribed representatives of the nation who welcomed it as the salvation of their distracted country.

The work affords striking evidence of wide research. There is scarcely a page in which there are not several foot-notes referring the reader to the original authority for every statement advanced. And through it all Mr. Lecky is relentlessly pursued—

Mr. Lecky tells us "In Ireland . . . the Independence of the Parliament was supported by the strong pride and passion of Nationality," while in other pages of the same work he impresses on us the general contempt that was felt for that Assembly.

Mr. Lecky says, "The name taken by the Catholics (Defenders) implies that the Protestants were the aggressors." This misstatement as to the origin of the term and implied vindication of the Defenders can be traced. It first appeared in Wolfe Tone's cunning defence of the Roman Catholic sub-Committee; from that production it passed to a book, "Pieces of Irish History," compiled in New York by two United Irishmen who had escaped the well-deserved gallows. The younger Grattan adopted it, and from him Mr. Lecky borrowed it.

One could fill columns with extracted paragraphs bearing on the forefront the name of Mr. Lecky—a red and ragged irritant for this Irish bull. "Mr. Lecky's accounts of the Orange system are very inconsistent." "Mr. Lecky has furnished us with an amusing instance of the perfect confidence of ignorance." And on the subject of Mr. Lecky's "grave accusations against an International Treaty of Union," Mr. Ingram comes to the end of his tether, and asks—What punishment is due to the writer who circulates them and is unable to prove them?

We do not undertake to decide here between the warring historians. After all, an accurate account of a period of history can often only be obtained by a study of the researches and comments of several historians, each regarding the subject from a different standpoint, and mutually correcting each others' mistakes and false impressions. The zealous student will therefore accompany his perusal of Mr. Lecky's "History of Ireland in the Eighteenth Century" by a reference to Mr. Dunbar Ingram's work, which the author so confidently describes as "A Replacement of the False by the True." He will, however, probably think that while Mr. Dunbar Ingram suggests the counsel for the plaintiff or the defendant, Mr. Lecky—though his history may be wrong—impresses one as a judge delivering a great judgment in a lofty, judicial temper.

GRAY'S LETTERS.

THE LETTERS OF THOMAS GRAY, INCLUDING THE CORRESPONDENCE OF GRAY AND MASON. Edited by DUNCAN C. TOVEY. Vol. I. (G. Bell and Sons. 3s. 6d.)

We have here the first volume of a recension of Gray's correspondence, prepared by an editor who is already known as a scholar of wide erudition, and, in particular, as an elaborate authority upon Gray and his times. The present volume, which forms one of "Bohn's Standard Library," covers the period of a little over twenty years, from 1735 to 1757, which was the most productive and interesting in Gray's career. It includes the early letters to West and Walpole, the Wharton correspondence, and the animated interchange of ideas between Gray and Mason, besides a mass of other letters more occasional and scattered. The book is excellently printed, and, being published at a very moderate price, should become invaluable to students, for it is marked by many of the best qualities which distinguish the elaborate school of editing.

Mr. Tovey has, indeed, gone about his work in no half-hearted fashion, and the text of the letters, as here presented to us, is probably the most literally accurate that we are ever likely to obtain. For Mr. Tovey has carefully corrected existing copies of the Wharton correspondence from the Egerton MSS. in the British Museum, and in a future volume will publish the result of similar research in the letters to Norton Nicholls. We cannot say that Mr. Tovey's labours, so far as we can judge from his notes to the present volume, have resulted in any very important corrections of early editors. Mr. Tovey is an enthusiast of the kind which grows garrulous over an added comma or a dropped full-stop; and, though he is able to point out a good many discrepancies between his own interpretation of the MS. and those of his predecessors, the errors of transcription which he detects are seldom of vital significance. That Gray wrote "Christophn," and earlier editors have printed "Christopher" might be a matter of some import had the conjectural "Christopherson" in question played any striking part in the context; but, when the entire passage is found to amount to no more than the statement that "Brown wrote a Month ago to Hayes and Christophn, but has had no Answer, whither or no, they shall be here at the Commencement," the matter cannot be said to be of much moment. Indeed, Mr. Tovey seems to us in his notes and appendix to make too much of trivialities, though that is not an unnatural foible in one who has clearly spared no pains towards the establishment of a literally accurate text. We are not ourselves sure that much purpose is served by the adoption of all Gray's eccentricities of spelling and punctuation, such, for example, as the commencement of a sentence with a "lower case" letter instead of a capital; but it is always difficult to discriminate in questions of editing, and Mr. Tovey has, at any rate, erred on the side of unremitting and meritorious labour.

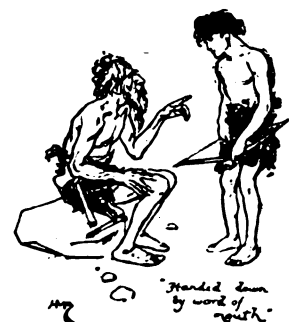

The original notes, are, perhaps, of even greater importance, and they seem to us to be admirable both in scope and arrangement. They have not, it is true, the charm of style and personality which the most felicitous of editors have contrived to introduce into the somewhat hide-bound exercise of annotation; but they are excellently considered and range over wide fields of erudition and research. We have tested them in many matters of rather intimate particularity, and have nowhere found them at fault either in statement or deduction. And they have the further advantage of not only explaining but illustrating their subject; they show a detailed knowledge of eighteenth-century life and literature, and they apply that knowledge intelligently and clearly. It would be difficult for any one, equipped with Mr. Tovey's edition, to miss the significance of any important suggestion or allusion in the correspondence, and where so much is both suggestive and allusive, this implies an uncommon thoroughness of knowledge and of method. The least satisfactory part of the volume is its introduction. Every editor has his own shortcomings, and Mr. Tovey's strength is not upon the lines of literary exposition. His own style is unelastic and congested, marred at inconvenient moments by laborious efforts towards flippancy, and generally lacking in charm and persuasiveness. In his attempt to define the attitude of Gray to his time, and the influence of the period upon the poet, he has collected, as everywhere else, much interesting testimony and evidence; but he conducts an argument with little vivacity and arranges his material to its own confusion. The student who wants a clear and intimate picture of Gray will not find him here; and it would, indeed, appear from several of Mr. Tovey's own remarks that he is himself somewhat out of sympathy with that quick, intuitive faculty of the "born" biographer which builds up a character from a suggestion and illumines a trait until it reveals an entire nature. Yet this is, after all, the only way in which criticism can become creative.

THE SCIENCE AND ART OF HOME LIFE.

A wonderful monument to the complexity of modern life is THE BOOK OF THE HOME, in eight volumes (Gresham Publishing Co., 5s. each vol.), of which five have now been published. That domestic life is a matter which requires some study and gets far less than it deserves is a proposition the truth of which must have been recognized even by the dweller in stone huts on Dartmoor. For him, indeed, such recurring troubles as the choice of wallpapers, the iniquities of washerwomen, and the ascetic discomforts of a spring cleaning were unknown. When he had closed up the hole of his hut at night to keep the bears out, and taught the children not to fall into the oven, his household duties were pretty well exhausted. Yet his was a limited intelligence, and no doubt these and other simple maxims were handed down from father to son, as conceived by the artist of some amusing little "thumbnails" which embellish the prospectus of this magnificent book, and of which we reproduce three by the courtesy of the publishers. It is a far leap across the centuries to the days of our grandfathers; and yet when we alight on the year 1800 how far are we still from the opening of the twentieth century! This book would have been a strange revelation to gentle-folk in the days of the Regency. Flat life was then unknown; so were sanitary fireplaces; so was the æsthetic movement. Home life is no longer the happy-go-lucky thing it was. It is no longer comprised in the wise saws of the experienced housewife handed down, like those of neolithic man, by word of mouth. It is a matter which requires to be expounded by specialists who can shed "the light of modern research into every corner of Home Life." And the general standard of life has been so enormously raised, art and science have so vastly developed the possibilities of the home, that there is undoubtedly a scope for a work on a large scale to which students of the art of living—and every housekeeper should be one—can refer when the innumerable questions of domestic management present themselves for solution. This new book, which attempts the first exhaustive treatment of the subject, seems to us to be conceived in the right spirit. It is edited by Mr. H. C. Davidson "assisted by over one hundred specialists." It is divided into four parts:—First the house, choice of site, sanitation, furnishing, law of landlord and tenant, heating and lighting, the garden. Then comes a section on the servant question, which by the way includes in itself an entire cookery book. The third section takes those usual, and, indeed, necessary items of house furniture, the master and mistress, their duties, their pursuits, and their amusements—a very exhaustive disquisition including mending and cleaning, entertaining and visiting, books, bees, cycles, account books, with much else—and last, but not least, dress. Lastly is to come a section on the children. The work, it will be seen, is exhaustive. But its chief merit is that it is thoroughly practical. It wastes no space in "chat" or in any of the futilities to which the subject has so often lent itself; nor does it pad itself out with the obvious. The writers really do know their subjects and really do say something worth saying on almost every subject. From the artistic point of view they represent the taste and knowledge of the day at its best without indulging any capricious and pedantic extravagances. The illustrations, moreover, are copious and extremely clear and instructive. Mr.

[From Prospectus of "The Book of the Home."]

[From Prospectus of "The Book of the Home."]

[From Prospectus of "The Book of the Home."]

Davidson has certainly gone far to satisfy his ambition of producing a "standard work of reference" on household management.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Army Reform.

Captain Creagh, late of the 1st Royals, is obviously a rather remarkable man, and it is, perhaps, easy to guess why so revolutionary and outspoken an officer did not rise to higher rank. In SPARKS FROM CAMP FIRES (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) he relates with vivacity and courage many of his experiences in the Crimea. But, though he is entertaining enough in the chapters relating to that campaign, the real value of his book at the present moment, when Army reform appears almost hopeless before it is commenced, lies in his outspoken comments on Army training as he knew it. In his time the letter choked the spirit in military affairs as it appears to do at the present day, and the means to military ends became the ends themselves. Captain Creagh, who apparently speaks French well and has travelled among all the armies of the Continent, enjoyed greater opportunities than the ordinary officer possesses for becoming acquainted with the fatal results of the fossilized drill-book. His remarks on the French, Austrian, and Prussian methods might well be laid to heart by commanding officers at the present time. The audacious author of "An Absent-minded War" might find in "Sparks from Camp Fires" some more ammunition for his guns when he next opens fire in Pall-mall.

China.

Dr. W. A. P. Martin was besieged by the Chinese in Peking, but did not originally intend to write a book about his experience. When persuaded to do so he dictated THE SIEGE IN PEKING (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, 3s. 6d.) "with all possible rapidity to a stenographer." The book is of the kind one would expect to be produced in these circumstances. Much of it is padding, and the rest is mainly a string of anecdotes thrown off at random in no particular order. The author's point of view is that of the missionaries. He will not hear of any proposal to settle the Chinese question which does not give missionaries full liberty to propagate the Gospel in the interior of the country. Perhaps the most interesting portion of his book is the appendix, in which he prints some poems which he has translated from the Chinese language. It is very interesting to find Chinese poetry set to the familiar tune of "You are old Father William":—

"Spare the life of my guest, and touch not a hair;
I received him for your sake alone!"—

"For your sake, my mother, the stranger I spare,
But you've bartered the life of your son.

For you I have broken my chieftain's command,
My blood must atone for my guilt;"

So saying, the blade that he held in his hand
He plunged in his heart to the hilt.

"Farewell, Noble Soul!" the brave Tai-tsu exclaimed.

"My brother! your mother is mine.

"In ages to come you'll with honour be named,
And adored in our family shrine."

The most noticeable feature of Dr. Martin's book is his evident feeling that England and the United States ought to work together. As Mr. Robert Barr pointed out in an account of his travels in the Levant, this is the almost invariable sentiment of Englishmen and Americans who find themselves thrown together in a foreign country, even at times when their respective Governments are at daggers drawn.

The Paganism of the Ocean.

WITH CHRIST AT SEA (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is of a different kind from the stories by which Mr. F. T. Bullen is best known. It will excite the imagination less, and the reflection more, than his brilliant story of life on a whaler. He describes it as a religious autobiography; and it is, in fact, a species of seafaring Pilgrim's Progress from the day when his religious life began to the time of his finally settling down ashore. But it is much more than the history of his own religious experiences. It contains, indeed, little that such a phrase connotes, but treats of questions, general rather than personal, which are of vital importance to our merchant service. In Mr. Bullen's pages—and he writes only of that which he has seen and knows—most of the amenities and attractions of a life on the ocean wave vanish; and their place is taken by a more prosaic course of hardship and blasphemy. It is to be hoped, though we have no reason to suppose it, that Mr. Bullen has been exceptionally unfortunate in the ships in which he has sailed. He mentions in his book seventeen or eighteen of them. One was a "miserable old barque," "with hull and rigging so rotten that it was constructive murder to send her to sea." Another was "frankly pagan," with a drunken skipper. Then comes another "pagan" ship, "the crew the cruellest in my experience." Others were "pagan," "godless," "utterly godless," and "too bad for description." Of two or three ships he speaks with grateful praise; but these are rare exceptions. The others seem to have been little better than floating receptacles of drunkards and heathen, whether their crews were British or came from all countries under the sun. He judges them, no doubt, by a somewhat exacting religious standard; but, even if we try to persuade ourselves that the picture is overdrawn, it is at the very least a sad and depressing state of things. The remedy is not easily found. Mr. Bullen says:—

Laudatque cadit post paulum gratia ponti;

Let those sneer at Christian effort who will—and God knows their name is Legion—there is no more effective agent for the personal elevation of man's body, as well as his soul, than this. Other agencies lop off decayed branches or poisonous suckers; Christianity strikes at the giant tap-root, and this alone can meet the urgent necessities of the case.

There is, however, this practical difficulty, that the sailor is almost always beyond the reach of external human aids to religion, so that his religion, if he is religious at all, must necessarily be of an intensely spiritual and personal kind. Having said this much of the rather sombre complexion of the book, we may remind our readers that it is not a romance, but a real and true account of seafaring life, by one who certainly knows the ropes. How Mr. Bullen became so good a writer we do not know, but he excels in narrative, and has had many adventures, both great and small, in all parts of the world. The incidents, as he says, are not of his choosing. He relates them—and they deserve to be related—in the hope that good may result.

Spain.

THE ROMANCE OF SPAIN, by Charles W. Wood (Macmillan, 10s. n.), makes a very handsome volume, charmingly illustrated. Mr. Wood writes in a bright and readable fashion, and if his style is not literary, his reflections not profound or original—well, the average reader demands neither literature nor originality. What the average reader wants to find in a book of travels he is sure to find here—ready-made phrases, hackneyed observations, a light and genial tone easily assimilated by him who runs, and nothing in the least novel, perplexing, or intellectual. On every page at least once occurs the compound word “old-world”; infinitives are split with easy indifference; “dream” and “dreaming” are in excess quite as much as “old-world” and the hackneyed quotation “dim, religious light.” The mention of woman is always prefixed by “fair,” and a Spanish monk is made to describe himself as “il conte” instead of “el conde,” one knows not why. Mr. Wood, who has lived in Spain and seems to know Spanish enough to talk to Spaniards along his route, has a curious fancy to transform the Spanish “el” into the Italian “il.” There is a vein of very thin and cheap humour introduced by means of his travelling companion, one H. C., a susceptible youth, whom Mr. Wood, without any felicity or originality of observation or expression, represents as constantly in and out of love, and who affords him the gratification of referring frequently to the youth’s aunt, Lady Maria. It is difficult to explain the introduction of the Lady Maria into a book on Spanish travels, and we ask ourselves why the susceptible H. C. should be found at San Sebastian composing a sonnet au sourire de Mademoiselle, the innkeeper’s daughter. If Mr. Wood were in search of local colouring, why not use Spanish, since he is in Spain? If not, English is the natural alternative; but the French is absurd and inartistic.

Mr. Wood’s impressions of Spain are in the main commendable if commonplace. He is delighted with neglected and beautiful Segovia, and very properly so, for Segovia is one of the most delightful towns of Spain. It is a pity that among the illustrations of Segovia there is not one of the famous Casa de los Picos, which in its high corner over a lovely arch forms a radiant nook. There are two drawings of the House of Shells at Salamanca, while there might have been one of each of these celebrated houses. Mr. Wood is also right in his slighting remarks of Madrid, the cheapest and shoddiest capital of Europe, with nothing to recommend it to the traveller but its superb picture gallery. But when he reaches Toledo we are sorry for his readers. Mr. Wood gives a résumé of the town’s history which might with considerable advantage be left out. He turns two or three Moorish kings into one, converts the legendary Florinda into Zoraida, and proves to us once more that the hasty traveller, if he must touch at all upon history, had best do so in the lively and humorous fashion of Théophile Gautier, who treats it as pure romance. Thanks to the illustrations, Mr. Wood’s “Romance of Spain” is a pleasant volume, but the exacting reader, who wants his travels put in the form of literature like Gautier’s “Voyage en Espagne,” who wants wit and humour and freshness of style and observation, who clamours for charm such as abounds in M. René Bazin’s delightful and delicate “Terre d’Espagne,” will turn from it impatiently. It is the sort of thing to delight the cheap magazine public, who naturally revel in “dreamy,” “old-world,” “dim religious light,” and “fair ladies.” They will doubtless also appreciate the fatiguing and uninteresting fugitive loves of H. C. and the continual references to Lady Maria, his noble aunt. But everybody will be interested in the charming illustrations.

More about Omar.

“This book has been written with a view to helping, if possible, those who, on their first introduction to Omar Khayyám, as interpreted by FitzGerald, find difficulties in the way of understanding him.” Thus Mr. Batson in his preface to still another book on the Rubai’yat, the full title of which runs as follows—THE RUBAI’YAT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM, translated by Edward FitzGerald, with a commentary by A. M. Batson, and a biographical introduction by E. D. Ross (Methuen, 6s.). We doubt whether those persons who, on their first introduction to FitzGerald’s poem, fail to understand it, will likely to acquire a taste for it through Mr. Batson’s paraphrases and commentaries. This is how he explains the two famous quatrains XI. and XII., which begin respectively “With me along the strip of Herbage strown,” and “A book of Verses underneath the Bough”—“Not disingenuously had he” (Omar) “assured Nizam ul Mulk, when invited to take his place among the rich and powerful, that he wanted none of their favours. To sit in a meadow with a golden girl as fair as the houris is, for him, a Paradise which no mere kingly boons could equal, &c.” There is not only a touch of vulgarity in the remark, but it is also misleading in every particular. There is no proof that Omar ever knew Nizam ul Mulk at all. The idea of houris never comes into FitzGerald’s poem, or into the Persian sources from which he drew his inspiration; and the only person whom Omar ever directly addresses is his Sa-ki or cup-bearer, who was always a boy. The prefatory “Life and Times of Omar Khayyam,” by Professor E. Denison Ross is a useful compilation containing all that is at present known of Omar from Oriental sources; and Messrs. Macmillan have allowed the entire text of FitzGerald’s fifth and last edition to be incorporated in the book.

Science.

Following the excellent example set in several cases of late, Professor Osborne Reynolds has collected together the papers on physical and mechanical subjects which he has contributed to scientific societies and periodicals. He republishes them in a convenient form under the title SCIENTIFIC PAPERS (Cambridge University Press, 15s. n.). The first volume, lately issued, includes some forty papers written between 1869 and 1882. These are placed in strictly chronological order, the appearance of disconnectedness inseparable from such an arrangement being atoned for by references, both forward and backward, to other papers on the same subjects. The topics discussed are of considerable diversity. They include astronomical phenomena, the refraction of sound by the atmosphere, rolling friction, the steering of screw steamers and the behaviour of the propeller, the study of fluid motions by means of colour bands, &c. The most elaborate memoir of all deals with certain dimensional properties of matter in the gaseous state, and includes some of the author’s inquiries respecting the radiometer.

The second volume to appear of the TREATISE ON ZOOLOGY, edited by Professor Ray Lankester (Black, 16s. n. each volume), is also the second part of the whole work, and deals with the Porifera and Coelentera. An introductory chapter on the great divisions of the Metazoa is supplied by the editor, but the most important section is Professor E. A. Minchin’s very full account of the Sponges. This takes up nearly half the book. The other sections are on the Hydromedusæ and Scyphomedusæ by Mr. G. Herbert Fowler, on the Anthozoa by Mr. G. C. Bourne, and on the Ctenophora by the same author. Each of these sections forms a index in itself, complete with separate pagination and a copious index. The illustrations are numerous and well executed, and the text is written with all the unflinching severity of style that is proper in a work which addresses itself to serious students only.

In STUDIES IN FOSSIL BOTANY (Black, 7s. 6d.) Dr. D. H. Scott, F.R.S., reproduces the substance, with considerable additions, of a course of lectures he delivered some years ago at University College. The book does not pretend to be an exhaustive manual of fossil botany, but aims simply at putting before the reader a general view of such results of palæontological inquiry as are of fundamental importance from the botanist's point of view. Dr. Scott confines himself to the Pteridophyta and the Gymnosperms, in which so far the bulk of the results have been obtained, and shows how the botanist's conception of those two divisions of the vegetable kingdom and of their mutual relations has been modified by recent study. The book has many excellent illustrations, and the facts are presented in the clear, and at the same time balanced and impartial, style that botanists have learnt to associate with Dr. Scott's writings.

In CHEMISTRY AN EXACT MECHANICAL PHILOSOPHY (Churchill, 3s. 6d.) Mr. Fred. G. Edwards, "inventor of atomic models," propounds a theory that the atoms of the chemical elements are built up from "one primordial material whose atom is a tetrahedron the sole function of which, including the property of elasticity, is to occupy effectually an infinitesimal space." The hydrogen atom consists of two of these tetrahedra placed base to base. Symmetrical arrangements of such pairs, in numbers corresponding with the atomic weights, form the atoms of the various elements, while compound bodies are the result of further agglutinations of these hydrogen atoms as grouped together in the elements. Mr. Edwards is somewhat severe on the "occult" force which he alleges has hitherto been supposed to hold together the atoms in molecules. It is therefore the more regrettable that he omits to give any clear account of the forces which hold together his tetrahedra. He does not explain why a number of them bound together to form, say, water can be torn asunder by the chemist and divided into groups, whereas another set bound together to form iron remain inseparable. Another dark matter is that these atoms are not all exactly regular in shape, the distortion being greatest in the elements of greatest atomic weight. Surely this assertion is tantamount to saying that there is no one primordial atom, but that the atoms of each element are different. But perhaps the function of the single tetrahedrons, a pair of which compose the hydrogen atom, is the most remarkable of all. These, the author opines, are the atoms of the ether which is material, and if it is objected that in that case they would cause friction on the surfaces of the planets and so bring them speedily to rest, he answers they may have peculiar motions which render them a "veritable ocean of perfectly-balanced friction-rollers," so that they have no retarding effect whatever. After this it is not surprising to learn that hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen are perfect gases because they are not easily liquefiable.

THE HUMAN EAR, by Miriam A. Ellis (A. and C. Black, 3s. 6d. n.), is a strenuous attempt on the part of the authoress to show that the ear is a real index of character and means of identification. Given accurate copies of the ears of an eminent Oxford musician, or lexicographer, or Assyriologist, she is able to prove how completely impossible it would have been for the owners of these ears to excel in anything but music or lexicography, or the accumulation of curious lore on ancient languages. "Otomorphology" is not yet an exact science, and many of its dogmas seem to depend more on the ipse dixit of its exponent than on any definite scientific proof; exception, however, must be taken to such statements as this, that warts are "only a nervous complaint of the skin" (p. 4). The book gives a rather depreciatory account of earlier workers at the subject, from Pliny down to M. Bertillon, the French graphologist, and will, no doubt, increase the resources of those who can tell the character from the lines on the hand, the bumps on the head, or the look of the handwriting.

Reprints.

The first volume has now appeared of Sir Arthur Helps' SPANISH CONQUEST OF AMERICA (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.), of which we recently spoke—a book, apart from its literary value, of great interest in the history of the dealings of conquering civilized nations with aborigines. On one or two points, such as the character of Isabella, the best opinion is now opposed to Sir Arthur Helps, but his book still remains in great measure a standard work, though the researches of Mr. Ulick Burke and others have somewhat expanded our knowledge.

Two more plays added to the Chiswick Shakespeare (Bell, 1s. 6d.), JULIUS CÆSAR and TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA, show that Mr. Byam Shaw is beginning to adopt in his illustrations a manner rather less black and heavy, and there are also two more of Mr. Lane's delightful little "Flowers of Parnassus"—a selection and re-arrangement made by Mr. F. B. Money Coutts from Percy's NUT-BROWN MAID, and Sir John Suckling's BALLADE UPON A WEDDING (1s. n. each). Both are illustrated with great taste by Mr. Herbert Cole, one of whose pictures we reproduce.

"EACH AND EVERY MAN WITH DISH IN HAND."

[From "A Ballade upon a Wedding" (Lane).]

THE FORSAKEN MERMAN (Dent 1s. 6d. n.) is a pretty little reprint of Matthew Arnold's poem, "decorated" by Jean C. Archer.

Messrs. Methuen's excellent little "Library of Devotion" now includes a considerable number of religious classics, to which is now added A GUIDE TO ETERNITY, the "Manuductio ad Cælum of Cardinal Bona (1609-1674)," Englished by Sir Roger L'Estrange, the Royalist Surveyor of the Imprimerie under Charles II. It is well edited, with an Introduction by Canon Stanbridge. That in the "Temple Classics" CRANFORD (1s. 6d.) should be added to the already formidable list of editions of Mrs. Gaskell's story was inevitable; and Mr. Gollancz, the editor of the series, has done wisely in confining himself to the briefest possible note on the book and its author. Equally indispensable in the "Temple Classics for Young People" is such a book as FAIRY TALES FROM THE ARABIAN NIGHTS (Dent, 1s. 6d.), to which Mr. T. H. Robinson contributes twelve skilful pictures.

Two little Rossetti volumes are THE BLESSED DAMOZEL (Lane, 1s. n.), which Mr. Money Coutts adds to his "Flowers of Parnassus," with illustrations in the Rossettian manner by Mr. Percy Bulcock, and another volume of the "Siddal Edition," containing poems mostly of Rossetti's youth, with an introductory note by Mr. W. M. Rossetti (Ellis and Elvey, 2s. 6d. n.).

Uniform with the "Colloquies of Erasmus" we now have the book IN PRAISE OF FOLLY (2s. 6d. n.) from Messrs. Gibbings.

We cannot applaud this edition as we did the former volumes. There is not a sign of information as to what translation is made use of; nor as to who is the author of the life of Erasmus prefixed to the volume, in which both the English style and the information are alike unsatisfactory.

Lord Roberts.

Captain W. E. Cairnes has made a high reputation as a military critic during the Boer war. He is an interesting writer, and he would even be a good writer if he would take a hint from a civilian critic who sometimes wonders how so busy a man can find time to split so many of his infinitives. His LORD ROBERTS AS A SOLDIER IN PEACE AND WAR (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is the best biography of the Commander-in-Chief that has appeared, though it is only a narrative of the great general's public career, and does not pretend to touch, whether with or without authority, on his private life. It is a contribution not only to biography, but more particularly to military history. The famous Afghan campaigns are related at length and critically. The part which luck played in some of Earl Roberts' earlier successes is made clear; the glory of the great march to Kandahar, romantically exaggerated by so many enthusiasts, is reduced to its true proportions, which, it need not be said, are still considerable. Perhaps, however, the greatest virtue of the narrative consists in its instructive production of parallels to those "unfortunate incidents" which have lately caused outcries against the inability of generals to subjugate completely and definitely a foe beaten in the open field. The Afghans were an enemy very like the Boers; they fought in a very similar country; and the campaign against them dragged on in much the same way, though the public did not follow its course so closely. Captain Cairnes' book is written graphically, and with admirable judgment and taste.

Another life of the Commander-in-Chief is contributed by Mr. J. S. Fletcher, under the title ROBERTS OF PRETORIA (Methuen, 6d.). It might easily have been worse, and it might easily have been better. As compared with Captain Cairnes' biography, which appears at the same moment, it need only be said that it is cheaper by 5s. 6d.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein publish a first instalment of a DICTIONARY OF QUOTATIONS (7s. 6d.), by Thomas Benfield Harbottle and Colonel Philip Hugh Dalbiac. It is impossible for such a work to contain everything that every one will want, and it is hard to say how far the detection of omissions justifies complaint. Still, in the French section at all events, we missed a good many old friends, including "de l'audace, de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace"; "il faut souffrir pour être belle"; "souvent femme varie"; "pour être dévot on n'en est pas moins homme"; "charbonnier est maître chez lui"; and "le tricolore a fait le tour du monde, votre drapeau rouge n'a fait que le tour du Champ-de-Mars." But it provides for a "felt want" and will be invaluable for the innumerable persons who earn their living by pointing morals or adorning tales.

THE BIOGRAPH IN BATTLE, by W. K.-L. Dickson (Unwin, 6s.), is the diary of a gentleman who went to war in search not of glory but of moving pictures. A magazine article would have given him less trouble to write and might easily have contained all that he had to say. There must surely be some error in his statement that "Mr. Rhodes gave me a letter to his college chum, Lord Kitchener," seeing that Mr. Rhodes was an Oriel man and Lord Kitchener a Woolwich cadet.

THE SALVATION ARMY AT WORK IN THE BOER WAR, by "Adjutant" Mary Murray (1s.), shows both the war and the Salvation Army from a new point of view. The Salvationists seem to drop most of their eccentricities when brought into contact with practical affairs in which such eccentricities are not required; and their adaptability is, no doubt, one of the secrets of their success.

The illustrations of THE JOURNAL OF A RABBIT (Grant Richards, 1s.) are so excellent that the fact that the letterpress is a little dull and ends with a wholly gratuitous tragedy is easily forgiven. We do not know the artist who signs the drawing "E. B. L.," but he or she certainly possesses a remarkable talent for black-and-white illustration in its simplest form. We trust soon to see the same draughtsman's work adding interest to a more amusing book.

A VAGABOND IN ASIA, by Edmund Candler (Greening, 6s.), is a book of travel, not very interesting or important. The author journeyed overland through Siam to Cochin China; but he "does not pretend to speak authoritatively on matters Oriental," and he describes his experiences only moderately well. The Himalayan Sketches included in the volume are also rather disappointing. The photographs, per contra, are exceptionally good.

The ancient game of whist has given rise to several variations. Bridge is one of them; another, which is at present unknown, or all but unknown, in this country, is the Russian game of Vint. THE LAWS AND PRINCIPLES OF VINT (D. Nutt, 2s. 6d.) will no doubt help to popularize it. It comes to us with high credentials as a scientific combination of Whist and Preference, and we should say that it would be well worth while to give it a trial. Mr. Frank W. Haddan, the editor of the volume before us, has been thoroughly coached by two Russian gentlemen who are expert players, and his explanations are so lucid that, as far as we can see, they leave no point of procedure doubtful.

Our customary praise of the guide books published under the auspices of the Homeland Association may properly be extended to WEEK ENDS IN DICKENS LAND, written and illustrated by Duncan Moul (St. Bride's Press, 1s.). As the title suggests, the book is about Rochester, Gadshill, Cobham Hall, &c. It is the right sort of guide for the right sort of tourist; the pictures are particularly charming, and the letterpress is no less entertaining than instructive.

In the Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, is a MS. of Savonarola's meditations on Psalm LI. and part of Psalm XXXI. They illumine the character of the Reformer, showing the source of his strength to lie in a close and devout study of the Scriptures; and, written as they were in prison and in the face of death, there is an intense pathos about the pure and humble spirit of piety which they breathe. The thoughts contained in this beautifully illuminated manuscript formed in the Middle Ages the devotional food of thousands. Twenty-one editions were published within two years of Savonarola's death in 1498; translations were made, though printing was as yet in its infancy, into five European languages before the middle of the sixteenth century, and the exposition of Psalm LI. was embodied in the English primers. To the Master of Corpus, Dr. E. H. Perowne, we now owe a scholarly translation into modern English of the meditations—SAVONAROLA (Cambridge University Press). It is finely printed in a large quarto volume, with two facsimiles from the manuscript, and forms a book of devotion of singular beauty and interest.

The article by M. René Doumic in the Revue des Deux Mondes of last July on the young French poets, to which we alluded recently, has been reprinted in a volume published by Perrin, entitled ÉTUDES SUR LA LITTÉRATURE FRANÇAISE. It figures here with thirteen other essays by M. Doumic reprinted from the same review. Among them is a notice of the Duc de Broglie's "Voltaire Avant et Pendant la Guerre de Sept Ans" (Calmann Lévy) and there are also studies of Baron Gourgaud's "Journal de Ste. Hélène," of Karenine's "Life of George Sand," of Tolstoi, M. Paul Adam, M. Marcel Prévost and of M. Bourget, à propos of the new edition of his works which we reviewed in our last number. M. Doumic, the critic and spokesman of the bien pensants among French readers, discusses M. Bourget from M. Bourget's own point of view, which is not identical with ours. It is the more incumbent upon us to recommend his book because it represents the best expression of a certain reactionary literary attitude now observable in France in other quarters than M. Brunetière's pages.

LAWYERS AND THEIR CLIENTS (Wilson, 2s.) gives a history of the Bar and a history of the profession of solicitors, but is apparently mainly written for the purpose of introducing potential clients to take the opinion of counsel without seeking the services of solicitors as go-betweens.

THE STORY OF H.M.S. POWERFUL (Horace Marshall, 1s.), said to be compiled "from the diary of a Powerful man," is a bright, breezy, and not very grammatical book, but gives a good idea of the life of a modern sailor on foreign service. The right sort of book to give to the right sort of boy.

MOTHER, BABY, AND NURSERY (Unwin, 1s.), by Geneviève Tucker, M.D., should be of much practical help to all parties—except perhaps the baby. We are told some things which even "father" knows already, but the bulk of the book, especially the chapter on "Posture," is most informing. The pages are dotted over with admirable illustrations of all kinds of babies.

ART.

Christ in Art.

Mr. Joseph Lewis French quotes the lines from Browning's "Fra Lippo Lippi" which run—

For don't you mark, we're made so that we love
First when we see them painted, things we have passed
Perhaps a hundred times nor cared to see.

If I drew higher things with the same truth,
That were to take the Prior's pulpit place,
Interpret God to all of you, as "the note" of his interesting brochure entitled CHRIST IN SACRED ART (Jarrold, 6s.), and for those who do not know well the pictures of the great masters in which Christ appears his volume will be welcome. As he says, there is no one greatest picture of Christ but rather a series of them. From Giotto to Herr Guger, the German artist; from Velasquez to that "painter of pain," Verestchagin, is a wide field for one convenient volume to cover, but Mr. French succeeds in a manner at once sympathetic and popular. Some thirty photographic reproductions of the most famous pictures are given, and the works are divided by the author into four sections—the "Christ-Child," "Christ as Teacher and Healer," "Christ as Martyr," and "Christ Dead and Arisen." We do not always quite agree with Mr. French's deductions however. For example, he writes:—

The æsthetic spirit has gradually become a commanding influence in general civilization, and, aided by the great accessions to the resources of technique, which have developed within the past half-century, it has given us from the hands of a few of the European masters some of the most important contributions to religious painting that have been produced.

Who, we wonder, among the European masters of the last half-century has improved upon the technique of Velasquez's "Christ at the Column," and where among the moderns are religious painters that compare in importance with the early Italians?

It would require a painter of greater strength than Sir W. B. Richmond to support the twofold tax of a private view at the New Gallery to which a paltry two hundred—rather than the customary four thousand—had been invited, and a one-man show which chronologically provokes comparison with the achievements of Millais, Watts, Burne-Jones, Rossetti, and Alma-Tadema. Portraiture, unless it is the work of genius, offers but small scope for a popular exhibition, and the alternative—Sir W. B. Richmond's uninspired classical genre pictures—is not exciting. Leighton occasionally gave freshness of treatment, if not of conception, to well-flogged classical war-horses; but Sir W. B. Richmond is seldom really inspired, and his classicism is generally pedantic. This will not provide a popular exhibition. "The Bath of Venus" leaves us unmoved, "An Audience in Athens during the Representation of the Agamemnon" impresses us with the conviction that an Athenian audience consisted entirely of "deadheads," and "The Death of Ulysses" causes us to question the accuracy of Sir W. B. Richmond's authorities.

"Prometheus released by Hercules" shatters all our preconceived ideas of the Titan, and in "The Body of Sarpedon carried by Sleep and Death" we recognize more the humour of the modern delineator than the sublimity of the classic thought. We pass from these pictorial platitudes to a branch of art in which Sir W. B. Richmond holds his own with many of his contemporaries—his portraiture. Here we find him almost convincing. The dignity and breadth of the "Lady Wantage," the rugged unconventionalism of "William Morris," the elegance of "Mrs. W. G. Rawlinson," the finish of "Miss Gertrude Lewis," the rare richness of "The Viscountess Hood," the intellectuality of "Miss Helen Gladstone," and the characterful "Holman Hunt" help us to forget the comparative feebleness of the "Gladstone," the "Dr. Lightfoot," and "Bishop Westcott." If anything justifies the devotion of the New Gallery to an exhibition of the works of Sir W. B. Richmond it is, without doubt, the facility with which he paints a more than presentable portrait. If the organizers of the show had remembered that there was another Richmond in the field, and had included the best work of George Richmond also, the lovers of portraiture would have had small cause to complain.

Some recompense for the disappointment in connexion with the two large winter art shows at the Academy and the New Gallery will be provided by the forthcoming exhibition at the Guildhall. The Director of the Corporation Art Gallery has for the past eighteen months been preparing an exhibition of works by Spanish artists, and arrangements are sufficiently advanced to give promise of the opening of the show in April. The large room on the lower level will be devoted to Velasquez and his contemporaries, while in the two smaller galleries will be hung examples by Goya and later artists.

In the gallery of the "Old" Water Colour Society, Pall-mall East, on February 4, there will be opened a Ruskin exhibition, limited, as we understand, to works from the critic-artist's own hand; drawings in various mediums, some architectural, others of landscape, manuscripts, and the like. The show will remain open until the end of the month.

We have received from Messrs. Virtue the twenty-second annual issue of that very comprehensive handbook THE YEAR'S ART, 1901 (3s. 6d.), which Mr. A. C. R. Carter, the editor, has adorned on this occasion with portraits of seventeen War Correspondents. Much interest also attaches to Mr. Heathcote Statham's article on Architecture in 1900.

FICTION.

Manners and Mysticism.

Mr. Phœbus, of "Lothair," favoured us long ago with the dictum that "the originality of a subject is in its treatment," and bearing this in mind, perhaps, Mrs. Lucas Cleeve has sought to give some feeling of newness to the novel of manners and mysticism by a very unconventional treatment. In YOLANDE, THE PARISIENNE (Long, 6s.), all thoughts of the vraisemblance of life are cast aside, and in its place a dull and rather nebulous world is depicted under the vague title of a "dream of the twentieth century." When early in the book Yolande's voice sounds "like mountain torrents breaking loose from the ice," and you realize that "her heart had broken and pieces of it were being carried away in her voice," you know also that restraint and truth will not be the leading features of the novel; and when the "Marseillaise" is sung, and "it seemed as if the meaning of the song hurtled above us and explained the music," one realizes also that the author does not cultivate the virtue of lucidity. The idea of the novel is good, but Mrs. Cleeve, who knows well enough that "only he who seeks the mystic can understand nature," has not the power to convince. She attempts a task that genius alone could carry through.

We get a full measure of occultism in Mrs. Campbell Praed's AS A WATCH IN THE NIGHT (Chatto, 6s.), in which one becomes acquainted with many aristocratic personages and a beautiful lady who lives in this world of ours as well as in another and less material one. Dorothea Queste would be intensely interesting if Mrs. Campbell Praed permitted us to believe in her. But the author of "As a Watch in the Night" has not that particular gift which enables the reader of the weird and impossible to be convinced. Yet she has many other gifts and the novel is boldly original and occasionally entertaining. The two worlds, ours and that of ancient Rome, are depicted with skill, but one requires something of Dorothea's "fourth-dimensional faculties" to fully understand the inner meaning of some of the situations. Mrs. Praed's new book takes us into a new fictional environment, and refreshes rather by its force and courage than by means more artistic and conventional.

Mr. A. J. Dawson.

Mr. A. J. Dawson prefaces his novel, THE STORY OF RONALD KESTREL (Heinemann, 6s.), rather quaintly with the lines, "Work done solely that the doer may live; that is 'shop' if you will. Life lived, for the more part, that the liver may work; that is life by your leave. So, to my story, with an open mind and kindly, if you please." Nothing would please us more, but the author has already prepared us for a lack of humour. This bad promise of the preface is confirmed on reading the adventures of Ronald. But for the absence of comedy, one of the most damaging lacunæ in an author's equipment, Mr. Dawson's book would be a work of great charm. The early pictures of Oriental life, the accounts of London days, the struggles and victories of a writing man, the development of life in New South Wales, the influence of those women who "run into you, and there remain absorbed," are given with no small skill. Peace comes to Ronald at last, and the moral of the book is this—be hard-working and marry, and do not have a sense of humour and live in Australia.

Mr. Tom Gallon.

Mr. Tom Gallon's reputation is established, and, in spite of one or two crude books hastily put forth, well founded. Some people have boldly described him as the Dickens of to-day. He is certainly the only writer who directly, and sometimes slavishly, founds himself on "Boz," though certainly without "Boz's" comic creative gift. Nevertheless, perhaps some may think that he has a truer idea of pathos in fiction than had the author of "The Old Curiosity Shop." In A ROGUE IN LOVE (Hutchinson, 6s.) Mr. Gallon has the pathetic tale to tell of how a released gaol-bird of a somewhat humorous turn of criminality wins his way back to a better life by the loving respect with which the presence of a young English girl inspires him. Joe Badgery's is a really affecting tale. It were kinder not to give the story away; even by a hint, for it deserves to be read. But, Mr. Gallon, please do not speak of a single individual as "a good Genii!"

MANY DAYS AFTER, by C. Howell (Digby, Long, 6s.), is a powerful study of the tortured mind of an upright and honourable man, who is nevertheless guilty of unpremeditated murder. How the sufferer finds his way out of life and its burdens is told with extraordinary force and skill, and the gloom of the book is lightened by some humorous character-drawing.

A SON OF AUSTERITY, by George Knight (Ward, Lock, 6s.), is not powerful enough to make up for its unattractiveness. The scene is laid in a squalid brickfield, and the characters, including a deformed blind girl and a mad gardener, are ghastly company. Their story is little less than repulsive.

The cry of "No Popery," the keynote of AN OBSTINATE PARISH (Unwin, 2s. 6d.), seldom fails to stir up passions, but we fail to find any merit in Mr. M. L. Lord's book. There is an air of unreality about parish and parishioners; and especially about the vengeance of the latter upon their vicar, whom they duck, with appropriate oaths, after burning his house.

The title of THE INNER SHRINE (Harpers, 6s.) suggests esoteric mysteries of the deepest dye, but Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick's book is in fact as simple, straightforward, and sincere a piece of work as any of the novels by, say, Mrs. Andrew Dean. The adventures of her heroine Celia are such as might befall any young lady of gentle training who happened on the world without worldly riches. Beauty of face and form and character win her the man she loves, and that is almost as pleasant, we suppose, as marrying a title and a palace. We do not remember to have read a book so thoroughly "nice" in the worst meaning of the word as "The Inner Shrine" for these many years, unless, indeed, it should be JENNY OF THE VILLA (Arnold, 6s.), by Mrs. C. H. Radford, but then in the latter there is a hint or two of méchanceté, and a good deal about social reform. Neither book will make the welkin ring, but both are agreeable, well written, the work of cultured women, who possibly know the world well, but do not care to say so.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein will shortly publish a "Descriptive Guide to the Best Fiction" by Ernest A. Baker, M.A., Librarian to the Midland Railway Institute, Derby. This is an annotated guide to the more noteworthy works of fiction in English, including translations from foreign languages; several thousand works receive separate notice. The books are arranged into classes according to the nationality of the authors, each class being divided into chronological periods, within which the order is alphabetical. The English novels of the last quarter of a century, for example, will be found altogether. To facilitate every kind of reference, there are two indexes, an author and title index and a subject index, the subject index giving references to all important topics dealt with. Historical novels are arranged chronologically by the periods treated of in an appendix. American fiction is fully dealt with and foreign literature is well represented. The notes are characterizations, stating briefly the subject, the intention, and the writer's method. Dates of first editions, biographical dates, and the full names of authors are given, with other useful details. Such a handbook as this has long been noted as a desideratum by public librarians; it is needed as a book of reference by such organizations as the Home Reading Union, and is intended to be of use to novel readers generally. There is practically nothing of the same kind in existence at present.

The Trustees of the British Museum are to be congratulated on having issued in pamphlet form the "Rules for Compiling the Catalogues in the Department of Printed Books." Every librarian ought to possess it. A study of the principles which underlie the catalogue at the Museum might well result in the improvement of smaller efforts, and further impress the public with the knowledge that there is both science and art in the making of good catalogues.

Busts of Charles Lamb and John Keats are to be placed in the Public Library at Edmonton. We referred to Lamb's connexion with the place when the old Bell Inn was sold last summer. He lived in Bay Cottage, Church-street, and died there in 1834. His body lies in the churchyard close by, and his sister is buried beside him. Keats, as a boy, also lived in Church-street, Edmonton—in his grandmother's house—and remained there from his fifteenth year, 1810, until he broke off his apprenticeship to the local surgeon, Hammond. Both writers were also connected with the adjoining parish of Enfield. Keats went to school there, and it was the master's son, Charles Cowden Clarke, who first encouraged him in his literary ambitions.

The late Mr. R. C. Christie, Chancellor of the diocese of Manchester, was a distinguished figure in the library world. The beautiful Christie Library which he presented to Owens College at a cost of £20,000 will probably become the home of his fine private library. This is rich in works on the Renaissance, editions of Horace and books from the Aldine Press. Mr. Christie's interest in the public library movement was great and constant. He was president of the Library Association in 1889, and his bibliographical attainments rendered him invaluable to the members. He leaves a permanent memorial in the buildings raised through his munificence and in the memory of many kindnesses which the world will not willingly let die.

The new London boroughs are already busily adjusting themselves to their libraries. At Wandsworth there are four libraries, and the proposal was made that there should be one librarian for the whole borough; but the Council after a lively discussion decided to adhere at present to the existing plan of having a librarian at each of the four libraries. The Finsbury Council wish to discourage betting. To this end they will only place one edition of the evening papers in the reading-room.

The London Government Bill creates a difficulty as to the Chelsea Branch Library at Kensal Town, which is part of the borough of Paddington. The Privy Council has settled that the maintenance of the institution shall fall on the Paddington Borough Council. We only hope that this will in time lead to the adoption of the Acts throughout the borough of Paddington.

From Carlisle we have a list of new books in the subscription department attached to the lending library. These supplementary book clubs appear to be in favour at many of the smaller public libraries. From Manchester comes an "Index to the Owen MSS. in the Reference Library." These MSS., consisting of eighty volumes, comprise materials for a most researchful history of Manchester and locality. The sections devoted to Monumental Inscriptions and Parish Registers are most important, but the whole collection is important for the catholicity of its contents. The list is compiled by Mr. Ernest Axon, Assistant Librarian. He has done his work well, and has written an excellent introduction. A bibliography of Sir Arthur Sullivan is a capital feature in the Quarterly Record of the Manchester libraries. There is also a classified list of additions to the libraries, and a useful index of authors of anonymous works.

Mr. Passmore Edwards has offered to Newton Abbot a public library as a memorial to his mother, who was a native of the town.

A striking example of the progress of Free Libraries in the United States is given by the State of New Jersey. Fifteen years ago a really free circulating library was hardly known. Now all the most important towns have taxed themselves for the support of free libraries, and, when all the arrangements are completed, involving the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, New Jersey will have seventy-seven libraries, mostly free. Their present circulation is 1,604,000 books a year, and it is anticipated that this will rise to 2,000,000. There are also forty-eight travelling libraries which circulate in thirty or forty cities. The oldest library in the State—that of Burlington City—comes down from colonial times, and its charter bears the seal of George II. Four years ago it was converted into a free library, supported by the municipality.

OBITUARY.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON.

Comparatively brief as was Dr. Creighton's tenure of the See of London he had not disappointed those who recognized in him the many and rare qualities which separate the great from the average Bishop. Much has justly been said of his ability and administrative power, of his tact, his sympathy, his breadth of view. Yet there can be no doubt that he will chiefly live in England's memory as an historian and as a man of letters of most diversified gifts. And this, we believe, is what he himself would have wished. The story has indeed been told that when discussing the question of writing one's own epitaph he said, "I only want this over me, 'He tried to write true history.'"

It is comparatively easy to win a name for fairness in historical studies of certain epochs; but when attention is chiefly given to that stirring period of change, the sixteenth century, so thick with theological rancour, it seems almost impossible for any one of strong personal convictions to pen anything worth reading without the display of prejudice. Dr. Creighton achieved this difficult task. All thinking men bear testimony to the soundness of his judgments and the fairness of his methods, whether in dealing with Cardinal Wolsey or Queen Elizabeth, in compiling an historical primer on the whole of the period, or treating in many volumes the great question of the Papacy during the first period of the Reformation struggle. Cardinal Manning, in reviewing one of Dr. Creighton's earlier works, said that, though dealing with an eminently controversial subject, there was hardly a single sentence or phrase with which any intelligent (Roman) Catholic need quarrel. One or more of his historical primers are, we believe, the handbooks in use at leading Nonconformist schools. The same power that made the Bishop so sympathetic a companion to men of opposite schools of thought enabled him to take a calm and intelligent grasp of an historic situation.

Both of our great Universities are much indebted to Dr. Creighton for being mainly instrumental in fostering a school of faithful and conscientious historians. Particularly was this the case with Cambridge from 1884 to 1891, during which period he was Professor of Ecclesiastical History. But in no way did he make his influence more felt than by the founding of the English Historical Review, which was under his active editorship from 1886 up to the time of his acceptance of the Bishopric of Peterborough. It invited the co-operation of all who loved historic truth and who were trying to find it, and brought together into more than paper juxtaposition such zealous labourers as Lord Acton, Professor Freeman, Professor Seeley, and Messrs. Gairdner, Cunningham, Elton, Rashdall, Simeon, and many others, who were all contributors to the first volume. In a prefatory note Dr. Creighton gave an excellent definition of what history should be, which yields a keynote to his own manner of treatment. History may, on the one side, be regarded as a record of public events; on the other, as a picture of the whole past, including all that has been wrought or thought by man. The Bishop could not find satisfaction in either of these views; the former was too narrow, and the latter too vague. In his opinion, it was best "to regard history as the record of human action, and of thought only in its direct influence upon action."

When the time comes for taking a general survey of the activity of this great mind, now (according to human judgment) so prematurely stilled, many of Dr. Creighton's brief papers, that attracted but little attention at the time, will be brought to light. He never undertook anything without giving it an undivided attention. He wasted no time in mere word-painting or in wearisome introduction. An instance occurs to us in connexion with the Visit of the Royal Archaeological Institute to Cambridge in the summer of 1892. The Bishop delivered the opening address in the historical section. The title of his paper was "The Fenland." It covered merely ten pages when printed. Yet in it he condensed the most vivid and accurate picture of that wilderness of water, marsh, and islands, which used to prevail throughout the district, that has probably ever been penned. He led his hearers back to the time when "Lincoln, Peterborough, and Cambridge had as good a right to be reckoned as seaside towns as has Lynn to-day." Then, in a wholly original way, he showed that policy, asceticism, and personal convenience had combined to make the Fenland the special home of monasticism, and sketched in a few masterly paragraphs the reasons that led to the selection of Cambridge as the site of a University. Possibly Dr. Creighton was at his best on the platform, with an intellectual audience before him, and his notes or manuscript ready at hand. Yet so excellent was his memory and so happy his gift of language that he was fully able to dispense with such aids when he had made a subject his own. He could rivet the attention of a highly trained audience whilst he poured forth the vivid tale of the life of Savonarola, or keep enthralled for over an hour a crowd of shoemakers and artisans at the Saturday "popular talks;" in Northampton Town-hall whilst he discussed St. Benedict and his monks—and all this without the aid of a single scrap of paper.

Dr. Creighton had presentiments on coming to London that the stress of work would prove too much for him. He recognized with regret that he could never complete his great "History of the Papacy"—began at the north country living for which he left his tutorial work at Merton, Oxford, continued during his tenure of the Cambridge Professorship and the Worcester Canonry, and not abandoned when he became Bishop of Peterborough. He kept making resolves to cut himself off absolutely for a time from literary effort, but his love of historic work and his desire to encourage it proved too much for him, and he was ever ready to yield to somewhat inconsiderate pressure. It was entirely through his agency and suggestion that the boroughs of Northampton and Leicester have published their records. For the former since he has been in London he wrote an able preface, and in the latter he took the keenest interest. Almost on the eve of his death he wrote, as we noticed last week, a preface for a biography of that great ornithologist, Lord Lilford, a foremost resident in his Peterborough diocese.

Indeed, continuously full as his life was of clerical work, he may yet as an historical writer almost be called prolific—helped, no doubt, by the never-failing encouragement and sympathy of his wife, herself a writer of distinction. When the Bishop was entertained a year or two ago as the guest of the evening at a literary club, the chairman remarked that after some time spent in refreshing his memory as to the publications catalogued under the name of Creighton, he had suddenly become aware that it was Mrs. Creighton's historical books and not the Bishop's that he had been studying. At Oxford, in 1875, Creighton published a Roman History Primer, which was followed in the next year by a Life of Simon de Montfort, the well-known little work on "The Age of Elizabeth" and "The Tudors of the Reformation"; the Cambridge period produced a "Life of Wolsey" and a "History of Carlisle"; and the Peterborough period (during which the Bishop was Rede Lecturer at Cambridge and Romanes Lecturer at Oxford) produced "Persecution and Tolerance," "The Early Renaissance in England," the "English National Character," and "Queen Elizabeth" in Messrs. Goupil's well-known series of illustrated quarto biographies of Royal personages. His latest book was "The Story of some English Shires." As an historical writer Dr. Creighton was more remarkable for weight, judgment, and a proper perspective than for any special grace of style, just as his preaching was marked by thought, shrewdness, and sincerity rather than by natural eloquence. But that he had the gift of popular and attractive exposition no one could doubt who heard him lecture on any of his favourite subjects.

It is a month short of a year since the Bishop of London delivered a memorable charge to his clergy of his diocese in St. Paul's Cathedral, a masterly utterance suitable to the stress of the times, which closed with this characteristic utterance:—"With the cry sounding in our ears, 'Arise, shine,' how can we waste time by disputing about the shape of our lanterns?" And if he was primarily a great historian, yet the very qualities which made him so—breadth of sympathy, balanced judgment, and wide culture—also made him a great Bishop.

Journalism has lost one of its notable members by the death of Mr. JOHN DAVIS-ALLEN, of the Imperial South Africa Association. It is true that he was best known as a persuasive public speaker. But he had an intimate knowledge, which he turned to good use in the Press, of South African affairs, and he was a ripe scholar who might have made his mark in many branches of learning.

One of the first authorities on International law has just passed away in M. ARTHUR DESJARDINS, the author of "Traité de Droit Commercial Maritime." Perhaps he was better known to the majority of English readers for his famous articles in the Revue des Deux Mondes on "The Hague Congress" and the "Transvaal War." The impartial view he took of the African question had great influence in France.

Correspondence.

"ERNULPHINE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Huxley's "Life and Letters" (i. 203), in reference to the clamour occasioned by the publication of "Man's Place in Nature," the following passage occurs:—

Personally, like the non-covine personages in the Ingoldsby legend, I did not feel one penny the worse. The book reached a wider public than I had ever hoped for, being largely helped, I imagine, by the Ernulphine advertisements to which I have referred.

And again he says (ii. 355), "may St. Ernulphus' curse descend on all influenza microbes."

As no explanation of this is given by the editor, some of your readers may perhaps be glad to be told what is referred to.

It is, of course, evident that the curse is of the same kind as that denounced in "The Jackdaw of Rheims," which had such remarkable effects on the covine personage. But Ingoldsby says nothing of Ernulphus. This name Huxley, no doubt, took from Tristram Shandy. There (part 3, ch. 10) Mr. Shandy reaches down "a form of excommunication of the Church of Rome, a copy of which my father had procured out of the ledger-book of the Church of Rochester, writ by Ernulphus, Bishop"; and a very pretty piece of cursing it is.

"The ledger-book of the Church of Rochester" is the book which is commonly known as the "Textus Roffensis," a compilation made by direction of Bishop Ernulph, early in the twelfth century, of documents which he supposed that it would be useful to the Church to preserve. Mr. Shandy says that he had "procured" a copy; but there is little doubt that Sterne copied the curse from Hearne's edition of the "Textus" (1720), a copy of which would probably be found in the Cathedral library at York.

Yours faithfully, S. CHEETHAM.

Precincts, Rochester, Jan. 15, 1901.

THE ABUSE OF THE POSSESSIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I had no intention of returning to this subject, when I came across the following passage, which is so apposite that it may prove interesting to your readers, and is so entirely in agreement with my own contention as to be gratifying to myself.

The passage occurs on page 58 of Vol. II., 2nd edition, of Henry Crabb Robinson's Diary, in a letter from S. T. Coleridge to Robinson, dated June, 1817:—

"Oh, Robinson! if I could, or if I dared, act and feel as Moore and his set do, what havoc could I not make amongst their crockery-ware! Why, there are not three lines together without some adulteration of common English, and the ever-recurring blunder of using the possessive case, 'compassion's tears, &c.,' for the preposition 'of'—a blunder of which I have found no instances earlier than Dryden's slovenly verses written for the trade. The rule is that the case 's' is always personal; either it marks a person, or a personification, or the belly of some proverbial personification, as 'who for their belly's sake' in 'Lycidas.'"

Striking as is the resemblance of these sentences to some of my own, I may say that I had never seen or heard of the letter till this very day.

Yours faithfully,

E. D. LITTLE.

MORE MAGAZINES.

The North American Review of January 15 is a notable number, the interest of which space forbids us to do more than indicate. Politicians will at once be attracted to the important article by Sir Robert Hart on China and her foreign trade, and to M. de Blowitz's "Past Events and Coming Problems," a study mainly of the position in France; while the position in England is discussed by the Duke of Argyll. Some interesting speculations on the newspaper of the future are given by Mr. Alfred Harmsworth, who thinks the power of journalism is declining and contemplates a great newspaper trust. And Mr. Howells—to mention one more item from an interesting list—discusses in a style full of his familiar personal hesitations and his dislike of a "plain answer to a plain question" the progress of American poetry.

The policy of the new Twentieth Century Magazine is to enlarge the print and shorten the articles. It has a long list of contents, largely political, leading off with an interesting paper on the Foreign Office, by Mr. E. H. Parker, and discussing elsewhere at length the future of Liberals and Unionists. It does not depend for success on names in the "contents" bill, but it is readable and very varied.

The Lady's Magazine is a new venture of Messrs. Pearson, of which the chief feature at present is the serial publication of Mr. Hall Caine's new novel, "The Eternal City." There is a good deal of other fiction in the first number; also an article on "Besieged in Kumassi," by Lady Hodgson, and "Hints from a Mother's Life," by the late Mrs. Gladstone. The other matter is of the familiar type.

The Argosy is much improved in print and appearance, and has some capital photographic illustrations. Moreover, its January number has much intelligent and well-selected matter of a kind not too familiar. For example, Lady Gregory's very interesting account of the Irish bard Raftery, a true poet of the people though little known to the literary critic. As a peasant said to Lady Gregory, "Many who go to America hear Raftery's songs sung out there." Mr. Augustus Hare writes on "St. Peter's at Rome," and there are pleasant articles on "An Indian Garden" and on "Pidgin English," besides a good deal of fiction.

The Architectural Review has a magnificent appearance which cannot but increase the public respect for architects. From a host of interesting articles we may select for mention Mr. A. E. Street's account of "The Architect in Fiction," Pecksniff, Paul Astier, of "L'Immortel," M. Anatole France's Quatrebarbe, Mr. Sturgis' architect in "John-a-Dreams," and "George Somerset," of "A Laodicean," are, so to say, stood in a row and inspected. The result of the inspection is that "the public, as represented by the writers who cater for it, declines to take architects at their own valuation." So far as our recollection goes, the only people who do get accepted at their own valuation in novels are novelists. The rest of us—from Cabinet Ministers to charwomen—can condole with the architects for the good reason that we suffer with them.

The School World publishes the gist of some inquiries as to the effect of the war on South African education. The number of schools closed by the end of 1899 was 215, and the number of scholars missing was 4,730, and, "as for the teachers, it would seem that the majority of them moved outside the fighting lines," with the result that they may reasonably hope to live to teach another day. Other articles are "Common Examination Errors," by H. T. Evans, and "The Teaching of English Literature," by A. T. Addis.

Other magazines, which it is impossible to notice this month, are:—The Reliquary, the Harnsworth Magazine, and the Public School Magazine.

The "Easter Art Annual"—the spring extra number of the Art Journal—will be devoted to "Sir John Tenniel, his Life and Work," by Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, with forty illustrations of Sir John's work.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Dr. Creighton published most of his works through Messrs. Longmans, though Messrs. Macmillan are the publishers of his early book, the little "History of Rome." His "Age of Elizabeth" belonged to Longmans' "Epochs of Modern History," and his "The Tudors and the Reformation" to their series of "Epochs of English History" which he edited, and for which he wrote "The Shilling History of England" as an introductory volume. In the same year he was editing their "Historical Biographies," which includes a life of Simon de Montfort by himself. Mrs. Creighton wrote several of the most successful volumes in these two series—"England: A Continental Power" in the "Epochs," and the volumes on the Black Prince, Sir Walter Raleigh, and the Duke of Marlborough in the "Historical Biographies." Mrs. Creighton also published with Messrs. Longmans her "First History of England," "First History of France," and "Stories from English History."

The six volumes of the Bishop's "History of the Papacy" were published by Longmans during the years 1882-04, and meantime he was bringing out his life of Cardinal Wolsey in Macmillan's half-crown series of English Statesmen and his volume on Carlisle (his birthplace) in Longmans' Historic Towns

Series. In 1895 the Cambridge University Press published his Rede Lecture on "The Early Renaissance in England," and in 1896 the Oxford University Press followed with his Romanes Lecture on "The English National Character." For Messrs. Longmans Dr. Creighton also edited the series of "Epochs of Church History" in fifteen volumes, and he was announced by the Cambridge University Press as one of the contributors to the forthcoming history of modern times, edited by Lord Acton.

For a long time past the French National Printing Establishment has been preparing a "History of Printing in France," and visitors to the Exhibition were able to see the first volume of this superb work. The book is in itself the perfection of French printing, and it gives the most complete and erudite account of the history of book-making in France which has ever yet seen the light. The first volume is now ready for delivery upon the following terms:—Japan paper edition, 250 francs; velin edition, 200 francs. Purchasers in ordering Volume I. must send, in addition, the price of Volume II. Volumes III., IV., and V. may be bought separately. Orders to be sent to Monsieur le Directeur de l'Imprimerie Nationale, Paris.

"Travail," M. Zola's new novel, the second in his present series of four, will shortly appear in book form; and his English admirers will also at once have ready for them Mr. Vizetelly's English version from Messrs. Chatto and Windus. Neither condemnation nor unwelcome amnesty has power to check M. Zola. So far as literary production goes, he is a prime authority on "Travail" and "Fécondité." Meanwhile the same publishers issue Mr. Vizetelly's rendering of "Germinal"—the novel that deals with the strike of the miners. In the view of many critics it is one of the best, though it has not been one of the most successful, of the "Rougon-Macquart" Series. The subject gave an opening to the "lyrical temperament" which so often breaks in upon M. Zola's realism.

Besides the biographies which Mr. Murray has in hand for the spring, which we have already mentioned he has "The Military Life of Field-Marshal George, 1st Marquess Townshend," who fought at Dettingen, Fontenoy, Culloden, and the capture of Quebec, and concluded the capitulation which gave Quebec to England. Townshend was also Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. His life has been written by Lieut.-Col. C. V. F. Townshend from documents preserved at Raynham, and gives much information hitherto unpublished. A more recent Lord Lieutenant of Ireland figures in the new list—the fourth Earl of Carnarvon, whose "Speeches and Correspondence on the Affairs of British North America" will be published by Mr. Murray in the spring. Lord Carnarvon brought forward his bill for confederating the British North American provinces nearly twenty years before he took his Irish appointment. The book is edited by the Hon. Sir Robert G. Herbert. Mr. Murray also announces "The Life and Correspondence of the Right Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers" (Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1883 and Home Secretary in 1886), by his son, Lieut.-Col. Spencer Childers, R.E., in two volumes, and "Recollections of the Old Foreign Office," by Sir Edward Hertslet, who was librarian and keeper of the archives at the Foreign Office until a few years ago.

"Inter Amicos," a correspondence between the late Dr. Martineau and Professor William Knight, chiefly on the doctrines of Unitarianism and the Trinity, is announced by Mr. Murray, who is also publishing a new volume of essays by Professor Knight, entitled "Varia: Studies on Problems Ethical and Philosophical." Mr. Murray's other announcements for the spring include:—"The Reformation: A Religious and Historical Sketch," by the Rev. J. A. Babington; "A Commentary on the Psalter: Devotional and Analytical," by the Rev. R. M. Benson, formerly head of the mission of St. John the Evangelist, Cowley; "The Orchestra and Orchestral Music," by W. J. Henderson, and "Song and Song Writers," by H. T. Finch. South Africa again plays a prominent part in Mr. Murray's list. Besides General Mackinnon's book on the C.I.V., and the account of the work of the Portland Hospital during the war, entitled "A Civilian War Hospital," he announces the official report of the South African Native Races Committee under the title of "The Natives of South Africa: Their Economic and Social Condition." The committee was formed in 1899, and the report enters fully into the liquor question and the present position of the labour question, land tenure, &c.

Messrs. Longmans announce a work called "Egypt and the Hinterland," by Mr. F. W. Fuller, containing a résumé of the political question and of the military operations down to the death of the Khalifa; a Coptic section; and the necessary indications for those who wish to visit Khartum by the Sudan military railway. They have also in hand a book by the Hon. Mrs. Oldfield containing some records of the later life of her grandmother, the Countess Granville.

Messrs. Putnam's new list will include "Episodes from 'The Winning of the West,' 1769-1897," by Vice-President Roosevelt; two books by Herman Melville—"Moby Dick; or, the White Whale" (with an introduction by Louis Becke), and "White Jacket; or, The World in a Man-of-War"; and "Visiting the Sin; a Tale of Mountain Life in Kentucky and Tennessee," by Emma Rayner, the author of "Free to Serve." One of the first books to be published by Messrs. Putnam will be a study of "The Method of Evolution," by Professor H. W. Conn, of the Wesleyan University, who in a former work, "Evolution of To-day," summarized the evidence for and against the general theory of organic evolution.

Mr. Standish O'Grady, author of "The Coming of Cuculain," "The Flight of the Eagle," and other Irish romances, has become a publisher as well as a newspaper proprietor in Kilkenny. He promises a series of works to be called "The Library of the Nore." The first volume has already been published in the form of a booklet by Mr. F. W. Rolleston, entitled "Imagination and Art in Gaelic Literature," and Mr. O'Grady announces two other works for immediate publication—a volume of poems by Mr. Paul Gregeen, a promising young Irish poet, whose verse has appeared chiefly in the All Ireland Review (Mr. O'Grady's own paper), and a collection of essays by "John Eglinton," whose "Two Essays on the Remnant," issued some years ago, attracted much attention. "John Eglinton" is the pseudonym of Mr. William Magee, an assistant in the National Library of Dublin.

Mr. John Long makes the following announcement, which would seem intended to be served with a pinch of salt:—

"The Master Sinner,"

By a Well-known Author.

Dedicated to all those inspired persons who quarrel among themselves whilst attempting to instruct the world by means of religious novels.

... This extraordinary work is by a clever writer whose identity is certain to be widely discussed by all readers of latter-day religious novels. In boldness, in originality, in strength, in deep feeling, in fervour, and occasionally in ghastly cynicism, it exhibits lineaments of surpassing and sustained power. ... Followers of all denominations and creeds will read the book with unalloyed interest, and there can be no doubt it will be much talked of.

The Publisher has printed a very large first edition, but the orders already received have necessitated his preparing another large edition.

As a result of the competition for the best essays on "The Sieges of Limerick and Derry," instituted last year by the Irish Literary Society of London, Mr. Henry Mangan, a clerk in the employment of the Dublin Corporation, has won the first prize of £50, and Mr. Hugh Law, a son of the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the second prize of £25. These prizes were offered by Mr. William Gibson, and the essays were adjudicated upon by Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, M.P., and Mr. Justice Mathew.

Messrs. J. M. Dent will publish shortly a new book by Mr. Leonard Courtney, entitled "The Working Constitution of the United Kingdom." It will cover the whole ground of Imperial, national, and local institutions.

Under the title "First on the Antarctic Continent" Mr. Borchgrevink, the commander of the recent Antarctic expedition, has now completed the account of his voyage in the Southern Cross. It will be published by Messrs. Newnes.

The first of Messrs. Newnes' "Our Neighbours" Series will be by Miss Hannah Lynch, and entitled "French Life in Town and Country."

"Memorials of Old Buckinghamshire" is being published by Messrs. Bemrose, under the editorship of Mr. P. H. Ditchfield.

The Cambridge University Press announce the fourth volume of the translation of the Pali Jakata or "Buddha Birth-stories," the last volume of which was published in 1897. The series is expected to fill six or seven volumes, but at present only five volumes of the Pali text (published by Messrs. Kegan Paul) have appeared. The fourth volume has been translated by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse.

An English translation has been arranged of Professor Pasquali Villari's history of "The Barbarian Invasion of Italy," the second volume of his Italian series of historical manuals. Mr. Fisher Unwin will be the English publisher, but the work will probably not be ready before the autumn. It will occupy two volumes, with maps and illustrations.

Messrs. Rivington announce for immediate publication "The Pilgrim's Path: a Book of Prayer for Busy People," with instructions and illustrations, compiled by the Rev. Frederick E. Mortimer, Rector of St. Mark's, Jersey City.

The Paris exhibits of the Oxford University Press have been transferred to Oxford, where they are to be exhibited in the Examination Schools.

Books to look out for at once.

- LITERATURE—
 "English Miscellany." Presented to Dr. Furnivall in honour of his 75th Birthday. Oxford Univ. Press. 21s.
 [Fifty contributions by English and foreign scholars. Edited by Professor W. P. Ker. With plates and portrait.]
 "The Paston Letters," 1422-1509. Ed. by J. Gardner. Constable. 10s. 6d. n. [Introduction and supplement to the reprint of the 1872-73 edition.]
 "Bret Harte, a Treatise and a Tribute." By T. E. Pemberton. Greening. 3s. 6d.
 ["English Writers of To-day." Portrait and bibliography.]
 "The Poet of Home Life." Centenary Memoirs of William Cowper. By A. J. Symington. Home Words Office. 3s. 6d.
THEOLOGY—
 "Two Lectures on the Gospels." By F. C. Burkett. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. n.
 "Sermons on Faith and Doctrine." By the late Benjamin Jowett. J. Murray. 7s. 6d.
 "Facsimiles of the Fragments Hitherto Recovered of the Book of Ecclesiasticus in Hebrew." Oxford and Camb. Univ. Press. 21s. net. [Sixty leaves, collotype.]
 "Christianity in the Apostolic Age." By G. F. Purves. Smith, Elder. 6s.
 "The Last Years of St. Paul." By the Abbé Constant Fouard. Translated by George F. X. Griffith. Longmans. 9s.
 [Maps and plans.]
 "Bread in the Wilderness." By the Rev. H. J. W. Buxton. Skeffington. 2s. 6d. [Twelve addresses to communicants.]
 "Scriptural and Catholic Truth; or, the Faith and Worship of the Primitive, the Medieval, and the Reformed Anglican Churches." By the Rev. F. Meyrick. Skeffington. 5s.
 "The Soul in Light." By Eleanor Tsee. Skeffington. 2s. 6d. ["A book for the recently bereaved and those who are afraid to die."] "Thoughts, Memories, and Meditations." Translated from the French by Constance White. Skeffington. 3s. 6d. [Devotional meditations from the diary of Madame Hoskier, who lost her life at the fire in the Charity Bazaar in Paris, May, 1897.]
HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY—
 "History of the People of the Netherlands." Part III. By Professor P. J. Blok. Putnam. 12s. 6d. [To be completed in five parts. Translated by Ruth Putnam.]
 "Welshmen: Their History, &c." By T. Stephens. Spriggs. 3s. net.
 "Life of Henry George." By Henry George, junior. W. Reeves. 7s. 6d.
POLITICS AND PHILOSOPHY—
 "A History of Political Parties in the United States." By James H. Hopkins. Putnam. 12s. 6d. [With a reprint of the several Party Platforms.]
 "A Sketch of the Development of Philosophic Thought." By L. Noire. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.
 "Greek Thinkers." Vol. I. By Professor T. Gomperz, Vienna University. J. Murray. 14s. net. [Translated by Laurie Magnus, M.A.]
CHINA—
 "China: Her History, Diplomacy, and Commerce." By E. H. Parker. J. Murray. 8s. net. [Nineteen Maps. The author was Consul-General in Corea, 1886-7; Consul-General in Kiung Chow, 1891; and in 1892-3 Adviser in Chinese Affairs to the Burma Government.]
 "China's Only Hope. An Appeal from her Greatest Viceroy." Oliphant. 3s. 6d. [An English translation of a book by Chang Chih Tung, said to have reached a circulation of a million copies in China.]
FICTION—
 "Amusement Only." By Richard Marsh. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
 "The Prettiness of Fools." By Edgar Hewitt. Greening. 6s.
 "The Aftertaste." By Compton Reade. Greening. 6s.
 "Trowen: A Welsh Tale of the Thirties." By R. M. Thomas. Unwin. 6s.
 "The Lost Land: A Tale of a Cromwellian Irish Town." By Julia M. Crotte. Unwin. 6s.
 "A Little Grey Sheep." By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. Hutchinson. 6s.
 "The Coming Waterloo." By Captain Cairnes. Constable. 6s.
SCIENTIFIC AND CLASSICAL—
 "Modern Astronomy." By Professor H. H. Turner. Constable. 6s. net.
 "The Method of Evolution." By H. W. Conn. Putnam. 7s. 6d.
 "Qualitative Chemical Analysis." By F. M. Perkin. Longmans. 3s. 6d.
 Oxford Classical Texts, published by the Oxford University Press:—
 "Thucydides." Tom. II. (Libri V.-VIII.). By H. Stuart Jones. 3s.
 "Cæsar." De Bello Civili. By R. L. A. Du Pontet. 2s. 6d., 3s., and 7s.
 "Ciceronis Orationes." Pro Milone, Cæsarianæ Philippicæ I.-XIV. By A. C. Clark. 2s. 6d. and 3s.
MEDICAL—
 "Contribution to the Study of Blood and Blood Pressure." By G. Oliver. H. K. Lewis. 7s. 6d.
 "Studies in Comparative Pathology." By W. Hutchinson. H. J. Glaisner. 12s. 6d. net.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 171. SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, 1901.

CONTENTS.

THE DEATH OF THE QUEEN	61, 62, 78
NOTES OF THE DAY	62, 63, 64, 65
PERSONAL VIEWS—"Decadent Metres—A Reply," by Charles Camp Tarelli	65
THE ART OF FENCE AND ITS LITERATURE.....	66
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	67
REVIEWS—
A History of Chinese Literature.....	68
Theology—
Christian Conference Essays—The Works of Bishop Butler— Lines of Defence of the Biblical Revelation—Pro Patria—The Social Teaching of the Lord's Prayer—Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans—Christ the Truth—Clue—The History of the Romeward Movement	69, 70, 71
Hans Memling	74
A Practical Guide to Garden Plants—Helena Faucit—Twelve Great Actors—Twelve Great Actresses—Woolings and Weddings in Many Climes—The Emperor Frederick—Morris Steiner—Arch- itects of English Literature—F. C. Tait—Adam Duncan—Daniel Defoe—E. Herber Evans, D.D.—Joshua Clarkson Harrison—Irene Petrie—From Suffolk Lsd to London Merchant, &c. ...	71, 72, 73, 74
Foes in Law—A Gentleman—The Clayborough Endeavourers— Deacon Bradbury—The Madness of David Baring—John Charity —A Scholar of his College—Love in Our Village—Parson Peter	75, 76
ART NOTES	75
THE QUARTERLIES	77
CORRESPONDENCE—"Robustious" (Mr. Sidney Lee)—Pecksniff and the Sirens—Robert Burton and Venus and Adonis—A Dictionary of Quotations	77
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for.....	78, 79
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	80

NOTES OF THE DAY.

For the nation and the Empire, for all English journals, however special their scope and their interests, one event this week overshadows the rest. We are looking back over the ceaseless march of national development during the past century, forward into the luminous haze which heralds the dawn of a new one; and at the moment of transition we have been watching, full of memories, the ebbing of a life which comprised in itself all that was noblest in England's past, all that was most full of hope for England's future. Sixty-four years of rich growth and virile energy in the world of action and the world of thought—scarcely a decade without its ringing note of life—in literature, in politics, in science, in philanthropy, in Imperial expansion; and through it all the one central figure whose name was sacred upon the lips of three generations—that of the great Queen who inspired alike the statesman, the warrior, the poet, and the historian; and who has lived to give England the opportunity of proving that personal worth is the foundation of its greatness, and that personal devotion to the great qualities of its Sovereign can still inform its public service.

Whatever else the rule of Queen Victoria may have done for the higher life of the nation, literature and art owe to her one debt of gratitude beside which all other obligations become insignificant. From the moment when, at her first Council, as recorded in the Greville Memoirs, "she bowed to the Lords, took her seat, and then read her Speech in a clear, distinct, and audible voice and without any appearance of fear or embarrassment," to the last sad days at Osborne, every action of the Queen has been marked by an absolute sincerity. She was always simply herself. It is the one virtue which is at the foundation of all that is excellent in letters, in art, and in life. Upon this woman, so conspicuously simple in her life, so pure and true in her emotions, so singlehearted in her motives, the eyes of a vast Empire have been concentrated for nearly three-quarters of a century. Who shall say what ideals such a spectacle has inspired, what incentives to honest work it has supplied, what insincerities it has swept away, what affectations it has put to shame!

Throughout her reign it is this quality which has marked her relations with her subjects, and it is this which has shone so brightly in her own writings and in the personal records of those who were admitted to her intimacy. Of the latter, two books at once occur to the mind as giving a picture of the Queen more touching at the moment than any other—Sir Theodore Martin's Life of the Prince Consort, and Lord Tennyson's Life of his father. We quote from the former a passage referring to the last illness of the Prince:—

The listlessness and the irritability so foreign to the Prince's nature, but so characteristic of his disease, continued; and at times his mind would wander. But when, later in the day, the Queen read "Peveril of the Peak" to him, he followed the story with interest, and by his occasional remarks showed that he did so. When her Majesty returned to him after dinner, she records with a touching simplicity, "He was so pleased to see me—stroked my face, and called me 'liebes Franchen' ('dear little wife') . . . Precious love! His tenderness to me this evening, when he held my hands and stroked my face, touched me so much—made me so grateful."

It was shortly after the Prince Consort's death that Tennyson had his first interview with the Queen. From the account of it and of his after relations with her given in his Life we get a singularly interesting picture of the Queen's personality, and also of her wide literary interests.

He said that she stood pale and statue-like before him, speaking in a quiet unutterably sad voice. "There was a kind of stately innocence about her." She said many kind things to him, such as "Next to the Bible, 'In Memoriam' is my comfort." She talked of the Prince, and of Hallam, and of Macaulay and of Goethe and of Schiller in connexion with him. "Madam," wrote Tennyson to her in a later year, "when I left your presence, those lines of our Shakespeare in his Henry V. came across my memory—

O hard condition! twin-born with greatness,

What infinite heart's ease must Kings neglect
That private men enjoy.

And, again, in the words of the Queen herself—

When I took leave of him I thanked him for his kindness, and said I needed it, for I had gone through much, and he said "You are so alone on that terrible height; it is terrible. I've only a year or two to live, but I shall be happy to do anything for you I can. Send for me whenever you like." I thanked him warmly.

It was the transparent simplicity of her nature which formed one, though not the only, merit of her Majesty's two series of "Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands." In sending a copy of the second series to Lord Tennyson she described herself as "a very humble and unpretending author." And, of the book, she said, "Its only merit is its simplicity and truth." Tennyson, a man equally free from any taint of hypocrisy, was able to take a less modest critical estimate of a book containing, as he said, "The lofty and tender sentiments and the hearty enjoyment of nature, expressed in pure English, which cannot fail to make a book interesting; apart from the special interest which must of necessity belong to this particular volume."

* * * *

The Queen's long life has been in a real sense one with the life of the nation, and we need not here trace again the literary features of the Victorian era. In another column will be found some particulars about the existing Lives of the Queen to which there will now naturally be given an increased popular attention. The long work, in which England has played so great a part, of civilizing the world, the slow growth of freedom and enlightenment, the nation's life broadening slowly down from precedent to precedent—over all the Queen has watched, and through it all has moved her guiding hand. For all who peruse the record of a life which reaches so far back into history, and sums up in its own vigorous and unfailing vitality the long course of national development, the verses (of which we quote two stanzas) written by the late Mr. Frederic W. H. Myers in celebration of the Queen's eightieth birthday fitly express the emotions such a story will evoke:—

To her whose patient eyes have seen
Man's knowledge wax thro' ebb and flow,
Till some have felt, those bars between,
Wind of the Spirit blow:
Tho' some, heart-worn with doubt and strife,
Would bid the doomful thunder fall,
Bind as with bands the cosmic life,
And dream the end of all:

Beyond, beyond their wisdom's bound
Thro' fairer realms the Queen shall roam,
Till soul with soul the Wife hath found
Her mystic wedded home:
While her long-rumoured glories stir
The blue tide's earth-engirdling wave,
With love, with life, her Prince and her
The All-Father shield and save!

There was a literary side to the career of the late Duc de Broglie. He was an admirable historical writer. Less than two years ago he gave us a delightful volume on Voltaire as diplomatist (Calmann Lévy). Besides contributing his excellent periodic articles to the Revue des Deux Mondes, he founded the Correspondant with Montalembert, the review in which he wrote a series of articles forming his first volume, "Histoire de l'Eglise Chrétienne et de l'Empire Romain au quatrième Siècle." In 1862 the Academy chose him to succeed Lacordaire. Later on he translated Leibnitz, wrote an essay entitled "La Souveraineté Pontificale et la Liberté," and, after 1885 his two well-known volumes "Le Secret du Roi" and "Marie Thérèse et Frédéric II." He discovered many fresh documents for this period in the archives of his chateau de Bernay. He was also an habitué of the great Paris collections, spending many hours of study amid the archives of the Foreign Office. He was the grandson of Madame de Staël and the great-grandson of Necker. The family de Broglie had been French, however, only since the latter half of the seventeenth century, having its origin at Chieri, in Piedmont. Classical serenity was the chief characteristic of his work.

The German theatre in London is doing admirable work, much too little appreciated. Its representation of Faust at the Comedy Theatre illustrated in a manner invaluable to students of German literature the true greatness of Goethe—viz., that he compels us to think; and he has, perhaps even in a higher degree than other great poets, that felicity of language which makes the most complicated thoughts clear and simple. The Faust story in any form makes a strong appeal to the thoughtful; so many of us unconsciously resemble him. No one can live, in the true sense of the word, solely by his intellect, and without a proper sense of what Carlyle so aptly calls the importance of one mortal to another. Faust dimly discerned this. He aimed at perfection; he would have all knowledge, natural and supernatural, all love; but his success did not satisfy him, for it did not imply sacrifice. When he freed himself from the tempter—that is, from his baser self—the riddle became clear. Man must earn his bread; he must work; he must, so to speak, reclaim the marshland and make it fit for habitation and cultivation; and that is the only road to happiness.

* * * *

This is scarcely the classical interpretation of the Faust story. But such are the thoughts that the admirable representation of Goethe's great poem-play lately given by the German actors in London impressed on the mind. It is really a reproach to English culture that so fine a performance should be played in London to so sparse an audience. No student of Faust could watch it without realizing that its chief literary charm lay in the unique combination of philosophic thought with natural feeling. This conviction was confirmed by Herr Nollet's rendering of the part of Faust. He declaimed his lines with rare taste and excellence, and made clear the marvellous simplicity of language in which Goethe clothes his deepest philosophy. Herr Nollet was better as the old Faust than as the young, perhaps because the weariness of the foiled seeker after truth is less usual on the stage than the impetuosity and tardy repentance of the young lover. Fräulein Marthe Elbrig (of Hamburg) was a charming Gretchen, simple and graceful in the early scenes and rising to tragic height in the last. The Mephisto of Herr Behrend carried out the ordinary stage traditions adequately, while the Marthe of that versatile actress Frau Josefine Dora left nothing to be desired.

* * * *

Faust has been followed by Sudermann's latest play, Johannisfeuer. It will not rank among the dramatist's greatest achievements. It lacks the stern philosophy of Die Ehre, the tragic clashing of wills in Heimat, or the poetry underlying Das Glück im Winkel; but it is, nevertheless, a wonderful presentment of the eternal conflict between happiness and duty. Whether Sudermann sees duty in the right perspective it is wiser perhaps not to discuss. The belief that it is better for two persons to be happy than for three to be wretched is a moral heresy that the dramatist does well to shun.

* * * *

The literary character of the play has already been fully discussed in these columns, and we may therefore confine ourselves to its stage aspects. The more often we see Sudermann's and Hauptmann's plays acted—and Londoners owe the committee of the German theatre a great debt of gratitude for giving us the opportunity of seeing them—the more we are impressed with the fine dramatic effect they attain without any of the usual theatrical devices. We forget we are looking at a play; everything seems as natural as the daily life around us; and this is the highest art, because it is art concealed. The dialogue, too, is strikingly simple and restrained, yet far more telling, and at the right moment more humorous, than the elaborated epigrams of our contemporary stage. The acting was good, especially that of Georg Worlitzsch as Vogelreuter. He realized the simplicity, obstinacy, and vanity of a man who, while he invariably means well and is always sure that he sees all there is to see, is blind to what is actually taking place under his eyes. It was good evidence of the artistic aspirations of the company that that most excellent actress, Josefine Dora, was content to play the thankless part of a drunken old gipsy woman who only appears on the stage for about five minutes—a part, nevertheless, which in less capable hands might easily have spoiled the whole. The next performance is of L. Treptow's Unsere Don Juans.

With our next number there will be an Educational Supplement containing articles on educational subjects by Mr. Francis Storr, Mr. A. H. Gilkes, and Mr. T. E. Page, and a Personal View by Mr. Frederick Wedmore on "Fiction and the Public."

Scarcely with surprise, though certainly with regret, we hear that Mr. Baring Gould has been ordered to take a prolonged rest. It is hard to conceive a more industrious and fertile literary career than his. His first book was published before he was of age; he is now within a week or so of his sixty-seventh birthday; and in the interval his pen can hardly have been a day idle. For nearly forty years scarcely one year has passed without at least one new book from his pen, while some years have produced two or three. Yet the mass of his work is not without considerable merit; in much of it the merit has been conspicuous. In fiction, in hagiology, and in what way be called romantic topography he has done excellent work. "Mehalah," "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," "The Lives of the Saints," and "Songs of the West" would alone satisfy many men's literary ambition; but each of these is but one sample of a well-filled class. We sincerely hope that Mr. Baring Gould will attend to his doctor's advice; yet it is hard to believe but that his holiday will result in the production of fresh volumes.

Every one knows the story about the Eton, Harrow, and Rugby boys, the lady and the chair. There have been one or two similar neat differentiations of Oxford and Cambridge, though the epigrammatist has not sharpened his wits on modern University characteristics so often as one might expect. A contemporary recalls the motto of the late Bishop of London that Oxford men went about the world as if it belonged to them, Cambridge men as if they did not care to whom it belonged. Another way of putting it less complimentary to the latter University was that of the lady who found that if an Oxford man was asked if he had been at Oxford, he said "Yes," in a tone of complacent reserve. If a Cambridge man was asked if he had been at Cambridge he always replied "Yes; why should you think that?"

Many will be interested to learn that a book on "Roman Catholicism as a Factor in European Politics," by Mr. F. C. Conybeare, is to be published by Messrs. Skeffington. To the learned, Mr. Conybeare is known as an erudite student of ecclesiastical history; to the wider public as the author of a trenchant volume on the Dreyfus case. Many readers of that volume looked for a sequel dealing with the subsequent history of the case and the trial at Rennes. But, as it now appears, Mr. Conybeare was attracted by the larger question of the whole relation of the Roman Church to modern politics. Mr. Conybeare has an almost fanatical dislike of the Jesuits, as we know from his book on the Dreyfus case, and there can be no doubt in which camp he will fight.

Two studies on Ruskin that appeared last week in Paris ought not to pass unnoticed. Thirty-six years ago M. Milsand's book, "L'Esthétique Anglaise," first drew the attention of any large body of Frenchmen to the author of "Modern Painters." Taine, in his "Notes sur l'Angleterre," seven years later, curtly dismissed his work:—"C'est l'Esthétique d'un homme du Nord spiritualiste et protestant." Then Guyau put Ruskin's ideas into two volumes of philosophy which appealed only to a special public. At times he even adopted his style. But the mass of cultivated readers in France were not familiar with Ruskin's name until M. Robert de la Sizeranne produced his "John Ruskin et la Religion de la Beauté." It has been translated into English, and since 1897 four editions have appeared in French. Ruskin was taken up by the reviews, and his ideas began to colour the prose of the younger French writers. M. de la Sizeranne's book was not, however, complete. And this is pointed out by M. Jaques Bardoux, whose "John Ruskin: Le Mouvement Idéaliste et Social dans la Littérature Anglaise au XIX. Siècle" has just been published by Calmann Lévy. M. de la Sizeranne made no attempt at an adequate analysis. There was room for M. Bardoux's work, as also for M. Brunhes' "Ruskin and the Bible," just published by MM. Perrin (3fr. 50c.). The detached point of view of the foreigner is always of interest, and instead of taking Ruskin as a high priest of beauty, these two more recent writers consider him as a "prophet astray," and not as an æsthete, but as a moralist. M. Brunhes writes as an accomplished psychologist of the modern school. His book is far removed in its steadiness and competence from the impressions of the mere literary essayist.

Mr. William Archer in the preface to the new edition of Ibsen's prose dramas confesses that his translations have erred "by laying too great stress on the colloquialism of the poet's [why 'poet's'?] dialogue," and he has revised it accordingly. For one thing, he is not going any more to give us "I'm," "you're," "he's," &c. "This," he says, "may seem a mechanical matter, but it is far from unimportant." Equally mechanical but equally important is the way of printing the dialogue. For some reason or other Ibsen's dialogue is always printed with the name of the speaker in the middle of the page, which impresses the reader with the idea of an oracular pronouncement to follow. If the plays were only printed like other peoples' plays the absurdities would be much less apparent. This is surely the apotheosis of the commonplace:—

ASTA.

Oh! Alfred, I hope you've never told Rita this?

ALLMERS.

Yes, I believe I did once tell her.

ASTA.

Oh! Alfred, how could you do that?

ALLMERS.

Well, you see—one tells one's wife everything—very nearly.

ASTA.

Yes, I suppose one does.

"Irish Literary Ideals" have so greatly changed during latter years that more interest than usual attaches to the volume of essays which, edited by Lady Gregory, is to be published shortly by the Unicorn Press under the above name. The writers are nearly all well-known Irish literary men, and include Mr. W. B. Yeats, Mr. Standish O'Grady, Dr. Hyde, Mr. George Moore, Mr. George Russell (the mystical poet who signs himself "A. E."), and Mr. Edward Martyn. Most of the contributions to the volume have already appeared in Irish papers and magazines. Though the tendency of all of them is in the direction of "the de-Anglicisation" of Ireland, the making of a more Irish Ireland (which does not necessarily mean anti-English in the political sense), the essays are far removed in spirit from the furious diatribes which until recently made up the sum of that literature which might be called propagandist Irish literature.

Among the Gaelic books which are to be published soon are two important items. Mr. Standish Hayes O'Grady, the editor of "Silva Gadelica," has been long engaged upon an edition of the great Irish historical tract known as "The Wars of Turlough," and intends to publish the text with a translation and notes in two volumes. Mr. Thomas O'Neill Russell, of Dublin, editor of several Irish books, is also preparing for immediate publication a modernized version of the old text which is known as "The Leinster Tribute." This remarkable work, describing the imposition of a tribute upon the men of Leinster by the High King of Ireland, is found in the famous manuscript (now in the Royal Irish Academy) called "The Book of Leinster," and has already been printed in its ancient form by Mr. O'Grady in his "Silva Gadelica." The object of Mr. Russell is to provide a new text by a modernization of the old spelling, &c. It will be ready in a week or two.

* * * *

M. Jules Barbier, who has just died at the age of seventy-six, was the most prolific and successful librettist of our time. He was the author, in co-operation with Michel Carré, of the librettos of the most famous operas and comic operas which French composers like Ambroise Thomas, Victor Massé, Charles Gounod, and Reyer have produced. Faust was his work, as also were Romeo et Juliette, Hamlet, the Reine de Saba, Mignon, Paul et Virginie. He received annually as author's rights never less than 30,000f. and sometimes as much as 100,000f. But by these successes he set little store. He was tormented by the desire to produce a great tragic play. To write for Sarah Bernhardt or for Mme. Bartet was his dream. His Lucie Desmoulins was his most serious effort to realize this ideal. It was an instant success with the public, but it was not Mme. Sarah who played it, nor yet Mme. Bartet. He also published several volumes of lyric verse. But for the association of penury with the term he might be called a sublime "hack."

* * * *

Victor Balaguer, the most celebrated among the Catalan poets, has just died at Madrid at the age of 77. He was one of the promoters of the Catalan Literary Renaissance and one of the organizers of the autonomist movement in Catalonia. This movement was at first confined to literary decentralization, but it soon became political, and its adherents separatists. He wrote several works. Among them are a "History of Catalonia and Aragon," a "History of the Troubadors," and numerous historical dramas and tragedies. Balaguer founded in Catalonia a Felibrige organization, modelled upon that of Mistral. He was Minister of Public Works in 1872 and Colonial Minister in 1886, and had been Vice-President of the Cortes and Governor of the Philippines.

* * * *

The serial "Eve Victorieuse," in the Revue de Paris, by Pierre de Coulevain, is, perhaps, the most powerful psychological study of the American society woman ever attempted by a French author. When his former work, "Noblesse Américaine," appeared, it was thought that the author was an American writing under a French pseudonym. An American could not give so faithful a study of his own compatriots. Pierre de Coulevain is essentially French, and has made a life-long study of the "âme Américaine"; the result of his study is the production of this novel. The heroine of the story, the victorious Eve, is a highly intellectual and refined woman, belonging to the best American society; and in the background we have portraits of an American savant, a fin-de-siècle society girl, a French aristocrat of the old school, and a young Italian nobleman and his mother in their magnificent old Roman palace.

* * * *

From America :—

"Methuen's Library of Standard Literature" now being published in London is also put before the American public as "Putnam's Library of Standard Literature." "The Early Poems of Lord Tennyson," edited by John Churton Collins, has been very popular.

There is a great demand in America for books on the South African War. Captain Mahan's "The War in South Africa," with a preface by Sir John Bourinot, Clerk to the Canadian House of Commons, has just been published by Mr. R. H. Russell, and Louis Creswicke's "South Africa and the Transvaal War" is now in course of publication by Messrs. Putnams. The volumes already published give a history of events up to the outbreak of war. The fifth and sixth volumes, which will be published in America in February and shortly afterwards in London, bring the history down to the present time. Both books will be of interest to Englishmen as the estimates of unprejudiced observers.

Another American book to be noted is "The Thirteen Colonies," by Helen A. Smith—the first attempt to trace their history in a comprehensive way, and likely to interest English families whose ancestors were among the founders of the thirteen colonies. Of the "History of the Scotch-Irish Families in America," by Charles A. Hanna, soon to be published, we have already given some account. A History of the Parish of Trinity Church, in New York, by the present Rector, Dr. Morgan Dix, is also a notable book coming from Messrs. Putnams, for this ancient endowment came into existence in May, 1697, with Dr. Henry Compton, the Bishop of London, as Rector, and its history for the past 200 years is an evidence of the vitality of the Anglican Church on a foreign soil. Trinity Corporation more nearly resembles the ancient Anglican endowments than any other ecclesiastical organization in America.

The Egyptian Exploration Fund are about to distribute among the principal American Universities 118 rare Egyptian papyri discovered in recent excavations.

A curious point has just been decided by the Court of Appeals at Chicago on the law of copyright. The American Book Company, who publish a large number of school books, found that another firm had acquired hundreds of thousands of second hand copies in various stages of preservation. These were trimmed up, the edges of the leaves cut, rebound, and sold, and the Court held that this was no invasion of copyright, provided that a notice was stamped on the cover that the book was a second hand copy. The Public Library of Chicago, U.S., had for December the largest output of books ever attained in that period in the United States. The issue for the month was 159,789 books for circulation among readers.

The alarm note of the day is the commercial competition of America. That enterprising country means to outsell us in still another industrial product—the book. This is the idea of a writer in "The World's Work," who says :—

We have as yet taken no thought of foreign bookselling . . . but we must soon do so. We sell to the English houses editions of American books, which they in turn sell to the colonies. It certainly will not be many years before we are seeking and finding foreign markets of our own, just as other American manufacturers are doing.

They have been much disturbed in America over the list of names which the New York University proposed to inscribe in their contemplated "Hall of Fame." No people will ever agree on its most famous men. The selection is a harmless pursuit for individuals. In the case of books and authors we are overdone with the annual invitations to the public to supply lists of their favourites. To those who are fond of the pastime we may commend the remarks of the Rochester (U.S.) Democrat and Chronicle, which reduces ad absurdum the "Hall of Fame" agitation. Any University, it remarks, can erect a Hall of Fame, or any private person can have a Hall of his own, if dissatisfied with existing erections, either "in his front or his back yard."

The selection of names to be honoured would afford pleasing and instructive occupation for the family during the long winter evenings. The Hall of Fame would make an attractive play-house for the children, and would serve excellently as a place of storage for the lawn-mower and other garden tools. Reflecting that an entirely competent Hall of Fame can be easily and economically instituted by merely inscribing, in chalk and the proper spirit, on the woodshed door the legend "Hall of Fame," we are tempted to assert, as to the Hall of Fame, boldly and without qualification, that "no family should be without it."

Meanwhile the New York University have fixed upon 29 distinguished Americans, and is going to select 21 more names in two years' time, and to complete the roll at a later date. It is preparing notices by well-known writers of each notability chosen, giving the reasons why the name is selected. They will be published in book form by Messrs. Putnams next month.

It was the fate of the late Mr. Frederic Myers, as it was that of Matthew Arnold, to devote powers fitted to accomplish much for literature to the often wearisome task of testing the knowledge of little boys in elementary schools. The Few and official world knew him as an inspector of schools. the Many. It is more regrettable and more significant that the wider public of to-day knew him almost solely as the secretary for the Society for Psychical Research. It is significant because it helps one to touch the real evil in modern culture. Seldom, we believe, has there been so widespread an interest in literature. Never before have the English classics been so widely read. Never has there been so large a body of readers who can enjoy much that is excellent in the productions of living writers. We would even go further and affirm that the general standard of criticism has never been so high. Yet, save in the select aristocracy of letters, a poet, a critic, and a prose essayist of the stamp of Mr. Myers has little honour. Such a state of things is due to the fact that literature has become democratic. The successful littérateur must be fertile, prolific, must have an insistent personality. Mr. Myers fell behind those who possessed these qualities. And though the general average of criticism is of sound quality, it comes in too great a volume and with too swift a rush to admit of nice distinctions. Real literary insight such as Mr. Myers showed in his Wordsworth, or in his Essays, has no time or opportunity to assert itself and achieve the place which is its due. But above all the public has lost its taste for distinguished, scholarly, and lucid English prose. Some there are who can still write melodious dignified English in which the art is unobtrusive, which leaves the reader conscious of the thought conveyed, but unconscious at the moment of the beauty of its expression—such writers, for instance (among others) as Mr. Frazer, Mr. Gosse, and (when he does not give us jottings from a notebook) Mr. Andrew Lang. The prose of the new fashion on the other hand must be "nervous"—the muscles always tense, the effort unconcealed; or it must be of the smart variety and "brightened up" by familiar slang and tags of quotations; or even in the hands of distinguished literary critics it may be clumsy and formless, and the public will never know the difference. Such writers as gathered round Mr. John Morley when he undertook to edit "The English Men of Letters" Series, or round Mr. Humphry Ward when he compiled "The English Poets," many of whom are happily still living, had before them a better ideal, and Frederic Myers was not the least distinguished of them. He was, of course, a poet himself, as he showed in his "St. Paul," published at the age of twenty-four, and in his later volume, "The Renewal of Youth," and his poetic gift he used to good purpose recently in some verses which we quote elsewhere. How high a standard he aimed at in the work of poetical criticism he showed in the letter appended to the "Life of Tennyson" on the need of a classical training "to judge the highest poetry aright." But it was the polished prose style of his criticisms which should, for its classic restraint as much as for its fine imagery, have placed him, had he been more prolific, among the dii majores of English writers. Thus we find him closing his fine Essay on Shelley with an application to the poet himself of a metaphor from his own poem:—

The hues of sunset also have for us their revelation. We look, and the conviction steals over us that such a spectacle can be no accident in the scheme of things; that the whole universe is tending to beauty; and that the apocalypse of that crimsoned heaven may be not the less authentic because it is so fugitive, not the less real because it comes to us in a fantasy wrought but of light and air. We have too little of that sort of writing, because there is so small an audience to which it can appeal.

Personal Views.

DECADENT METRES — A REPLY.

An irresponsible writer of personal views is at liberty to differ from all the world; and though he may hesitate to criticize the personal views of another writer, yet even this, perhaps, may be permitted to him. To me, at least, Mr. J. E. Patterson's views on "Decadent Metres" are too interesting and too provocative to be allowed to pass unchallenged. Whether there really is such a want of metrical variety in contemporary verse as Mr. Patterson complains of; whether our minor poets would really do better if they took themselves less seriously; or whether it is quite just to include Mr. Kipling among these minor bards, I will not stay to inquire. To be sure, Mr. Kipling does not write exclusively in iambics; and it has been held that excellence in poetry is not to be attained without seriousness. But what astonishes me in Mr. Patterson's article is the school to which he would send our poets to learn melody, the models which he exhibits for their imitation. "What," he asks, "of the 'Boat Song' in the Lady of the Lake?" Well, it is vigorous and spirited, as Scott's verse usually is, but—can a poet who writes like that teach us any secrets of beauty or melody? Does Mr. Patterson think "happy" a beautiful or appropriate epithet to apply to dew, or does he find in these lines the true dactylic rhythm? I can hardly believe it; and yet he seems to find "haunting melody and beauty" in Byron's "Song of Saul." Doubts of Byron's poetic greatness must be held secretly, for fear of Mr. Henley. But however great he may be, and whatever be the qualities which make him great, magic and loveliness of rhythm are not among them; and the poet who in metre shall take Byron for his model, without doubt he shall perish in æternum. As for Scott, let us hope the time is far distant when men will cease to delight in his bustling narrative, in his skill at catching the tone and movement of the old ballad poetry, in the spirit and gusto of his verse; but the gift of melody and the gift of metrical beauty were certainly not his.

Heaven send it happy dew,
Earth lend it sap anew—

But this is not the worst. "Of all the people under heaven's wide cope," Moore is to be the model for our youthful poets in the cultivation of the lilting anapaest. I do not wish to be inurbane, but it is difficult to keep from violence with a critic who can still admire the lyric genius of Moore. Moore's pathos I will not discuss; at that "let those who will, if any, weep." But "what melody he did have!" says Mr. Patterson. What melody indeed!

There was a time, falsest of women!

When Brafeni's good sword would have sought
That man, through a million of foemen,
Who dared but to doubt thee in thought.
While now—oh! degenerate daughter
Of Erin, how fall'n is thy fame!
And, through ages of bondage and slaughter,
Thy country shall bleed for thy shame.

There is melody! And again—

Oh! what was love made for, if 'tis not the same Through joy and through torments, through glory and shame?
I knew not, I ask not if guilt's in that heart,
I but know that I love thee, whatever thou art!

But this, perhaps, is hardly fair to Moore ; let us take him at his best.

Oh ! breathe not his name, let it sleep in the shade,
Where cold and unhonoured his relics are laid ;
Sad, silent, and dark, be the tears that we shed,
As the night-dew that falls on the grass o'er his head.

It would be hard to find in Moore anything better than that ; but if that were the best that could be done in anapaests, ought it to surprise Mr. Patterson that the anapaest has lost its vogue ?

But it is not the best. Mr. Patterson thinks that we shall never have another lyrist of Moore's kind. That we cannot tell ; but we may be certain that no lyrist of that kind will ever win such praise as Moore won in his day, for our ears have become habituated to a nobler and rarer music. Coleridge and Keats and Shelley brought back into English verse the fairy melodies and the spherul harmonies which the eighteenth century had forgotten, and which Byron and Moore never knew ; and these have been developed by later poets until the Moore-ish rhythm has come to affect us like the twanging of the Jew's-harp. How shall we delight in Moore who have heard such strains as this ?—

Maud with her exquisite face,
And wild voice pealing up to the sunny sky,
And feet like sunny gems on an English green,
Maud in the light of her youth and her grace,
Singing of death, and of honour that cannot die,
Till I well could weep for a time so sordid and mean,
And myself so languid and base.

Or as this ?—

What hadst thou to do being born,
Mother, when winds were at ease,
As a flower of the springtime of corn,
A flower of the foam of the seas ?
For bitter thou wast from thy birth,
Aphrodite, a mother of strife ;
For before thee some rest was on earth,
A little respite from tears,
A little pleasure of life.

I know not if Mr. Patterson would call these dactyls or anapaests ; I doubt if it is wise to apply any such terms to them. The laws of English metre cannot be accurately expressed in terms of classical prosody, and it was not by careful measurement of longs and shorts that Tennyson and Mr. Swinburne acquired their wonderful rhythm. A fine sensitiveness to the melodic value of words, an exquisite feeling for the subtle effects of movement, accent, and pause—there is the whole secret. It is a secret, perhaps, which cannot be communicated ; yet if it is to be learned it can only be by the study of those masters who possessed it ; if it is to be preserved and developed it can only be by constant practice on the lines which those masters have laid down. If our poets are really so poor in metrical resources as Mr. Patterson thinks, they will not enrich their art by borrowing from singers poorer than themselves, and such, I must repeat, Mr. Patterson's idols were. Scott, Matthew Arnold tells us, had the balladist's mind ; in verse he certainly had no more than the balladist's art. Byron had many gifts, but an ear for rhythm was not one of them. Moore's was a tongue that could not be silent ; his sentiment was hollow and false, his verse a monotonous jingle. While the world was listening to these writers, the main stream of English poetry was flowing in other channels. The calm intensity of Wordsworth, the golden phrase of Keats, the strange enchantments of Coleridge, the ethereal splendours of Shelley—these were the true riches of that time, and in the verse which enshrined them were all the possibilities of the future. These veritable Olympians have been worthily succeeded by the two great poets whom I have named, and if English poetry is to keep its high estate it must never be allowed to lose the suppleness and variety of rhythm which they have given it. We do not want poets who follow Tennyson like an echo, or who put on the mannerisms of Mr. Swinburne like a garment ; but still less do we want men who wilfully neglect the masters who have most to teach them, and set their thoughts a-dancing to the jiggling measures of Tom Moore. We do not know what the future will bring ; whether poetry will decline or disappear, or whether the spirit which bloweth where it listeth will produce new periods of fruitfulness. We do not know what forms of verse will be most in favour with our coming singers—whether the slower measures which Mr. Patterson calls iambic, or the rapid measures which he calls dactylic and anapaestic. It may be that new eras of experiment will arise, and that new forms will be added to our metrical stock. But at least let us hope and pray that English verse will never permanently lose the great and beautiful qualities which it possesses—its force and freedom of movement, its inexhaustible variety of cadence, its infinite richness and suggestiveness of sound.

CHARLES CAMP TARELLI.

THE ART OF FENCE AND ITS LITERATURE.*

The art of Fence has suffered for many years from the needless difficulty with which its science has been too often surrounded. The divorce between the theory and practice of swordsmanship has before now grown to exaggerated dimensions ; for as soon as men began to write about the sword at all they felt constrained to show off their knowledge with such encyclopædic completeness that the weapon itself became hopelessly involved in the meshes of interminable argument. At the present day it may be hardly fair to take the opinion of any average Englishman on a subject which ceased to interest all his compatriots, save a very few, as soon as duelling was chased across the Channel. Yet there are a select few, even now, in this country who appreciate the virtues of a Salle d'Armes, and they know even better the difficulty of persuading a novice that the art of Fence is worth his notice. Neither from the technicalities of text books nor from the superfluities of most professors has the newcomer been able to extract the gist of what he wants. So he has very naturally given the matter up in despair. But he has no further excuse now that Mr. Felix Clay has put into his hands the admirable conversations of the Baron de Bazancourt.

Originally delivered in a country house full of French sportsmen, these sparkling dialogues lose nothing of their wit in the excellent English of Mr. Clay's translation. They are interesting from two points of view especially—as the protest of commonsense against futility, and as the final modern development of a fatally fascinating art. That development has been slow indeed. We need but turn to pages so well-known as Romeo and Juliet to see how different is the use of the point-to-day from the old cut and thrust of the Elizabethan rapier. Quite early in the play we read of Tybalt's sword, which " He swung about his head, and cut the winds." A little further on and Mercutio expresses the very same revolt against " the schoolmen of the sword " as does reforming Bazancourt. " O, he's the courageous captain of compliments. He fights as you sing prick-song, keeps time, distance, and proportion : rests me his minim rest, one, two, and the third in your bosom ; the very butcher of a silk button, a duellist, a duellist ; a gentleman of the very first house, of the first and second cause : ah, the immortal passado ! the punto reverso ! the hai !” The phrases ring with scorn of so much detail, and one of them is curiously reproduced in that “Paradoxe of Defence,” disinterred from too long oblivion by Mr. Egerton Castle, which was first published in 1599 and has this year been reprinted by Captain Matthey. “Signor Rocco,” writes old George Silver, describing his friend Mr. Austen Bagger’s high disdain of such new-fangled foreign fancies, “thou that art thought to be the onely cunning man in the world with thy weapon, thou that takest upon thee to hit anie Englishman with a thrust upon anie button. . . come out of thy house, if thou dare for thy life. I am come to fight with thee.” The learned Italian did come out, was promptly tripped up, stamped upon, and, after every rule of accurate fencing had been violated, was permitted by the valiant Bagger to depart, an act of “good nature” which the English author heartily applauds. This may sound exaggerated, but it is a true picture of the feeling that has always been prevalent in this country against intricate instructions in so simple a matter as a thing of life and death.

* "Secrets of the Sword." Translated from the original French of the Baron de Bazancourt by C. F. Clay, with illustrations by F. A. Townsend. George Bell.

But the complications of the bookmen went on all through the duelling period. You may see it in all those comedies of “Spada e Cappa,” which Lope de Vega was writing at the time. While every roysterer was “as full of quarrels as an egg is full of meat,” and was ready to fall out with one man “for coughing in the street,” and “with another for tying his new shoes with an old riband,” the use of the sword was really far less fatal and effective than it is in days when the duel does not exist at all in England, and is comparatively rare even on the Continent. Baron de Bazancourt’s pages are a complete explanation of the paradox. His work was not originally published till 1862. It was the first treatise which considered every fencing lesson from the point of view of the actual duel, and made recommendations to the fencer which would be of real service to the duellist. “No more dancing-master posturings ! Away with complicated feints ! Imagine yourself stripped to the waist, defending your whole frame, from top to toe, against your enemy, and eager to slip your point neatly into him. This is no child’s play either of graceful convention or of applied mathematics. You have to hit your man somewhere, or you will be hit. Think of that first, and think of it all the time. A pair of parries and about three simple thrusts are all you need, if you will use your legs and make a swift wrist work at perfect service with your eye. Never get flurried. Watch your man. Forget all rules save that your left hand must never touch your enemy’s blade. This is as much a strife of will and character against character and will as of one sword’s point against another. If you are as good a man as he is, you can run him through.” These are not the Baron’s words, but they fairly convey the meaning of his book, and it was rather startling doctrine to the student of his day. Like all reformers, M. de Bazancourt is a trifle iconoclastic now and then. He recommends the “assault” too frequently, and, above all, too early. But he knows the heart of the matter, and he is as nimble with his pen as with his sword. Both Mr. Clay and Mr. Townsend are to be congratulated on their successful association with so brilliant a performer. These lively little pictures are accurate yet not pedantic ; full of movement yet without a technical mistake. They are fit companions of a sound translation.

THE DRAMA.

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.—MACKLIN’S SHYLOCK.

In essaying The Merchant of Venice the Benson company seem to me to have bitten off a little more than they can chew. To say, as must be said, that Mr. Benson’s Shylock is painstaking is, of course, to say that it is not Shylock. That he has the right conception of the part as we now understand it—a reservation of some importance to which I will return in a moment—I do not doubt. He sees that Sir Henry Irving’s Shylock is of a too colossal majesty, the feat, to speak colloquially, of putting a quart into a pint pot. He sees that Shylock is rather the fox on the scent and trapped than the lion on the prowl and at bay. He sees, no doubt, all sorts of things ; but, once again one must insist on the point, clear vision is not enough for an actor, the chief part of his business is adequate expression. Mr. Benson’s physical means, particularly his voice, are not on this occasion quite adequate. His Shylock is undoubtedly interesting—Mr. Benson in all his parts contrives to interest the spectator—but it interested me as much by what it left out as by what it exhibited. Nor was Miss Calhoun’s Portia, intelligent, persuasive, womanly as it was, quite the Portia of one’s dreams. It lacked authority, it was not sufficiently grande dame. The Antonio was unnecessarily, and the Gratiano absurdly, heavy. A heavy Antonio may be excused as merely an over-emphasis, but a heavy Gratiano is a counter-sense. But there was Mr. Weir, as usual, to make amends. The comic sententiousness of his Launcelot Gobbo was the very thing.

And now for a brief excursus on Shylock. Noticing the performance in a daily newspaper I referred parenthetically, and without explanation, to the “comic Shylock” of Macklin. The unexpected adjective “comic” seems to have puzzled a matter-of-fact reader, who has read, like the rest of us, that Macklin was famous in his time for his restoration of Shylock as a serious personage. That is true ; nevertheless, I think my epithet is not necessarily untrue. Shylock is a notable illustration of what (in an opuscle so little likely to have caught the attention of the general reader that I shall make no apology for quoting from it here) I have called, after Alfred Allmers, the “law of change.” In Shylock, as we all know, Shakespeare touched up an older, and coarser, stage-figure, promoting a low-comedy character to semi-tragic honours. Now, “in a ‘mixed,’ or tragi-comic, character, a blend of the serious and the grotesque,” I said, “it is the serious element which waxes in process of time, while the comic element wanes. The reason is that our forefathers were more thick-skinned and brutal than ourselves, nearer the child, who even to-day will laugh at a humpback or the village idiot. Sheer ugliness, for instance, revolts us ; it merely amused the Greeks, and Aristotle classified the ridiculous (τὸ γελοῖον) as a species of turpitude. Even Cicero thought that bodily deformity was ‘satis bella materies ad jocandum.’ The Elizabethans laughed, and were intended to laugh, at the madness of Hamlet, the despairing rage of Shylock, and the helpless contortions of Caliban. Molière’s patrons laughed, and were intended to laugh, at the venomous malice of Tartuffe, the stiff unworldliness of Alceste and the atrocious sufferings of George Dandin. Nowadays these characters have all undergone the ‘law of change,’ and we ask in wonder how our ancestors could have had the heart to find them ‘comic.’ The general rule, then, is that when a character (or a scene, or a play) is compounded of two colours, tragic and comic, it is the comic colour which fades and the tragic colour which remains ‘fast.’” But there is another reason for this rule besides the gradual change in the public idea of the ridiculous. It is this—that leading actors, in playing tragi-comic characters, inevitably tend to emphasize the graver elements of their part. It comports better with their own dignity. A leading actor, which is only another name to-day for an acting-manager, is ex hypothesi a man of commanding temperament ; he does not choose, literally, to make a fool of himself. Hence the courtly elegance and Machiavellian profundity of Febvre’s Tartuffe—Tartuffe whom Molière designed as a low, unmannerly rascal. The same process is very noticeable in all Sir Henry’s impersonations—his Shylock, his Malvolio, and even his Macaire.

This second reason could not have operated in the case of Macklin, who was essentially a low-comedian. Apart from his Shylock, his great successes were in the low comedy of Scrub and Sir Pertinax ; when he tried sheer tragedy (e.g., Richard III.) he lamentably failed. While there can be no doubt (I refer readers to Mr. E. A. Parry’s careful little Life of Macklin, 1891) that his Shylock seriously impressed his contemporaries, I suspect the effect of this performance to have been over-estimated. Macklin described it to his biographer Cooke when he was a very old man, with his memory, but not his vanity, almost extinct ; and Cooke was by no means a trustworthy reporter. There is, to be sure, some external evidence. Macklin's Shylock is said to have frightened George II. ; but many things, I fancy, frightened George II. which would by no means excite our terror to-day. And there is the famous doggerel attributed to Pope :—

This is the Jew
That Shakespeare drew.

But that doggerel has been generally misunderstood. It was not so much an opinion on Macklin's acting as the record of a simple fact, the fact that Macklin (in 1741) restored Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice to a stage which had been occupied ever since 1701 by Lord Lansdowne's perversion The Jew of Venice. Lord Lansdowne had made Shylock a mere buffoon, so that Downes, the prompter of the Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre, could write of Doggett as "the only Comick original now extant ; witness Solon, Nikin, the Jew of Venice," &c. By comparison with such a version, any performance of Shakespeare's Shylock must of course have appeared serious. But I still hold the opinion that the Shylock of the low comedian Macklin, however serious it may have seemed to an age used to Doggett, would appear comic to an age used to Sir Henry Irving. Macklin brandished the scales and knife like a butcher. In Zoffany's picture his face is grotesque. He must have been in short a fee-faw-fum Shylock. And to-day the fee-faw-fum is a species of the comic.

Perhaps I ought not to have used the adjective without explanation ; it was puzzling to the plain man. But does not the daily Press carry the cult of the plain man a little far ? To give him a tweak, to fright him from his propriety by an unexpected adjective, is a temptation not always to be resisted. It got the better of me, I own, on this occasion. A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

CHINESE LITERATURE.

A HISTORY OF CHINESE LITERATURE. By HERBERT A. GILES, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Chinese in the University of Cambridge and late H. B. M. Consul at Ningpo. (Heinemann. 6s.).

Mr. Herbert Giles tells us in his Preface to this volume, which forms part of Mr. Edmund Gosse's series of "Short Histories of the Literatures of the World," that it "is the first attempt made in any language, including Chinese, to produce a history of Chinese literature." We may begin our remarks on this book by complimenting Mr. Giles on the courage which inspired him to write it, and also on the high degree of success that he has attained in making his theme both interesting and instructive. Failure to attract the sympathies of the English reader or to elucidate an intricate subject would have been pardonable in an enthusiastic sinologue naturally predisposed by his own studies to place an undue value on the sophistries of Chinese writers. Such a failure cannot be charged upon this work, which gives, with complete success from every point of view, a remarkable survey of Chinese literature from the beginning of its history down to the present time.

Mr. Giles confines himself to a brief description of pre-Confucian literature, although it includes the Five Classics, the fifth of which—viz., the Chun Chin or Spring and Autumn Annals—was contemporary with and probably in part the production of Confucius. The second group of works in Chinese literature is represented by the Four Books, which include the grand teaching of Confucius and practically all we know of the great exponent of the doctrine of neighbourly love and duty, and also the sayings of that second national prophet and philosopher Mencius. The study of the Four Books is judged the necessary precursor among Chinese scholars to that of the Five Classics, and it may be affirmed that most of them are content to take their views of the earlier literature through the light reflected on it in the Analects and in Mencius. The preservation of all the early Chinese literature must be considered most fortunate, because in the year 213 B.C. the great Emperor, who founded the Tsin dynasty and built the Great Wall of China, caused all the books on which he could lay his hands to be burnt. There is no doubt that much of the ancient literature, written on bamboo tablets with a style, was then permanently destroyed ; but by the devotion of students all over the country enough was preserved to enable the texts of the various works cited to be pieced together and restored. Some of these books were not discovered for several centuries, and it is recorded, for instance, that the "Book of History," one of the Five Classics, was found by Kung-An-kuo, twelfth in descent from Confucius, when pulling down the old house of his ancestor.

The burning of the books probably stimulated inventors to make improvements in writing materials. The clumsy bamboo tablets and style were discarded, and Moung-Tien, the great general of the Hans, who succeeded the Tsins as rulers, is credited with having invented the camel's hair brush which is still in use to-day. At first strips of cloth or silk were used to receive the written character, and brickdust and water did duty as ink. The invention of paper in the first century of our era gave an immense impetus to literary activity, at the same time that it was conducive to the easier preservation of the national literature. Mr. Giles remarks incidentally that any changes in the written character were due to the modifications necessitated by the changes in the materials employed. A final stage in the development of the mechanical agencies at the disposal of writers was reached with the invention of printing from wooden blocks in the tenth century. The Chinese Caxton was an individual named Fêng Tao. Fêng Tao, says our author, presented himself at Court, saying that "he had no home, no money, and very little brains, a statement which appears to have appealed forcibly to the Tartar Monarch, who at once appointed him grand tutor to the heir-apparent." A Chinese reader would see in this emphatic repudiation of capacity the possession of superlative merit. The only work of his that will be remembered is his introduction of wooden block printing, which became general under the Sung dynasty. Some Chinese commentators declare that printing had been introduced before Fêng Tao, and it seems to be as difficult to say positively who was the very first printer in China as it is in Europe.

Leaving aside the ancient writers of whom Mencius may be termed the last, the golden periods of Chinese literature occurred under the Han, Tang, and Sung dynasties. Ssu-ma Chien, called the father of History, illustrated the first-named ; Li Po, "China's greatest poet," the second ; and Ssu-ma Kuang, the author of the "Mirror of History," the third. The passage translated from Ssu-ma Chien's history of the rise of the Hans will scarcely compare favourably with one from Herodotus or Thucydides, but it contains a description of a tragedy that has never been surpassed in connexion with the burial of the First Emperor—that is to say, Tsin Che Hwangti, who built the Wall. After explaining how his tomb was prepared during his lifetime by tunnelling under a mountain, the historian goes on to say that his successor compelled those of his widows who were childless to perish with him, and then, on some one suggesting that the workmen employed in preparing the grave would let out the secret as to the treasure hidden in it, he caused the outside gate at the entrance to the mausoleum to be secretly closed after the burial ceremony, so that not one of the workmen escaped. Of Li Po's poetry Mr. Giles gives several specimens. He was a Chinese Anacreon, who met his death in his cups by falling out of a boat while trying to embrace the moon's reflection. This was not very surprising on the part of one who wrote :—

What is life after all but a dream ?
And why should such pother be made ?
Better far to be tipsy, I deem,
And doze all day long in the shade. . . .
Overpower'd with the beautiful sight,
Another full goblet I pour,
And would sing till the moon rises bright—
But soon I'm as drunk as before.

Another poet of the seventeenth century conceived the original idea of composing a farewell poem while seated in his coffin, and probably no similar instance could be found in history, more especially as he lay down and died when he had finished his composition. It may not be equal to Hadrian's prayer, but the poem was not without merit :—

An eternal home awaits me, shall I hesitate to go ?
 Or struggle for a few more hours of fleeting life below ?
 A home wherein the clash of arms
 I can never hear again !
 And shall I strive to linger in this thorny world of pain ?
 The breeze will soon blow cool o'er me,
 and the bright moon shine o'erhead.
 When blended with the gems of earth
 I lie in my last bed.
 My pen and ink shall go with me
 inside my funeral hearse,
 So that if I've leisure " over there "
 I may soothe my soul with verse.

We have left ourselves no space to deal with novels, plays, proverbs, and other branches of literature, on all of which Mr. Giles throws the light of his erudition and playful fancy. The author does not attempt to establish any comparison between Chinese literature of the nineteenth century and earlier ages, or to say whether the standard of literary excellence has declined. But when we remember the ideals that the Chinese literary classes place before themselves, and that their test of excellence is approximation to the style and sense of the ancient sages, it is not difficult to come to the conclusion that literature in China, like everything else there, has for centuries been moving in a vicious circle. The Chinese are unquestionably a lettered people ; they possess a great love of nature, and they have a keen sense of humour, and the sound of their language is sufficiently euphonious to make it triumph over the cumbersome written character, which demands in the literary man as much excellence in calligraphy as in style. But they long ago reached the summit of attainable excellence. Their great writers were in the past, and most of them in the remote past. The conditions under which he labours preclude the possibility of any modern writer surpassing them, or even of his attempting any original work. Mr. Giles has undoubtedly conferred an immense service on those who are in any way interested in the affairs of China by showing that she possesses an ancient literature of which any people might be proud, and which entitles her to a place among cultured races that recent occurrences have done something to obscure.

THEOLOGY.

LIBERAL THEOLOGY.

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE ESSAYS. Edited by A. G. B. ATKINSON, M.A. With an Introduction by the Right Rev. The BISHOP OF HEREFORD. (Black. 5s. n.)

It is a pity that the value of this remarkably cheap book is hidden behind a defective title-page ; the Bishop of Hereford contributes the slightest of papers—and his name ; Mr. Atkinson has only to describe in a short preface the Christian Conference (of which he is now joint secretary) and to make "superabundance" a plural noun. The real importance of the book lies in the contributors whose names are hidden away in the table of contents. They are all men of some eminence, they include members of very different religious bodies, though most of them are Anglicans, and they are united by a common desire to simplify Christianity in the light of modern thought. The key-note of the book is struck by Professor Auguste Sabatier—the one member of the band who can be described as a great theologian—and the book is worth buying if only for the sake of his long article on "Christian Dogma and the Christian Life."

The rest may almost be described as a commentary on M. Sabatier's text.

The danger that confronts Christianity is, he says, the drying up of its inner life through a divorce between science and conscience, between thought and action. The one hope is that Christians of all sorts should unite to free the faith from the swaddling-clothes of an extinct formalism, should in fact believe in inspiration with something of the living faith of the first Christians. Round this idea all the other writers are rallied. The Unitarian Dr. Brooke-Herford, for instance, complains that, while the iron methods of the Roman Church have made Christian thinking impossible for its clergy, the Reformers have equally failed to bring us back to the Christianity of Christ, because they were content to go but a little way behind the Medieval schoolmen, and on the rigid orthodoxy which they borrowed from St. Augustine orthodox Protestantism has been content to rest. All over Christendom the various Churches are content to proclaim dogmas which once were living symbols but are now mere formal utterances, with the result that multitudes of Christian-minded thoughtful men find themselves separated from that religion with which they are essentially agreed. It is, however, in the Church of England that many of the writers find their hope, Mr. F. R. Statham even including the Oxford movement, as a legitimate development in that Church and as tending now to greater intellectual freedom ; indeed it might have been further pointed out that the insistence on the practical, devotional, and administrative sides of Christianity gives the best opportunity for the quiet readjustment of intellectual problems without loss of spiritual vitality. That is one view of liberal Anglicanism—as a strongly corporate religion, freed from Tractarian exclusiveness, and tending to be satisfied with practical rather than theoretical conformity. An article on this side of the problem would have materially broadened the basis of the "Christian Conference."

The view which does find a place is that of Dean Fremantle, whose mission it is to hand on Dr. Arnold's theory of the Church as the nation in its religious aspect. The great value of this theory is, as Dr. Arnold's greater son so often insisted, that an establishment fosters freedom of thought by protecting the liberal theologian against the repressive tendencies of ecclesiasticism. Keep us the establishment, is in effect the cry of more than one of the "Christian Conference" writers, or we shall be turned out of the Church. It is indeed remarkable that even in the narrowest of Churches, that of Russia, the fact that it is established preserved the iconoclastic Tolstoy from excommunication till only last year. But it is when Dean Fremantle would extend the principle until the Church is eviscerated so as to include everybody in the nation, until it becomes only the nation under another name, and Judges and mayors are recognized as Bishops because they "are presiding agents of a system of Christian righteousness"—it is then that we realize why Dr. Arnold's theory has not commended itself to practical men. Dr. Fremantle's essay is one of the best in the book. Many will agree with his desire to free the English Church from the "black-letter" theology of the Thirty-nine Articles, and of the Athanasian Creed, at least in its present form ; but all the same there is more practical hope in Canon Barnett's judicial estimate of the advantages and disadvantages of Nationalism, which leads him to the conclusion that the people should be given more control over their Church and their ministers ; more hope, too, in the marked drawing together of Churchmen and Nonconformists which Mr. R. E. Bartlett estimates, pointing to the large possibilities of future progress that are opened out thereby.

But everything centres round the intellectual and spiritual position which M. Sabatier sketches with so masterly a hand. The nineteenth century, he says, has been the age which discovered history, not in the history-schools alone, but in evolutionary science, and in theology—it all comes to that. The Jehovah of early Jewish literature, of Genesis and the Book of Joshua, has disappeared from theology. "But," he asks, "do you really regret him ? Was not your conscience uneasy when you read of such violence and trickery attributed to the God whom you adored?" Of the New Testament again, he says, "Compare what we lose with what we gain"; we lose a collection of classic texts, of dicta probantia; we gain a living voice, as pre-eminently in St. Paul, whom now at last we can understand. And if we lose the old dogmatic forms, it is not Christianity that we lose but Christianity cast in the mould of Greek thought and language—"the philosophy of Aristotle and Plato, of the Stoics and Neo-Platonists of the decadence." For dogmas are symbols and not mathematical truths, and if we "render traditional dogmas really useful by renewing their interpretation," we are but following the example of Christ who dealt in the same way with the law and the prophets. Such in brief is the position of M. Auguste Sabatier.

Bishop Butler.

THE WORKS OF BISHOP BUTLER, edited by J. H. BERNARD, D.D. (2 vols., Macmillan, 15s.), is, on the whole, the most satisfactory edition of Butler's works that has hitherto appeared. It is scholarly, careful, and complete; it is attractively printed, in volumes of convenient size and shape; and it is further commended by the "Introduction" to the series of which it forms part, contributed by the late Bishop of London. The particular selection of works embraced in the "English Theological Library" may be open to criticism; but the general design is commendable. The Bishop of London remarks justly that "It is better to read one great book than a series of little books. It is better to seek for the truth where its issues were most seriously felt than to rest content with tabulated arguments in its favour. Theological students will profit by contact with great minds. . . . They would gain in power to face the problems of our own time if they were better acquainted with the great heritage of the past, and were animated by the same spirit as their predecessors, whose lot was cast in no less difficult days." The work of an editor could scarcely be better done than it is in the present case. In an "Introduction," appreciative but discriminating, Dr. Bernard points out the change which has come over our conceptions of miracle and prophecy since the days of Butler. In language which recalls a notable lecture of Dean Church's, he describes the "dominant principle which governs Butler's thinking . . . the principle of the greatness of God and the littleness of man." We regret, indeed, that Dr. Bernard should have limited so strictly the scope of his introduction. A fuller treatment of Butler's character and intellectual standpoint would have been valuable. In the lecture above mentioned Dean Church dwells on the "singular seriousness" of Butler, his sense of the awful greatness of the universe, and "the enthusiasm which lies under the language of reserve." Dr. Bernard's introduction would have been improved by a similar "appreciation" of Butler. It would have added a touch of human interest to the "Sermons" and the "Analogy." With this reservation we admire the editor's judgment and tact. The notes are excellent, especially the appended notes (e.g., on the doctrine of probability, the immateriality of the soul, the function of motive in the formation of habits, &c.). They give real and necessary assistance to a modern student of the "Analogy." A fuller note on Butler's "too narrow" definition of prophecy might have been desirable. The "argument from prophecy" needs to be restated in its modern form, and Butler's famous sentence, "Prophecy is nothing but the history of events before they come to pass," might have furnished the text for a note which no one could have compiled more skilfully than Dr. Bernard. This edition of Butler deserves a word of special commendation for its completeness. It comprises not only the correspondence between Butler and Samuel Clarke, but also the very interesting fragments preserved in the British Museum. These with a portion of the Bristol Charge, delivered by the Bishop in 1749, have only once before been published and are little known. The indices are useful. The index to the "Sermons" has been compiled by the editor himself.

Biblical Apologetics.

IN LINES OF DEFENCE OF THE BIBLICAL REVELATION (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) Mr. D. S. Margoliouth publishes a series of papers contributed by him to the Expositor, adding a chapter on the "Principles of Criticism." In spite of its ingenuity and learning, the book, as a whole, is curious rather than convincing. There is, moreover, a want of connexion in the argument, which makes Mr. Margoliouth rather difficult to follow. It is more easy to mention the chief results to which his researches lead than to feel much confidence in the reasoning on which they are based. Theocritus, he argues, borrows not only from the "Song of Solomon," of which he may have been the translator, but also from Isaiah. It is even "practically certain" that a passage in Theocritus Idyll xxiv. is modelled on Isaiah, ch. xi. An even more paradoxical "result" is the conclusion that Isaiah made use of the Book of Wisdom (in its original Hebrew), and that that book itself may claim Solomonic authorship. That Mr. Margoliouth should defend the literary unity of the Book of Isaiah is not so surprising as that he should maintain that the psalter was compiled in the age of Solomon.

The fact that the national history, as it appears in the Psalms, closes with David, makes the Solomonic age the most likely period for the compilation of the book. That some of the references to the exile are inserted by editors who had no intention of letting them count as the work of David is obvious; but whether the references which are found in the body of the Psalms are necessarily signs of post-exilic origin cannot be determined till the whole phenomenon of prophecy has been brought within the domain of science.

Mr. Margoliouth's arguments are based for the most part on linguistic considerations—particularly on the supposed light which classical Arabic throws on the usage of Hebrew words. He asserts that the Hebrew, or Canaanitish, language is unquestionably "a vulgar dialect of Arabic." The literary peculiarities of such a book as "Job" may be explained, he thinks, if it is translated from an Arabic original. Hence the process of critical analysis or "dissection" as applied to such a book must be "excessively premature." We are bound to say that of all the ingenious suggestions put forward in this book there is only one which strikes us as effective for apologetic purposes. That is the argument for a special inspiration of the Hebrew race, based upon its "most patent want of originality." Mr. Margoliouth is, no doubt, right in urging the need, for the purposes of criticism, of systematic excavation in the Holy Land. For the rest we do not think that he succeeds in shaking to any appreciable extent the main conclusions of the "Higher Criticism." As to the battle between Mr. Margoliouth and the leaders of Biblical Criticism, at whose perversity and blindness he occasionally hints, we can only say ipsi viderint.

A Humane Preacher.

Fifty years ago Deans were made for their knowledge of Greek roots. At the present day the average Dean, if he is less scholarly, is certainly more useful than his predecessors; and yet the fact that Dr. Stubbs has few fellows among his kind shows that progress has still to be made before the English Church makes the most of the decanal position. There are indeed other men of his stamp; but not many Deans. Yet surely this is the stuff of which the heads of our great cathedrals should be made; for her cathedrals give the Church a splendid opportunity of correcting the narrowness and professionalism of the ordinary parish church, of appealing to the national conscience at large, of welcoming the half-sceptical, half-religious man of the world, to whose intellect as well as to his sense of reverence and of beauty they can make the largest and best appeal. For the head of such an institution as a cathedral is wanted a man whose mind is intensely reverent without being merely ecclesiastical, a man, too, who is cultured enough to appreciate and utilize the glories of a medieval building, who loves the past while he trusts the future.

Dr. Stubbs is all this, and he has also the gift of writing sermons that cry out to be printed, so graceful are they in style, so rich in suggestion, so wide in their range. The sermon which gives its title to the volume PRO PATRIA (Stock, 6s.) was preached on the Sunday appointed for intercession on behalf of the war. From its claim for those virtues which make for true patriotism, we pass to the second sermon on behalf of international peace which was preached at The Hague in connexion with the Peace Congress the year before. Then in a sermon on "All Saints and Benefactors" he pleads for the truth which Positivism has proclaimed by its calendar of great men; and later on, in a sermon full of graceful fancy, he draws his lessons from the cult of the angels in the Roman Catholic "Rosary of St. Michael." If the word "broad" had not been narrowed by party use, there would be no one to whom it might be more justly applied; for he is broad by virtue of his affirmations and not of his denials. Literature and painting also furnish subjects for this humane preacher; there is a "Thanksgiving Sermon for Shakespeare" preached at one of the anniversaries at Stratford-on-Avon; and another on Mr. Holman Hunt's "Triumph of the Innocents," when that picture was acquired for the Liverpool Art Gallery and was placed in the chancel of the church during the service at which the sermon was delivered. The Dean is also one of that handful of clergymen whose preaching evokes the enthusiasm of working-men; for, without being a partisan, he has all his life devoted himself to the cause of social reform. In this volume is printed one address, blended of hopes and warnings, which was delivered in Bristol Cathedral on May Day, the "May Festival of the Church and Labour"; and two Church Congress papers, one on religion and village citizenship, the other on sanitation—no, not sanitation, but on "the Health Right of the People." The volume concludes with a "Creed of Christian Socialism," a finely expressed summary of Christian duty, very clear and decided, but yet containing little with which any consistent Christian could disagree, though much which Christians often forget. The principles of social duty are further laid down in the four University sermons preached by the Dean on THE SOCIAL TEACHING OF THE LORD'S PRAYER (Wells Gardner, Darton, 1s. 6d.). They are dedicated to another well-known member of the Christian Social Union, Dr. Huntingdon of New York, in a letter wherein Dr. Stubbs acknowledges his debt to the Cambridge movement (not less momentous than that of Oxford) of Maurice and Kingsley, Lightfoot, Hort, and Dr. Westcott. Preached all the same in Oxford and dedicated to the Church in America, they are a happy example of that blending of religious views in a wider outlook upon humanity which is the note of the Church of England at the beginning of the twentieth century.

The Rev. J. A. Beet's COMMENTARY ON ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS (Hodder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d.) in its ninth edition embodies the results of the author's most recent studies; and is, in fact, re-written for a new generation of students. The writer rightly claims for his commentary that it is a contribution to doctrinal theology. The short but scholarly studies of single words—e.g., "Holiness," "Flesh," "Spirit," "Election," &c., are excellent. It is a great merit, in view of the readers for whom Dr. Beet writes, that he refrains from printing the Greek text, and that he does not overload his pages with illustrative matter. His exposition is both sound in scholarship and impartial in tone.

In CHRIST THE TRUTH, by the Rev. W. Medley (Macmillan, 6s.), the writer's motive has been "a deep, quick sense of the loss so many intelligent Christians suffer because they have never been able to relate in any vital way their faith in Christ with those wide provinces of human interest which claim them as intelligent, educated, and cultivated men." He has read widely and thought deeply; and his aim is to show that religion both embraces and transcends the conclusions of logic and philosophy, and that it includes all essential elements of the moral life. Perhaps the most striking passages are those which describe Mr. Medley's conception of religion. Religion—the true life of the soul—consists for him in fellowship, in the "personal relation of spirit with spirit"; faith implies not only an absolute trust in a personal object, but an "infinite progress" towards it. The lectures are clearly based on a careful study of recent philosophy and the characteristics of present-day life. The modern dislike of dogma is traced not so much to "the superficiality and levity of the age in which we live" as to "a more eager and even passionate desire to get at the truth of things than has ever prevailed before"—and this desire is itself due to the prevalence of the scientific temper. The book makes rather difficult reading, but this is due more to the abstruseness of the subject than to any lack of clearness in Mr. Medley's style.

CLUE, a guide through Greek to Hebrew Scripture, by Edwin A. Abbott (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d.), is the first of a series of short volumes, to be called "Diatessarica," dealing with the interpretation of the Gospels. The hypothesis of an original Hebrew gospel is not finally established, but new light has been thrown upon it by the recovery of the lost Hebrew of certain passages in Ecclesiasticus, and the statement of Papias that Matthew composed the logia in the Hebrew language has acquired additional weight. Dr. Abbott's real aim is to show how mistranslations of Hebrew into Greek account for discrepancies in the synoptic narratives. It is a wide field of inquiry, but as seven parts are to follow Part I., criticism of details would at present be premature.

THE HISTORY OF THE ROMeward MOVEMENT IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND, 1833-1864, by Walter Walsh (Nisbet, 10s. 6d.), cannot strictly be intended for a "history." It is a more or less accurate chronological sketch of certain events which happened between the years 1833 and 1864; but Mr. Walsh has no qualifications for the task of an historian. He misinterprets both the epoch of which he treats, and the real significance of the Reformation itself. The Reformation vindicated certain rights which had been obscured or withheld; it restored a liberty which had been lost. Much that the Reformation overthrew in the way of restrictions on "private judgment" Mr. Walsh would re-establish. But, in any case, no history can be worthy of the name in which everything is painted black. No one who has heard of Francis of Assisi can believe that the medieval Church was the home only of darkness and iniquity. Nor will any one who has heard more than the mere names of Newman and Keble, Pusey and Charles Lowder, suppose them to have been the hypocritical, narrow-minded "Romanizers" depicted in Mr. Walsh's book. If Mr. Walsh had read the letters written by Newman between 1845-1847, he could not have so misjudged him as to question his motives for not having succeeded earlier than he did; nor, if he had studied the "Apologia" could he have suggested that Newman had as early as 1833 been re-ordained in the Roman Church. It is difficult to see how far Mr. Walsh's own allegiance to the Articles extends, but the question is not one of great importance. What is clear is that Mr. Walsh, in spite of his Protestantism, gives a picture of the Movement coloured by the fond hopes of those prominent Roman Catholics who naturally watched the course of events with interest, and whose letters and statements are quoted by Mr. Walsh whenever they seem likely to be useful. Instead of describing a great Movement, with far-reaching issues, in a broad and intelligent spirit, he deals chiefly with personalities; and in no single passage does he give one tribute of appreciation to men who, with all their mistakes, certainly rendered great services to the cause of religion. We should advise Mr. Walsh to read R. L. Stevenson's open letter on Father Damien, addressed to the "Reverend Doctor Hyde of Honolulu," before he fulfils his promise of completing the "History" at a future date.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Last Word on Gardening.

Those who "cultivate the genius of the ground" have so grown in number of late years that many publishers have been at some pains to discover authors who will keep pace with the demands of the conscientious amateur. But that A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO GARDEN PLANTS (Longmans, 21s. n.), occupying nearly 1,200 closely printed pages of concise and carefully popularized information would have found, a score of years back, the enthusiastic welcome which must be accorded to Mr. John Weathers' volume we venture to doubt. Nothing so good has been previously placed at the disposal of the amateur, and we believe that the time is ripe for its publication. The work is exhaustive, it is scientifically unassailable, and the voluminous information is presented in a readily accessible form. If, for example, the amateur is uncertain under what natural order he will find the information he requires, the very full index at the end, giving the English and Latin names, will immediately tell him. The work deals exhaustively with all garden plants—flowers, fruits, vegetables, ferns, shrubs, and trees—worth growing in the open air in the British Isles. Every species is described, and information is given as to cultivation and propagation. It is a practical working gardener's book, and ignores those plants which can only be grown under specially favoured conditions with much risk and unremitting attention. The glossary has been formed with a view of grouping together all technical expressions which, if employed without consideration throughout the work, may confound the less learned brethren; and the necessary technical and botanical terms here gathered together are further elucidated by the use of numerous thumbnail sketches. It is obvious that Mr. Weathers' book has been well considered and most carefully written up from data accumulated during many years of practical experience, and the fact that it excludes almost all plants that require artificial warmth in this climate, shows how thoroughly the author has endeavoured to place himself in the position of those amateur and professional growers who have the beautiful English garden as it is under their personal care. It is a relief among the mass of gardening books to which we recently called attention, to find a really practical guide, of a character unique in the annals of the literature of the garden. It only remains for Mr. Weathers to add a Kalendar of Gardening operations to his work to make it conform with every requirement of the ambitious amateur. A merit to which we have not previously referred is the clearness of the literary style—a quality so often absent in technical literature.

An Actress and some Actors.

Helena Faucit may perhaps be said to have been the last great actress the English stage has known. Not that the supply of dramatic talent has been arrested at its source; but our appreciation of fine acting has lain dormant. We have not been worthy of great artists; therefore the great artists have delayed their coming. Genius to be appreciated must come at the right moment. Helena Faucit was born just in time. If she had not reached an age to take the world by storm while Macready flourished and kept the poetic drama alive by the force of his personal talent and his energy in seeking talent in others, it is doubtful whether she would ever have won a full recognition of her marvellous art. She knew herself how valuable her association with Macready had been to her. She wrote that the breaking up of the Drury Lane company in 1843 was to her a heavy blow.

Severe as my labours had been, the delight in them far more than outweighed the fatigue. Drury Lane Theatre, conducted as it then was, was an arena in which every gift I had found scope for exercise. My studies were all of an elevating character: my thoughts were given to the great types of womanhood drawn by Shakespeare's master hand, or by the hands of modern poets—Browning, Marston, Troughton, Bulwer-Lytton, and others—anxious to maintain the reputation of the national drama.

This letter, or reminiscence, is one of the many quoted by Sir Theodore Martin in his HELENA FAUCIT, LADY MARTIN (Blackwood, 10s. 6d. n.). It is no disparagement of his literary skill to say that Lady Martin's own words give the book its chief interest. She was a woman of remarkable mind. While she was quite a child, she was familiar with great thoughts, with the characters of Shakespeare, the grand abstractions of Milton, the allegorical figures of the "Pilgrim's Progress." She had the same intuitive faculty as Mrs. Siddons for projecting her personality into that of a character impersonated. And to this she joined a trained intellect (as her "Women of Shakespeare" showed) and a noble simplicity of character that left no room for theatrical tricks or strivings after effect for the effect's sake alone. Her sense of art was lofty, and the littleness of the theatre continually jarred upon her nature.

Oh, dear friend, you do not know, you cannot tell what my profession is, when you are forced to deal only with the mechanical matter-of-fact side of it! How I wonder sometimes at the vain dreams I have of it! If you could sit by and listen to the insipid things that I am obliged to hear, generally summed up by praise or dispraise of a dress or a bunch of feathers or what not, you would not be surprised that my heart sinks into a very deep pit now and then. It may be all an illusion; and my art may not be the instrument for good and the help of all high and noble things I believe it and have ever felt it in myself. If so, how gladly would I be undeceived! I would leave it at once without a pang or regret.

It was this high conception of the actor's aim, this determination to exalt her art and sink her individuality, that made Helena Faucit great. She spoke to the souls of men and women, pierced through the core of carelessness or cynical indifference, and forced home the great truths of Nature and of Art. She could make Christopher North alter his conception of Lady Macbeth; a poet and critic of Matthew Arnold's calibre could send her a play (Merope) in which everything was to turn "upon the nobleness, seriousness, and powers of feeling of the actor"; a man of wide culture and experience like Sir Archibald Alison could discover that "a young woman of 25, without any advantages of fortune or situation, was not only fully equal but in many respects superior in conversation to a man of 50 whose life had been spent, with the aid of far greater facilities, in the constant study of literature and the arts."

In short, she was a great actress because she had a great soul, and this Sir Theodore Martin's book makes clear. It is longer than it need have been, and it has those drawbacks that always attend biographies written by husbands or wives or any near relation. But it does make this clear, and that is, after all, the main point.

Sketches of the lives of famous players can always be made readable. The life of the theatre has an attraction for most of us, and players to be great must have a great deal of what we call "human nature" in their composition. We smile indulgently over their foibles—vanities, jealousies, eccentricities; we are touched by their generosity, their kindness of heart. TWELVE GREAT ACTORS and TWELVE GREAT ACTRESSES (Putnam, $5.00) are pleasant books to read. Mr. Edward Robins gossips cheerfully and his sketches have a wholesome literary flavour. His trick of referring constantly to actresses as "the Brereton," "the Mason," "the Jordan" is a little irritating; and he is now and then a slave to an epithet, as when for the sake of heightening an effect he speaks of "the trembling Boswell." Bozzy never played Jacques Strop to Johnston's Macaire; when the Doctor thundered, his admirer enjoyed it; "trembling" is no epithet for the genial, self-satisfied little Scot. But Mr. Robins writes generally with an entertaining and a well-informed pen. William E. Burton is the only actor of less than world-wide repute who finds a place among the twenty-four celebrities. His "greatness" is, we think, scarcely recognized beyond the United States. For the rest, the names are those one naturally expects to find—all British or American except Rachel and Ristori, and, after all, the Anglo-Saxon race seems to have as good a claim as her native Italy on the actress who brought to vivid life Lady Macbeth, Queen Elizabeth, and Mary Stuart. The portraits in the two volumes are nearly all very good.

Wedding Bells.

All women, we believe, love weddings, even the weddings of other women. On this account Mrs. Miln's stout volume of WOONINGS AND WEDDINGS IN MANY CLIMES (Pearson, 16s.) will appeal to the majority of readers. And this majority is likely to extend to Mrs. Miln the indulgence she needs for pages "well pock-marked with egos "—the phrase is her own—even though her style is slovenly, and overloaded with clichés and familiar quotations. The subject itself is interesting, since if all women love a wedding, all mankind loves a lover. And if you have the forbearance to accept Mrs. Miln as your guide, she will show you lovers from one pole to the other, and the whole world round. Amongst almost all peoples some kind of a marriage rite is to be found, which progresses from simplicity to complexity. But amongst the lowest human beings of the scale, the Australian bushmen, there is no sort of ceremony at all. The bushman often buys his wife from her parents before she is born, and when she reaches nubility, either lives with her, or eats her, according to circumstances! On the other hand the most complicated marriage rites predominate in the oldest civilization of any—viz., the Chinese. Here, Nature has been dropped so far behind that all natural wishes are counted disgraceful. The Chinese parent desires to see his daughter married, but may not take a step to further his desire. Hence the necessity for the professional match-maker, or "go-between." The Chinese girl looks upon her marriage as the one essential thing in life, yet she must devote a whole week to simulated lamentation at having to forsake her father's house. It is even etiquette for the young bridegroom to hide himself in an upper chamber, and have to be called thrice before he will come down. Between these two extremes, every sort of marriage ceremony may be found, from that of the North American Indian who leads his bride out of her father's house to the nearest stream of running water where, joining hands across it, they swear to be true to one another so long as the water runs, to that of the gipsies who, less poetically, but more symbolically, are married "across the tongs." The signification is obvious; in union lies their value, but take one from the other, and both become worthless. If there are no fewer marriages in England than in other countries there are very many more old maids; while in Turkey, Algiers, and east of Suez, generally, such a class is quite unknown. Old maids exist in Russia, but they will not admit their own existence, and when a Russian girl finds herself still single, and getting on in years, she leaves home for a time to announce on her return that she married while abroad, and her husband died upon the honeymoon. No embarrassing questions are asked, for in Russia it is not etiquette to speak of a dead man to his living widow. Most women marry in France, but there the craving seems rather for motherhood than mere wifehood; so, at least, the anecdote of the author's Brittany servant-maid seems to point. This woman, when she said her rosary at bed time, used to have lying on the bed before her a tissue-paper parcel. One night her mistress, having something to say to her concerning the next day's breakfast, went in, and saw spread out a baby's little gown, flannel, and cap. The servant explained that these were given her by the nuns who brought her up, in readiness for her marriage; a marriage she had not made, and now probably would never make.

It made me feel very strange, for she was work-worn and no longer quite young. And guessing, or fancying that I did (sic) what her prayer had been when I blundered to the door, and interrupted those well-worn beads, a fear stuck in my throat. So I told her that it didn't really matter what we had for to-morrow's breakfast, and slipped away, and left her to her rosary, and her marriage present.

There is an ill-compiled index; and some fifty excellent illustrations, reproductions of photographs, mostly portraits. For these alone the book is worth having, and would be particularly valuable to black and white artists in search of types.

Some Biographies.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK (Harpers, 12s.) is compiled from the German of Margaretha von Poschenger and has an introduction by Mr. Sidney Whitman. It naturally tells a certain number of things that were not known before, but not things of any great importance. Those who plough through the book in the hope of discovering the true inwardness of such matters as the dispute between Sir Morell Mackenzie and Professor Bergmann will be disappointed. On the other hand, readers who like to pore over long accounts of Royal weddings will be pleased. There is plenty of that sort of thing, with long lists of illustrious names, and descriptions of jewelry, wedding presents, and bridal dresses. The Emperor Frederick gets plenty of praise, which he no doubt deserved. But his life is not here so written that his personality stands out clearly, and the general impression is that a good deal that would have been interesting has been purposely left out.

An interesting combination of the artistic and commercial temperament goes to make THE REMINISCENCES OF MORRIS STEINERT (Putnam), compiled and arranged by Jane Marlin, well worth the telling. Morris Steinert might be described as a quick change artist, not in clothes, but in enthusiasms. He has now a certain reputation in Germany and America as an authority on the history of keyed instruments, of which he has a wonderful collection. But in his day he has been an optician, a brewer, a teacher of music, a conductor of several orchestras organized by himself, and a performer on the violin, violoncello, flute, accordion, guitar, banjo, cornet, organ, horn, clavichord, harpsichord, and spinet. Quite late in his career, on discovering that music, always his chief interest, was not as lucrative as he wished, he all but entered upon the hoop-skirt business, but decided in the nick of time to become a vendor of musical instruments, and so made his fortune. The story of his travels in these several capacities from town to town in Germany and America is full of colour. His habit of observation, his fund of humorous anecdote, and above all his devotion to music, more than reconcile the reader to his rather florid style. Pictures of some beautiful specimens from his collection of instruments are reproduced. He has himself invented an instrument—the Steinertone—for which he claims a combination of the old world sweetness of the clavichord and the "rhythmical tone-production of the pianoforte."

ARCHITECTS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, by R. Farquharson Sharp (Sonnenschein, 5s. n.), is a series of twenty-four biographical sketches of great English and American writers, from Shakespeare to Tennyson. They are the sort of biographical sketches that might be produced by a careful man who read up his subjects in "Chambers' Encyclopedia" and the "National Dictionary," closed the books, and tried to reproduce them from memory. There is no criticism worthy of the name, but there are notable omissions and some inaccuracy. The sketch of Carlyle does not mention the destruction of the MS. of the French Revolution by Mill's housemaid; and in the sketch of Byron we read that the poet's amours "were never entered upon without his affections being genuinely engaged"—a strange statement in view of what Byron himself said concerning the affair with Miss Clairmont. The most interesting feature of the book is the reproduction in facsimile of examples of the handwriting of the authors, with whom Mr. Sharp deals in the manner of a safe commentator who may always be trusted to note the obvious, if not to salute it with the welcome due to an old friend.

Affection probably accounts for the publication of F. C. TAIT, being the life, letters, and golfing diary of the popular young officer of the Black Watch who met his death at Koodoosberg, by J. L. Low (Nisbet, 6s.). It is well enough written, and Mr. Andrew Lang contributes an introduction; but so far as the general public is concerned there was no pressing necessity to write Mr. Tait's life at such a length. We freely accept all that his friends say as to his personal charm. His letters reveal an ordinary athletic, stout-hearted young man who might be relied upon to do his duty according to his lights, but whose range was limited. His letters are about golfing, duck-shooting, or fishing, and seldom touch any subject of wider interest. Such men are useful to their country, but their lives need not be written, and the newspaper reports of their sporting performances need not be reproduced.

Messrs. Kegan Paul have been well advised to include a sketch of the life of ADAM DUNCAN (2s. n.) in the series named "The Westminster Biographies." Mr. H. W. Wilson may be congratulated upon the clearness and utility of the manner in which he has dealt with the career of the very remarkable commander who won the victory of Camperdown only a few months after he had patiently struggled against a mutiny of exceptional strength. The career of Admiral Lord Duncan remains to his countrymen as a precious heritage, not alone because of the bravery and patriotism of the officer, but also on account of the noble altruism and wisdom of the man. A giant in stature, a courtier in manner, and a sincere Christian in faith and action, Adam Duncan is a hero of English history for whose memory British boys and girls may be taught to cherish unstinted reverence and admiration. DANIEL DEFOE, by Wilfred Whitten, is another life added to the same series. It is well enough written; but there were so many things that the author was obviously obliged to say that he had little space left to be original or critical. The get-up of these little volumes is everything that could be desired.

Biographies such as those of E. HERBER EVANS, D.D. (6s.), and of JOSHUA CLARKSON HARRISON (3s. 6d.), both published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, hardly call for detailed criticism. Both men became chairmen of the Congregational Union; the former essentially a preacher, a fighting Welsh minister and politician, the latter a London pastor of high character and great influence, who, as his anonymous biographer says, "might have passed in general society as an admirable specimen of the English rector untroubled by tithe questions." Both biographies—that of Dr. Evans is by the Rev. H. Elvet Lewis—are well written and admirably suited to the particular class of reader to which they appeal. The purely religious Nonconformist biography has a wide clientèle of its own; and readers who may probably have never heard the names of those whose lives, sincere, influential, and whole-hearted, are thus recorded may unquestionably find in these volumes documents very illustrative of the religious life of the time, and, in the case of Dr. Evans, throwing much light on the aspirations and methods of Welsh Nonconformity.

Those whose ideas of women interested in missions are based on Mrs. Jellyby should read Mrs. Ashley Carus-Wilson's biography of IRENE PETRIE (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). Miss Petrie died while travelling in Tibet after three years' labour among the natives of Kashmir. The annals of the C.M.S. and her fellow-workers alike testify to her success. But to bring home her work and the beauty of her character to a wider circle Mrs. Ashley Carus-Wilson should have kept her well-written book shorter; and occasionally she shows the lack of a due sense of the ridiculous. "Some friends she (Irene Petrie) incited to Bible reading by giving a Revised Version, when an Authorized Version might have hinted in an offensive way that she doubted if they were Bible students already." Truly a subtle use of the Revised Version.

FROM SUFFOLK LAD TO LONDON MERCHANT (Arrowsmith, 2s.) is the life of James Harvey, the son of a yeoman, who became a London merchant, occupied himself with religious and philanthropic movements, and did good work in connexion with the early closing movement—a very worthy if not a very interesting man. The book is written by his son, the Rev. Alfred J. Harvey, Vicar of Shirehampton.

THE ADVERTISER'S A B C (T. B. Browne, 10s. 6d.) is an admirable Press directory, and has some good articles on subjects of interest to newspaper readers. An essay on "The Newspaper Press of the Nineteenth Century" is particularly good. We may take an extract for the benefit of those who are depressed at the decadent qualities of modern journalism. The reference is not to the new journalism but to the old:—

The tone of the Press was low. Much appeared in the papers of those early days which was coarse, vulgar, and even indecent. Articles were published with impunity which no lady would think of reading aloud, and which would certainly banish any paper from the family circle which ventured to insert them to-day. The columns of the papers were largely filled with society notes and comments upon fashionable doings. Short paragraphs were popular. Gossip was the mainstay of the papers.

We have received the 1901 edition of the CLERGY DIRECTORY (Phillips, 4s. 6d. n.), which has been got ready a couple of months earlier than usual, and LODGE'S PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE (Hurst and Blackett, 36s. 6d.), which attains its 78th edition. A list of the Royal household has been added to its contents.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S LOVE LETTERS (Unicorn Press, 2s. 6d. n.), with its dainty white binding and pink (not green) riband, will seem perhaps less heartless and more amusing than it would a couple of months ago. It is a clever skit in which the great mystery is thus cleared up, in Letter W. —

My poor Dear,—I must be brief with you. It is the truest kindness. My mother has reasoned with me. She has been reasoning with me for weeks. I have reasoned back. Ah! how I have reasoned! Yet it has come to this! You must cease to be literary or—we must say good-bye.

THE STORY OF THE UGANDA PROTECTORATE, by General F. D. Lugard (1s. 6d.), is added to Messrs. Horace Marshall's Story of the Empire Series. The author's knowledge of the subject is more conspicuous than his talent for writing about it. His work with difficulty permits itself to be read, though the provision of information is ample.

We are glad to welcome a new edition of that invaluable work Mrs. BEETON'S COOKERY BOOK (Ward, Lock, 1s.), much enlarged and improved to suit the needs of the times in cooking pure and simple, and also containing much new matter about serving meals, kitchen arrangements, housekeeping, and housework generally. The price-list of provisions is a most useful feature.

ART.

HANS MEMLINC. By W. H. JAMES WEALE, Associate of the Royal Academy of Belgium, late Keeper of the National Art Library. (Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.) (G. Bell. 5s. n.)

The latest volume of Messrs. Bell's "Great Masters" is devoted to the great Flemish painter, Hans Memlinc—as it appears we are now to call him. The name recurs no less than forty-nine times in contemporary documents, in thirty-two cases with the ending inc, in fifteen with ync. Once, it is spelt yneghe, and once ynghc, but never ing, a termination, we are now told, that is never met with in family names of the period. Both the editor and publishers of the series are to be congratulated upon their good fortune in securing so distinguished a critic for the task. Mr. Weale has spent the best years of his life in studying Early Flemish and Dutch painters and is a recognized authority on the subject. The present work is the fullest and most accurate biography of the master that has yet appeared, and gives us the few certain dates and facts concerning the old Bruges painter that have been discovered of late years.

Everything about Memlinc, however, is uncertain. The year of his birth, the precise origin of his family, his training, even as we have seen, the spelling of his name, are still open questions. What little we do know is chiefly due to Mr. Weale's own researches. He was the first to brush aside the absurd modern fables which represented the artist as a sick and wounded soldier, and a drunkard who repented of his sins and painted the pictures in the hospital of Bruges out of gratitude for services rendered to him by the Brothers of St. John. Mr. Weale tells us that Hans Memlinc was probably born between 1430 and 1435, at the village of Mümling, near Aschaffenburg, and that he served his apprenticeship under some German painter of Köln or Mainz. He was already a master painter when he came to Bruges in 1467, in the service of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. In this year he painted the portrait of the Arezzo medallist, Spinelli, who engraved seals and gems for the Duke, and in 1468 he executed the fine triptych of the Donne family now at Chatsworth. Sir John Donne was sent to Bruges by King Edward IV. to attend the marriage of the Princess Margaret of York with Charles the Bold, and Memline in his capacity as Court painter was among the artists employed to prepare the decorations for the wedding.

The remainder of Memline's life was spent at Bruges, where he married Anne de Valkenaere, and in 1480 bought a "large stone house" as well as other property, from which we may conclude that he was a man of substance. Most of his best pictures are still to be seen at Bruges, either in the Academy or in the Hospital of St. John, which is a complete museum of his works. One remarkable triptych, representing James Floreins, the brother of the Master of the Hospital, with his six sons and twelve daughters, is now in the Louvre, and a smaller altarpiece of Our Lady with an angel playing a lute and St. George standing behind the kneeling donor adorns the National Gallery. The famous shrine of St. Ursula, at Bruges, was only finished in 1480, and the Passion picture in the Cathedral at Lubeck bears the date of 1491, after which we have no more information as to the painter's life and works. But in 1889, a Belgian Jesuit, Father Dussart, discovered the following entry, from the diary of a notary of Bruges, in a manuscript of the public library at St. Omer. "On the 11th of August, 1494, there died at Bruges, Master Hans Memmeline, who was considered to be the most skilful and excellent painter in the whole of Christendom. He was a native of the Principality of Mainz, and is buried at St. Giles."

Mr. Weale does ample justice to the devout and gentle art of this old master of Bruges, whom he places next to Hubert Van Eyck, among the Early Netherlandish painters. Although Memline never produced anything equal to Hubert's masterpiece "The Adoration of the Lamb," and fell short of John Van Eyck in technical execution, his conception and treatment of religious subjects far excelled those of that artist and of his other contemporaries. "As compared with the other masters of the Netherlandish school," says Mr. Weale, "he is the most poetical and the most musical . . . and many of the subjects he represented have never been so delicately and delightfully expressed by any other painter, with the exception, perhaps, of Fra Angelico." To the end of his life he retained his love of open air and running streams—"he was," as Sir Martin Conway remarks, "the first painter who drew the form of a river bank correctly"—and enlivened his landscape backgrounds with all manner of animals and objects, with Romanesque architecture of the most fantastic type, with dogs and horses, camels and monkeys, swans and boats.

The numerous illustrations which accompany Mr. Weale's letterpress are well chosen, but their quality is decidedly unequal. The reproductions of Memline's finest altarpieces, such as the Louvre and Chatsworth triptychs, are particularly disappointing, and those of such crowded compositions as the Passion pictures at Turin or the Calvary at Lubeck could hardly prove satisfactory. On the other hand, the lovely group of the Virgin and Child in the Hospital of Bruges, the portraits of the wealthy burgomaster-grocer William Moreel and his wife and daughter, above all the splendid bust of Martin van Nieuwenhove, kneeling with clasped hands and with his Book of Hours open before him, are all admirably reproduced, and show us Memline in his best and happiest moments.

There would be but small hope for the English Art of to-day if the exhibition of the Society of Oil Painters, at present open in Piccadilly, represents the ideals. It is respectable, without any great achievement, and with few efforts to rise above the merely commonplace. The members who paint well show their handicraft neither to better nor worse advantage than usual, and the members who paint badly continue to paint and are gibbeted by the conscientious critics with the same monotony as of old.

Not, indeed, that the painters represented are worse—some of them are even better represented than on some former occasions—but they present the spectacle of men complaining of lack of patronage. It is apparent in their work. They lament the frequent gaps between the desirable red stars, and yet make no efforts to shine. And the reason for this lack of patronage is obvious. Only a few men—and still fewer women—want to buy pictures, and in a time such as the present only men who really love art care to pay for it. The rest are content to leave it to the house decorator's persuasive representative, and although a self-respecting painter fears the time when his works find a ready mart in the Tottenham-court-road, his fear seldom prompts him to try and satisfy the higher requirements.

There is, frankly speaking, nothing unusual to complain of in these 491 canvases contributed by men whose names have appeared in "The Year's Art" for a decade. The majority of them satisfy no want, it is true, but they would have been considered "good enough" thirty years ago. To-day no one seems to hanker after them, and if any one does he has only to go into a respectable dealer's shop to have his wants promptly and gratefully gratified. Exceptions may be taken to the Margetson in the West Gallery, "The Sacred Spaces of the Sea," which is another of the simple spaceful successes of the painter of "The Sea hath its Pearls," to the "Dorothy," a very tender sketch by Mortimer Menpes, hung over a conscientious "Rosemary" by Miss Janet Archer, to the beauty of the background of "The Kelpie," more successful as a picture than convincing as a presentment of incident, by Byam Shaw, to "The Ghost" of Gabriel Nicolet, which is a subtle and fascinating portrait study somewhat damaged by a catch-fancy title, in the Central Gallery; and to the large and almost brutally true "Stirling" of D. Y. Cameron, the decorative and—in spite of its eccentricities of femininity—deserving "Groves Elysian" by Cecil Rea, the healthy, glowing "Dreams" by Miss Isö Rae, the natural and accurate, if somewhat close, "Harwich Harbour" by Fred. G. Cotman, and the tender, well-drawn "Sheepfold on the Hillside" by Arthur G. Ball, in the East Gallery. These pictures at least have the merit of being unexpected. For the rest—the well expected that is—Chevallier Tayler, in spite of his nice fancy for a dainty form, makes a conscious technical effort to interest us in a very unlikely "Committee of Taste"; there is a solidly drawn "Stopham Bridge" by Yeend King; a worthy, sandy "Bamburgh" (we question the spelling) by Niels Lund; a fanciful "London Fantasy" by A. Birkenruth; a good Edwin Hayes; a solid Terriek Williams; a well-drawn "Scholar" by George Hare; a thoroughly true "Rough Pasture Land" by Harold Waite; a broadly painted portrait of "Mrs. Rennell Rodd" by Melton Fisher; a tender "Spring" by Miss Elsie Atkins; a delicate "Departing Day" by Sidney Moore; a faithful drawing of "Appledore" by H. Trier; a Spenlove of the right kind; a large landscape by Claude Hayes; and a greater mystery by Dudley Hardy. No one need be ashamed to be included in this list. But of the remaining 400—who cares why they were painted?

FICTION.

Miss Broughton.

The spirit and vivacity which inspired Miss Broughton when she wrote "Cometh up as a Flower" or "Nancy" have not deserted her even in FOES IN LAW (Macmillan, 6s.), which must be about the sixteenth novel from her pen since 1867. To have sustained one's ardours for so long is no small achievement, but we can assure her readers that Miss Broughton is no whit less amusing and acute in the twentieth than in the middle of the nineteenth century. Lettice Trent, her latest heroine, is the daughter of an old county family. She endeavours to find "the real thing" in life and love, and discovers she has made a bad shot—before it is too late. This does not sound a promising plot, but Miss Broughton is telling it. Lettice's brother has married into a large, amusing, Broughtonesque family, the Kergonets, whose function it is to brighten up the story. Marie Kergonet, who becomes the foe-in-law, is a lively stage figure; she does not convince, but she does a number of other pleasant things—and leaves one amused. Miss Broughton has her faults, of course. She makes her characters speak, and then tells you why and how they did it in a way that seems a little old-fashioned; but there is so much of lightness and fun, and often more than a touch of delicate feeling, in her work that one likes to pass over such defects as there may be and recommend the reader to try "Foes in Law" after dinner, beside the fire, of a winter's night.

"A Gentleman."

With these unequivocal and inspiring lines—

My papa's a gentleman,
My mamma's a lady ;
I'm a girl of consequence,
And you're a dirty baby—does the Hon. Mrs. Walter R. D. Forbes open the prologue to her entertaining novel, A GENTLEMAN (Murray, 6s.). The lines at least inspire the mother of Raymond White, a suburban dress-maker, to make "a gentleman" of her son, and the book skilfully describes how that transmutation, which is generally supposed to take at least three generations, is achieved in a very short period. All Mrs. Forbes' people are boldly sketched, her knowledge of men and women is sound, and her story wisely planned. It may have some inner democratic meaning, and be all the better for it ; but judged merely by externals it is bright and enjoyable, from the prologue in which his little nurse-girl sings the hero to sleep with her satiric quatrain to the epilogue in which many fine political ladies and gentlemen congratulate him on his return to the House with a majority of 2,000. If the story is just a little pat, the incidental pictures make up for it. "A Gentleman" is never dull.

Religious.

THE CLAYBOROUGH ENDEAVOURERS (Elliot Stock, 2s. 6d.) is something out of the ordinary run of fiction. Mr. G. H. Hemsoll deals in this little volume with the efforts of a Congregational minister and his friends to evangelize a manufacturing town in a country district. Into this is woven the history of Mr. Frank Vaughan—his rise in life, his election to the council, and finally his prophesied elevation to the Mayoralty of Clayborough. It is an honest if rather dull attempt to write the spiritual history of a body of Nonconformist worshippers in a country town.

There is power in Mr. E. A. Dix's careful study of the religious perplexities of DEACON BRADBURY (Macmillan Company, 6s.). This village Prometheus is driven by misfortune into rebellion against the decrees of Providence, and the effects of the loss of a lifetime's faith upon a naturally noble character are skilfully and subtly traced. But the best part of the story is its charming picture of every-day life in a New England township. Mr. Dix has observed closely and recorded with loving fidelity, and his minor characters are well chosen and individual. The love interest is chiefly welcome as a relief to the sombreness of the deacon's mental struggles. The author is an enthusiast on dialect. Realism in the guise of phonetic pedantry is apt to be wearisome.

The Familiar Moralist.

THE MADNESS OF DAVID BARING (Hodder, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. Joseph Hocking, is a fair specimen of that class of novel which dabbles in theories of life. The hero's madness consists in his forsaking a comfortable property that had been left him unexpectedly to join a socialistic brotherhood in Devonshire. There is much of the usual conversation with intelligent artisans in the East End (where a large proportion of the property lay), and a good deal of talk on the part of David Baring and his friends on the great subject of "Wealth—its use and abuse." The moral Mr. Hocking intends to point—one is confident that some lesson is intended—seems to be that socialistic brotherhoods cannot last, and that, though sticking-plaster remedies are useless, the millionaire can but try to help his poorer brethren as best he may. Riches, in fact, are a trust. The thought is not novel, but we confess to some pleasure at seeing David Baring recover his sanity at the close. These excessively high-minded young men are sometimes rather a strain.

Long Ago and Far Away.

Among the many "romances" of the Cape and Sword period, one which deals with the life of yesterday is especially welcome.

JOHN CHARITY (Murray, 6s.) purports to be written by a yeoman of Cranberry-Orcas, in Hampshire, who tells of his adventures in Alta California, and is edited, according to the title-page, by Mr. Horace Annesley Vachell, whose book "The Procession of Life" novel readers will remember. We confess to a prejudice at starting. The first sentence we know too well :—

It was in the year 1837, when her Gracious Majesty Victoria ascended the throne of England, that I, John Charity, left England for Alta California. But before setting down the adventures that befell me 'twere well, doubtless, to give the reader some brief information in regard to my birthplace, and so forth. This "opening" is tedious enough and generally leads to a comfortable "mate" in some half-dozen moves, but Mr. Vachell soon interests one and continues the process until the story ends. His style, with a touch of eighteenth-century classicism, is well adapted to his story ; the pictures of Spanish rule in the Californias is historically and dramatically convincing ; the general result of his labours is an interesting piece of fiction with the ring of truth in it.

At the University.

A SCHOLAR OF HIS COLLEGE (Blackwood, 6s.) is considerably better than the common run of novels describing the undergraduate, though it is by no means wholly concerned with the University. Mr. W. E. W. Collins steers clear of the ridiculous errors often made in novels of University life, and writes well enough in a healthy, breezy vein of optimism. He describes a day's covert shooting or a cricket match with relish, and his characters, especially the dons, are not amiss, though he is apparently too healthy a man himself to draw a convincing villain. Mr. Collins' inventive genius is not the best part of his equipment, and it probably cost him considerable thought to plan out a satisfactory termination of his hero's pecuniary difficulties. As it is, we have to put up with a kindhearted solicitor who has more money than he knows what to do with, and is never so happy as when smoothing away the difficulties that beset the course of young love. It is something novel to find the solicitor thus playing the stage divinity. The different love-interests in this story are somewhat overwhelming, but the general effect is distinctly pleasing, and the parts which deal with life at St. Hilary's are very good indeed.

The Genius Loci.

LOVE IN OUR VILLAGE (Ward, Lock, 6s.) is a volume of short stories of life in Dorset by the author of "Jan Oxber"—a novel which had at all events the success attaching to good Press notices. Orme Agnus knows his country well, and has got as near as any to the heart of the rustic character in a district that has been singularly fortunate in its interpreters. In passages of native humour Orme Agnus can bear comparison with the best of his predecessors, and in "The Poet's Love" he displays a genuine and unstrained pathos. This story, and "The Dethronement of the King," each in its own fashion, are the best, but all the stories are eminently readable, at any rate by those who can put up with plenty of dialect. And the majority of them do not sacrifice sweetness to power ; the love affairs progress to everybody's satisfaction, and when some rare chance sends a lover astray he is promptly punished for his misdeeds. The book is wholesome, humorous, and written with a rare observation.

The author of "Highways and Byways in Devon and Cornwall," Mr. Arthur H. Norway, knows the county of the Dart so well that in PARSON PETER (Murray, 6s.) he can transport us backward some hundred years, and yet preserve the genius loci intact. Fiction and fact have both told of many an eighteenth century parson who viewed with a sympathetic eye the smugglers among their flocks, but seldom has so vivid and engaging a figure of the kind been presented as that of Parson Peter. The plot is highly interesting ; from the earliest chapters the atmosphere of the country side, freshened and made clear by a touch of the sea, is delightfully sustained.

THE QUARTERLIES.

The Quarterly urges the claims of the poet Crabbe, declaring that "the neglect and forgetfulness into which the poems of Crabbe have been allowed to fall is not creditable to the present generation of English readers and critics." Their excuse must be that "the world is so full of a number of things" that some of the things are bound to get undeservedly neglected. There was a time when even Byron was neglected. We note the Quarterly's theory of the reason why Crabbe has not been popular. It was because, though he wrote in the nineteenth century, "he nevertheless retained to the last the literary impress of the eighteenth century." His position, in short, was like that of a chef who should insist upon serving tea and a smoked haddock for dinner. The excellence of the haddock would hardly save such a cook from condemnation. Similarly Crabbe's couplets sound to modern ears not a little like parodies of prize poems, though when one has got used to them one perceives that they are nothing of the sort. Another interesting paper is on Professor Huxley. It is in effect, though not in form, a palinode, the Quarterly having, as all the world knows, put up a Bishop to hold the fort when Darwin and Huxley were storming it. The present reviewer bears no malice—there is, indeed, no reason why he should—but even goes so far as to admit that the Bishop did not get the best of it in the subsequent passage of arms at the meeting of the British Association. The paper on "Virgil and Tennyson" is not, as might have been expected, a demonstration of the indebtedness of the English to the Roman singer, but an attempt to "parallel" the lives of the two poets after the fashion of Plutarch. A not very hopeful view of the future of the drama is given in a paper on "the Victorian Stage."

There are many good articles in the Edinburgh. The political paper on "Our South African Troubles" is particularly sane and statesmanlike, though not in the least sanguine "that lasting peace will prove to be the result of this most deplorable war." The article on Madame du Deffand shows a graphic power and grip of the subject that reminds us of Macaulay's essays, though Macaulay, fortunately for his popularity, usually preferred more obvious subjects. "Fiction and Politics" is a review of "Quisanté," "Senator North," and "The Mantle of Elijah." Incidentally the reviewer expresses the opinion that the best novel of English politics ever written is Trollope's "Phineas Finn," and the greatest character in political fiction Mr. Plantagenet Palliser; and he shows, accurately as it seems to us, why it is so difficult to make this sort of novel at once interesting and true to life. It is because "heroics" are out of place in Parliament.

Indeed, if you look for heroism in politics, it is apt to be not unlike the heroism of the gentleman in An Enemy of the People who became a martyr for conscience' sake upon a question of drainage. Ibsen's doctor, who insisted on reporting that the town drains were in an unsound condition, although the mayor and corporation urged upon him that no good citizen would bring inevitable ruin on the watering-place of which he was a burgess, is a true type of the hero in politics, be they Imperial or municipal. But it is very hard to make him a sympathetic figure, and most people declare that An Enemy of the People is not a play at all, much less a tragedy, but a squabble about sanitation.

Mr. Wilkins' "The Love of an Uncrowned Queen" is also reviewed in the number.

The function of the Economic Review is to reduce to simplicity the most complex problems of the dismal science. In the number before us that service is rendered to the questions of Trusts and Sugar Bounties. Having read the articles one feels not only that one understands all about these dark subjects, but also that they are not really either difficult or obscure.

Correspondence.

"ROBUSTIOUS."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I much regret my error in stating in your columns that Shakespeare only used the word "robustious" once in his works. He used it twice. Mr. Walkley quite justly calls me to account for a stupid lapse of memory. At the same time I do not think the effect of my argument was really weakened by my forgetfulness. I will not, however, go over the ground again just now, but, whenever I return to it, I shall certainly pay very great consideration to all that Mr. Walkley urges.

Yours obediently,
SIDNEY LEE.

108, Lexham-gardens, Kensington, W., Jan. 19.

MR. PECKSNIFF AND THE SIRENS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I am pained to note that under the heading of "The Drama" Mr. A. B. Walkley misquotes his Dickens and applies to Mr. Podsnap (all honour to the creator of "the young person!") a memorable phrase uttered by a far greater man than Podsnap i.e., the immortal Pecksniff. I have not my "Martin Chuzzlewit" by me, but believe the sententious reflective "Pagan, I regret to say" bore reference to the Sirens, and, so far as I recollect, the remark ran "The Sirens were fabulous creatures—Pagan, I regret to say."

No; it is far too delicious an affectation of disapproval even for Mr. Podsnap to monopolize. It is Pecksniffianism in excelsis.

Yours faithfully,
National Liberal Club, Jan. 18. ARTHUR RICKETT.

ROBERT BURTON AND VENUS AND ADONIS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With regard to your interesting allusion to the MSS. note in Burton's Copy of Venus and Adonis, we have, in that quaint and delightful volume, "A Restitution of Decayed Intelligence" (second edition, London, 1628), by that sturdy child of mystery Richard Verstegan (Richard Rowlands was his Oxford name), an eulogy of the writer, signed "R. B.," written in the stanza of Venus and Adonis. Since, according to Robert Chambers, Burton's verses on Melancholy inspired some of the best lines of Milton's "Penseroso," anything that may have emanated from the poetic pen of Democritus Junior (Paucis notus, paucioribus ignotus) seems of interest, and therefore I subjoin the three verses, with modern punctuation and spelling. I leave, however, the old word "stygh"—i.e., to soar—which shows that the author was not so lost in classic lore as to be unable to make a good Saxon pun on his friend's name:—

In Commendation of the Author's Travel
Employed in this Work.

Man's eye is pleased in the beauteous light,
Bred forth of Phoebus' bright arising rays,
But more the mind by taking inward sight,
Of that chief consolation of his days—
Sweet soul-enriching Knowledge, Reason's guest!
Which doth distinguish man from brutish beast.

Endeavour then to know what may be known,
To ignorance permit not any place;
Let never time transport what is our own,
Let wit and learning hold him still in chase;
Let travel search, let searching lastly find,
Let finding please the kind accepting mind.

Industrious then, Verstiegan! forwards stygh,
Raise up thy nation's ancient worthy fame,
Bear on thy wings their glory up on high,
And rise the reputation by the same.
If Envy bite what thou hast here set forth,
She makes herself a witness—'tis of worth. R. B.

Yours faithfully,
H. F. HALL.

Sheffield, Jan. 21.
P.S.—Donnelly, by the way, found reasons for believing that Bacon wrote the "Anatomy of Melancholy!"

THE DICTIONARY OF QUOTATIONS
(FRENCH—ITALIAN).

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your issue of the 19th inst. appears a notice of a Dictionary of Quotations by myself and Colonel Dalbiac.

Your reviewer refers to it as the first instalment. Had he looked at the preface he would have seen that it was the third, collections of English and of Classical Quotations forming part of the series having already appeared.

Your reviewer goes on to specify certain omissions in the French portion. As he justly observes, it is impossible that a work of this nature can contain everything that any one may look for, but of the six "omissions" three are in the book. "De l'audace" is in its right place, on page 38, and is indexed under "audace." "Souvent femme varie" is under "Toute femme varie," the older form, but is indexed under "souvent" and "femme," so should not be hard to find. "Ah ! pour être dévôt" is in its right place on page 5, and is indexed under "dévôt." I am afraid your reviewer did not consult the index, an indispensable preliminary to declaring that a quotation is missing. The other three are not in the book, though the old Italian proverb which is the basis of "Il faut souffrir pour être belle" is to be found on page 261, and is indexed in the English section under "beautiful." I did not during my researches discover the French and more familiar form, nor did I find the other two sayings in French literature, and, as your reviewer may perhaps have noticed, only such proverbs and sayings are quoted in the book as have literary authority. If your reviewer or any of your readers could give me chapter and verse for any of these three I should be extremely grateful.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

Walton-on-Thames, Jan. 22.

THOS. B. HARBOTTLE.

. Our reviewer certainly read the preface, otherwise he would not have known that the volume is, as a matter of fact and despite what Mr. Harbottle says, "a first instalment." The authors there state that "the mass of material was found to be too great to include in one volume; it was therefore decided to issue the first, the present, volume, containing quotations from French and Italian sources only, to be followed in due course by a further volume from German, Spanish, and other sources." We know well and value the Dictionaries of English and of Classical Quotations already published. It would, perhaps, have been clearer if our reviewer had referred to them. But Mr. Harbottle's criticism of what he said is certainly not justified. We are glad to publish his remarks on the quotations which were alleged to be missing; but we confess that in a list of quotations alphabetically arranged we think "souvent femme varie" (the accepted form) should have come under "souvent," and "Ah ! pour être dévôt, &c." should have come under "pour." Nevertheless, we can repeat what our reviewer said as to the value of the book, and assure Mr. Harbottle of our sense of the care with which he and Mr. Dalbiac have performed a difficult task.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The death of the Queen is likely to unsettle the book trade for some time, and the spring publishing season may be thrown back several weeks; but while many books may be held over for the time—for the season promised to begin early this year—there is certain to be a flood of Royal biographies to take their place. One important branch of the business will be seriously affected, for the death of the Sovereign makes the existing Prayer-book obsolete. A number of devotional books will be affected in the same way. The chief difficulty in the case of the Prayer-book, we believe, is that no alteration can be made to the text without official authority, and this may lead to some delay in bringing out the new edition.

The Queen, reluctant though she was to make her first appearance as an author, had the gratification of seeing her two books, "Leaves" and "More Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands," run successfully into eleven editions between them. The first book, edited by Sir Arthur Helps, was originally published by Messrs. Smith, Elder, at 42s., but it is now obtainable in a third edition at half-a-guinea. It also appears in a popular half-a-crown edition and a "People's Edition" at sixpence. It has been translated into Hindustanee. "More Leaves" is now in a fifth edition at half-a-guinea, and also appears in a popular form at half-a-crown. Mr. Humphry Ward's "Reign of Queen Victoria," published by Messrs. Smith, Elder, in 1887, is, we understand, out of print, as also is their "Early Years of the Prince Consort," with notes by her Majesty, prepared under the Queen's direction by General Grey. Sir Theodore Martin's "Life of the Prince Consort," however, which was also prepared under the Queen's direction, and published by Smith, Elder, in 1867, is still obtainable, the five volumes being now in the following editions:—Vol. I., seventh edition; Vol. II., fifth edition; Vol. III., seventh edition; Vol. IV., fifth edition; Vol. V., fourth edition. A people's edition is also issued of this life.

There is a bewildering list of lives of Queen Victoria in the British Museum catalogue—nearly a hundred items under "general biography" alone, while the writings, speeches, and works dealing with separate events run to several hundred more. A large percentage of the biographies are jubilee books, and the remainder range from the collection of reminiscences of the Queen's accession, under the title of "The First Year of a Silken Reign," by Andrew Tuer and Charles Fagan, published by the Leadenhall Press, to Mrs. Oliphant's "Personal Sketch," published by Messrs. Cassell only a month or so ago. There are lives published at all prices, from one penny (the jubilee narrative issued by Messrs. Partridge, which had an enormous circulation) to the handsomely-illustrated three-guinea volume by Mr. Richard Holmes, the Librarian at Windsor, in Messrs. Goupil's "English Historical Series"—several copies of which, we are informed, are still for sale. It will be remembered that a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Holmes' life, with a supplementary chapter bringing the record to the Queen's visit to Ireland last year, was published recently by Messrs. Longmans.

Dr. Tulloch's "Life of the Queen," as in the case of his "Life of the Prince Consort"—both published by Nisbet—was revised by her Majesty, and has had a very large sale. Other successful biographies during the last fifteen years have been Mr. Cordy Jeaffreson's "Victoria, Queen and Empress," published by Heinemann in 1893, but now out of print; Dr. James Macaulay's "Jubilee Life," published by the Religious Tract Society; Robert Wilson's "Life and Times of Queen Victoria," in two volumes, Cassell, 1888; G. Barnett Smith's "Life and Times of Queen Victoria," published by Routledge in 1886; and Mr. Fawcett's Life in the "Eminent Women Series," 1895.

The books of the late Dr. Moses Coit Tyler, mostly published by Messrs. Putnam, did not have a large sale in England, but were widely read in America. His sound scholarship, engaging style, and fearless energy made him a standard authority on the subject of American literary history. He had, however, many literary friends in England, where he spent several years in the sixties, after resigning the pastorate of the first Congregational church in Poughkeepsie, New York. Dr. Tyler worked hard while Professor of the English Language in the State University of Michigan (1867-1881), publishing his "Brawnville Papers" (Boston) in 1868; acting as literary editor of "The Christian Union," 1873-74; contributing frequently to reviews and magazines; and publishing his political, social, and literary "Glimpses of England" (Putnam), as well as the first two volumes of his "History of American Literature During the Colonial Period" (Putnam) in 1878 and his "Manual of English Literature" in the following year. In 1881 he became Professor of American History in Cornell University, the post which he filled up to the time of his death. His "History of American Literature"—now in a new edition, revised—and his "Literary History of the American Revolution," in two volumes (Putnam), are invaluable to every student of American literature. His other publications were "Three Men of Letters" (Berkeley, Dwight, Joel Barlow), published by Putnam, and his "Life of Patrick Henry," in the "American Statesmen" Series (Boston, 1888). He was engaged upon a work entitled "A Century of American Statesmen." Some portion, if not the whole, of the work, which was to be in four volumes, will no doubt be issued. Another volume upon which he worked intermittently was a "Literary History of the American Republic During the First Half-Century of its Independence, 1783-1833," intended to supplement the previously-published volumes.

Lieutenant-Colonel G. F. R. Henderson writes to The Times from the War Office :—

May I, as the official historian of the war in South Africa, claim the courtesy of your columns to ask officers and others who have been engaged in the South African campaign if they will be kind enough to lend me, for the purpose of completing the official history of the war, letters, diaries, sketches, &c., which throw light on any of the operations? I may add that all comments, criticisms, and personal reflections will, if desired, be treated as strictly confidential, and that no document will be allowed to pass out of my own possession until returned. Without the aid of regimental and private records it will be almost impossible to give due prominence to the work done by different corps, or to make the history as instructive as it should be.

Mr. Lane is publishing a volume of verse by Mr. Stephen Gwynn, to be called "The Queen's Chronicle and Other Verses." The first and longest appeared in the Anglo-Saxon, most of the others in the Spectator, and one in Literature.

The Emir Emin Arslan, Consul-General of Turkey at Brussels, has just completed the first portion of a treatise of international law in Arabic. No work of the sort has ever before appeared in the language of Mahomed. The Emir is engaged on the second portion, which will treat of naval warfare.

Messrs. Cassell have begun the publication of the new "Century" edition of their "Illustrated History of England." It is to have a large number of very interesting coloured plates—the first instalment reproduces Ernest Normand's design of "King John Granting Magna Charta" in the Guildhall. The history will also be brought down to the beginning of the twentieth century. When completed it will be a fine edition with nearly 2,000 well-selected illustrations by leading artists.

The Cambridge University Press promise "The Charters of the Borough of Cambridge," edited for the council of the borough and for the Cambridge Antiquarian Society by Professor F. Maitland and Miss Mary Bateson, Associate and Lecturer of Newnham College. With a few exceptions, all the Kings and Queens of England from Henry I. to Charles II. are represented in this book. The work of transcribing and translating the charters was first undertaken by Mr. F. C. Wace and Mr. J. E. L. Whitehead when respectively mayor and town clerk of Cambridge some years ago, and after being subsequently taken up by Dr. Maitland was completed by Miss Bateson.

Messrs. Chatto are bringing out a sixpenny edition of "The New Arabian Nights." The same publishers hope to have Sir Walter Besant's "East London"—part of which has been appearing in the Century Magazine—ready on March 1, illustrated by Mr. L. Raven Hill, Mr. Phil May, and Mr. J. Pennell.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has several new volumes in hand for his "Story of the Nations Series," among them being "The Papal Monarchy; from Gregory the Great to Boniface VIII." (700 years), by Dr. William Barry—whose new novel, by the way, entitled "The Wizard's Knot," will be published by Mr. Unwin on March 18th. In his book on the Papacy Dr. Barry, says the announcement, deals only with facts, not with speculations, and is neither Roman nor Protestant. Three other volumes are announced in the same series—"Mediæval Rome, 1073-1535," by William Miller; a history of "The American Colonies," by Helen Ainslie Smith, from their formation to the declaration of Independence, 1625-1783; and "The United States of America (1783-1900)," by A. C. McLaughlin, Professor of American History in the University of Michigan.

Three devotional volumes are announced for publication by Messrs. Sands—"How to Walk before God: Being the Practice of the Divine Presence," translated by M. S. Dalton from the French of Père Vaubert, S.J., with a preface by Dr. Robert Butler; "Meditations on Psalms Penitential," by the author of "Meditations on the Psalms of the Little Office"; and "Coram Sanctissimo," by Mother Mary Loyala, of the Bar Convent, York, edited by Father Thurston, S.J. Among the first novels to be published by Messrs. Sands are a romance of the war, entitled "The Fugitives," by Mr. Morley Roberts, and "The Heritage," by Mr. Edwin Pugh.

Messrs. J. Pearson and Co. issue a very elegant priced catalogue of "First Editions of One Hundred Masterpieces of Literature" (with full descriptions and many facsimiles), ranging from the classics, through the Middle Ages, down to Maupassant—a representative selection from all the centuries in which the collector of first editions searches for his treasures.

Following on "Constantinople" and "Assisi" in Messrs. Dent's "Mediæval Towns" series, the next new volume in the same series will be Mr. Norwood Young's "Rome," illustrated by Miss Erichsen.

On February 1 a new bi-weekly Franco-Hellenic review called Pallas will begin to appear at Athens, edited by Mr. Alexandre S. Patrickias.

Messrs. Virtue announce a work by Dr. Hugh Macmillan on the Highland part of the course of the River Tay, illustrated with over fifty pictures of the district by Mr. Scott Rankin.

Messrs. Fremantle will publish in February a novel of Norwegian peasant life, entitled "Peasant Lassies," by Mme. Jutta Bell-Ranske, the Norwegian lecturer and teacher of voice production.

Messrs. Methuen are publishing a new edition of Mr. E. L. S. Horsburgh's "Waterloo." Many alterations have been made, a note has been added as an appendix, and an index.

Mr. John Milne writes :—

"I have received the following letter from the author of 'An Absent-Minded War,' a work of which I am the publisher :—
18-1-01.

Dear Sir,—I shall be greatly obliged if you would contradict the reports which have lately been put into circulation as to the authorship of my book, reports curiously wide of the mark.

Yours very truly,

THE AUTHOR OF "AN ABSENT-MINDED WAR."

I shall be glad if you will kindly insert the above in an early issue of your paper."

Messrs. Spottiswoode will shortly publish "The New Century Cookery Book," dealing with everything pertaining to the important art of gastronomy.

The volumes to be added to the "Reformer's Bookshelf" are Mr. Collett's "Taxes on Knowledge" and Mr. Morley's "Life of Richard Cobden," in two volumes. A popular edition is also to appear of Professor Villari's "History of Florence," hitherto only obtainable in two volumes.

Mr. Edward Stanford has removed his head office to Nos. 12, 13, and 14, Long-acre, W.C.

Books to look out for at once.

BIOGRAPHY—

- "Our Naval Heroes." By various writers. Murray. 16s.
- [Short Lives of Nineteen Admirals. Ed. by G. E. Marinden, M.A., with a preface by Lord Charles Beresford.]
- "Kings of the Rod, Rifle, and Gun." By "Thormanby." 2 vols. Hutchinson. 24s. net.
- [Companion volume to "Kings of the Hunting Field."]
- "Famous American Belles of the 19th Century." By V. T. Peacock. Lippincott. 15s.
- "Algernon C. Swinburne: A Study." By T. Wratlaw. Greening. 3s. 6d.
- ["Great Writers" Series. Portrait. Bibliography.]

THEOLOGY—

- "Christ the Life and other Sermons." By the Rev. T. Jordan, D.D. Skeffington. 2s. 6d.
- "St. Francis of Assisi: Lessons from a Noble Life." By the Rev. W. O. E. Oesterley. Skeffington. 2s.
- [Six addresses for Lent.]
- "Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament." By Professor G. A. Smith. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.
- [Yale Lectures on Preaching.]

HISTORY—

- "The Story of Rome." By N. Young. Dent. 4s. 6d. net.
- [Medieval Towns. Illustrated.]
- "History of the Congregational Independency in Scotland." By J. Ross. Maclehose. 5s. net.

MUSIC AND POETRY—

- "Song and Song Writers." By H. T. Finck. Murray. 5s. net.
- [Murray's Musical Series. Portraits.]
- "Burns from Heaven and other Poems." By H. Hendry. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.
- "Self's the Man." A Tragi-comedy. By John Davidson. 5s. net.
- [The new play commissioned by Mr. Tree.]

FICTION—

- "The Sin of Jasper Standish." By Rita. Constable. 6s.
- "Rival Claimants." By Sarah Tytler. Digby and Long. 6s.
- "Domestic Dramas." By Paul Bourget. Downey. 6s.
- "Marked with a Cipher." By W. T. Taunton. Downey. 6s.
- "The Bishop's Gambit." By T. Cobb. Richards. 6s.
- "The Invaders: A Story of Britain's Peril." By Louis Tracey. Pearson. 6s.
- "The Man who Forgot." By John Mackie. Jarrold. 6s.
- "A Wayside Weed." By A. F. Slade. Hutchinson. 6s.
- "Four Red Night Caps." By W. Chesney. Macqueen. 6s.
- "The Tragedy of a Pedigree." By Hugo Ames. Greening. 6s.

SOUTH AFRICA AND CHINA—

- "At Pretoria." By Julian Ralph. Pearson. 6s.
- "Martyred Missionaries; or, the China Inland Mission." By M. Broomhall. Morgan and Scott. 5s.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY—

- "Helwan and the Egyptian Desert." By W. P. May. G. Allen. 3s.
- "The Oak Hamlet: Oakham, Surrey." By H. St. J. H. Bashall. Stock. 5s. net.

"Rambles Round the Edge Hills and in the Valley of the White Horse." By G. Miller. Stock. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL—

"Self-Educator in German." By the Rev. J. Adams. Hodder and Stoughton. 2s. 6d.

["Self Educator" Series.]

"A Short French Grammar for Use of Upper and Middle Forms." By H. Wall. Oxford University Press. 4s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS—

"Domesday and Feudal Statistics." By A. H. Inman. Stock. 10s. 6d.

"Early English Printed Books in the University Library, Cambridge, 1475-1640." Vol. 1. Camb. Univ. Press. 15s. net.

"The Comparative Physiology of the Brain and Comparative Psychology." By Professor Jacques Loeb. Murray. 6s.

["Progressive Science" Series.]

"Deeds of Glory: Stories of our Empire." Jarrold. 2s.

"The Mind of the Century": A Series of Essays. Unwin.

NEW EDITIONS—

"Finn and His Companions." By Standish O'Grady, with illustrations by Jack B. Yeats. Fisher Unwin. 1s.

[Children's Library.]

"Evolution of the Idea of God." 7s. 6d. net. Grant Allen. Grant Richards.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

ART.

The Painters of Florence. By Julia Cartwright. 7½×5in., 373 pp. Murray. 6s.

BIOGRAPHY.

Life of Phillips Brooks. 2 vols. By A. V. G. Allen. 9½×6in., 650+956 pp. Macmillan. 30s. n.

Saint Nicholas I. By Jules Roy. Trans. by Margaret Maitland. 7½×5in., 200 pp. Duckworth. 3s.

Fifty Years of Work in Canada. Scientific and Educational. By Sir W. Dawson, C.M.G., &c. 7½×5in., 308 pp. Ballantyne.

My First Voyage. By R. H. Sherrard. 7½×5in., 176 pp. Digby, Long. 3s. 6d.

DRAMA.

Three Plays for Puritans. The Devil's Disciple, Caesar and Cleopatra, and Capt. Brassbound's Conversion. By Bernard Shaw. 7×5in., 308 pp. Grant Richards. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL.

The Temple Continuous Readers. Books 1, 2, & 3. 7½×5in. Dent. 9d. each.

The Temple Girls' Readers. Books 1, 2, & 3. 7½×5in. Dent. 1s. 3d. each.

The Temple Nature Readers. Books 1 & 2. 7½×5in. Dent. 10d. each.

The Temple Literary Readers. Book 1. 7½×5in. Dent. 10d.

A Short History of Sierra Leone. By J. J. Crooks. 6½×4in., 214 pp. Dublin. The Nation Printing & Pub. Co.

FICTION.

The Coming Waterloo. By Capt. Cairnes. 7½×5in., 364 pp. Constable. 6s.

The Leaven of Love. By Beryl Goldie. 7½×5in., 383 pp. Routledge. 6s.

Driscoll, King of Scouts. By A. G. Hales. 7½×5in., 386 pp. Arrowsmith.

Love Has No Pity. By F. Langbridge. 7½×5in., 308 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

A Wheel of Fire. By Jean Middlemass. 7½×5in., 308 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

Daddy's Girl. By L. T. Meade. 7½×5in., 340 pp. Newnes. 3s. 6d.

LITERARY.

Macaulay. A Lecture at Cambridge on Aug. 10, 1900. By Sir R. C. Jebb, M.P. 7½×5in., 59 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 2s.

An English Miscellany. Presented to Dr. Furnivall in Honour of His Seventy-Fifth Birthday. 8½×5in., 500 pp. Clarendon Press. 21s.

MILITARY.

Australia at the Front. By F. Wilkinson. 7½×5in., 286 pp. J. Long. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Eccentricities of Genius. By Major J. B. Pond. 9×6in., 564 pp. Chatto & Windus. 12s.

An Englishman's Love-Letters. 5½×3½in., 71 pp. Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. n.

Book-keeping for Business Men. By J. and S. W. Thornton. 7½×5in., 185 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

The Meaning of Good. A Dialogue. By C. L. Dickinson. 7×4½in., 231 pp. Glasgow. Maclehose. 3s. 6d. n.

The Antiquary. Vol. for 1900. 10×7½in., 388 pp. Stock. 7s. 6d.

PHILOSOPHY.

Whence and Whither. An Inquiry into the Nature of the Soul, its Origin, and its Destiny. By Dr. P. Carus. 8×5½in., 188 pp. Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d.

Imitation; or, The Mimetic Force in Nature and Human Nature. By R. Steel. 7½×5in., 197 pp. Simpkin. 4s. 6d.

A Sketch of the Development of Philosophic Thought from Thales to Kant. By L. Noiré. 9×5½in., 359 pp. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. n.

POETRY.

John of Damascus. By Douglas Ainslie. 7½×5in., 129 pp. Unicorn Press. 5s. n.

Phaëthon. By Henry Abbey. 6½×4½in., 126 pp. Kingston, New York: Styles. $0.75.

POLITICAL.

China's Only Hope. By Chang Ching Tung. 7½×5in., 151 pp. Oliphant. 3s. 6d.

REPRINTS.

Bones and I. By G. Whyte-Melville. 8×5½in., 259 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

American Notes, &c. (New Century Dickens.) 6½×4½in., 416 pp. Nelson. 2s. n.

Guy Mannering. (New Century Scott.) 6½×4½in., 532 pp. Nelson. 2s. n.

The Adventures of Philip. (New Century Thackeray.) 6½×4½in., 744 pp. Nelson. 2s. n.

Carlyle's French Revolution. (The Minerva Library.) 7½×5in., 624 pp. Ward, Lock. 2s.

SCIENCE.

Modern Astronomy. By H. H. Turner, F.R.S. 7½×5in., 286 pp. Constable. 6s. n.

Electricity Simplified. By A. T. Stewart, A.I.E.E. 7½×5in., 165 pp. Chambers. 1s. 6d.

In Nature's Workshop. By Grant Allen. 7½×5in., 240 pp. Newnes. 3s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

The Fatal Opulence of Bishops. By H. Handley. 9×6in., 149 pp. Black. 5s.

Encyclopædia Biblica. Vol. II. Ed. by Rev. T. K. Cheyne, D.D., and J. S. Black, LL.D. 11×8in. Black. 20s. n.

Sermons on the Books of the Bible. Selected from the Volume of Village Sermons by the late F. J. A. Hort, D.D. 7½×5in., 143 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

TRAVEL.

In Tuscany. By M. Carmichael. 8½×5½in., 335 pp. Murray. 9s. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXX.

By L. A. CARDOZA, Braga, Brazil.
BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 9 pieces.
White mates in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CCXI.

By KARL KONDELIK, Bohemia.
BLACK. 13 pieces.

WHITE. 9 pieces.
White mates in three moves.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A. L. S.—1. What you, in common with many of greater experience, forget is that a pawn arriving at the 8th rank may become either Q, Kt, R, or B at the player's option.

2. You may have half-a-dozen queens at once.

W. M. E. (Croydon).—You showed too great a readiness to exchange, thus somewhat spoiling the interest of the game. You also allowed your opponent to win a pawn when a simple exchange of pawns (move 8) was advisable.

THE MONTE CARLO TOURNAMENT.—The entries for this event, due February 5, are likely to include Blackburne, Gunsberg, Marshall (New York), Lipschütz, Mieses, Tschigorin, Alapin, Schlechter, Marco, Janowski, and Reggio (Italy).

BRILLIANT END-GAMES.

A. BLACK.

WHITE. 9 pieces.
White to play and win.

B. BLACK.

WHITE. 9 pieces.
Black to play—White wins.

Note.—In Game "A" White, who is several pieces to the bad, wins easily, mating, we believe, brilliantly in four moves. In "B" White (Mr. Gunston) has just played Q-Kt2 and Black replied P×Kt3 hoping if Q×Q to regain that piece with effect by Kt-B7 ch. &c. White now wins by a brilliant combination, e.g.—1. Kt-K7 ch, K-R sq: 2. Kt-K6 ch, K-Kt sq (or Q×Q ch wins): 3. Q-Q5 ch! This was one of the Llandudno games.

GAME No. LVIII.—Played by correspondence:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
Dr. F. Liharszik.	E. R. Feyerfeil.	Dr. F. Liharszik.	E. R. Feyerfeil.
1. P-Q4	P-Q4	22. B-R3	P-K Kt4
2. P-K B4	B-B4	23. B-B sq	Q-Kt3
3. P-K3	P-K3	24. R-Kt sq	R-K B2
4. B-Q3	B×B	25. B-Q2	P-R4
5. Q-K B3	Q-Q2	26. R-K B sq	K-Kt2
6. Kt-K B3	Kt-Q B3	27. Q-R-R sq	R (B2)-R2
7. P-B3	Kt-B3	28. P-Kt3	B-K2
8. Castles	B-K2	29. B-B sq	P-B5
9. Kt-K5	Kt×Kt	30. Q×Q ch	K×Q
10. B P×Kt	Kt-K5	31. K P×P	P×P
11. Kt-Q2	Kt×Kt	32. P×P	R×R P
12. B×Kt	Castles K R	33. R×R	R×R
13. P-Q Kt4	P-K B4	34. K-Kt2	B-B sq
14. P-Q R4	P-Q Kt3	35. P-R4	K-B4
15. R-R2	P-Q R4	36. R-B2	R-R8
16. P×P	R×P	37. R-B sq	B-R3
17. K-R-R sq	Q R-R sq	38. K-Kt sq	K-Kt5
18. B-B sq	P-Kt2	39. K-Kt2	R-Q Kt3
19. R-Kt sq	P-Q B5	40. P-B5	R×B
20. Q-B2	B-Q sq	41. P×P	R×R
21. R-Kt4	Q-K B2	42. P-K7	R-B sq & wins (a)

(a) There is a little novelty here in the opening. 2. P-K B4 being unusual. The game proceeds evenly until the end, when Black gets the better game. It seems that White relied upon his moves 40 to 42, which Black cleverly met.

GAME No. LIX.—A brilliancy in Russia:—

White.	Black.	White.	Black.
B. Schawrow.	A. Donetzki.	B. Schawrow.	A. Donetzki.
1. P-K4	P-K4	17. Kt×Q B P	K×Kt
2. Kt-Q B3	Kt-Q B3	18. P-Q5	B×Kt
3. P-B4	P×P	19. Q-Kt3	Q-B sq
4. P-Q4	Q-R5 ch	20. P×P ch	K×P
5. K-K2	P-Kt4	21. P-Kt	P×P
6. Kt-B3	Q-R4	22. P-K5 ch	K-K2
7. Kt-Q5	K-Q sq	23. P×P sq	B×P
8. K-B2	P-K R3	24. B-B5 ch	K-Q sq
9. B-Q3	B-Kt2	25. B-Kt6 ch	K-K2
10. P-B3	P-B3	26. B-Kt6	B-Q4
11. P-K Kt3	P×P ch	27. Q-Kt4 ch	K-Q2
12. P×P	Q-K sq	28. K-R-Q sq	Q-Q Kt sq
13. P-K3	P-R3	29. R×B ch	P×R
14. P-R4	P-Q3	30. R-B7 ch	Q×R
15. Q-R-B sq	B-Kt5	31. B×Q	K×B
16. P-B5	Q-K3	32. Q-B5 ch	Resigns

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 172. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
POEM—"The Queen," by Dr. Richard Garnett, C.B.	81
NOTES OF THE DAY	82
PERSONAL VIEWS—"Fiction and the Public," by Frederick Wedmore	83
REVIEWS—
An English Miscellany	84
China's Only Hope—Self's the Man	85
The Coming Waterloo—The Visits of Elizabeth	86
OBITUARY—Signor Giuseppe Verdi—Mr. H. R. Haweis	86, 87
AMONG THE MAGAZINES—I.	87
CORRESPONDENCE—The Poetry of the Twentieth Century (Mr. T. H. Warren)—Decadent Metres	88
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for	89
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	90

EDUCATIONAL SUPPLEMENT—

CONFERENCES AND A COUNCIL OF PERFECTION, by Francis Storr	1
THE POSITION OF ASSISTANT MASTERS. I.—By A. H. Gilkes. II.—By T. E. Page	2, 3
REVIEWS—
Classical	4
Modern Languages	8
English	9
Science and Mathematics	10
Miscellaneous	10
NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS	11, 12

THE QUEEN.

I.

The Century that to the grave is gone,
Whose birth was fear, confusion, and lament,
Parted in joy, beholding ere it went
High jubilee of happy Albion.
Another step of Time's long stair is won ;
O'er widening life an ampler prospect lent ;
New morning streams o'er isle and continent ;
Where is the glorious Light that was our Sun ?
Yet, Britain mine, though chiefly o'er thy coasts
The all-eclipsing shade broods dim and blind,
And tears more sad from springs more sacred flow,
Thine is but one among the mourning hosts.
Thy sorrow is the sorrow of mankind,
And the wide world is darker for thy woe.

II.

Yea, the wide world is darker for thy woe !
What blast of all the many-roaming gales
But speeds or thwarts some errand of thy sails,
And waves thy Empire's banner to and fro ?
Where the brief sun shines dim on mounded snow,
Where luxury of summer never pales,
Where frost with fire is poised in even scales,
Hearts beat to bleed, eyes ope to overflow.
The great confederate Land decree divine
Dissevered from her Mother, so to lend
Thy language and thy laws yet wider reach,
Droops, what to foe did never yet incline,
Her constellated flag ; and sighings send
The swarthy nations, skillless of our speech.

III.

The swarthy nations, skillless of our speech,
Where neath the starry Cross the suppliant throng
Sue for thy sword to remedy their wrong,
And rule humane and equal right beseech :—
Or where late laurel veils the baleful breach
Where Gordon died, and speed of Nilus strong
Rolls on rich wave the liquid life along
Thy science stores, thy care divides for each :—
Or where from Comorin to Cashmere reigns
The British Peace, and fly to gloomy lair
The fiends of Plague and Famine overthrown :—
Or where new drops for their decrepid veins
The dateless empires from thy fount would share :—
By these for theirs is thy bereavement known.

IV.

By all for theirs is thy bereavement known !
Around earth's circle tolls the heavy bell ;
In thousand tongues the thousand nations tell
Of orphaned multitude and stricken Throne :
And prudent Kings and counsellors grey-grown
New writing on the wall discern, and spell
The silent sign and script irrevocable,
And reason of the things that shall be shown.
But lost is a nobility from Life
Not soon restored, for Time by Time repairs
Slowly a cedar-crest of Lebanon.
More gravely garbed, with moodier musings rife,
The youthful Age upon its journey fares
Than that which to the sepulchre is gone.

RICHARD GARNETT.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

If a biographer of the Queen sets about to utilize the immense mass of newspaper matter which has been written about her Majesty during the past fortnight, he will certainly have to devote himself to selecting the wheat from the chaff—the really discriminatory " appreciations " and the really authentic details from the general journalistic matter. Few, we suppose, will hesitate to put the complete historical life given by The Times at the head of set biographies. Among collections of " reminiscences " one of the best we have come across is that of the Record of January 25. It is, of course, mainly confined to the religious life of her Majesty ; but it shows how much material there is for a biographer to collect from various books and papers such as the Life of Archbishop Tait, the Life of Archbishop Benson by his son, Mr. Hodder's Life of Lord Shaftesbury, the Rev. W. Tulloch's Life of the Queen, and various papers in provincial journals.

* * * *

Queen Victoria was herself an artist as well as a patroness of art. Save for a study in crayon of a little girl, made in 1829, one of the earliest of her known drawings is that dated

Kensington Palace, March 7th, 1833. It is after Hayter, and represents a Georgian mother teaching her little girl to play the guitar. The drawing is one of several executed at Kensington Palace in the early Thirties, when Richard Westall taught the young Princess. Another is a study of two Roman peasant girls moving with palls on their well-poised heads. That a girl of fourteen or fifteen should have executed these drawings gives some colour to the remark of one of her masters that "she would have made the best female artist of her day, if she had not been born to wear a crown."

Soon after her marriage, the Queen caused a room at Buckingham Palace to be fitted up with all appliances for etching—apparently her favourite medium. Among the best of the etchings is a full-length portrait of a girl, signed, and dated 1840. She is in simple frock, and stands in simple attitude, with the right foot placed on a bank in front of her. The original copper plate is at the Tussaud exhibition, as are two others, one of a female head, dated December 27, 1840, and the other of a seated female figure, executed in February of the following year. Some years ago the Queen presented several water-colour drawings and a set of proof etchings to the Royal Anglo-Australian Society of Melbourne. The etchings included the earliest portrait of the Princess Royal in the arms of her nurse, her attention being momentarily attracted by a caged parrot; the same little lady at the age of one, seated on the floor playing with her ball; "Victoria on January 1, 1844, in the costume of the late Princess Royal, after West"; the Princess Adelaide of Hohenlohe, dated 1840; and the late Duke of Coburg, in all the pride of three summers, wearing sailor dress and an old-fashioned naval hat. Signed proofs of the last two were contributed by her Majesty to the Artists' War Fund of 1900, adding thereto the sum of 280 guineas. In September, 1840—it may have been under the influence of Landseer, whose animal studies she so much admired—the Queen made an etching of her favourite Skye terrier, "Islay, from nature."

There are etched portraits by the Queen of nearly all the Royal children: of "Louise," 1851, of "Alice," 1850, of "Alfred," 1852, of "Albert," in the same year, and of "Victoria," 1857, besides many plates of the Duchess of Kent. In these studies the Queen had a comrade in the Prince Consort, from whose hand came many examples, including the "Head of a Man," dated 1840, which, with an autograph specially written by her Majesty, realized 34 guineas at the War Fund sale.

Mr. W. L. Leitch was one of several of her Majesty's masters in the domain of water-colour, and he has left a record of the first lesson which he gave her Majesty. He was impressed with the intelligent and earnest interest taken by his Royal pupil in colour principles, which, apparently, had till then been unexplained. In this kind there are now in the public collection at Melbourne portraits of "Arthur" (Duke of Connaught) at the age of three, a full-length figure in reddish brown frock; of Princess Victoria, executed at Balmoral on June 5 and 6, 1875; of "Killa of Hesse"; and of Princess Alix, begun on May 20, 1875, in a pink and white frock. Perhaps the most successful work in any medium is a sketch of a girl bending, hands folded before bosom, over a table, where lies open a devotional book. Conceivably this may have been suggested or copied from a picture by Lawrence. In any case the treatment is most graceful; the attitude is good, and the main lines have not been set down at mere haphazard. It is said that the Queen could draw with considerable effect on stone, but we cannot remember that any of her lithographs have been exhibited.

The first book to be issued by the Doves Press at Hammer-smith, the "Agricola of Tacitus," will be ready for subscribers very soon. Mr. Emery Walker and Mr. Cobden Sanderson intend to do their best to keep up the traditions of fine printing which William Morris left. They were both personal friends of Morris, and the Doves Press is very near Kelmscott House, whence the famous Kelmscott Press took its name. Their type is an adaptation of a fount by Jenson, who flourished at Venice in the fifteenth century. The specimens that have been issued show that it happily combines a dignified seemliness of aspect with ease in reading, that other necessary quality of type which enthusiastic printers have sometimes overlooked. Other works, besides the "Agricola," edited by Mr. Mackail, are "The Ideal Book or Book Beautiful," a tract by Mr. Cobden Sanderson, who speaks with authority on such a subject; and Ruskin's "Unto This Last," which will be published by Mr. George Allen. The most interesting project which the Doves Press has in contemplation is the printing of the authorized version of the Bible by arrangement with the Cambridge University Press. The publication would be in five parts, priced at about 60s. each; and the parts would be published by subscription. The idea is not likely to be without fruit. There must be a great many people who would be glad to possess the Bible printed in a gracious type with all the beauty that the printer's art can suggest, and, so far as we know, there is not any modern Bible that answers this description.

* * * *

A correspondent criticizes our remarks on the printing of plays with the name of the speaker in the middle of the page. What we said was perhaps a little sweeping, but we were speaking only of the English custom, and we are quite aware that among Englishmen the modern dramatist is becoming fond of the habit. Mr. Bernard Shaw nevertheless is one playwright who is still content to print his dramas in the manner which is thought good enough for Shakespeare and Sheridan; and we adhere to our opinion that the new fashion often gives a reader a wholly wrong impression of the give and take of dialogue.

A few years ago the notion that our commercial supremacy was dependent upon the efficiency of our educational institutions would have been treated with genial derision. A long period of prosperity had satisfied the successful business man of his ability to keep ahead of all foreign rivals. Education of some sort or other, like measles or other infirmities of childhood, was in his eyes a necessary evil, but hardly worthy of a sensible man's serious attention. Soon, however, foreign competition ceased to be the bogey of the lecture-room, and entered the arena of practical economics. The bewildered merchant recognized that each year was diminishing the profits of his business, and that the despised foreigner was pushing his way into markets that had hitherto been closed to him. To bear the blame of such a deplorable state of things some scapegoat had to be found. After long groping in the dark, the British public in its collective wisdom bethought itself of the schoolmaster, and decided that the root of the mischief lay in the deficiencies of our modern education. Lord Rosebery recently assumed the prophetic mantle and warned his hearers that they must be prepared for a "war of trade," in which the victor's spoils would be the commercial supremacy of the world. The best preparation for such a contest was, in his opinion, a higher and more extended system of commercial education.

The publication of our Educational Supplement suggests some considerations as to the provision that is being made for the educational equipment of our future soldiers of commerce. Little need be said of those special but vitally important branches of industrial education, primarily concerned with the manufacture of commodities. The progress which technical education has made within the last few years is very encouraging. Much has been done by the munificence of private benefactors, supplemented by Government subsidies and the unstinted support of the County Council, to put us on a level with our Continental competitors. Commercial education, on the other hand, is still embryonic. We cannot be said as yet to have passed the stage of reports, committees, Royal Commissions, and all the other outward and visible signs of hesitancy and indecision. Only here and there has any serious attempt been made to introduce systematic instruction in strictly commercial subjects. The London Chamber of Commerce and the London School of Economics are doing good work in this direction. To many the successful organization of commercial education on the Continent suggests a close imitation of their methods as the best solution of our difficulties. But in estimating the value of, let us say, German schools of this type, we must remember the special inducements which they can offer to their students. The remission of a year's military service to those who hold the leaving-certificate of a Realschule is in itself for an ambitious lad an inestimable privilege. Moreover, the State offers to all who have completed their full course in a Realschule exceptional facilities for entering the public service as well as many of the more lucrative professions, and additional privileges to those who have worked their way through the more elaborate curriculum of an Oberrealschule. Employers have proved ready enough to follow the lead of the Government. With practical unanimity they insist on their clerks holding the leaving-certificate. The same state of things with slight modifications exists in France and Belgium. A successful course of study in a Higher Commercial School is becoming an essential preliminary to a business career. Clearly any attempt to reproduce similar conditions in English life would be doomed to failure. The country would strenuously oppose State regulation of the conditions of entrance into this or that occupation. Nor is there any sign that employers are as a body anxious to secure specially trained clerks. Many of our most successful merchants, in fact, have expressed their conviction that the best commercial school is the business itself. A good secondary education, they think, is a better introduction to a business career than the specialized course of a purely commercial academy. But if there is no necessity for specifically commercial schools it is none the less the duty of the schoolmaster to shake himself free from traditional methods. It is in the re-organization of secondary schools that we must place our hopes of maintaining commercial pre-eminence. The large and well-endowed schools, there is little doubt, will be fully equal to the task. The Modern Side, too frequently in the past the dumping-ground of the dullard, must be kept closely in touch with the varying requirements of business life. A course of study, comprising the mastery of two foreign languages, a knowledge of the principles of political economy, and a thorough grasp of the mechanism of commerce, would be at once a liberal education and an admirable preparation for the work of life. The smaller schools, where the endowments are quite unequal to any exceptional strain, present more difficulty. Many of them, for the sake of the grant, have reluctantly transformed themselves into organized schools of science, and pass to a large extent under the control of South Kensington. Science is a jealous mistress. She makes imperious demands, and it is very doubtful whether her devotees will find much opportunity for the development of the commercial side of their training. A glance at the time-table of a German Realschule shows that, although science is not excluded, it is at least duly subordinated to the main objects of the school. For the successful adaptation of existing educational institutions to their new work, the active co-operation and support of the Chambers of Commerce will be necessary. There are on all sides abundant indications that their help and guidance will not be withheld. Possibly they may be inclined to do more than merely advise. The endowment of Travelling Scholarships would enable clever boys on the Modern Side to obtain the highest commercial education. And such a step would also help to provide a supply of competent language masters. It is only by some such joint action on the part of educational and commercial experts that the difficulties in the way of educational reform can be overcome, and our existing types of secondary school so modified as to meet successfully the new needs of modern life.

Personal Views.

FICTION AND THE PUBLIC.

There is not one public, but many publics—that is the beginning of the whole matter. When a bookseller says "the public wants this" or "the public does not want that," he is speaking, really, not of the world of English readers, but of an assemblage of persons sufficiently large to compass what he would call the success, or prevent what would seem to him the failure, of a book. Very few are the books in any one generation that reach the English-speaking world. Many great English Classics have never reached the English-speaking world at all—or never the mind of that world. They are published in cheap agreeable form, when the copyright has expired, and are illustrated prettily by Anning Bell or Byam Shaw, and are put into pretty covers; and the world that does not read them at all, or that reads them only fifty years after they were written, thinks fit to buy them and put them on the table—tasteful decorative objects, nice little pieces of furniture.

There are many publics then, larger or smaller, and they are of different kinds. Presently I shall try to say a word as to what the kinds are, and how their approval is to be won; but first I will say this one thing, with all possible earnestness—a writer's real business is to disregard these publics altogether. A writer must study life. He must study the Masters. And he must let the public, larger or smaller, wiser or more foolish, come to him if it will, or stay away from him altogether, if that is what it prefers to do. In any case he will have done his work; though of course if he wins approval, by which I do not mean popularity, he will have done that work in the warmth of sympathy and under the glow of support. And if, on the other hand, no approval has been vouchsafed to him—not even the approval of the wise and the few—he will have done his work, savagely perhaps, but he will have done it, still.

And now to speak for a moment of the different publics, and what these publics want; for I know that my last paragraph—my recommendation to disregard the contemporary, outside verdict—will seem to many only a "counsel of perfection," not a practical matter at all. This public, then, which the practical writer is supposed to be trying to catch at—shaping his imaginative work either much or a little in deference to its needs—what does it really want? It wants at different times different things; but there are two or three methods of practice which it, or a part of it, never ceases to want, or at least never ceases to be content with.

The immediate success—which not once in a thousand times turns out to be the lasting one—is scored often by the dexterous treatment of topics uppermost in the public mind. The topic may be theological. There may be a tendency in the particular day to revert to an older order of ideas, which have been considered outworn. Or there may be a newer tendency towards tolerance, breadth, what is called "progress," and the sufficiently equipped writer, who takes advantage of a widely-spread interest in these things, has his reward almost surely. Are we concerned not exactly with Theology, but with the apparently irrepressible influence of occult forces?—the things in Heaven and Earth not dreamt of in our philosophy—these things are a mine for the writer who knows how to work it. Again, the bait of Reality is constantly an effective one: an immense piquancy, in the opinion of stupid people, resides in the fact that a thing happens to be true. Still more engaging must the matter be if it can be artfully suggested that it is not certain whether it is true or not true. A not inconsiderable public, with little else to occupy itself about, will settle down to the judicial examination of this question, and many an edition of a quite insipid work may be happily worked off before that public, which is concerned with the matter, has made up its mind on the all-important question. Then, again, there is the order of success that is attainable by the merely rousing some little curiosity as to a book's authorship. It is by nobody in particular, probably; but it has been published anonymously, and, if a book is published anonymously, is there any reason why it should not have been written by Hardy or George Meredith, by Mr. Balfour in the intervals of golf playing, or by the Lord Chief Justice during the Long Vacation? At all events an enormous number of readers are quite unable to say or see that there is any reason; and the immense multiplication of newspapers has placed some critical pens in the hands of foolish persons.

Again, there is always a certain public sure to welcome a novel that deals rather grossly with the relations of the sexes. For a real study of the Psychology of the matter there is a very small public, but there is quite a large one for the rough, crude, garish handling of sexual affairs. The treatment of sexual affairs that suits this particular public is not a treatment concerned in the least with the individualities of character and temperament—with the clash and contact and magnetism of particular natures at particular crises. The treatment deals only with that which is thought to be common to all, and it is a vulgar treatment. I read very sparingly—I must crave leave to admit—the novels of the least illustrious of my contemporaries; but word is brought to me now and again by enterprising people who have leisure and courage to journey into these obscure fields; and, from the word that is brought, I am permitted to gather that the licence of expression gets greater every few years—that what was thought indecent ten years ago was only improper five years since, and is now a matter of course and nothing at all to find fault with.

But even while all this is going on—while a great succès de vente is being secured by the coarse and common, the absolutely inartistic treatment of themes permitted to the master but withheld from the dunce—the public, or a large public, a public that makes a success, has a fit of simplicity, and reads, with sudden avidity, bald tales about village life, country town life, not necessarily in England at all, and reads them under the impression that it is reading a “Cranford.”

One other condition under which a novel presents itself favourably to the public, it occurs to me to mention. It has a great advantage if it can present itself as foreign. Hospitality to the stranger is now a leading characteristic of the English novel-reading world. Far are we from the days when we deserved, if we ever deserved, the reproach of André Chénier, who said of us that we were ridiculous admirers of ourselves alone, that we were “du génie étranger détracteurs ridicules.” Guy de Maupassant's work, clever and forcible, decisive if a little superficial, has had the fullest justice done to it by the average Englishman and by the critical writer. Zola's work—some of which is work of genius—has been admitted by the whole reading public. But, notwithstanding all that I have said about the acceptability of grossness, would the particular naughtiness of Guy de Maupassant and the occasionally irrelevant hideousness of Zola have been received at all if these writers had been English instead of foreign? Undoubtedly not; though I am aware, of course, that in marking the difference in their reception, it is reasonable also to take account of the fact that we may forgive fairly enough work that is done from a standpoint that could not be our own. Turguenef's success, Tolstoi's success, is due, in part, to a certain interest created by the remoteness of their themes. Their very subjects, the lands in which their stories pass, insured a measure of novelty—and novelty is always the comfort of the blasé. One other comfort is reserved to him, too—let it be his to welcome, and his ridiculously to overrate the value of, those many pages by Gabriele D'Annunzio which are animalism and brutality, brutality and animalism alone.

I am afraid I seem to have been dwelling a good deal upon successes attained by means not at all the worthiest, and upon an order of book that lies outside the range of many not altogether unwise people. But how many readers amongst the English public has the one delightful and consummate artist amongst French novelists got to set against the troop of readers attracted by exotic grossness? Anatole France is read in England chiefly by his smaller or greater fellow-artists; he is not eagerly asked for by the novel-reading public, but his audience is of the kind that bestows upon him the blue ribbon of his craft. Is André Theuriet very much read? Is Victor Cherbuliez? Has René Bazin a crowd of devotees? With us, I fear, the readers who avoid the offensive are a little apt to neglect the purely artistic. The artistic problem, the technical achievement, does not much interest, does not much concern, the average bourgeois mind; and the conventionally educated person, the “tired clergyman,” the cultivated spinster, the reader who swears by the Spectator, wants either pleasant novelty or pleasant familiarity of subject, but never wants Art.

Although the novel-reading public of one kind and another must now be infinitely larger than in the days of Dickens, Thackeray, and Trollope, I doubt if it is as good a public. The better part of that good public of old days exists still, but it is swamped, its tastes are overruled; it is to some extent itself led away by that larger, more superficially educated, and more thoughtless public which ensures the commercial success of work which, if not by any means always vulgar or unworthy, is at all events inferior. We are in a time of transition. Sooner or later the public, I believe, will itself be a better public, and sooner or later there will be more writers to add to the scanty few who now, according to their lights, uphold in narrative Fiction the interests of literary Art. Fiction, the long story or the short story, cannot be produced for ever out of moulds long accepted—dare I say long used up? Individuality of method—the expression of your mind and message in your own and nobody else's way—will come hereafter to be more and more aimed at by writers; and in the public there will be increased receptiveness, a more diffused alertness, to accept each man's new method, each man's sincere and careful view of the world as he finds it.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

Reviews.

THE FURNIVALL BIRTHDAY BOOK.

AN ENGLISH MISCELLANY. Presented to Dr. Furnivall in Honour of his Seventy-Fifth Birthday. (The Clarendon Press. 21s.)

Perhaps there is no man now living to whom the historical study of English owes more than to the veteran Dr. Furnivall, whose seventy-sixth birthday falls on Monday next. We are glad to think that his claims to just honour have not been neglected by the chief living students of our language. About a year and a half ago it was decided by some of his friends, "chiefly students and professors of English literature," to celebrate his seventy-fifth birthday in some fit way. Accordingly a fund was raised, which it was felt could be spent—as to part of it—in no better fashion than in giving Dr. Furnivall a new boat. He has long been able to say, with the hero of James Thomson's poem, "Most of all I love and prize This boating on our river," and he was a partner in the work of building the first narrow wagger-boat launched in this country, as long ago as 1845. He refused, in a letter equally characteristic in style and spelling, to accept a new boat. "The fact is," he wrote, "that at Richmond a randan can't be kept in a boathouse and run in and out as you want her; she is too heavy and the banks are too high. She has to lie out in the river all the season, getting rub'd by other boats, so that at the end of the season a new boat looks just like an old one. I couldn't take a new boat. But I will gladly accept a second-hand one, wh can be knockt about and lent to friends." The Committee managed to persuade Dr. Furnivall to sit for his portrait, and the rest of their fund, amounting to four hundred guineas, has been devoted to the Early English Text Society. We are rejoiced to see that part of it is to be spent in reissuing the very interesting "Handlyng Synne," by Richard of Brunne, which Dr. Furnivall edited nearly forty years ago for the too exclusive Roxburghe Club. The last, but not the least, interesting portion of the birthday present now appears, just a year late, in the form of the "Miscellany"—what the Germans call a "Festschrift"—which has been prepared from the contributions of some fifty well-known students of English in Europe and America. No disrespect is intended to them when we say that the most remarkable of all the contributions to it is the bibliography of Dr. Furnivall's own work, which covers just half a century of strenuous, inspiring, and self-denying labour. It is enough to mention, among the admirable pieces of work which it includes, the Six-Text Chaucer and the Shakespeare Quartos to which every modern student owes so much, and to add that Dr. Furnivall founded the Early English Text, the New Shakespeare, and the Chaucer Societies, besides others of minor note. He also became secretary to the Philological Society in 1854.

Turning from the recipient of this handsome birthday book to the book itself, we cannot profess an intention of criticizing the work in detail. The names of the editors—Professors Skeat, Napier, and Ker—are sufficient warrant for its quality. Whilst, as was only to be expected, some of the contributors have sent in rather trifling notes, others have provided matter of considerable interest. First we have Mr. Henry Bradley's suggestive "bunch of guesses" as to some prehistoric river-names. They deal with the Avons (i.e., simply "rivers") of the south-west. In prehistoric times Mr. Bradley thinks all these rivers must have had special names of their own. He suggests, for instance, that the old name of Shakespeare's river may have been the Wrangon, which gave its name to Warwick, the Caer Wrangon of Welsh tradition, which became in English mouths Waeringe-wic. This is rather a nebulous fabric, but it is the sort of thing that may any day be made an important hypothesis by other discoveries. Then we come to an interesting voice from a leading American University in the shape of Mr. J. W. Bright's fragment on "grammatical ictus in English verse," which contains some acute speculations on the conditions of reading poetry aloud, and incidentally raises the question why poets often read their own work so differently from other people. Dr. Earle sends a weighty though brief and disjointed disquisition on "the place of English in education," urging that the educational advantages gained through Latin might be gained more directly and naturally through English grammar. Professor Oliver Elton, who has just been promoted from Manchester to Liverpool, has written a very striking paraphrase of part of the Book of Judith in alliterative verse. Mr. Israel Gollancz has edited, for the first time, a quaint and rather pleasing "alliterative religious lyric" of the fourteenth century, called by him "The Quatrefoil of Love." Here and there it shows a really charming lyrical faculty, and it is a pity that its author cannot be traced—for he was certainly not Huchown. Mr. F. B. Gummere traces out an interesting anthropological question, the "nephew-right" or importance of the "sister's son" in English and Scottish popular ballads. M. Jusserand—writing, as is his wont, in English—sends a delightful "note on pageants and 'scaffolds hye,'" in which he wears his learning, as ever, lightly as a flower; with it one may couple Mr. Sidney Lee's lecture on the probable attitude of the Elizabethan playgoer to Shakespeare. Professor Ker criticizes Panurge's English, or rather Scotch, and Professor Napier describes the well-known Franks Casket, with photographs. M. Gaston Paris, Professor Skeat, Professor York Powell, Mr. Sweet, Dr. A. W. Ward, and Mr. Paget Toynbee send characteristic contributions. We must call special attention to the series of notes signed by such German names of eminence as Brandl, Förster, Kluge, Koepfel, and Morsbach, though they appeal solely to the specialist. The book has for its appropriate frontispiece an excellent portrait of Dr. Furnivall, with his autograph.

A Chinese Viceroy's View of China.

CHINA'S ONLY HOPE (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, 3s. 6d.) must be read by all those who want to know what Chang Chih-Tung thinks. He is a Viceroy of proved probity and a patriotism none the less sincere because he is willing that the heads of foreign devils should remain upon their shoulders. His great desire is that China should accept reforms not for the advantage of Europe, but for her own advantage, and he has the courage to hold up to his countrymen the example of the Japanese, who have exploited Europe instead of permitting Europe to exploit them. He wants a big army, and a big fleet, and plenty of railways, and plenty of foreign books, and an improved system of education. He is also in favour of religious toleration, and draws his own distinction between the religious wars of Asia and Europe:—

In the latter country the strife has been waged for mastery by the ambitions of men. In China the fight for Confucianism against Taoism and Buddhism has been for principle.

No doubt he would say the same of the fight for Confucianism against Christianity; but as he also offers an elaborate demonstration that it is not true that Christian patent medicines are made of the powdered eyeballs of Chinese babies, he has the honour of being taken in hand, translated, and introduced by missionaries. The translation is by Mr. Samuel T. Woodbridge, and the introduction by Mr. Griffith John, who opines, differing from Chang Chih-Tung, that "Christianity alone can form a safe and adequate basis for the reformation which the Viceroy seeks." It is a notable little book, the publication of which is said to have precipitated the coup d'état, and may be studied with profit by any one who wants to know how the Chinese intellect works.

Mr. Davidson's New Play.

Mr. Davidson's play SELF'S THE MAN (Grant Richards, 5s.) would probably act better than it reads. It is described as a tragic comedy; that is, it is not particularly tragic, nor yet particularly comic; but it contains several highly dramatic situations which, though poison and dagger fail to do their work, will be effective enough on the stage. The difficulty is to interest oneself in a period so remote and so little known as the eighth century; or in the kingdom of Lombardy, which was then coming to an end, in spite of the triumph with which Mr. Davidson concludes his play. If this one difficulty can be overcome, it will be found that the drama is constructed with a great deal of skill, and that the central figure, the elected King of Lombardy, is a solid piece of character drawing. It must be said, however, that the author's strength is not so much in his poetry as in his management of the scenes and the plot. The play is in blank verse, and much of it is very blank indeed. It is a metre that becomes extremely tedious when, as too often happens, two or three speakers combine to make a single line; and it needs more passages of good poetry than we have been able to find in this work. Here and there one comes across ten or a dozen lines that may fairly be called poetry, but the rest is verse of an ordinary kind, which sometimes sinks into simple colloquialism.

The following lines are, perhaps, as good as any, and we only wish, from the reader's point of view, that the author had more often written up to their level :—

Once on a time the broad earth was my room.
Between the curtains of the day and night
I strode from east to west, and hourly held Communion with my great imaginings ;
And now this prison is the only space
That's left me in a universe of worlds !
A dying rat is happier in his hole !
Had I a star to go to, even a waste
Abandoned orb, that fallen spirits shun,
My soul could live at ease. Nothing is mine
Without my kingdom !

FICTION.

The latest "war of the future" book is THE COMING WATERLOO, by Captain W. E. Cairnes (Constable, 6s.). Reckoned as fiction it is devoid of interest and importance. There is no story, and the characters are so little individualized that it was hardly worth while to give them names. They might as well have been lettered like batteries or numbered like torpedo-boats. If we are to treat the book as military criticism, we have less confidence in our judgment ; though we do not believe it would be feasible, as Captain Cairnes suggests, to land two army corps at Berck. The tide there runs out for a distance of about three miles over sand full of puddles often as much as three feet deep ; there are quicksands about that would have to be very carefully avoided ; and the roads into the interior are fringed with dunes and frequently a foot deep in sand. Let us hope that these facts, ignored by Captain Cairnes, are familiar to the War Office of which he is such an unsparing critic. The general moral of the book is that, if the British Army is to go everywhere and take everything, it had better be made as efficient an army as possible :—

"We have now learnt that the strongest navy cannot bring a war to a conclusion, and that modern weapons are of little value if you do not take the trouble to make your men experts in their use. Every improvement in weapons strengthens my argument. The highly-trained few will annihilate the half-trained multitude in the fighting of the future."

They would hardly do so if they landed with their guns and transport at Berck ; but that is a detail. In his main contention Captain Cairnes is no doubt right, though he has chosen to prove it in a literary medium in which he is not qualified to shine.

The letters from a young English lady to her mother which go to make up the novel called THE VISITS OF ELIZABETH (Duckworth, 6s.) are almost remarkably clever. The author, whose name or pseudonym is Miss Elinor Glyn, just misses giving us an excellent picture of social life as seen through the eyes of a bright, highly-connected, attractive young lady of seventeen. Unfortunately, from the point of view of conviction, Miss Glyn has determined never to be dull and to be risqué rather than realistic. The result is that we cannot quite believe in her pretty and gay ingénue, and suspect her amusing naïveté is affected with the view of entertaining us. But many are prepared to accept full measure of artificiality in comedy, and therefore Miss Glyn's clever picture of life in country houses both in France and at home is sure to please a section of readers. Elizabeth's experiences must have entertained her invalid mother immensely if that lady was as irreproachable as her quoted remarks would lead one to suppose. If, on the other hand, the mother of Elizabeth had lived a good deal in the world and read, occasionally, say, the Sporting Times, she would have already been acquainted with some of the situations in her daughter's letters, and have been a little inclined to doubt some parts of her naughty narratives. As some of Miss Elinor Glyn's letters appeared from time to time in the World they seemed to us brilliant above the common ; it is only in volume form, quick upon the heels of one another, that one notes the trick of caricature and the preparation for the wicked little jokes and farcical situations. Next time, when Miss Glyn does not ask us to believe in the utter simplicity of her "dainty rogue in porcelain," say, when she permits Elizabeth, who marries her English marquis, to write her memoirs, as Lady Valmond, a really delightful book will, we believe, be produced. We look forward to it, for there are not many novelists at the present time who possess the gaiety and skill of the author of "The Visits of Elizabeth."

OBITUARY.

GIUSEPPE VERDI.

The late Giuseppe Verdi was the brilliant composer of some of the most popular melodies ever listened to in the opera-house. But he was more than this. By his death the poet has lost almost as convincing an advocate as Richard Wagner. Italy was no less the stronghold of conventional opera than the land of song ; and for the composer who set to music such inane productions as the books of Ernani and Un Ballo in Maschera to give Otello to the world in his seventy-fourth year was an occurrence without parallel. The youthful Wagner, after the indiscretions of Die Feen and Rienzi, at once set out with the avowed purpose of reforming opera into some semblance of dramatic unity. Verdi, on the other hand, did not depart from the old conventional forms until 1871, when Aida advanced the dramatic method which had been tentatively considered in Rigoletto (1851).

The stereotyped arias and the set pieces of the horsehair furniture period disappeared in a great measure from the grand musical spectacle which was commissioned by Ismail Pasha, but even in Aida Verdi committed the strange solecism of allowing the priests of Isis to play upon nineteenth-century trombones. Yet in 1887 the veteran composer produced an opera which was as advanced as the most ardent musical revolutionary could desire. Viewed as absolute melodies only a few of the themes in Otello are very striking, but the whole opera grew from the book, a poetic libretto, faithful to the great original. Verdi's orchestration had now undergone as much change as his treatment of the voice. The celebrated passage for the double basses which accompanies Otello's entry into Desdemona's chamber and the pathetic delivery of the "love motif" from the duet at the end of the first act, repeated at the close of the opera, were without parallel in Verdi's former works. The close of the third act was indeed unknown to Shakespeare, and the final tableau in which Iago stands with his foot upon the swooning Otello, exclaiming "Ecco il leone!", is too obviously introduced for the sake of an effective curtain. But the progress of the then greatest living Italian composer towards dramatic truth was one of the most remarkable artistic events of our time. Not content with this, the veteran closed his career with Falstaff (1893), a robustly playful musical comedy in which musicians entirely failed to recognize the thin instrumentation which had satisfied him during the period of Rigoletto, La Traviata, and Il Trovatore.

Verdi was conspicuously fortunate in his librettists. The part played by the poet-musician Arrigo Boito in his later works showed as much appreciation of the altered conditions of opera as of the complete change in the composer's treatment. At the outset Verdi had a poet, Temistocle Solera, to write his book, and it was some time before the two parted. Then came Scribe and finally Boito. The author of the scarce two hundred little pages of "Il libro dei Versi," of the drama for music which he founded upon Otello, and of the lyrical comedy which he adapted from The Merry Wives of Windsor ranks amongst the most eminent of living Italian poets. The success of Verdi has been no less the triumph of the librettist.

In the midst of his clerical and philanthropic work the late Mr. HUGH REGINALD HAWES found time for lecturing and writing books, and at one time edited Cassell's Magazine and Routledge's World Library. He was a Wagnerian before it was fashionable to be so, and wrote several books on music, such as "Music and Morals," "Old Violins," and "My Musical Life." But he was a copious religious writer in a style characteristic of one who was a delegate at the Chicago Parliament of religion, but also a cultured traveller. His chief publications were "Thoughts for the Times," "Arrows in the Air," "The Key," "The Broad Church," "Travel and Talk," "The Dead Pulpit," "Winged Words Current Coin," "Speech in Season," "Ashes to Ashes," a work on Christ and Christianity, "Poets in the Pulpit," "Sir Morell Mackenzie," "Ideals for Girls," "American Humorists."

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.—I.

The New Liberal Review (1s.) is to wage "warfare, unwaried and unceasing, against the Unionist Party." It is an attractive publication and, whatever one's politics may be, it may be welcomed as likely to promote a healthy public opinion. Its Liberalism is Imperialist and non-Home Rule, and it has a wholesome perception of what the Liberal programme of the moment should be. Apart from the political items—a symposium on the Liberal leadership, an article by Lord Crewe on the reconstruction of the Cabinet (which contains many good things, especially some capital remarks on the effects of numbers at a Cabinet meeting), an account of the Progressive work of the L.C.C., and an article on Registration Reform—there is an interesting article on Mr. Kipling's poetry by Prof. Dowden. He expresses admirably what that poetry is, but we should have liked a little more consideration of what it is not. Mr. Max Beerbohm, who is a master in the art of general discourse round any familiar subject that may occur to him, writes on the demolition of a Hanover Square Club. Mr. E. T. Cook describes Ruskin as the prophet of many of the ideas which have led to the New Liberal Review. There are other articles and poetry, and the only subject not quite up to the standard is one on Mr. F. Carruthers Gould and his Work. Can we not be satisfied with enjoying Mr. Gould's work without talking about who he is and how he does it?

The Fortnightly reverts to the policy of publishing short stories. There is one by Mr. Maarten Maartens, who has been somewhat in the background of late. The leading article by Mr. Kipling throws light on "Railway Reform in Great Britain" by means of an Oriental parable, amusing, and, if properly studied, telling, but not, perhaps, the literary medium most obviously adapted to the matter in hand, or most likely to attract the attention of directors. Mr. Andrew Lang reviews the new edition of "The Golden Bough," and "cannot accept Mr. Frazer's theory of the origin of religion any more than his theory that probably the runaway slave of Aricia 'lived and died as an incarnation of the supreme Aryan God, whose life was in the mistletoe or Golden Bough.'" Mr. H. G. Wells' recently published criticisms of the Cyclist Drill are severely handled by Colonel Balfour, of the London Scottish, who holds that Mr. Wells "must now sit revealed as the arm-chair ignorant person posing as one who has but imaginative knowledge." The mysterious "Calchas" says his say about "The Crux in South Africa." His remedy is Federation—to be applied immediately. The article likely to attract most attention, however, is Sir Robert Hart's "China and Non-China." Sir Robert's bugbear is extra-territoriality: "Could we but give up this and relations would at once right themselves, rancour disappear, and friendliness rule instead." Possibly; but this, we take it, is the one experiment that is absolutely certain not to be tried so long as torture is permitted by the Chinese penal code, and so long as the Chinese prisons are what we know them to be. The number also contains a Sonnet of much dignity and feeling on the death of Queen Victoria.

Corahill prints some beautiful and pathetic verses written by a well-known authoress, who lost the use of speech, to her husband, and his reply. Mr. George Smith continues his reminiscences with some entertaining stories of libel actions, under the apt title "Lawful Pleasures." There are some curious speculations by Mr. Oscar Eve "on the pleasures of texture." He foresees the possible development of a new world of æsthetic enjoyment in the sense of touch. Some instructive points of view on the Chinese questions, especially as regards the missionaries and their beneficial influence, are urged by the Rev. R. Allen. There are more of Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's "Blackstick Papers," more St. Helena matters, more about "The Great Mutiny" from Mr. Fitchett, and, among other items, a story by Mr. Gissing.

The Library has an interesting article by Mr. Austin Dobson on Isaac Walton's quotations, the curious thing being that, although apparently they are given from memory only, Isaac prints them as if they were textual. Bibliographers will be attracted by Mr. Oscar Jennings on "Some Old Initial Letters" in his possession which are very curious. We give three reproductions which may perhaps invite further study of Mr. Jennings' paper.

[From Lübeck Josephus.]

The Monthly Review has struck a new note by having opinions of its own expressed in editorials which have so far been moderate and thoughtful, if a trifle ponderous. This month we have the true view of war expounded as opposed to that of the uncompromising peace-lovers; a paper on the housing problem, supporting a minimum standard of accommodation enforced by public authority; and a list of books best worth reading, or, in the phrase of the writer, to be hung "on the line," to criticize which would be unprofitable, though we may note that "The Cardinal's Snuff-box" is rather vieux jeu. The training of the Navy and of the Army is fully discussed, the latter by Colonel Maude, whose main contention is that we are at least not as bad as other people. "Giotto" is a good subject for a well-illustrated article by Mr. Roger Fry, because so poor an idea is presented of that painter in our National Gallery. Mr. Matthew Sturlaw's dissertation on "Naturalism and Musical

[From "Delitiosa Explicatio de sensibilibus, delictis paradisi." Published at Verona by Lucas Antonius, 1504.]

[From Bible published by Eihel at Bâle, 1477.]

Æsthetic" is worth reading, but, like the author of "The Origins of Art," which we reviewed the other day, he does not get much further in musical æsthetic than to say that music is an expression of the emotions. Sir Henry Roscoe, on the "Outlook for British Trade," sees the deficiency, of which we say something elsewhere, in our secondary schools, and wants a High School for Science in connexion with London University; and Mr. T.

Hodgkin discusses Cromwell. The sensation of the number, however, is a poem by "the writer of an Englishwoman's Love-letters," over whose untimely end tears were shed when the letters first appeared.

Our readers will remember a Personal View on "Translations" by M. Henry D. Davray. The argument was that French translations from English authors might very well be better than they generally are. Some amusing remarks on the same theme, pointing to the same conclusion, are made in an article entitled "French and English," contributed by Mr. George H. Ely to Macmillan. A fine collection of blunders is brought together; the most interesting of them being taken from a French version of "Sartor Resartus."

The Biblical sentence, "Out of the eater cometh forth meat, out of the strong cometh forth sweetness," is by some amazing psychological conjuring transformed into, "Sans ce mangeur, nous ne mangerions pas, nous, aujourd'hui; sans cette Brute, nous ne serions pas les délicats d'à présent."

Among other articles we may note one on Christ's Hospital, and one on "The Missionary in China and Elsewhere," by Mr. H. C. Macdowall.

Miss Kingsley is written of, this month, in the Good Words series of "Celebrated Lady Travellers." Why not Woman Travellers? There is also an amusing account of an ascent of Mount Rainier by Mr. Arthur Inkersley, who was "put through" by the local Alpine Club—the Mazamas. It appears that it is the custom of those climbers to shout in chorus

Rainier! Rainier! Rah! Rah! Rah!
Sluiskin! Sluiskin! Ma-za-ma!

The Sunday Magazine has an instructive paper on "Jewish Schools in Palestine at the Beginning of the Christian Era" from the pen of Dr. A. Schwartz.

As we indicated last month, the scheme of the editor of the Badminton is to a great extent a colour scheme. His four coloured plates once more command our respectful admiration. The pictures in black and white are hardly less meritorious, and the periodical is distinctly one of those that are improving. The most topical article is by Mr. P. F. Warner on "The Throwing Question." Other games dealt with are football, golf, and hockey; and those who take an interest in sport outside the confines of our island have the opportunity of reading what Mr. William Van Ness has to say about "Big Game Shooting and Exploration in Rhodesia," and what Mr. Edward C. Strutt observed "With Fox and Hounds in the Roman Campagna."

Correspondence.

THE POETRY OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In my "Personal View" on the "Poetry of the Twentieth Century," which you did me the honour to print last week, I certainly did not mean to ignore the claims of Mr. Kipling among poets who sing of Empire. It is obvious that Mr. Kipling is a poet and that he sings of Empire, and of the many who have often admired and enjoyed his song, the outcome of his vivid and vivifying genius, I should wish to be considered one. You justly rate him highly.

The fact is that I did not intend to speak critically, as I said in my opening words, of the well-known and distinguished living writers who were poets of the nineteenth and are now poets of the twentieth century. If I seem by implication to have done so, this is due to a too great compression of some of my remarks, and I can only regret that, to use the phrase of Horace, in endeavouring to be brief I may have been somewhat obscure.

We are all thinking of the change of era and century in a very different way from what was in our minds when I wrote the paper, and perhaps it is hardly worth while making this explanation, still I shall be obliged if you will kindly let me do so.

I am yours faithfully, T. H. WARREN.

Magdalen College, Oxford.

DECADENT METRES. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I note Mr. Charles Camp Tarelli's "Reply" on this subject, and am sorry that it reaches me at a time when work far outweighs good health. Yet such is Mr. Tarelli's evident misconception of what I meant to convey in the article (or was it the density of my putting the matter? Did I commit that error of expression—the burying of my grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff?) that I must do myself the justice of answering his "Reply."

The underlying subject of my text, that on which I sought to labour, was "melody"—the euphony of words obtained by the use of an acknowledged correct metre—not by such tricks of genius as are coined by Mr. Swinburne. By his coining the latter proves his genius. To be a genius is to be great. (A critical platitude here compelled.) I wrote of the minor poet. And although ninety-nine per cent. of us are minors in this until elevated into maturity by the chrysallizing hand of death, I did not refer to, nor thought of, those of the living who have proved their title-deeds to the inner domain of poetry. Yet my dear opponent seems to have less respect. Or is it that he brings up the big guns of verse to crush my poor array of insignificant infantry? If it be this, his fighting is unfair; and he the while proves his unfinished apprenticeship in the manner of his handling them.

As above said, my subject was "melody" gained by legitimate means—a fact shown on the face of the article. Mr. Tarelli proves that he saw it, then drags in "And wild voice pealing up to the sunny sky" as a melodious off-set against the perfect rhythm of "Oh, breathe not his name, let it sleep in the shade." Does not this compel me to ask, Where is my critic's ear for the proper disposition of syllables? Here he has brought from a really musical poet one of that poet's proofs of truth in the old literary proverb, "Even the good Homer nods." Were this even the comparative good of the master whom Mr. Tarelli quotes I should be inclined to turn his words on himself and say, "How shall we delight in Tennyson (i.e., his melody)—we who have read such lines as these?" As for English metres and classical prosody, what is classic but that which has sustained time and usage? And are not our four proper metres five hundred years old?

Half the troubles of life are caused by misunderstandings. Let me not be wrongly understood here. I did but cite Moore, Scott, and Byron in the matter of euphony. To our present verse-makers, great and little alike, having the virtues of thought, imagery, and sentiment, I readily acceded. Their lack of lyrical sweetness was my target; this Mr. Tarelli saw, admits seeing, and writes at—I know not what. For, to me, his article seems to be too much beside the mark, as, on his own showing (intentional or not), he also thinks us lacking the lyrist for whom many of us look longingly up to Olympia. He writes of "a nobler and rarer music." "Nobler" I freely admit; "rarer" I am glad of, and shall always be so whilst such discords are allowed to creep into it as exist in the verse quoted by Mr. Tarelli from Tennyson—a jarring mixture of iambs, trochees, and other metres; a piece of verse saved from doggerel solely by feeling, and the quoting of which makes one say, "Oh, save us from our friends who lack the critical faculty!" (All literary game is the rightful prey of the critic, and I have but followed where my antagonist has led.) In "Decadent Metres" I, in a small way, pointed to what melody can be gained by a judicious use of pindarics, which is but the iambic measure freely used in the matter of metre (line). Thus, if our bards have the true lyrical gift (such as went to the making of "To Mary in Heaven," "Believe me if all those endearing young charms," "O saw ye not fair Ines?" and scores of other lyrical gems), they may bring a harvest into our famine-time without even resuscitating dead metres; their not doing so is but another proof that melody in verse is dying out. And whilst critics view the matter with a too tolerant eye, young poets will be careless as to the smoothness of their verse.

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

J. E. PATTERSON.

8, Ocean-terrace, Felixstowe, Jan. 26.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As the writer of the "Personal View" in Literature, January 26, aptly says, "We do not want poets who follow Tennyson like an echo, or who put on the mannerisms of Mr.

Swinburne like a garment"; but, for all that, we do want poets who, if the divine flame is not within them, will at least write with an eye and ear on their greater forerunners. Of what nature is the Laureate's last poem? What art is it that pens a line such as this:—

All that, more than, I was there.

It might stand as an exercise in parsing, or for a foreigner's perplexed endeavour to write English. And if it be unfair to detach a line from its context, let us read:—

Looking thence I still will be,
So that you forget not me,
All that, more than, I was there,
Weighted with my crown of care.

Is not even the "jigging measure of Tom Moore" more pleasing to the ear and eye than this? Of the meaning intended to be conveyed I say nothing; a man may write obscurely and yet musically. But where is the "fine sensitiveness to the melodic value of words, the exquisite feeling for the subtle effects of movement, accent, and pause" in this harsh concatenation of syllables? If a singer cannot feel himself in a singing mood on every public event, and the most mercurial temperament might find it difficult, let us be given a fine sonorous prose, or at least a cultured prose, in place of a crippled, halting, uncouth rhyme. Yours faithfully, ARTHUR HOOD.

Lowlands, Bungay.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

King Edward VII. has had little leisure for literature in the course of his busy life, but one of his biographers states that in his youth he was an ardent lover of Sir Walter Scott. Dean Stanley tells us that the Prince during the tour in the Holy Land strongly recommended him to read "East Lynne." Students of his Majesty's life will find that very few biographies worthy of the name have yet been published. Books like Greville's Memoirs, Dean Stanley's Recollections, the Life of the Prince Consort, and so on, are, of course, indispensable for the King's early years, and various other writers have dealt with isolated chapters in his career. Sir W. H. Russell, as the official historiographer of the Indian Tour, was appointed honorary private secretary to the Prince in order that he might perform that task in addition to his journalistic duties as The Times correspondent, and he was attached to the Prince's suite when he wrote that other delightful volume "A Diary in the East during the Tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales," published in 1869. Sir W. H. Russell also prepared an account of the Wedding of the Prince and Princess of Wales for publication in the United States in 1863—collected from the description in The Times—and the "Memorial of the Marriage," which appeared in London in 1864. Other publications relating to the Indian Tour are "Notes of the Visit to India of their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, 1870—1875-6," by Sir John Fayrer, who accompanied the Royal tourists as physician, privately printed in London in 1879; "Letters from India during his Royal Highness's visit, from W. S. Porter to his Sister," privately printed in London in 1876; "The Prince of Wales' Tour: A Diary in India," by W. Simpson, the artist; and "The Prince of Wales in India, or from Pall Mall to the Punjab," by J. D. Gay, published in Toronto in 1877. Several works relate to the American visit—"The New England Tour of the Prince of Wales (Baron Renfrew)," which ran into several editions after its publication in Boston in 1860; "The Tour of the Prince of Wales through British Columbia and the United States," by a British Canadian, published at Montreal, 1860; and "The Prince of Wales in Canada and the United States," by Nicholas A. Woods, London, 1861.

The first two attempts at a biography seem to have been made in 1872, after the Prince's illness, when Messrs. Marlborough issued a little souvenir entitled "Mémorial of the Prince from Birth to Convalescence," and a life of the Prince was included in Beeton's Series of Penny Books. The next attempt was a separate biography bound up with a life of the Queen, by Marc Gilchrist, published by C. E. Johnson in 1884, with a preface by Sir Roper Lethbridge. Five or six years later came Sir Henry Burdett's "Prince, Princess, and People," which, though dealing mainly with social progress as illustrated by the lives of the Prince and Princess, was the first biographical work of any importance, and is still very useful. Messrs. Routledge published a "People's Edition" of this book in 1890. Another contribution is Mr. F. H. Beavan's "Marlborough House and its Occupants." The two most popular memoirs, however, are "The Prince of Wales: An Account of his Career," &c., the anonymous work published by Grant Richards in 1898, and "Our Future King: The Story of the Prince of Wales' Life," by Charles Lowe, published a few months afterwards by Macquenn. The latest biography, we believe, is "Britain's Prince and Princess: The Story of their Lives," by Thomas Paul, brought out last year by J. F. Shaw and Co. Mr. Murray also publishes the "Speeches and Addresses of the Prince of Wales, 1863-1888," edited by Dr. J. Macaulay.

Messrs. Longmans announce a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Richard R. Holmes' authorized life of Queen Victoria—the text being reproduced from Messrs. Goupil's edition of 1897—with a supplementary chapter bringing the narrative to the end of her Majesty's reign.

"Victoria the Good; Her Life in Portraits" is the title of a new work announced by Messrs. Cassell and Company.

We may congratulate Dr. Joseph Wright, so well-known as a German scholar, as a philologist, and to a still wider public as the editor of "The English Dialect Dictionary," on his election to succeed Mr. Max Müller in the Professorship of Comparative Philology at Oxford. As we have before mentioned, Professor Wright, besides editing "The English Dialect Dictionary," is collecting phonographic specimens of English dialects, partly to enable him to check the material for a comprehensive comparative grammar of all the English dialects in the United Kingdom—to be included in the last volume of the Dialect Dictionary—and partly to hand down to posterity a faithful record of the dialects as spoken at the end of the nineteenth century. Later particulars of his work appeared in the last number of the Periodical, the interesting little magazine published from time to time at the Oxford University Press. Dr. Wright's plan, in the case of people who have no knowledge of English grammar, is to send the "specimen" to some educated person in the district from which the dialect is derived, and as soon as one of the natives has been taught to repeat the specimen in good genuine dialect Dr. Wright goes to the place and phonographs the result. When the specimens have served their purpose, Dr. Wright proposes to hand them over to some public library or institution for preservation. It is expected that the preparation for press of Volume IV. of the Dialect Dictionary will be finished by about the end of next June.

Messrs. Longmans announce a Life of the late Bishop of London, to be written by Mrs. Creighton, who will be much obliged if any persons who have letters from the Bishop will kindly forward them to her at Fulham Palace, S.W. It is believed that materials exist for a volume of literary essays and for a volume on Church affairs, which last may probably be issued under the title of "The Church and the Nation."

Books to look out for at once.

- THEOLOGY—
 "Counsels for Church People, from the Writings of Bishop Mandell Creighton." E. Stock. 5s.
 "Short Studies: The Gospels." By John Smith. Oliphant. 3s. 6d.
 "Follow to Calvary." By the Rev. H. Wilson. Church Shop. 2s. 6d. n.
HISTORY—
 "A Century of Scottish History." 2 vols. By Sir Henry Craik. Blackwood. 30s. net.
 ["From the days before the Rebellion to Living Memory."] "British History from the Earliest Times to the Victorian Era." Simply told for Children. Illustrated. Warne. 2s.; sewed, 1s.
TRAVEL—
 "Modern Abyssinia." By A. B. Wylde. Methuen. 15s. net.
 "Abyssinia." By Herbert Vivian. Pearson. 15s.
FICTION—
 "A Narrow Way." By Mary Findlater. Methuen. 6s.
 "The Master Sinner." By a Well-known Author. Long. 3s. 6d.
 "The Lost Land." By Julia M. Crotty. Unwin. 6s.
 "Naomi's Exodus." By L. H. Montagu. Unwin. 3s. 6d.
 "Quality Corner." By C. L. Antrobus. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
 "A Path of Thorns." By Ernest A. Vizetelly. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
 "Trodies, Us and Others." By R. Andom. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.
 "The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler." By R. Marsh. Pearson. 6s.
 "The Believing Bishop." By H. Bates. G. Allen. 6s.
 "May Silver." By A. St. Aubyn. F. V. White. 6s.
 "The Golden Wang-Ho." By Fergus Hume. Long. 6s.

EDUCATION—

"New Method of Education." By J. L. Tadd. Low. 8s. 6d. net.

[On art, manual training, and nature study. Illustrated.]

"Concerning Children." By Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Stetson. Putnam. 6s.

SCIENCE—

"A Text Book of Applied Therapeutics." 2 Vols. Edited by J. C.

Wilson and A. A. Eshner. Saunders. 30s. net.

"Elements of Statistics." By A. L. Bowley. P. S. King. 10s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS—

"Irish Leaves: Poems and Songs." By John Robinson. Long. 7s. 6d.

"Industrial Social Organization." By J. C. Van Marken. Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.

"The Wildfowler in Scotland." By J. G. Millais. Illustrated. Longmans. 30s. net.

[With a Frontispiece by the late Sir John Millais.]

NEW EDITIONS—

"The Private Life of the Queen." By one of Her Majesty's Servants. Pearson. 2s. 6d.

"Victoria, Life and Times of." By Author of Grace Darling. W. Scott. 2s. 6d.

"The Life of Queen Victoria." By R. R. Holmes, Librarian to the Queen. Longmans.

[Brought down to the end of the Queen's reign.]

"The Life and Times of Queen Victoria." Part I. Cassell. 6d. net.

[New Serial issue in weekly parts. Illustrated.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

Hannah More. John Knox. (Literary Hearststones.) By Marion Harland. 7½x5in. Putnam. 6s. each.

Bret Harte. (English Writers of To-day.) By T. E. Pemberton. 7½x5in., 284 pp. Greening. 3s. 6d.

The Poet of Home Life. Centenary Memories of William Cowper. By A. J. Symington, and Others. 8x5½in., 224 pp.

"Home Words" Office.

Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford. By Rev. G. A. Payne. 7½x5in., 118 pp. Manchester: Clarkson. London: Gay & Bird.

Boniface Louis André de Castellane. 1758-1837. 18 Engravings and 5 Portraits. By the Comtesse de Beaulincourt-Marles. 9x5½in., 378 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr. 7.50.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

"Home Words" Office.

Histoire de France depuis les Origines jusqu'à la Révolution. By Ernest Lavisse, and Others. Fascicules 5, 6, and 7. 9½x7½in. Hachette. Fr. 1.50 each.

LAW.

Railway Law. For the "Man in the Train." By E. T. Edalji. 7x4½in., 129 pp. E. Wilson. 2s. n.

LITERARY.

The History of Early Italian Literature to the Death of Dante. By A. Gaspary. Trans. by H. Oelsner, Ph.D. 7½x5in., 414 pp. Bell. 3s. 6d.

La Comédie Espagnole en France de Hardy à Racine. By Ernest Martineau. 7½x4½in., 434 pp. Paris. Hachette. Fr. 3.50.

MILITARY.

At Pretoria. By Julian Ralph. 8x5½in., 377 pp. Pearson. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Mind of the Century. Reprinted from the "Daily Chronicle." 7½x5in., 141 pp. Unwin. 2s.

Côtes et Ports Français de l'Océan. Le travail de l'homme et l'œuvre du temps. By Charles Lenthéric. Maps and Plans. 7½x4½in., 400 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr. 5.

ORIENTAL.

Contributions Towards Arabic Philology.—I. Ed. by Dr. P. Brönnle. 9½x6in. Luzac. 7s. 6d. n.

POETRY.

Self's the Man. By J. Davidson. 8x5½in., 221 pp. Grant Richards. 6s. n.

Eyes in Solitude. By Rev. W. Moore. 8x6½in., 109 pp. Stock. 6s.

Survivals. By L. F. F. Randolph. 8x5½in., 89 pp. Putnam. 6s.

From Mayflower to Mistletoe. By Sarah J. Day. 7x5in., 95 pp. Putnam. 6s.

Ballads of Ghostly Shires. Folklore Verses. By G. Bartram. 7x4½in., 129 pp. Greening. 2s. 6d.

Burns from Heaven, with some other Poems. By Hamish Hendry. 7½x5in., 95 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. n.

REPRINTS.

The Evolution of the Idea of God. (Cheaper Ed.) By Grant Allen. 7½x5in., 447 pp. Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. n.

Le Médecin Malgré Lui. (The Temple Molière.) 5½x4½in., 81 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d. n.

SCIENCE.

Deschanel's Natural Philosophy. Part 3—Electricity. By J. D. Everett. 9x6in., 358 pp. Blackie. 4s. 6d.

THEOLOGY.

The Risen Master. A Sequel to "Pastor Pastorum." By Rev. H. Latham. 7x5in., 488 pp. Bell. 6s.

Truth and Reality. By J. Smyth. 7½x5in., 244 pp. T. & T. Clark. 4s.

TOPOGRAPHY.

Kirkwall in the Orkneys. By H. B. Hosack. 10½x8½in., 490 pp. Kirkwall. Peace.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXXII.
By J. C. J. WAINWRIGHT, U.S.A.
BLACK. 8 pieces.

WHITE. 14 pieces.
White mates in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CXXIII.
By K. FRITSCH, Germany.
BLACK. 6 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.
White mates in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 124.—The following is from the Swiss Magazine referred to below. White (8 pieces)—K at Q R 2; Q at Q 5; B at K R 2; Kt at K R 3; pawns at K Kt 3, Q 4, Q Kt 2, Q R 3. Black (5 pieces)—K at K R 3; Q at K Kt 3; R at K Kt 5; pawns at K B 4, Q R 5. White (to play) continued Kt—B 4, and Black drew the game. What was the play to bring this about?

NOTES AND NEWS.

Chess in Russia is very brisk. Two large tournaments began recently at Moscow, in both of which Tschigorin, Schiffers, Janowski, Lebedev, Bartolitsch, Jankovitz, Kulomsin, and other well-known players are competing.

Pillsbury's absence from the Monte Carlo tournament is explained by the fact that his marriage was fixed for January 20 at St. Louis. He is going to the Pacific coast on one of his professional tours. He was 28 on December 22 last.

It is not generally known that her late Majesty Queen Victoria was a devotee of chess, and there are well-authenticated stories current of encounters over the board which gave her Majesty much pleasure. Her favourite opponent, when they could meet, was the Empress Frederick, who was decidedly the stronger player, no doubt because the Empress could devote more time to practice, and to the German "Handbuch," which was her constant companion. The Queen could appreciate a good game played by the masters.

Marshall has become Manhattan C.C. champion through winning the club tourney; but he has been beaten at Brooklyn. Souweine taking the lead in the club's tournament recently concluded.

In the correspondence match, North v. South of England, South leads by 23½ to 10½.

A capital chess monthly has been started in Switzerland, entitled the Schweizerische Schachzeitung. It is edited by U. Bachmann, Max Pestalozzi and Dr. Th. Schaad, and is issued at Aschmann's, Predigerplatz, Zurich. Yearly subscription about 3s. There is a good deal of chess played in Switzerland and this magazine will be useful as a source of information of chess doings.

GAME No. LX.—Played in a college match :—

QUEEN'S GAMBIT.

White.	Black.	White.	Black.
H. Cleveland.	T. T. Robinson.	H. Cleveland.	T. T. Robinson.
1. P-Q 4	P-K 4	12. Castles	P-B 5
2. P-Q 4	P-K 4	13. Q-B 2	Kt x Bch
3. P x K P	P-Q 5	14. P x Kt	Kt-K B 3
4. P-Q R 3	Kt-Q B 3	15. B-K Kt 5	Castles K R
5. Kt-K B 3	B-K Kt 5	16. K R-K sq	P-Q 8
6. Q-Kt-Q 2	P-Q R 4	17. Q-Kt-Q sq	Q R-Q sq
7. P-K Kt 3	B-Q B 4	18. Q-B 2	Kt x Kt
8. B-Kt 2	Q-K 2	19. B x Q	R-Q 7
9. Kt-K 4	B x Kt	20. Q x R	Kt x Q
10. B x B	Kt x P	21. B x B	Resigns
11. Q-Kt 3	P-Q B 3

GAME No. LXI.—Played in Prague :—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
J. Vitacek.	O. Duras.	J. Vitacek.	O. Duras.
1. P-K 4	P-K 4	14. Q-B 3	Kt-Q 5
2. P-Q 4	P x P	15. Q-Kt 3	B-K 3
3. Q x P	Kt-Q B 3	16. P-B 5	B x R P
4. Q-K 3	P-Q 3	17. P x Kt P	R x P x P
5. Kt-Q B 3	P-K 2	18. P-Kt 5	B-R sq
6. B-Q 2	P-K B 4	19. B x P	R-K 7
7. Castles Q R	Kt-K B 3	20. Q-R 4	Q-K 2
8. P-K R 3	P x P	21. Q-R 6	Q R-K B sq
9. Kt x P	Kt x Kt	22. B-B 3	Q-K 6 ch
10. Q x Kt	Castles	23. B-Q 2	Q x B ch
11. B-Q 3	P-K Kt 3	24. R x Q	R-B 8 ch
12. P-K Kt 4	B-B 3	25. R x Q sq	Kt-Kt 6 ch
13. P-K B 4	R-K sq	26. P x Kt	B x P mate (a)

(a) A beautiful finish. We have often had occasion to call attention to the superior excellence of Bohemian chess.

Literature

EDUCATIONAL SUPPLEMENT.

CONFERENCES AND A COUNCIL OF PERFECTION.

[By MR. FRANCIS STORR.]

The Christmas holidays are over, and Paterfamilias who compares the five or six weeks of loafing that his boys have had at home with the days or week at most that he himself has stolen from his chambers or counting-house, or with the bare week allotted to the French or German schoolboy, fires off a letter to The Times complaining that the length of school terms varies in inverse proportion to the length of school bills.

Yet to some of us schoolmasters these Christmas holidays have been anything but playtime—holidays only in the sense that any change of work is in itself a relaxation. Strenua nos exercet inertia, and as we go back to our “gerund-grinding and death in longs and shorts” we cannot help asking ourselves what good has come of it all, this “roaring month” of parleying and palaver. “Were it not better done as others use,” to play golf at Hoylake, toboggan at Grindelwald, or go on pilgrimage to Rome?

And yet educational conferences, whether we believe in them or not, assist at them or stay away, are now looked upon by all as an inevitable necessity, and it seems almost incredible that some thirty years ago the institution was unknown. It was in December, 1869, that the first conference assembled at Uppingham on the invitation of Edward Thring, an apostolic gathering of twelve headmasters, none of them from the great public schools, meeting as it were in an upper chamber to discuss common interests and express the united voice of the profession. To have started such a movement and carried it to a successful issue, in the face of the then dominant individualism and in spite of the vis inertiae that had to be overcome, is, perhaps, the most signal proof of Thring's genius and force of character. A typical answer that he received to his invitation from a leading headmaster is worth quoting as a sign of the times:—“I doubt whether I shall ever be able to attend the proposed meetings, so strongly do I value the perfect rest of the holidays and the privilege of complete independence in dealing (so far as — is concerned) with such educational difficulties as may arise.” Well might Thring boast (modesty was not his foible), when addressing the Conference of Headmistresses that met at Uppingham eighteen years later, that out of the mustard seed he had planted a mighty tree had grown with branches spreading on every side.

Whether the Headmasters' Conference as a stimulant to educational progress has quite fulfilled the hopes of its founder seems to his biographer, Dr. Parkin, an open question; and one who has attended its meetings and reported its proceedings for the last twenty years must reluctantly acknowledge it, viewed as an educational Parliament, a comparative failure, though as a debating society and a dining club it has fully served its purpose. The Headmasters' Conference, plebeian in its origin, has become our Educational House of Lords. Its constitution is exclusive, it averages about a hundred members; its annual meeting for two half days proved too great a tax on its time and its resources; it has never made any pretence of dealing with education as a national concern.

The Incorporated Association of Headmasters, on the other hand, admits all headmasters of endowed and proprietary schools, and now counts 430 members. Its energy and activity can be gauged by the Report of the Council for 1900, a volume of 170 closely-printed pages. If the Headmasters' Conference is our House of Lords the Association may be justly styled our House of Commons. At starting the two bodies were, if not antagonistic, at least mutually exclusive, but at the present moment the majority of the Conference are also members of the Association. What just cause or impediment is there why these two bodies should not be joined together? The same questions were debated this year at Bradfield and at the Guildhall, and almost identical resolutions passed. An incident that I well remember in a Committee-room of the House of Commons may suggest le mot de l'énigme. Professor Simon Laurie was giving evidence in favour of the compulsory training of teachers, and was asked, apparently as a poser, by one of the Committee, whether he was prepared to insist on Eton masters being trained. “I see no reason,” the Professor answered, “why Eton boys should be worse taught than boys in a National school.”

But this amalgamation which must take place sooner or later, and sooner rather than later, suggests a larger question which has lately come to the fore. Why should we not have an educational council drawn from all ranks of the profession, a body of experts, unfettered by any party ties, unbiased by sectarian or social prejudices, to focus and voice (in Thring's words) “the skill of the skilled workmen,” and so to regulate and guide “amateur authority?”

It may be argued that we have already such a body in the Consultative Committee created by the Board of Education Bill of last year, and now sitting to determine the conditions for the registration of teachers. But though the Duke of Devonshire well deserved the compliment that Sir Joshua Fitch paid him at the Headmasters' dinner for his selection of a committee so non-official and independent, yet it can hardly be maintained that these eighteen distinguished ladies and gentlemen are competent or fitted to do the work of a national council. In the first place they cannot of themselves take action. They can only discuss matters referred to them by the Board. Secondly, they represent the administrative rather than the practical side of education. No one would dream of committing to them the work assigned to the French Conseil Supérieur—the determining of curricula, the creation of faculties, &c. Is it not strange, by the way, that while the inspection and examination of schools is one of the statutory functions of the Board, there is not among its advisers a single member who is conversant with inspecting and examining?

The need of a general educational council must have been borne in on any one who attended these last winter meetings or perused the reports of them in the newspapers. We find the Headmasters discussing at the Guildhall the appointment and dismissal of assistant masters, wholly regardless of what the assistant masters, who are sitting a few streets off, have to say upon the matter. So, in the debate on higher-grade schools, the views of those directly concerned could only be gleaned from a letter which was nearly being ruled out of order. The Modern Language Association ventilate their grievances. Modern languages are snubbed by headmasters and ignored by Oxford. An hour a day for French or German seems a modest request. The science masters make a similar complaint and prefer the same modest demand. With still greater force the shameful neglect of the mother tongue and the claims of English literature are insisted on in a third conference. An hour a day is the least that can be given to English. But there are only 28 working hours in the week, and it is no wonder that the typical headmaster, Mr. Lyttelton, bewildered by a multitude of rival professors, falls back on his belle Marquise and the beaux yeux of Latin versification.

There is need for a general council, but I greatly doubt whether the time is ripe for it. The meeting in the Botanical Theatre of University College was (the word must out) a flasco. The nine tailors of Tooley-street who convened the meeting (I can nickname them without offence, as I was one) miscalculated their powers; and a little rift within the lute—the assignment of ten members to the National Union of Teachers—was enough to break up the concert. It introduced the vicious principle of proportional representation—of a parliament of teachers instead of what is wanted, a privy council. It suggested that the three estates of the profession—primary, secondary, and tertiary—must be evenly balanced; it gave to the principals of Government training colleges as many votes as to Oxford and Cambridge combined—as if, forsooth, there was a danger lest Sir R. Jebb and Sir W. Anson on a question of elementary schools would out-vote Mr. Yoxall. The scheme was ill-conceived, and I doubt whether the committee will have the courage to summon again the adjourned meeting.

Meanwhile, I see no reason why the Consultative Committee should not become in time the mouthpiece of the profession, and do all that is so well done by the Conseil Supérieur. Its functions at present are limited, but if it performs the work it has in hand with judgment and discretion it will gain the confidence of the teachers and of the public, and the Minister of Education will be only too glad to throw on its shoulders part of his responsibility, and delegate to it all knotty and thorny professional questions, questions that are now fought out by amateurs on the floor of the House of Commons—the delimitation of schools, the status of private schools, the tenure of masterships, the subjects to be taught, the provision for technical and commercial education.

THE POSITION OF ASSISTANT MASTERS.

[By MR. A. H. GILKES.]

This question is receiving much attention, but not more than it deserves. All questions connected with schools are important to the country; and among these questions one of the most important is the constitution of their government. In this question three conditions of authority are concerned; that of the governors, that of the assistant masters, and that of the headmaster. The object of the existence of a school is not to establish any of these three in any particular position, but simply to secure the good of the boys in it, and thus also of the national life which they will affect. In a perfect condition of school government, the question of the exact relation of these three authorities will not arise either frequently or acutely; each authority will simply work for the good of the boys, and under such circumstances acute differences will seldom occur. But there is no such thing as perfection, and troubles will sometimes arise.

The view generally taken about fifty years ago as to the right condition of things is shown in the statutes either already in working then or framed then for new schools. These statutes place assistant masters entirely under the direction of the headmaster, and make them liable to dismissal by him, without obliging him to give any reason for the dismissal. Such statutes are generally in force now; but they meet with a considerable quantity of criticism. The objections to them are given as follows. It is said that assistant masters are not only competent to form opinions with regard to school matters, but are often, with regard to some particular matter, the only people competent to form them; that it is not just nor politic to make assistant masters, who are necessary to a school, and whose work may easily be scamped, impotent to control or advise, excepting so far as one man may think fit to allow them to act, or to ask them for their opinion; and, consequently, that there should be provided by statute a means for the expression of this opinion, by the establishment of masters' meetings as a necessary part of school life. But furthermore a complaint is made which is much more serious than this; it is said that it is not right that assistant masters should be dependant for their position on the will of one man; that the mere fact of their dependance is likely to make them either subservient or despairing, that it irritates them while they remain in their position, and menaces them continually with ruin.

It may be true that the position in fact is not so dangerous or so disagreeable as it might be made; and that good assistant masters, or, which is nearly the same thing, assistant masters who like their calling, are among the happiest of men. But it does not follow that a position is what it ought to be, because it is not so bad as the conditions of tenure might make it; and probably most people who consider the question will think that there is something wrong in it. It will be accepted by most people as a doctrine, that it is right for every man to have as much freedom of thought and of action, and as much security, as he can have without detriment to the rest of the world, and, consequently, that it is right for assistant masters to have as much freedom and security as the interests of their school permit. Would then the interests of the school suffer if they had more than the present statutes allow them to have? Of course, in fact, much more is theirs, and generally all that they desire to have; but if they have it in fact, is it not right that they should have it in law? Is it right that they should be nearly alone among men in having no statutory rights, and only statutory duties? Could there, in short—for the question seems to narrow itself to this—be any harm to the school in the recognition by statute of "masters' meetings," which are in most, if not all, schools already in existence, and in allowing to assistant masters in some way and in some degree an appeal to the governing body of a school either in the case of dismissal or otherwise?

Perhaps it may be well to mention the considerations which may have induced the framers of the present school statutes to frame them as they are. They probably felt that divided responsibility was a bad thing, and that since the headmaster was responsible to the governing body for the condition of a school, it was fair to leave him a free hand in managing it; that in every society some one must have the final word, since otherwise a deadlock may at any time arise; that dissensions among authorities are dangerous to discipline, and that to a headmaster should be given the power of ending them, even by the dismissal of a colleague. They counted on the fairness and good judgment of the headmaster, who is presumably chosen for the possession of those qualities. They thought that the fear of alienating the sympathies of his colleagues, who would be likely to stand together, would keep him from any hasty or unjust action. Perhaps also they thought that, if an assistant master were unjustly dismissed, the governing body would probably hear of it, and would be able to admonish a headmaster so as to prevent at all events a repetition of the improper exercise of his authority. To these safeguards which all undoubtedly exist now, and which are undoubtedly very strong, must in these days be added three more, as powerful, perhaps, as any—the existence of a powerful body ready to protect assistant masters, the fear of public opinion as shown in the Press, and of the sympathy of a jury as shown in the Law Courts. It is possible also that the framers of these statutes had in their mind the nature of the work of a headmaster, and also the composition of governing bodies of schools, either then existing or at some future time to be formed; that they thought that it is about as hard to manage a school as a battleship, or, perhaps, harder; that it requires special knowledge to do both; and that the governors of a school do not necessarily possess, nor are indeed likely to possess, this special knowledge; and yet, perhaps, are not likely always thoroughly to realize that they are without it; and that thus to put them in the place of the headmaster, in the very emergency which in fact he was more especially elected to meet, would be a mistake. Probably they thought also that in many cases it would be very difficult for a headmaster to set down in words reasons for an action which yet the interests of the school might demand; that incompetence or improper habits of any kind were difficult to prove; and that some governors either from prejudice or inexperience or from ignorance, or from a desire to emphasize their own importance or from other causes, might not see the bearings of a statement made by the headmaster, and send back an unsatisfactory master to the school again to its ruin.

It seems plain from what is written above that the question is one of much difficulty and delicacy; and that false steps in settling it are absolutely dangerous. Perhaps I may express the following opinions with regard to it, the reasons for which are practically given above. As to the first part of the difficulty—the provision for the expression of the opinion of assistant masters—it may be remarked, first, that it is not a very terrible thing to any one, either to a headmaster or to an assistant master, that on ordinary matters his opinion should be overruled; secondly, that no headmaster has much temptation to overrule the opinion of any assistant master unfairly; thirdly, that some one must at last decide every question; and, fourthly, that probably the headmaster is the proper person to make the decision, both because of his position, and also and chiefly because no assistant master is so likely as a headmaster to know and consider all the interests involved in any question. Thus it seems to be a good thing for the avoidance of deadlocks and mistakes to leave at last with the headmaster the decision of a question; but if this is done, it seems to be without harm to a school to make “masters’ meetings” not only habitual, as indeed they are now, but also a necessary part of the constitution of a school.

As to the second question—of appeals by assistant masters to the governors—they seem likely, if they are allowed, to produce uneasiness, uncertainty, intrigue, and disloyalty, which are four very bad conditions, tending to the paralysis of school life and work. I do not think that an individual governor should ever receive them; less mischief is likely to result if they are made to a full Board; but I think that they are likely to be mischievous even so. I think that it is right that they should be made through the headmaster only; but that the headmaster should be bound to make any representation to the governing body that the assistant masters desire him to make. With regard to the most important of all the questions—that of dismissal—I think that the matter is so serious that it is right to require a headmaster, in spite of all difficulties, to give to the governors his reasons for the dismissal; but that it is not right that the governors should be able to take his place and reinstate the assistant master in question. Of course, if it ever comes simply to what is statutorily possible, a governing body may do what would go a long way to check a mischief—dismiss the headmaster. I have given my opinions in the above paper, and the reasons why I hold them; what I have written seems sometimes ungracious, and to reflect unkindly on governors and on assistant masters. It is the extension of the subject into all its possibilities that has produced this effect, and not my own feeling. It would be strange, indeed, if I had other feelings than those of great respect and gratitude both to the governors who ably, courteously, and earnestly direct the destinies of our own school, and to the assistant masters who ably, courteously, and devotedly help me to manage it.

[By MR. T. E. PAGE.]

Questions which only affect the position of assistant masters in secondary schools may seem of little general interest, but in fact they closely touch the welfare of the community. They concern every member of the middle and upper classes who has sons to educate, because the quality of that education must depend largely on the character and capacity of those who conduct it, and on the more or less favourable conditions under which they perform their work. Unhappily the condition of things which prevails in the scholastic world is not adapted either to attract or to develop ability. For the vast majority of its members the path of promotion is absolutely closed, and as assistant masters they are doomed to a position of what is, not metaphorically but strictly, life-long infancy. No proof of professional capacity will, by itself, secure high professional advancement; and, unless he obtains a headmastership, no man has any legal right to make his voice heard on educational questions or to influence, however modestly, the direction of affairs.

There are, no doubt, many minor matters in which the position of assistant masters might be improved, but the two points which have been mentioned are vital to their welfare. No profession in which its members do not possess at least some legal status, and in which progress to the highest rank is not free to open competition, ever has prospered, or ever can prosper. The truth is obvious, but it is persistently ignored by those in authority, and their silence is, perhaps, the best proof of its validity and importance. Like politicians in office, headmasters are discreetly dumb about real grievances. At their last conference they found it much more convenient to pose as military critics, while they are at present busily engaged in compiling a hymn-book. About any triviality they are eloquent and energetic, but when a reform is needed which might imperil their own monopoly of place and power they utter no word and lift no finger to assist it. They object, indeed, to reform as naturally and as heartily as the House of Lords did seventy years ago; but if once public attention can be directed to the facts, their dissent will prove a matter of equal indifference.

It will be justifiable therefore to state briefly what are the facts with regard to the two points to which reference has been made, and to indicate what are the consequences which necessarily follow. When this has been done it will not be requisite to argue the case further, because the clear conclusions to be arrived at will present themselves at once to every impartial mind.

In the first place, then, no assistant master has at the present time any legal security whatever for his position. He owes his place not to public competition but to the private choice of the headmaster who appointed him; he may be dismissed at any time without right of appeal; if an increase of salary after long service is denied him, he has no claim anywhere for redress. His legal relation to his headmaster is, in fact, that of a clerk to his employer, but, whereas a good clerk can usually find a fresh place, the schoolmaster who has reached middle life, if he loses his post, is practically ruined.

No doubt this strict legal dependence is by courtesy often largely and liberally modified in practice, while in some schools, through the influence of tradition, the relation of assistants to their chief is, perhaps, rather that of feudal nobles to a monarch than of subordinates to a master. But, in spite of all modifications, the dependence is always present, and produces that dull indifference to other than personal issues which always and everywhere is its inevitable result. Individual work is often well done, and many men go on from year to year teaching Euclid or Caesar with earnestness and even enthusiasm; but the stir of intellectual life is feeble, and about educational questions outside their own particular sphere schoolmasters are as a rule apathetic. The most able of them obtain appointments in the great boarding schools, become house-masters, and then too often degenerate into virtuous hotel keepers. They “leave the ministry of the word” and take to “serving tables.” To be zealous about the principles of education is, they find, futile; but it profits much to know something about cookery, to be careful critics of coughs, and to consult the wishes of mothers; so that they shape their lives accordingly, accumulate a balance at the bank, play golf, and ultimately retire with a testimonial. It would be difficult, however, to find half-a-dozen of them who have shown any public interest in educational reform. They acquiesce in their own prosperity and are dumb.

It is from the humbler ranks of the profession that the cry for some change in their condition rises, and it is aroused by the sharp sting of necessity. The man, indeed, who becomes a master in any but the highest schools is practically cut off from hope. His salary is meagre and often almost stationary; he is absolutely voiceless; at the best he works for a certain length of time, becomes decrepit and disappears; sometimes an unjust dismissal brings sudden and complete ruin.* Under such circumstances men cannot work with spirit and enthusiasm, nor is it any wonder that they have at last united in order to secure some improvement. The Association of Assistant Masters was formed ten years ago and, although the well-paid masters in the great schools as yet take little part in its procedure, it numbers already 1,600 members and is destined, if it shows courage and wisdom, to exercise an important influence in the world of education. Its aims are twofold—to promote public interest in education, and to procure for assistant masters some voice in the guidance of that work of which they do by far the largest part. Both objects are not only legitimate but useful. The more the public understands about education the better; the more all the members of a profession are zealous about its welfare and interested in its development the more vigorous and fruitful it will prove. Teaching is not a mystery of which headmasters are the hierophants, but something which may be “understood of the vulgar,” and about which ordinary men who devote their lives to it may have something to say, may wish to say it, and have a right to say it. No conference of mere headmasters can do more than represent the partial, and sometimes prejudiced, opinion of a single class. No “Consultative Committee” from which assistant masters are ignominiously excluded can ever possess half the information which it ought necessarily to possess. If in the realm of education there is to be prosperity and progress, the emancipation and enfranchisement of the able and industrious men who bear nearly all its burdens is an essential and necessary step towards that end.

* In a recent case, on the death of a headmaster his successor claimed the right at once to dismiss all the assistant masters, much as, on the demise of an African potentate, the new monarch despatches his principal ministers after him to the Shades. The Charity Commissioners are, however, dubiously of the opinion that this barbarous practice is not necessarily legal.

When once that enfranchisement comes and members of the profession secure a right to be heard, the second injustice to which reference has been made, and which now hampers all educational progress, will inevitably disappear. There is no schoolmaster alive who does not know that in the appointment of the principal headmasters merit is not the controlling factor in the election, and that, in spite of justice, honesty, and common sense, no one who is not in Orders or willing to take them has the slightest chance of success. The fact is notorious, and, if once assistant masters were represented on any Board or Committee authorized to deal with education, they would compel it from sheer shame to insist on the complete and final abolition of clerical restrictions. The case against them is overwhelming. They degrade ordination into an easy means of purchasing advancement; they debar the great bulk of the profession from any just hope of promotion; and at every election they so narrow the field of choice that high appointments are continually conferred upon men who have done nothing whatever to deserve them. A single and recent illustration will suffice. Some few months ago the headship of a great London school fell vacant and the governors advertised only for candidates who were in Orders or willing to take them. Had it been an open election they would have had scores of able and experienced men from whom to choose; as it was, they were driven to elect a young University Don who had the advantage of being ripe for Ordination at the opportune moment, but whose qualifications to take a foremost place in a great profession were absolutely suppositional. A Judge, a Bishop, or a general must go through some preliminary discipline. The President of the College of Physicians has, usually, seen some actual practice. But the highest qualities of a schoolmaster are often, it seems, a miraculous gift. Ordinary mortals garner up knowledge through patient study and slow experience, but, by a strange paradox, many men who control education are a living contradiction of its laws; they know without learning, and find wisdom without seeking for her. That, however, under a system which thus defies all the principles of common sense, there are many defects in education is hardly to be wondered at. Promotion by merit and the right of all its members to some reasonable participation in affairs are essential to progress in every calling or pursuit. Some day, when the public understands how its own interests now suffer, it will recognize that education is not exempt from this universal law, and will insist on the reform of its antiquated and unjust methods of administration. When that reform comes, when men who devote their lives to teaching obtain some reasonable recognition of their rights and some hope that good work will in due season bring its good reward, then—but not before—there will breathe over the world of education a quickening spirit, and, instead of darkness and stagnation, there will be light and life.

Reviews.

CLASSICAL.

THE ATHENIAN DRAMA. I.—AESCHYLUS: THE ORESTEIAN TRILOGY. Translated and Explained by G. C. W. WARR. With Illustrations. (George Allen. 7s. 6d. n.)

Ever since the revival of learning there have been attempts to make the classics available for the reader who could not understand them in the original. These have usually taken the form of translations, some of which are among the choicest treasures of the English language. It is unfortunate that in the great age of English drama so few translations were made of the classical dramatists. Seneca we have, and some plays of Plautus or Terence in prose, but the few verse attempts at Greek plays are more adaptations than translations. In our own day scholarship is at its best, but the art of writing vigorous English has waned among us; hence one translation after another appears, and none seems just to hit the mark.

The plan of the series, of which this Oresteia is the first, is explained by Professor Warr in his preface. He hopes to supply not only the “English reader,” but the “more or less instructed student,” with “thoroughly annotated translations, giving the latter the means of widening the area of his early reading, and following it up in after life, so as to make the ancient literature a permanent possession.” He suggests that they may be used on the modern sides of schools, whose classical work is now confined to Latin. Instances of the type of book he has in mind are Leaf’s “Companion to the Iliad,” Lang’s “Homeric Hymns,” and his own “Greek Epic.” This volume, which contains versions of the Oresteia, a running commentary, and short essays on the Rise of Greek Tragedy and the Oresteian Trilogy, is intended to represent Aeschylus; to follow are others on Sophocles, on Euripides, and classical comedy. A number of illustrations, well selected and beautifully executed, further help modern readers to realize the theme.

Now the plan is good, and from the scholar’s point of view it has been well carried out, as Professor Warr’s name is enough to guarantee. There is no padding; indeed, the introduction is really too short and omits explanations which the non-Grecian will surely want (e.g., Pegasus, p. xviii.). The notes are just what the English reader wants, and the translation, though not slavishly literal, is correct and, so far as we have examined it, rarely fails to bring out the right points. We wish we could say that, from a literary point of view, this was the ideal translation, so long desired in vain; but, good as it is, this is not quite the fact. The chief fault, and one which strikes you on every page, is the affectation of archaic words. Dryden says that we may borrow a foreign word, or revive an old one, when it is either “more sounding or more significant” than those now in use. But on what ground should we use “fang” for “catch,” “covin,” “glory eterne and grist”? Are “feastful,” “deathful,” “presageful” more sounding than others, or is “hospitage” more significant? What would the English reader make of a “warraid burg” or the “twang of fists”? The choruses, in particular, are sometimes obscure and need a glossary. Then, again, the blank verse rhythm is somewhat monotonous, though it is often quite a success in passages; but the English reader, who wants his Aeschylus made as homelike as possible, will certainly be misled when he finds the choruses done into “rhythmic prose.” The pity is greater because Professor Warr’s verse renderings are far better than his prose; they are simpler, they are, indeed, rhythmical, and in the Eumenides, where some of the choruses are in verse, they are often daintily pretty. Professor Warr has really lost an opportunity of trying an experiment which we think would have succeeded. Characters like the Watchman or the Nurse ought to speak in prose. Shakespeare would certainly have made them do so ; but here they talk in the same high-flown style as the others. The Watchman says :—

Plague on this tyrant fancy, that hath taken
My lady's lording heart ! Oft on my couch—
This dank uneasy bed, that hath for me
No spell of gadding dreams ; for slumber bilks me
And terror stares upon me, lest I shut
Mine eyelids past all waking—whensoever
I think to purge my sleepy pate with song,
Humming or whistling, as I shred the dose,
I fall to poorly sobbing for our goodman
And goodly occupation gone to bad . . .
All hail, thou flame, that darkling usherest
Dayspring and ample jubilee of choirs,
Which Argos shall array for this success ! . . .
The rest is hush, all hush : a lumping ox
Hath poizèd down my tongue. My bedfellow
Would voice it plain enough, if stones could speak.
My closet he shall ope, who hath the key ;
To them who know not, I'm a dummerer.

The merit of this version is obvious, and it is all clear enough, except the "bedfellow," which can hardly represent αἰκός "the house." But the tone seems to us wrong ; the rough rustic humour is quite distinct in the Greek. Let us try what could be made of prose.

Needs must when the queen bids, and she's a stout-hearted lady, good as a man any day. So I must go roaming o' nights in the dew, and never a dream to visit my bed. Fear's my bedfellow, not sleep, so that I dare not clap my eyelids together to sleep sound. Time and again I would fain warble a song, or whistle ; your singing is a fine physic for the sleepless ; but the song turns to sighing, the whistle to wailing, as I bethink me how ill things are going now with the royal house. . . . There's the blaze, I vow, God bless it ! the night is as bright as day ; there will be great junketings in the city for this. . . . But mum's the word ! the black ox treads o' my tongue, and he's no featherweight. If walls had voices they might tell tales and no mistake. I'm glad to speak out before those that know ; for those who know nothing I have a rare short memory.

In the Eumenides Professor Warr has warmed to his work, and the blank verse seems distinctly more simple and no less dignified than in the earlier part of the volume ; but the choruses are the same all through until just at the end, where verse is used. Professor Warr at his best is very good, and we hope he will believe that these criticisms are made in no spirit of cavilling. We wish to see the whole work brought up to the level of the best of it. There is yet time to alter the succeeding volumes, and there is sure to be a second edition of this. With all its faults it is scholarly and interesting, and the English reader will find most of his difficulties cleared up and his judgment helped by a little excellent criticism, of which we would fain see more.

THE CAPTIVI OF PLAUTUS. Edited, with Introduction, Apparatus Criticus, and Commentary. By W. M. LINDSAY. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. n.)

Mr. Lindsay's Captivi marks a distinct step in advance on any previous edition of Plautus : one has only to glance at Ramsay's "Mostellaria," so excellent in its day, to see the difference. We do not compare this book with the numerous school editions which have appeared within the last few years. The notes in these are often quite good, and they make painstaking efforts to give some idea of Plantine prosody to the unreceptive schoolboy ; but none of them produce the impression, as does the present work, that the author is master of his subject. For one thing, Mr. Lindsay's own metrical studies have been in print for some years in the Journal of Philology ;

but they have not been used as they should be by editors. But here we have the starting-point for a new edition of Plautus. Mr. Lindsay's improvement on previous editors—we might almost call it his new discovery (for, although hinted at even by Ritschl, it has never before been worked out)—is the use of the phrase-accent for explaining apparent irregularities. It is well known that words are often accented differently in different connexions ; hence it is not sufficient to say volo is accented on the penult. Where volo is practically an auxiliary, the word and its infinitive are accented as one word or word-group ; thus volo scribere will have one main accent, and the result of volo losing its own accent is to shorten the final syllable. Hence Plautus scans the phrase vōlō scribē. So it is with others ; siquidem, tūquidem, sed quis homost, cūve dicas, and, in particular, all prepositional phrases. This fruitful discovery has been worked out fully in the brilliant introduction on Prosody, and applied to the criticism of the text. Mr. Lindsay's knowledge of the Romance languages has been turned to account in the same way. Of the notes, we can only say that they seem to us generally just what is wanted. There are a few weak points, it is true ; the question of the gerund and gerundive is not exhaustively treated, and we much doubt the explanation given of lucis tuendi copia ; the strange use of dixeram for a simple past is not adequately treated ; there are several notes on nam, but none brings out clearly that nam is an emphatic particle simply, as γάρ originally was, and like hi in Sanskrit. In the difficult line 202 Mr. Lindsay reads oculis multa mira ait, for miraculis, a clever emendation as far as form goes, but not quite convincing. In 882 we still think that Praeneste is suggested by the words just before—that is, that Hegio says tam diu, not iam diu ; and the Praenestine tam may have been a corruption of etiam, which Mr. Lindsay does not note. As to tu ne (857) we should be inclined to regard this as a comic echo of the other speaker, as one should say—"What, I sir ?—What you, sir !" However, there are not many points we would call in question ; and we desire to emphasize the value of the evidence from the Romance languages, as given by the editor on occasion, for deciding Latin pronunciation or even spelling. There are some happy Shakespearean parallels given in the notes. Another might have been added ; for as popular speech makes periculum into periculum, so the Elizabethans could scan l or r as a syllable—traitor, for example, as three (Marlowe). The Metres of Plautus are also dealt with in the introduction, and Latin accent in an appendix ; and Mr. Lindsay promises to edit us further plays, with essays on Plantine Syntax and Accidence, and the other points of interest. We hope he will do so ; there is no one living who could do it better.

THE ODYSSEY. Rendered into English Prose by SAMUEL BUTLER, Author of "Erewhon," &c. (Longmans. 7s. 6d.)

The discoverer of the "authoress" of "The Odyssey" (a claim to honour modestly suppressed on the title-page of this work) now publishes in full the prose translation of which he had before given copious extracts. Prose it certainly is, and that of the baldest and most commonplace. Messrs. Butcher and Lang in their prose translation of "The Odyssey," with which Mr. Butler, printing the first sixty lines of it, expressly challenges comparison, aimed at a somewhat archaic prose, suggestive of that employed in the Authorized Version of the Bible, and succeeded in producing a pleasant and dignified version. Mr. Butler's version is, so far as we have tested it, only moderately accurate, and certainly not dignified. It seems to aim at expressing Homer's language in that of the street or of the servants' hall. A few phrases will illustrate what we mean :—

νόμφη πόρνη' ἔρυκε Καλύππω, δια θεῶν, ἐν σπείσσι γλαφυροῖσι, λιλαιομένη πόσιν εἰναί. (Od. i., 14, 15.)

Butcher and Lang : "The lady nymph Calypso held (him), that fair goddess, in her hollow cave, longing to have him for her lord." Butler : "(He) was detained by the goddess Calypso, who had got him into a large cave and wanted to marry him." This, we may observe, makes no attempt to render δια, a vague and fluctuating term no doubt, but intended to have some meaning; ignores the meaning of γλαφυροίσι, and seems to confuse πόσιν grammatically with πόσις. It also suggests the picture of Calypso blocking the entrance with an ample person, and saying, "You shan't come out, unless you marry me."

καὶ λίην καὶνός γε ἐοικότες αἶται δλίθρῳ ὡς ἀπόλοιο καὶ ἄλλος τις τοιαῦτά γε ῥέζοι.

Butcher and Lang: "That man (Aegisthus) assuredly lies in a death that is his due; so perish likewise all who work such deeds!" Butler: "It served Aegisthus right, and so it would any one else who does as he did; but Aegisthus is neither here nor there." These passages occur in the lines where Mr. Butler specially invites comparison with the other translators. In the next paragraph, "Zeus, the cloud-gatherer," rebukes Athene: τέκνον ἐμὸν, ποῖόν σε ἔπος φέγειν ἔρκος οὐδόντων ("My child, what word hath escaped the door of thy lips?") Mr. Butler renders, "Jove (νεφεληγερέτα ignored) said, 'My child, what are you talking about?'" We may note, by the way, that he persists in using the Latin names Jove, Juno, Minerva for the Greek deities Zeus, Here, Athene—a small error, perhaps, but betraying lack of acquaintance with Greek and Roman mythology. Again, Telemachus' address to Athene, disguised as Mentis (i., 158), Ξεῖνε φίλ', ἣ καὶ μοι νημασθήσαι ὅττι κεν εἴπω ("Dear stranger, wilt thou of a truth be wroth at the word that I shall say?") appears as, "I hope, sir, that you will not be offended at what I am going to say?"

These examples, we think, are enough to prove our contention that Mr. Butler's prose translation is βάναντος—marked by bathos rather than dignity. To show, however, that it remains to the end qualis ab incepto processerit, let us take one more example from xxiv., 481, where Zeus, replying to Athene, says:—ἔρξον ὅπως ἐθέλεις· ἐρίω γέ τοι ὡς ἐρέοικεν ("Do as thou wilt, but I will tell thee of the better way"). This in Mr. Butler's hands becomes, "Do whatever you like, but I will tell you what I think will be the most reasonable arrangement!"

Those who do not possess that literary curiosity, "The Authoress of the Odyssey," will find its main conclusions summarized and confidently reaffirmed in the preface to this volume—viz., that the Odyssey was written at, and its scenery all drawn from, Trapani (Drepanum), on the west coast of Sicily; its authoress being a young woman who lived there, and introduced herself into the story as Nausicaa. If she was, as is pointed out in one of the notes, "a practised washer-woman," the English of this translation may be a fair equivalent of the language that she spoke. Otherwise we see no purpose in it. It is bald enough, but not sufficiently accurate, for a schoolboy's crib; for scholars of any taste it is disappointing.

Cicero.

The third volume of Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh's translation of THE LETTERS OF CICERO (Bell, 5s.) covers the years 48—February 44 B.C., a momentous period, as the culmination of the Great Dictator's life. The allusions to public events are numerous, but, unfortunately, not always so clear as could be wished. Cicero was in the early part of this period in doubt what to do, and naturally did not wish to commit himself in writing. He writes, however, from Pompey's camp, and we learn that he refused to take command of the fleet after the battle of Pharsalia, which he recognized at once as a decisive defeat. His own turmoil of mind, even during the time when he had made his peace with Cæsar, is well reflected in the letters. We have vividly brought before us how Cæsar's hand made itself to be felt through all departments of State. In several letters Cicero shows a suspicious interest in Brutus and Cassius. There is a good deal about his private life and anxieties; allusion to Terentia and to Marcus, and Cicero's literary recreations. Most of the letters are addressed to the ever-ready Atticus; other correspondents are the learned Varro, Sulpicius Rufus the lawyer, and L. Papirius Pætus. The letters to Pætus are amongst the most interesting in the book from a literary point of view. Mr. Shuckburgh's part in the work is satisfactory, and, we think, shows an improvement on the beginning. But why is the table of dates of Cicero's life placed in this volume? In the fourth and final volume is included the brief space between 44 and Cicero's death in 43. The first letter appears to congratulate one of the conspirators on Cæsar's murder; but Cicero soon finds out that with Antony alive "the tyrant had been destroyed, not the tyranny," and the rest of his days are occupied with opposition to Antony by all possible means. Mr. Shuckburgh's "Introduction" estimates the character of Cicero a little too summarily, perhaps, for one so complex, but without prejudice or heat. We also have a brief account of the chief correspondents, which is sensible, though it lacks the vividness of Boissier's. There is a full index. We should like to call attention to a few conjectural emendations printed on page vii.; in particular, the convincing one in Att. xv. 5: ὁ θησαυρὸς ἀνθρακες for ὅτε γαῦς ἀνθρακες. We see no reason to modify the opinion expressed in our notice of the first volumes, except to say that the style of the translation has distinctly improved. On the whole, it is a good piece of work, and the chronological arrangement will make it useful to historical students.

Mr. F. D. Norris' aim in his ORATIONS OF CICERO, another volume of the Scott Library (Scott, 1s. 6d.), appears to be to provide a Cicero for English readers by printing translations of typical speeches. He has chosen the Roscius, Cæcilius, the four Catilines, Mursæna, Archias, Milo, Marcellus, and two Philippias. One would expect a piece of Verres, but otherwise the speeches are characteristic. The translation is by William Guthrie, whose style has something of the ponderousness of the eighteenth century, but at least it is a style, and that is more than can be said of many writers nowadays. It is really quite agreeable to read. But neither Guthrie nor most others can compare with Roger L'Estrange, whose translations have been strangely neglected. His TULLY'S OFFICES have been carefully edited by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse and issued in the Temple Classics (Dent, 1s. 6d.). There never was a more racy writer of English. His peculiar talents have not full play in "Tully's Offices," but he makes the most of it. The preface alone is worth the money which Messrs. Dent ask for their dainty little edition.

A recent volume of Macmillan's "Golden Treasury" Series is made up of translations from Cicero's "De Amicitia" and "De Senectute," under the name of CICERO ON OLD AGE AND FRIENDSHIP (2s. 6d. n.). Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh's translation is worthy of his scholarship, and the introduction is at once interesting and admirably phrased. Many persons no doubt will be glad to possess in an English dress the work which Emerson characterizes as "Cicero's famous essay, charming by its uniform rhetorical merit, heroic with stoical precepts."

Classical Texts with Notes.

We are not in love with books of selections, but in the case of some authors they are useful. It is difficult, however, to place the SELECTIONS FROM PLATO, edited, in Macmillan's Red Series, by Dr. L. L. Forman, of Cornell University (7s. 6d.). For middle forms in schools it is too full, unless it be kept as a stock book for three or four terms; for the University it is not enough; a sixth form, again, prefers whole dialogues. But there is a unity in this book; it aims at being an introduction to the Greek of Plato and to the personality of Socrates. The "Apology" and "Crito" are given entire; and the most famous passages are chosen from the "Symposium," the "Republic," the "Phædo," "Gorgias," and other chief dialogues, besides extracts from some, such as "Euthydemus" and "Sophistes," which are rarely read. The notes are arranged on a novel plan; elementary notes, meant for beginners, are given first, and then a number of advanced notes, chiefly on points of language. Some of these are very good (e.g., that on ἀλλὰ γάρ, p. 419). Authorities and quotations are given for all statements, and in this respect the book is scholarly and reliable. Their bulk is unwieldy, however, and we must quarrel with the inelegant style of the Introduction. It is strange that a student of Plato has so little sense of the uncouth in language and so little regard for literary form. The text follows the best authorities and is generally judicious; but we think φροντιστής in "Apology" 18 C. is a quotation from the "Clouds," and ought not to be bracketed.

The Clarendon Press has produced quite a beautiful book in DEMOSTHENES AGAINST MEIDIAS, edited by Mr. J. R. King (3s. 6d.). The editing also is good. The text has been carefully revised by Professor Butcher, who adds the necessary critical notes. The text is certainly an improvement on the vulgate; conservative on the whole, Professor Butcher is not afraid to adopt a reading on the authority of inferior MSS. when it is demonstrably better (e.g., p. 526, ἐταύσεν for ἐψησεν). Mr. King's introduction and notes are neat and to the point. Occasionally he errs by omission; thus nothing is said to explain γὰρ when it does not mean "for" (§ 28, p. 25). We have also noted an error in archaeology, where the tripod as a votive offering is said to have special reference to Apollo and Dionysus (p. 18). The tripod in early times was a unit of value, and it is offered to the Muses and to other deities on occasion. On the whole, however, this is a good school-book. We should add that the reference pages by which Plato is quoted are the only paging used in the text. This capital idea is borrowed from the Oxford Classical Texts.

We have already called attention to Blackwood's Classical Texts (1s. 6d. each), with their interesting pictures; but we must repeat that they are unsatisfactory in form. The inset analysis is printed in ugly type, and there is no room for it on a small page; where it consists of a date only, one is apt to read it as part of the line. Thus, in Mr. Sharpley's OLYNTIACS OF DEMOSTHENES we read, "when the 366 B.C. he came of age." The illustrations are valuable, and a little pains on the part of the printer would make this an excellent series. The notes to the "Olynthiacs" are fair, but suggest comment. Why is not something said to explain why such a word as ἄντις is followed by the aorist infinitive as well as the future (p. 42)? What is a "good sense" in πικρὸς (p. 50)? Is not σαφὲς οὐρανό "plainly enough" rather than "quite plainly"? The remarks on the portrait of Demosthenes are shallow, and the editor appears to infer from it that he did not take enough exercise. We hasten to add that the estimate of Demosthenes as a man is conceived on less narrow lines, and the appendix of extracts from Plutarch is interesting. Mr. E. E. Sikes' SIXTH ODYSSEY is well done, but, like the Demosthenes, sometimes fails to insist on principles. Thus, on p. 289 it ought to be pointed out that the reason for the "idiomatic" order εἴνε δὲ is that the vocative, like exclamations, is always outside the syntax of a sentence. The philological part and the notes on dialect are good, and there is an appendix on Homeric Folk-lore which is worth reading. Mr. A. Jagger's XENOPHON ANABASIS, Books I., II., is very thoroughly done, the illustrated matter about the Greek army and Greek military terms is admirable. It is almost too thorough—the matter about irregular verbs, conditional sentences, &c., should be left to the grammar or the teacher.

It is strange that one should have to criticize the shape and get-up of school-books, when the Clarendon Press and Mr. Dent have shown how to make books look well. It is not a mere matter of look; but crowded print and small margins are doing a vast deal of damage to children's eyesight. Messrs. Bell's admirably Illustrated Classical Series, got up at great expense, is, we think, too small in size. Otherwise, Mr. E. H. Blakeney's ALCESTIS (2s.) deserves praise. It has a capital introduction, archaeological and critical, fairly good notes, and most instructive pictures. It is a mistake, however, we are confident, to translate too much; and here whole choruses are translated. The grammatical appendix does what every boy ought to do for himself. Lastly, those who read a Greek play ought to be made to use a dictionary, not a special vocabulary.

The ANABASIS OF XENOPHON, Book VI., edited by Mr. G. M. Edwards (Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges, 1s. 6d.), is a good school-book. The Introduction is interesting, the Notes hit the mean between too little and too much. In the same series Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh edits CÆSAR: GALLIC WAR VII., with notes and a vocabulary; this is also good. The new series is not so ambitious as the old school series, but more useful.

SELECTED LETTERS OF PLINY, edited by J. H. Westcott, Professor of Latin in Princeton University (Alleyne and Bacon's College Latin Series, Putnam's, 6s.), is a good book. The introduction contains an account of Pliny's style, very necessary for students. We have noted no sins of omission or commission in the book, and it may safely be recommended for colleges or higher forms in schools.

Two editions of Sallust's CATILINE lie before us. One of them is edited by Mr. W. C. Summers, a lecturer at Owens College (Pitt Press, 2s.), and is a very thorough and scholarly work. The other, by Mr. W. A. Stone (Blackie, 1s. 6d., illustrated), is less complete, but is better suited for schools; if, indeed, Sallust is a suitable author for schools. Mr. Stone is fuller on the historical side, but neither editor deals with the question of Cicero's legal right to put the conspirators to death. The frontispiece, by the way, is hardly illustrative of the subject.

In the same series as this Mr. J. Brown, Professor of Latin at Victoria College, Wellington, edits LIVY, Book I. (1s. 6d.). Here the illustrations are well selected, but we desire full information as to their authority. We have our doubts about those Roman siege-engines. The imaginative pictures of Cæsar's death and captives passing under the yoke are excellent. Notes and introduction are satisfactory, and there is a vocabulary and exercises in re-translation.

LIVY, Book XXI. (2s. 6d.), has long been a standing dish for lower forms and even for "smalls." But to read it as edited by Mr. George G. Loane, for Messrs. Blackie's Illustrated Latin Series, with admirable illustrations—notably a picture of Hannibal's elephants crossing the Rhine—is a modern luxury. The introduction is well suited to stimulate the young idea. The text is that of Müller's Weissenborn (eighth edition, 1891), and in the appendices and copious notes standard authorities such as Dowdall, Taine, Niebuhr, Mommsen, and Arnold are freely drawn upon.

Verse Composition.

TENTAMINA is the modest title given by Mr. David Slater, M.A., to a collection of translations into Latin and Greek verse (Oxford, Blackwell; London, Simpkin, Marshall), which we think can hold their own with others. They are scholarly and poetical, and their author has felt, as many do, the charm of such exercises, in which (he says) many of the happiest hours of his life have been spent. The most ambitious effort in the book is a rendering of Tennyson's "The Revenge" into Latin hexameters, spirited and well-sustained. Here, for instance, is the rendering of the lines (56 sqq.) beginning—

And the sun went down, and the stars came out
Far over the summer sea:—

Sol ruit interea: collucent sidere multo
Aestivi late fluctus. Olli usque tot unam
Diruere Ultricem tendunt; mora nulla duello.
Certatim immensae noctem, quam longa, carinae
Exorcere vices; nunc Martem accendere telis,
Nunc tentare aditum, multa nunc morte referri,
Vieta inhonora acies.

Or, again, the lines near the end—

And they manned the Revenge with a swarthier alien crew,
And away she sailed with her loss and longed for her own, are thus neatly turned:—

Captam deinde ratem manus advena voltibus atris
Occupat; illa abiit spoliata, suosque requirit.

Mr. Slater is less happy in his Alcaic version of Tennyson's magnificent Ode to Virgil. It has some neat turns, but does not seem to get fairly hold of either the language or the rhythm of the original, and reads poor beside it. But his elegiac versions are for the most part excellent. As a specimen we give the last four lines of R. L. Stevenson's "Requiem"—

This be the verse you grave for me :
Here he lies where he longed to be ;
Home is the sailor, home from sea,
And the hunter home from the hill.

Addē etiam titulum tumulo. Pia musa iacentem
Optato memoret procubuisse toro.
Nunc iuga venator linquit repetitque penates ;
Nauta pererratis nunc requiescit aquis.

For "linquit" perhaps read "liquit." This version is headed "Operum Solutus"; and the headings throughout are happily chosen. The book deserves a place upon a scholar's shelves.

Mr. Marchant's illustrated SCALE TERTIÆ (Bell, 1s.) contains easy extracts in prose and verse, Phædrus, Ovid, Nepos, and Cicero, with pictures drawn to illustrate them, a vocabulary, and notes. The notes are written ad puerum, and are like so many others, rather too specific. General principles can often be taught to young learners—e.g., why verbs of obeying take a dative. The book is open to the same objections as the others of this small series, and so is Mr. G. H. Nall's MILTIADES AND EPAMINONDAS from Cornelius Nepos (Macmillan's Elementary Classics, 1s. 6d.). There are good notes and all things to make the boy's path easy, but his eyes are not thought of. The PRECEPTORS' LATIN READER (Clive, 1s. 6d.), with vocabulary, edited by E. J. G. Forse, is better printed, but the extracts are rather short. These books ought to be compiled with a view to the usual lesson of fifteen or twenty lines. The "Reader" may be used with the same publisher's PRECEPTOR'S LATIN COURSE (2s. 6d.), by B. J. Hayes, a very clearly-printed and handy volume more or less on familiar lines, save that some elementary instruction on verbs and adjectives is introduced pari passu with the declensions. There are some good hints on translation. Blackie's INTERMEDIATE GREEK UNSEENS (paper covers, 4d.) is a useful booklet, clearly printed. The extracts are moderately easy and well chosen. We will but mention the SELF-EDUCATOR IN LATIN, by Mr. W. A. Edward, M.A., edited by Mr. J. Adams, Rector of the Free Church Training College, Glasgow (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.). This contains its own "crib," and will be useful for those who cannot find a teacher; but to use it requires some strength of character.

MODERN LANGUAGES.

French.

The Clarendon Press publishes an HISTORICAL PRIMER OF FRENCH PHONETICS, by Margaret S. Brittain (2s. 6d.). It is intended as an introduction to Brachet's "Historical French Grammar," and Mr. Paget Toynbee, in a prefatory note, says that "the want of some such elementary book has long been felt by English students." Some students will probably reply that their want has been supplied by the elementary book by Professor Spiers, reviewed in our columns about a year ago. Those who are satisfied to get a general view of the steps by which the vulgar tongue of the Roman legionaries developed into the language of Voltaire would certainly find all they need in Professor Spiers' manual. Miss Brittain's book is more advanced and goes into more details. If a student wants any preliminary exercises before plunging straight into Brachet, those provided by Miss Brittain will serve the purpose admirably.

Is the teaching of French Grammar in English schools to be simplified by the new licences in spelling and in syntax approved by the Ministre de l'Instruction? Is Alfred to be still subjected to a tyranny from which Jules is freed? At present, Yes, if he learns all that is imparted in Mr. Arthur A. Wall's admirable CONCISE FRENCH GRAMMAR (4s. 6d.) in the Clarendon Press Series. In that case he would first learn the old rules and then how to break them—a double task. But his method is, after all, the safest at present. By giving the old rules and then stating in brackets the variation which will in future be permitted he shows the master, so to speak, where he is, and leaves it to his discretion how to act. The book is otherwise well done, more or less on established lines.

PARLONS FRANÇAIS, by M. Frédérick Julien (Blackie, 2s. 6d.), is arranged on the principle that conversation should be taught before grammar. The author quotes the statement made by Lord Kimberley when enforcing the necessity of foreign languages to our commercial men—"Instead of beginning with the grammar, the languages should be learned as an infant learned to talk." But it is easier said than done. A French nurse may do wonders, or six months in France. But in the schoolroom it must be an uphill task to make a boy talk who knows nothing about tenses and so forth. If it can be done, M. Julien's conversations, racy and familiar, will do it. The following, by the way, seems to be more adapted to adult pupils:—

Qu'écrivez-vous ?

J'écris une lettre . . . à une jeune mariée.

Ecrit-elle souvent ?

Elle ne sait pas écrire.

Another French book, by Mr. de V. Payen-Payne, FRENCH IDIOMS AND PROVERBS (Nutt, 3s. 6d.), has proved its usefulness by reaching a third edition. The book is enlarged, and the author now helps the student who does not want to read the whole book at once by placing asterisks against the most important proverbs.

While the elaborate fabric of French grammar is tottering, Molière still plants his foot firm in the schoolroom. A writer in the Mercure de France tried to prove not long ago that there is more real humour in Hamlet than in any of Molière's plays. Luckily this does not affect Mr. Dent, who adds to the Temple Molière LE MÉDECIN MALGRÉ LUI (1s. 6d. n.), which Leigh Hunt selected as an example par excellence of Molière's "wit and humour." The notes are good and learned—almost too learned for the occasion. For how can a boy laugh as much as he should at the Mock Doctor if he has to remember all the parallels in the play to other works—Montaigne's Apologie de Raimond Sébond, &c.—which he cannot have read? It is a big jump from the classic atmosphere of Molière to Mérimée, who, as is pointed out in Mr. J. E. Michell's edition of TAMANGO (Blackie, 1s.), belonged to the romantic school at the beginning of the last century, in spite of the fact that he constantly made fun of it. It is a capital idea to give boys short stories in French. The French are supreme in that medium, and the length of some of the books used in class is apt to make literature into a task.

THE AGE OF LOUIS XI., a French reader, edited by Mr. F. W. B. Smart (Black, 2s. n.), is designed to illustrate a continuous period of French history from the narratives of contemporaries or eminent modern writers. Among the writers drawn upon are Philippe de Comines, Martin, Michelet, Sismondi, Victor Hugo, and Emile Zola. There is no vocabulary, but there are sufficient notes. The reader is for the higher forms, and is of the better sort.

German.

A SELECTION OF GERMAN IDIOMS (Macmillans, 3s. 6d.), compiled by Myra Taker and F. F. Roget, supplies a long-felt want. It contains some three thousand phrases selected not only from standard German literature but also from the more familiar usages of every-day conversation, and sentences are added illustrative of the more difficult idioms. A word or two of explanation might have been appended with advantage to some of the more recondite phrases. The fairly advanced student will find the book an invaluable companion to the ordinary dictionary.

Mr. H. W. Eve is responsible for a carefully-annotated edition of Gustav Freytag's bright little play, DIE JOURNALISTEN (Pitt Press, 2s. 6d.). A comedy of this type with its sparkling dialogue and modern phraseology seems to us much better adapted for the average student than the usual selections from the classical works of the great German dramatists. The text is preceded by a sketch of Freytag's career and a well-considered analysis of the plot of the play. The notes are short and to the point, and all obscure allusions and syntactical difficulties have been explained with sufficient detail.

PREPARATORY GERMAN LESSONS, by Mr. S. E. Bally (Allman, 9d.), is uniform with M. Blouet's "Preparatory French Lessons." It would be more useful in the hands of a teacher with a black-board than in those of the pupil. For this purpose its arrangement is good; it does not, for instance, give lists of declensions to be learnt by heart, but takes each case and each variety one after another, with conversations and exercises on each. A capital feature is the Volkslieder scattered throughout the book in illustration of different rules, frequently with a note as to the tune to which they can be sung.

Self-Educators.

The only objection to THE SELF-EDUCATOR IN FRENCH (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.), by John Adams, is that for those who wish to learn French without a tutor a special text-book is hardly needed. The ordinary grammars designed for school use do well enough, though they should be supplemented by a free use of the daily paper as a "reader." As many of the same telegrams appear in English and foreign journals, the student is there furnished with a "crib." But Mr. Adams' book is good enough, and may smooth over some difficulties. This, too, may certainly be said of the same author's SELF-EDUCATOR IN GERMAN (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.), intended to teach the student to read and write, not to speak German. This book is distinctly easier and more interesting for the solitary student than an ordinary grammar. It is attractively printed and copiously supplied with extracts of an interesting character for translation.

ENGLISH.

The English Language.

Professor Toller's OUTLINES OF THE HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE (the Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges, 4s.) is a scholarly piece of work. It is formal, not literary—that is, it deals with the materials of the English language, how they were accumulated, acted upon each other, and gradually took shape; and if extracts are given from earlier authors, they are studied from this point of view. A student may learn something of literature from the volume, but that is by the way. Professor Toller is no compiler; he knows his subject at first hand, and his remarks (as on the influence of Danish) are often original, and always acute. This book certainly supplies a want, and may be cordially recommended. We wish Professor Toller would follow it up with a work dealing with literary style; a most interesting subject, and almost untouched.

Shakespeare.

Mr. J. Lees, who has compiled one or two useful books of Examination Questions on Shakespeare's Plays, has a very clear idea of what is wanted to make a schoolboy understand Shakespeare. He now gives us a school edition of HENRY V. (Allman, 1s.), a handy, well-bound book. The introduction is a concise and practical summary of all that is known about the play. The notes are for the most part only explanatory of any possible difficulty in the meaning of Shakespeare's language, with some etymological and metrical matter. From this point of view they are very complete. The characters of the King and of Fluellen are fully discussed, but for the most part criticism of the merits and defects of the play are left to the teacher, who will also have to be careful to avoid any mechanical use of the notes. Thus, a boy asked in an examination to explain the phrase "arrant knavery" would not show much merit if he simply quotes from the notes "notorious villany."

Mr. A. W. Verity's editions of Shakespeare are well known, and his KING HENRY V. (Pitt Press Shakespeare, 1s. 6d.) shows the same merits of thoroughness and accuracy as the others. These books are too elaborate for middle school work, but are well suited for advanced students who wish to know all about a play. For examination purposes they are well suited; although it must be admitted that the humour and the poetic interest suffer somewhat by the elaboration of questions in language and literary history. Print and paper are good; the margins are mean, a serious fault in all the Pitt Press school-books.

Messrs. Blackie have issued AS YOU LIKE IT as the first number of a "Picture Shakespeare" (1s.), which embodies most of the notes and introductions of their Junior School Shakespeare. The text is revised "to secure entire suitability for class use." We do not like the coarse coloured frontispiece, but the half-dozen pictures in the text are neat. The print is good, but the paper is unpleasantly shiny. The notes are very simple, and are mostly explanations of the text.

Sir Walter Scott.

OLD MORTALITY and WOODSTOCK, in Black's school edition of Scott (1s. 6d. each), are before us. We have already described the features of this edition, which contains introductions and notes brief and very much to the point. They are well printed, and the cover will not show dirt. All young readers will be glad to be told the meaning of "culverin," "siserary," "sconce," "grimalkin," "Moriscoes," "tiffany," and "carolus." For middle forms there is an abbreviated edition of OLD MORTALITY (1s. n.), and for the very young there is THE STORY OF OLD MORTALITY, told in ninety pages. THE STORY OF IVANHOE is also told in some fifty pages by Harriet Gassiot; a few notes and a short introduction are added by W. M. Mackenzie. The two latter belong to Black's illustrated SIR WALTER SCOTT READERS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE (6d. n.), which would be useful in elementary schools. The pictures will help children to realize the scenes, and are not without merit. Nevertheless it might be urged that other authors have written tales better adapted for infants than Scott abbreviated. He need not be thrust down their throats as if he were the Shorter Catechism.

Reprints and Readings in English.

We are unfeignedly glad to see convenient editions of English prose masterpieces, but it is impossible to blink the fact that the "apparatus" in most of them is overdone. What is wanted is a brief introduction, including a sketch of biography and concise literary or historical criticism, and a glossary of proper names. Very few notes, indeed, will be necessary to explain the language and other allusions. THE TEMPLE CLASSICS contain almost enough for practical purposes, and we are surprised they are not more used in schools. But here we have Macaulay's ESSAY ON WARREN HASTINGS (Blackie, 2s.) in a book of 250 pages, his PITT (Blackie, 2s.) filling 160, and Carlyle's ESSAY ON BURNS (Blackwood, illustrated, 1s. 6d.) the same. The Life of Macaulay surely need not be written over again by every editor of one of his essays in the same series. Mr. John Downie, editor of the "Hastings" and the "Burns," has written capital introductions if they are meant for the general reader, but they are far too full for school work. Both he and Mr. C. J. Battersby, who edits the "Pitt," give careful historical criticism of Macaulay, chronological tables, and all imaginable help.

Mr. G. C. M. Smith, Professor of English in University College, Sheffield, who edits BACON'S NEW ATLANTIS (1s. 6d.) in the Pitt Press Series, has fallen into the usual error. To forty-six pages of text there are fifty-six of introduction and twenty of glossary. The historical part of the introduction is interesting, but Bacon hardly needs an elaborate "Grammar." We should like to see an Elizabethan grammar of prose writers like Dr. Abbott's Shakespearian Grammar, to which editors might refer. Such a book, which should deal specially with literary style, would be most useful; but these sectional grammars, not of single writers but even of single books, involve a waste of effort, and are not wide enough to be really useful.

Messrs. Blackie offer a Twentieth Century Edition of Mr. G. A. Henty's SOVEREIGN READER (1s. 6d.), being readings in the history of the century grouped about the life of Queen Victoria. The book is popular, and well deserves to be so; it is most interesting to children, and can be cordially recommended.

Fortunately, no grammar was thought necessary for the Pitt Press ROBINSON CRUSOE, Part I. (2s.). Mr. J. H. B. Masterman, the editor, contents himself with a brief account of Defoe, and a few foot-notes explaining words and allusions. It would have been better to put the notes at the end in glossary order, if the book is to be used by school children. The editing is satisfactory, and we are pleased to see that the old punctuation is followed. Our present system is pedantic, and appeals to the eye, when it ought to help in reading. County Grammar School (p. 2) seems to be a misprint for country.

Messrs. Macmillan have struck out quite a new line with a KIPLING READER (1s. 9d.), which contains some of the author's best stories. "Wee Willie Winkie," "Moti Guj," chapters from the "Jungle Book," and verses are amongst the selections given. Kipling is not a model of style, and schoolboys would be certain to imitate his mannerisms; but there can be no question that the book is interesting.

SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS.

Botany.

BOTANY, in the "Self Educator Series" (Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.), is one of the best and most comprehensive introductions to English botany we have seen. The student will have to familiarize himself with the constant use of a good many more hard words than the older Elementary Handbooks such as Sir Joseph Hooker's required of him, but it is hardly possible to study botany to good purpose without this familiarity; and there is an excellent introduction intended to pave the way to the use of Greek and Latin terms by explaining usual prefixes, &c. The illustrations are copious and very clear. There ought to have been an index. The student, we fancy, will much want a reference to some clear explanation (which we have not been able to find) of what is always a difficulty to him—the exact meaning of thalamifloræ and calycifloræ. Otherwise the account of the natural orders is all that is wanted. The "Temple Primer" PLANT LIFE AND STRUCTURE (Dent, 1s.), a translation by Clara L. Skeat from the German of Dr. E. Dennert, does not touch classification. It is generally, we know, an unsatisfactory criticism to say of a book that it ought to have been another book. But in such a series as this it does seem a pity that botany should not have been approached in the way through which almost every one begins to study it, and on which the ordinary naturalist finds his greatest interest. A close study of plant structure, too, requires the microscope, and the student will not find here any such useful hints as to its use as he will get from the first book we mentioned. The botanical student will, however, find here a very careful, if not very attractive, examination, with small diagrams and pictures, of the particular part of botany selected for treatment.

Astronomy.

A PRIMER OF ASTRONOMY, by Sir Robert Ball (Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d. n.).—The distinctive feature of this very elementary book is a series of eleven full-page half-tone plates, of which all but two are reproductions of photographs. We are glad to see that the Spectroscope receives due attention, and that space is found for some account of Professor Darwin's interesting deductions from tidal theory concerning the life-history of the moon.

Mathematics.

TREATISE ON ELEMENTARY DYNAMICS. H. A. Roberts, M.A. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.).—It is difficult to give this work its due share of praise. Written for students with little acquaintance with the calculus, it yet successfully attempts a scientific treatment of elementary dynamics on the lines laid down by Clifford, Mach, and others. Vectors are freely and elegantly used throughout. The chapter on the Laws of Motion sets forth the historical and general evidence for them in an interesting form, while that on Work and Energy is quite refreshing. Teachers of mixed mathematics will find the book most suggestive. Its ideas are too abstract for it to be of use as a school text-book.

THE ELEMENTS OF HYDROSTATICS, S. L. Lurey, M.A. (Pitt Press Mathematical Series, Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d.), is intended primarily for students who have read the author's "Elements of Statics and Dynamics." There are so few good elementary works on the mathematical aspect of hydrostatics that the lucid style of this work, combined with the excellent worked examples and the large collection of questions, should secure it a measure of popularity. The diagrams are clear, but the illustrations of apparatus are as grotesque as usual in English text-books of this class.

A FIRST GEOMETRY BOOK, by J. G. Hamilton and F. Kettle (Arnold) is a little book (90 pp.) of practical constructions and experiments in geometry. It is intended not so much to introduce the pupil to the formal reasoning of Euclid as to familiarize him with concrete figures which he will have to idealize later on. Much ingenuity has been shown in making the experiments instructive, and we have no doubt that a child would be really interested in working through the book with a good teacher; his observation would be trained, and he would almost unconsciously acquire a good deal of geometrical knowledge. We heartily recommend the book for use with young children.

THE ROMANCE OF THE EARTH, by A. W. Bickerton (Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.), is a popular introduction to the marvels of all the sciences, starting with geology and proceeding to physiology and embryology, and not even shrinking from a discussion of the problem of the origin of life. From the pictures, which are numerous and good, we judge that the book is intended for young people, but what will a young person or a beginner of any age make of such a sentence as the following:—"The primitive amoeboid animal grows complex and clothes its body in flint, in lime, or in horny material, becoming the radiolarians and foraminifers which float in countless numbers on the open ocean or glide in amoeboid fashion on the sea-floor"?

BUSINESS ARITHMETIC—ELEMENTARY STAGE (Sir Isaac Pitman, 1s. 6d.) seems intended for those who have already studied arithmetic and who require a set of mere rules and tricks for office use. It is to be hoped that such books will never find their way into schools (even into "commercial classes"), for their methods divest arithmetic of most of its educational value.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Divinity.

Dr. Driver's name is a guarantee of the excellence of THE BOOK OF DANIEL in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges. The introduction deals with thorny questions of criticism, and we applaud the courage of Professor Kirkpatrick and the Pitt Press in publishing it. The sooner they revise their other volumes with the same courage the better; at present they are often childish in the extreme. This is a book no Biblical student can afford to be without.

Rivington's HANDBOOK TO THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW (2s. 6d.), edited by Canon Newbolt, appeals not to the student but to the teacher in elementary schools. The book is divided up into lessons, and for each practical notes are given, including blackboard sketches. It is doctrinal, orthodox, and devotional. For large classes of young children it would probably be useful, but it should be used with discrimination.

Much the same may be said of EASY LESSONS ON ISRAEL IN EGYPT AND THE WILDERNESS, by William Taylor, Master of Method in Battersea Training College (Church of England Sunday School Institute, 2s.). The blackboard sketches here are a trifle vulgar, and we doubt the wisdom of teaching Scripture on this plan.

Our readers may remember how "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" urged that each generation should "depolarise" the Scriptures, by making a translation of them in everyday language free from poetic associations. An attempt to do this has been made in the TWENTIETH CENTURY NEW TESTAMENT, translated from Westcott and Hort's text (Horace Marshall, 1s.). The second part comprises the APOSTLE PAUL'S LETTERS TO THE CHURCHES. This is not a paraphrase, like Dr. Hayman's "Epistles of St. Paul," or Dean Stanley's, but a translation from the Greek into modern English. There is no question that such a book is useful. The thoughts strike one with a new force, and often the obscure becomes clear. Nothing of this sort is likely to supersede the Authorized Version; but it certainly is worth reading side by side with the other. This translation is not undignified.

Geography.

Blackie's CONTINENTAL GEOGRAPHY READERS (1s.), AFRICA and ASIA, represent the reaction against the old system of facts and figures. Here we learn of the Climate, Animals, Peoples, Minerals, and so forth, first of the whole, and then one by one of the parts. These things have their place, and they serve well as adjuncts to more serious geographical study, but they will not do for the only geography book of a school. Mr. L. W. Lyde's ELEMENTARY GEOGRAPHY OF EUROPE (Black, 4d. net) is more businesslike. But after all recent attempts, the ideal geography book has to be written.

In Messrs. Blackie's "Continental Geography Readers" the anonymous author attempts in 142 pages to conduct us round EUROPE (1s.), giving us all sorts of miscellaneous information about each country on the way. He has plenty to tell us, and the explanatory maps are clear and not over-crowded. But such compressed matter must be difficult to remember. Was not the more leisurely method of the children who browsed over the expansive pages of "Near Home" or "Far Off" better for their souls?

Primers.

Messrs. Dent's PRIMERS (1s. each n.) are nice little books, and though they differ much in style and merit, all we have seen are good in some way. The CIVILIZATION OF THE EAST, by Dr. Fritz Hommel, sums up the present state of knowledge with respect to early Babylonia and Egypt, and gives a great deal of useful information clearly and concisely. It should be in the hands of all Biblical students, and is by no means useless for illustration of the classics, considering how much astronomy owes to Babylonia. The GREEK DRAMA, by L. D. Barnett, suffers from a too great devotion to theories new and especially German. Dörpfeld is a distinguished scholar, but he is not inspired, and Mr. Barnett would have done well to check his deductions by the sound common sense of Mr. Haigh. Apart from his youthful partisanship, the book is good; but it cannot be safely used by those who possess no other books on the Greek drama.

For Children.

For their clearness, intelligence, and excellent illustrations—many of them coloured—the volumes of "Dent School Series," edited by Dr. M. T. Yates, may be warmly commended to parents and to teachers in elementary schools. It consists of three books of TEMPLE NATURE READERS, giving lessons in Common Things and on Geography; six books of TEMPLE GIRLS' READERS of a similar kind, but more adapted as regards subject to girls, and containing stories and biographies; seven books of TEMPLE LITERARY READERS, of stories and extracts suitable for children in which a capital feature is the pages devoted to "Reading Drill"; and a series of six CONTINUOUS READERS, giving the stories of Columbus, Drake, and other adventurous persons. The books vary in price from 9d. to 1s. 9d.

School Management.

SCHOOL MANAGEMENT AND METHODS OF INSTRUCTION, by George Collar and Charles W. Crook (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), is a practical and business-like handbook for school managers of all sorts; and although much of it is meant for the elementary teacher, it may be studied with profit by others. It covers the whole range of organization, from the keeping of the attendance register to the teacher's moral influence. Looking at the book from the secondary teacher's standpoint, we would single out two or three points of special importance. It was a favourite saying of Thring's, that the fate of a school was in the hands of the builder; all depended on the "almighty wall." So, here, many readers will be astonished to see, under the heading of Discipline, "the Architect" named as one of the chief agents who make or mar it. Now, this is a truth which is too little recognized in the secondary schools. There are scores of class-rooms in public schools where arrangements for light and ventilation are so bad that it is impossible to teach effectively; the attention of the class is consequently hard to keep. One such we know, where the blackboard is fixed by a hinge to the wall. Flat, only one-third of the form can see it; and it is usual to write what is necessary on both sides of the board, and then move it about until all have seen and read. This not only wastes time, but naturally causes restlessness amongst those whose turn is past or to come. It is a great point to insist that school buildings should be intelligently planned to make school work run easily. Then, again, reading and writing are in secondary schools almost extinct arts. Writing is ruined by impositions; reading aloud is execrable, and there are few boys in those schools who can speak distinctly. This book tells plain truths about both points. The hints on methods of teaching are, like the rest of the book, intelligent and practical. The authors are full of a reasonable enthusiasm for their calling; and it is hard to believe that any teacher could fail to benefit from reading this excellent little book.

THE STORY OF THOUGHT AND FEELING, by Frederick Rynold (Newnes, 1s.), is an introduction to the science of psychology, which it treats without reference to metaphysics and with all possible avoidance of technicalities. Such simplicity can only be attained by steering clear of the real difficulties of the subject. The book, however, may serve its purpose by stimulating students to grapple with these difficulties in the works of profounder writers.

Among school-readers is A READING BOOK IN IRISH HISTORY, by P. W. Joyce (Longmans, 1s. 6d.). Children who are compelled to use it will become familiar with Celtic folklore to the joy of the Celtic Association. Most of the pieces are composed by the editor, but in some cases we have an opportunity of comparing his version of the stories with other versions. This is notably the case with "The Voyage of Maeldune." Tennyson's poetry is here printed side by side with Mr. Joyce's prose, and does not suffer by the comparison.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Enterprise should be encouraged in every branch of the book trade. Nevertheless, the Publishers' Circular was justified in complaining recently of the competition which has robbed many a good educational work of success. "No sooner does some new educational work or series promise to be a success than it is threatened with some rival, started with the sole object of supplanting it." The writer speaks of a possible congress of educational publishers "to consider if it is really necessary to exhibit against each other, to travel and push against each other, to undersell and cut out each other, on every possible occasion." The truth is that school-books form such a profitable branch of the trade that every publisher is anxious to mark out his claim in the market. Even a small fraction of the market is well worth having, and the publisher is not above helping in the share of somebody else's claim. There are three series of illustrated classics, all coming out at the same time and doing practically the same work, and other instances constantly occur. The multiplication of text-books—especially elementary French and German—is amazing, but is, to a certain extent, excusable, for every little improvement—say a new method of parsing—means an entirely new text-book. The market for educational works has grown enormously during the past ten years, yet the supply has been steadily outgrowing the demand. Colonial publishers are extending their influence and powers and have to be reckoned with seriously to-day by the publishers at home. In South Africa the trade in educational books has been bad for many months past, though not so bad as the other South African branches of publishing, which have been ruined by the war.

The colonies are supplying new educational authors as well as publishers—Professor Bickerton, for instance, of New Zealand, whose "Romance of the Earth," published by Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein, sold well last autumn and has already gone to an Australian and an American edition. Messrs. Sonnenschein now announce a companion volume by Professor Bickerton, entitled "The Romance of the Heavens," which will be out soon. Other educational works to be issued shortly by the same publishers include Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace's "Wonderful Century Reader" (an adaptation of the author's "Wonderful Century," which has soon gone through several editions); "Chivalry," by Mr. F. W. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton, with illustrations from the British Museum (a volume in the "Social England" Series which is mainly issued for educational purposes); an illustrated edition of Aristotle's "Psychology," translated and edited by Professor Wm. A. Hammond, Cornell University; "Seneca's Tragedies," text and prose translation on opposite pages, and notes, by Dr. Walter Bradshaw; "Beowulf," translated into English prose by Dr. Clark Hall—whose Anglo-Saxon Dictionary is published by Messrs. Sonnenschein—accompanied by archæological illustrations, notes, and a comprehensive introduction intended for the use of students; a little book on "The Industrial Revolution," by C. E. Beard, with a preface by Professor York Powell; and Mr. Cotton Mitchin's book entitled "Our Public Schools and the part they have played in English History."

Messrs. Blackwood's educational announcements include Dr. John Robertson's two new books, "A History of German Literature" and "Outlines of German Literature," for the use of schools; "Historical Reader of Early French," containing passages illustrative of the growth of the French language from the earliest times to the end of the fifteenth century, by Professor Herbert Strong and Mr. L. Barnett, of Trinity College, Cambridge; two books by Mr. P. Giles, Fellow and Lecturer of Emmanuel College, Cambridge—"A Short History of the Ancient Greeks from the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest" and "Outlines of Greek History"; "A Manual of Greek Prose Composition," by Professor Gilbert Murray; and "A Manual of Classical Geography," by Mr. J. L. Myres.

Two new volumes will shortly be added to Black's School Text-books—"Athens and Sparta, and the Struggle with Persia" (Historical Greek Reader), by E. G. Wilkinson, M.A., and "The Old Senate and the New Monarchy" (Historical Latin Reader), by Miss F. M. Ormiston, of Leeds Girls' High School. Messrs. Black also have in the press "English History Illustrated from Original Sources, 1307 to 1399," edited by N. L. Fraser, B.A., and the "Introduction to the Study of Physics," by Messrs. A. F. Walden and J. J. Manley.

Messrs. Bell are preparing a third and cheaper edition of the "History of Modern Europe," by the late T. H. Dyer and Arthur Hassall, M.A., in six volumes—a work which still has a steady sale every year. It is more than two score years, however, since the last edition was published, and the history has now been brought up to 1900. The same publishers announce "An Itinerary of English Cathedrals" (illustrated), by the Rev. T. W. Perkins; "The Age of Shakespeare," by Thomas Seecombe and T. W. Allen, in the series of "Handbooks of English Literature" (to be ready about Easter); Part II. of Bell's Latin Course for the First Year (to be completed in three parts), by E. C. Marchant, M.A., and J. E. Spencer, B.A.; and the "Agricola" of Tacitus, edited by J. W. E. Pearce, M.A., formerly assistant master in University College School, in Bell's Intermediate Series of Illustrated Classics; to be followed shortly by "Livy," Book XXI., edited by F. E. A. Trayer, assistant master at St. Paul's School, and "The Athenians in Sicily," being portions of Thucydides, Books VI. and VII., edited by the Rev. W. Cookworthy Compton, Headmaster of Dover College. In their Elementary Series of Illustrated Classics Messrs. Bell will shortly publish "Elegiac Selections from Ovid," edited by F. Coverley Smith, B.A., assistant master at the High School, Nottingham; "Euripides, Bacchæ," edited by G. M. Gwyther, of Plymouth College; "Euripides, Hecuba," edited by the Rev. A. W. Upcott, Headmaster of St. Edmund's School, Canterbury; "Euripides, Medea," edited by the Rev. T. Nicklin, of Llandoverly College; and "Aeschylus, Prometheus Vincetus," edited by C. E. Laurence, of Blackheath School. One other book to come from Messrs. Bell should be mentioned—"The Idylls of Theocritus," edited by R. J. Chalmers, of the City of London School, who introduces the results of recent investigations into the literary history of the Alexandrian writers, so far as concerns Theocritus. The text is complete, save for the expurgation of a few lines.

The next volumes which are to be added to the Oxford Classical Texts are "Platonis Opera," Tom. II. (Tetralogiae III., IV.), by J. Burnet; "Xenophontis Opera," Tom. II. (Libri Socratici), by E. C. Marchant; "Ciceronis Epistulae Ad Familiares," by L. C. Purser; and "Aristophanis Comoediae," Tom. II., by F. W. Hall and W. M. Geldart.

The new announcements of the Cambridge University Press include "Demosthenes, De Corona," edited by Dr. W. W. Goodwin, Eliot Professor of Greek Literature in Harvard College; "The Neo-Platonists: A Study in the History of Hellenism," by Thomas Whittaker—both to appear shortly; and "A Key to the Exercises in 'The Elements of English Grammar,'" by A. S. West, M.A. (nearly ready).

The next volume in Mr. Murray's Progressive Science Series will be "The Comparative Physiology of the Brain and Comparative Psychology," by Professor Jacques Loeb, Professor of Physiology in the University of Chicago (immediately). Mr. Murray also announces "The Growth of the Empire: An Historical Review of the Development of Greater Britain," by A. W. Jose; new editions of Darwin's "A Naturalist's Voyage"—uniform with the half-crown edition of "The Origin of Species" published last year—and Dean Liddell's "Student's History of Rome," revised and in part re-written by P. V. M. Benecke, M.A. Other educational items in the same list have been previously referred to in Literature.

Besides his book for Mr. Murray Mr. Jose has written a little volume on "Australia, the Commonwealth, and New Zealand," which Messrs. Dent will shortly publish in their Temple Primers. Another early volume in this series will be "Education," by Foster Watson, of University College, Aberystwyth. Next month Messrs. Dent will publish "Les Précieuses Ridicules," edited by Prof. F. Spencer (for the Temple Molière), in view of the Cambridge Local Examination.

Mrs. Charlotte Perkins (Stetson) Gilman, the author of "Women and Economics," has written a volume "Concerning Children" which Messrs. Putnam will publish at once. The book deals with the education of children and the duties of parents, punishments, unconscious schooling, teachable ethics, children and nurses, and natural and unnatural mothers.

"England's Neglect of Science," by Professor Terry, will be included in Mr. Unwin's Spring list, containing an attack upon our educational system.

There will be many educational works from the United States which will swell the number of American school books already established in the English market. Messrs. Bell have an English edition in hand of "A History of the English Language," by T. R. Lounsbury, Professor in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University—a work which has been very successful in the United States—and "An Introduction to English Literature," by Henry S. Pancoast—which enters into the political and social conditions of the successive literary periods, notes foreign as well as domestic influences, and emphasizes the relations of literature to history. Messrs. Bell also announce a volume entitled "Memory: An Inductive Study," by Dr. F. W. Colegrove, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Washington. From Messrs. Isbister will come "Nature Study and the Child," by Charles B. Scott, M.A., recently Instructor in Nature Study at the State Normal School, Oswego, New York. America is the home of "Nature Study," and the method has been extensively adopted on the Continent, but in England it is little understood. "What is Nature Study?" is a question which has often been asked by English teachers, and the coming book is intended as an answer. The same publishers are issuing the collection of "German Lyrics and Ballads" selected and arranged for Heath's Modern Language Series, by James Taft Hatfield, Professor of German Language and Literature in North-Western University. Among the Spring publications on this side of the Atlantic by Messrs. Heath may be mentioned a "Short History of American Literature," by Professor W. C. Bronson, of Brown University, and "Experimental Chemistry," by Dr. L. C. Newell, Instructor in Chemistry at the State Normal School, Lowell, Mass.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 173. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	91, 92, 93
PERSONAL VIEWS—"Bookselling and the Distribution of Books," by Joseph Shaylor	93
FORTY YEARS OF MODERN ILLUSTRATION	95
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	98
REVIEWS—
Books about India—
A History of British India—The Forward Policy and its Results
The Bombay Field Force, 1880—The Great Famine and its Causes
—India and Imperial Federation	99, 100, 101
The Later Work of Aubrey Beardsley	103
Three Plays for Puritans—War—Tennyson's Princess—The Gentleman in the Next House—Sailing Alone Around the World—The Fatal Opulence of Bishops—Australia at the Front—Towards Pretoria—Tactics of To-day—From Cape Town to Ladysmith—Egypt in 1888—The Imitation of Buddha—The Calendar of Empire—The Tennyson Birthday Book—The Book of Common Prayer—The Post of Home Life—The Wildfowler in Scotland—Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford—The Mind of the Century—The Book of Peace—Rouen—Chartres—Worcester—Rumania in 1900—Songs and Sayings of Gowrie—Lancashire Humour	101, 102, 103
The Wastrel—The Chase of the Ruby—The Seen and the Unseen—The Dissemblers—The Bishop's Gambit—From Valet to Ambassador—The Outcast Emperor—Publicans and Sinners—The Order of Isis—Her Father's Trust—The Flowers of the Forest—The Invaders—The Vereker Family—Love in a Mist—Carpathia Knox	104, 105
LIBRARY NOTES	105
AMONG THE MAGAZINES—II	105, 106, 107
CORRESPONDENCE—"The Strange Wooling of Mary Bowler" (Mr. R. Marsh)—"A" Was an Archer	108
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... ..	108, 109
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	110

NOTES OF THE DAY.

It has been known for some time that the dramatized book is preferred by the play-goers of New York to any other kind of drama. The climax of the tendency seems to be reached with the announcement that Mr. Richard Mansfield will play in a dramatized version of "Omar Khayyam." One can almost as readily picture a dramatized version of "The Origin of Species," or the Book of Proverbs.

Mr. Kipling, no doubt, knows best; but many of his sincerest admirers have heard with disquietude that he is dramatizing his "Jungle Book." Of all his books that is the one, with its woodland witchery, that they would save from the glare of the footlights. Yet there may be comfort left, if rumour says rightly that it is to be produced at Christmas. If Mr. Kipling can thus give children (in years or in heart) a new delightful kind of Christmas play, instead of the current pantomime with its heartless mangling of beautiful folk stories by the senseless interpolation of "turns from the halls," which merely distract and disturb the children's natural interest in the story, he will render the state some service.

One of the most interesting of links between Queen Victoria and the writers of her age is the copy of "Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands," the fly-leaf of which bears the autograph inscription, "To Charles Dickens, Esq., from Victoria Reg., Buckingham Palace, March 9, 1870." In handing the book to Dickens, the Queen said that "the humblest of writers" would have been ashamed to offer it to "one of the greatest" had not Mr. Helps assured her that personal presentation would add greatly to its value in the eyes of the recipient. The volume after several vicissitudes passed into the possession of Mr. Henry Dickens, K.C. On November 13, 1893, it was sold for thirty guineas; and afterwards could be seen at Mr. W. T. Spencer's in New Oxford-street, who in the summer of 1899 was asking about £40 for it; finally, it brought £100 by auction on November 22 of that year.

VOL. VIII. No. 6.

Mr. John Cordy Jeaffreson, who died last week, was the author not only of many books, but of books of many kinds. He began nearly fifty years ago, as a novelist, with "Crewe Rise," "Isabel the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. He built anecdotes into books in "A Book about the Clergy," and similar publications. He published, in 1894, "A book of Recollections." His best known works, however, were his biographies. One of these was a life of her late Majesty, but it was less notable than "The Real Lord Byron," "The Real Shelley," and "Lady Hamilton and Lord Nelson." In these Mr. Jeaffreson grubbed up old scandals in the interest of truth, and at least succeeded in exciting considerable controversies. In addition to writing books, Mr. Jeaffreson was a busy journalist, and (in his early days) a classical and mathematical tutor, and an inspector of ancient writings under H.M.'s Commissioners on Historical Manuscripts.

The Pall Mall and the St. James's Gazette have been engaging in a little controversy on the subject of splitting the infinitive. As the former organ is chiefly concerned to contradict something that the latter organ did not say, there is no occasion for an arbitrator to intervene. On the whole we are inclined to agree with the opinion expressed by Mr. J. R. Thursfield some time ago in our columns under the heading "Personal Views"—viz., that the operation must be voted inexpedient rather than incorrect. It is certainly difficult to demonstrate its incorrectness. As the St. James's Gazette points out, though we may not split an infinitive—"to exactly describe," we may split a gerund—"of exactly describing." Or, again, if we are told that Lord Kitchener hopes shortly to have entirely subdued the Boers, we applaud both the sentiment and the grammar. If, on the other hand, we hear that he promises shortly to entirely subdue them, the stylist pounces on the phrase in a frenzy of indignation. Yet a split infinitive may sometimes positively help the language by conveying a meaning which cannot be conveyed in any other way. "I ask you to kindly clear out" does not mean quite the same as "I ask you kindly to clear out," or as "I ask you to clear out kindly," which last expression is very nearly nonsense. But the habit is an ugly one, though probably few writers (certainly not Sir Walter Scott) have altogether kept clear of it.

The late Mr. Frederic Myers' magnum opus—"Human Personality and its Survival after Death"—has been left, we believe, in a sufficiently forward state to be easily completed by his literary executors. Its object is to present the evidence which points to human faculty operating below the threshold of ordinary consciousness during the life on earth, and to human faculty continuing to operate after the body's decay. The work will be in two volumes, published by Messrs. Longmans. Most of Mr. Myers' other books are issued by Messrs. Macmillan. Death has played sad havoc among the principal officials of the Society for Psychical Research during the past twelve months. It was Mr. Myers' first year as president of the Society, and, by a melancholy coincidence, the last paper that he read was in memory of his most intimate friend, Professor Henry Sidgwick, the Society's first president. This paper was published in the Society's Proceedings by Messrs. Kegan Paul in December, and contained an admirable portrait of Professor Sidgwick, from a photograph taken by Mrs. Myers. The Marquis of Bute, who died last year, was a vice-president. The Society's annual meeting has been postponed on account of the death of the Queen until some time this month or the beginning of March.

Those who read Major Pond's "Eccentricities of Genius" (Chatto, 12s.) in quest of "blazing indiscretions" will be disappointed. For the more part the great impresario contents himself with compliments and commonplaces. Of Mr. Gladstone, for instance, he has little to say except that he once had breakfast with him; of Mr. Hall Caine little except that he "dresses very quietly"; and of Mr. Zangwill little except that he keeps his Press cuttings in a portmanteau. With the dead, however, he is less reticent, and Matthew Arnold's failure as a lecturer is announced with emphasis:—

Matthew Arnold stepped forward, opened out his manuscript, laid it on the desk, and his lips began to move. There was not the slightest sound audible from where I stood. After a few minutes General Grant said to Mrs. Grant, "Well, wife, we have paid to see the British lion; we cannot hear him roar, so we had better go home." They left the hall. A few minutes later there was a stream of people leaving the place. All those standing went away very early. Later on, the others who could not endure the silence moved away as quietly as they could. Matthew Arnold went to Boston, and some friends there urged him to take lessons in elocution, which he did. He engaged the well-known instructor, Mr. Marshall Wilder (not Marshall P. Wilder of vaudeville fame), but it only helped to make the performance appear more ridiculous than before.

In the case, too, of American humourists the Major is not indisposed to "let himself go"; and this is particularly so with his reminiscences of Bill Nye and James Whitcomb Riley. These gentlemen were given to humour in real life as well as on the platform. The following story of a dialogue, on the cars, between Mr. Riley, who pretended to be deaf, and an unknown admirer who had nothing of importance to say to him, is funny:—

"Is this Mr. Riley?"

"Er, what?"

"Is this Mr. Riley?"

"What did you say?"

"Is this Mr. Riley?"

"Riley, oh! yes."

"I knew your father."

"No, bother."

"I knew your father."

"What?"

"I knew your father!"

"Oh, so did I."

And in a few minutes the farmer heard Nye and Riley talking in ordinary tones of voice. Imagine his chagrin!

There are good points, too, in the story of Bill Nye's little argument with the gentlemen who were in no hurry to pay him for his lecture:—

"Gentlemen, I must catch that train in ten minutes. Will you kindly settle with me?"

"You will take our cheque, won't you, Mr. Nye?" asked the treasurer.

"Yes, if the contract says so. How does it read?" asked Mr. Nye, with impatience.

"It does read currency. You won't take less than $150?"

Mr. Nye said nothing, and the treasurer counted out the money, for which Nye signed a receipt. Then he said:—

"Gentlemen, I suppose you delayed this payment and decoyed me in here for the purpose of making me angry, thinking that when you gave me this money I would fling it back in your faces in a mad fit. You are mistaken. I'm a good-tempered man."

* * * *

Among the illustrious men who have declined to lecture for Major Pond is Mr. Kipling, and Mr. Kipling's vigorous refusal is worth quoting. It runs thus:—

Dear Mr. Pond,—I am much obliged to you for your letter, but I can't say that I can see my way to the ententement you propose. There is such a thing as paying one hundred and twenty-five cents for a dollar, and though I suppose there is money in the lecturing business, it seems to me that the bother, the fuss, the being at everybody's beck and call, the night journeys, and so on, make it very dear. I've seen a few men who've lived through the fight, but they did not look happy. I might do it as soon as I had two mortgages on my house, a lien on the horses, and a bill of sale on the furniture, and writer's cramp in both hands; but at present I'm busy and contented to go on with the regular writing business. You forget that I have already wandered over most of the States, and there isn't enough money in sight to hire me to face again some of the hotels and some of the railway systems that I have met with. America is a great country, but she is not made for lecturing in. With renewed thanks for your very kind letter, believe me, &c.

* * * *

The Major is not without a pleasant unconscious humour of his own. His account of "Mr. Ed. Heron-Allen"—"one of the most unique successes in the way of a Lyceum novelty that I ever discovered," is delightful. There was certainly much that was novel about Mr. Ed. Heron-Allen. "He told me," says the Major, "that he was going back to London to take charge of his father's business, who was a well-established barrister in Soho."

* * * *

The literature of cooking is immense, and a future student of its bibliography, such as was the late Mr. G. A. Sala, will have to take account of Colonel Kenney-Herbert. The well-known author of "Common-sense Cookery" has given us another volume of recipes—"Picnics and Suppers" (Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. n.). In his preface Colonel Kenney-Herbert says that he has been accused of being expensive; and so indeed he is. However good some of his recipes are, they are useless to the middle-class housewife. For the kitchenmaid who has already seen some good cooking in a big kitchen, and who wishes to qualify herself as a cordon bleu, they may be invaluable. Even if the recipes are not followed au pied de la lettre and some ingredients are omitted they still remain rich and extravagant, though, as the author should know, extravagance is by no means an "inseparable accident" of the French system of cookery.

* * * *

Speaking of Sala, one is reminded that Messrs. James Rimell and Son, of Oxford-street, recently catalogued for sale at £15 his unique collection of English and French Cookery-books, numbering one hundred and eighty-five volumes, and bearing dates from 1706 to 1890. The most curious item is a copy of the famous production of Mrs. Hannah Glasse, which contains a long account of the author, who, it seems, was Habit Maker to the Princess of Wales; on the title-page is an original autograph signature of Mrs. Glasse, which was printed in facsimile in later editions. Sala's own autograph appears in nearly every work, with many notes and humorous sketches by him. Sala's copy of Mrs. Glasse's book on the "Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy, which far exceeds any Thing of the Kind ever yet Published, by a Lady," is the rare fourth edition.

* * * *

M. Henri de Bornier should not be allowed to depart without a word of recognition. His literary activity dates from 1845, when he published his first volume of poems, "Les Premières Feuilles," and brought out unsuccessfully, at the Odéon, five long acts, Le Mariage de Luther. His great success was La Fille de Roland (1875), the echoes of which bid fair to haunt the vaults of the Théâtre Française for some generations still. It is one of the best examples of the patriotic poetic drama which any imitator of the "Cid" has ever produced in France. In the "France d'Abord!" which was his swan song, he recovered much of the passion of his success of twenty-five years before and produced, in the thick of the Dreyfus controversy, a play reminiscent of his talent at its best.

The death of M. Jules Barbier, to which we referred the other day, reminds one how obscure is the fame to which, as a rule, the operatic librettist is condemned. He has

The Librettist. to remain content with his share of the pudding without getting much share of the praise. There have been exceptions—Wagner is too much of an exception to count—but Mr. W. S. Gilbert is an exception under our eyes. Mr. Herman Merivale protested recently that in some of the obituary notices of Sullivan, Mr. Gilbert's share in the success had been ignored or belittled. But as a matter of fact, both in popular and critical appreciation, the librettist and composer of what were universally called the "Gilbert and Sullivan Operas" were on unusually equal terms. Signor Boito again has received honour for his share in the later Verdi operas, and with reason. He himself was perfectly competent to supply the music as well as the words. Jules Barbier certainly deserves not to be altogether forgotten, seeing how widespread and how lasting is the popularity of Faust. The success of the opera is in no small extent due to the libretto. Literary critics complained of the ruthless way Goethe's masterpiece was mangled. But we do not want metaphysics in music, and Gounod got in his libretto just what he was capable of expressing. Signor Boito endeavoured to be more faithful to Goethe in his Mefistofele, with the result that he merely perplexes his audience by bringing in, quite at the end, an unexpected Helen.

The librettist is often consoled for his position by being told that he really has not much right to consideration; that he never produces anything of literary excellence. But the literary excellence necessary to a poet is not and should not be the aim of the librettist. He must avoid the subtleties, the fine shades of expression, the multiplication of images, and the metaphors of poetry. The audience have their eyes riveted upon the stage and the performers thereon. Lines intended to bring to the imagination of the audience any picture, other than the scene before them, must be of secondary effect. Romeo and Juliet is a good case in point. Shakespeare's play is crammed with metaphors and conceits. These may be of interest in the literary drama, but they are de trop in the more complicated machinery of an opera. When once the medium of song is adopted, only what is simple and essential will reach us over the footlights. The "fiery-footed steeds" conjured by Juliet to "gallop apace towards Phoebus' mansion" are of no use to the librettist. But he can help the composer to delight us with the simpler sentiment of the scene, where Romeo hastens to depart at the sound of the lark (c'est l'alouette), though Juliet assures him that it is still the nightingale he hears (c'est le rossignol). All this is intimately connected with the dramatic action. Wagner indeed often assumes the rôle of the philosopher in his music dramas. But his works cannot be considered in the same category as operas, in the ordinary sense of the word. Moreover, he justified the introduction of long philosophical monologues by his use of explanatory leit-motifs in the orchestra. Much has been urged against the poetry of his music dramas. But if he was not a poet in the highest sense of the word he realized the best aims of a librettist—though he would have scorned the term. Though, as we have tried to show, the true librettist must deny himself much of the expression of the poet, he must, like Wagner, be always a poet in feeling. What we ask of him are broad and general conceptions and a clear-cut story. The colouring of his work lies with the orchestra.

Personal Views.

BOOKSELLING AND THE DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

There are few trades that have kept so close and so conservative an organization as that of the making and distributing of books. From the time when Caxton printed and sold the books produced from his press, there has been little change. Soon after the discovery of printing, the producer employed the bookseller to dispose of the books he had originated and produced. Then the bookseller became also a publisher and employed the author and printer. Now the author can be said to employ the printer, the publisher, and the bookseller.

There is to-day a tendency on the part of the publisher to become his own distributor to the public. Whether this will develop into larger proportions it is impossible to say; and it is equally doubtful whether such an arrangement would be as satisfactory as the present one, for undoubtedly the producers of books have neither the time, the machinery, nor the adaptability to combine the manifold functions of the maker with those of the supplier of the various streams which lead to the book-buying public. The problem of the relative value of the bookseller to the publisher and to the public is just now a very acute one. Since the commencement of the ruinous discount of 3d. in the 1s. booksellers have not only been considerably reduced in numbers, but it is possible that the fact of this trade being less remunerative than it was has deterred many men of business aptitude and intelligence from entering it, and that the trade has thus been lowered in the social scale. There are, of course, still in the trade numerous men of tact, intelligence, and learning, who know a great deal about the inside as well as the outside of books; but I am speaking of the attractiveness of the bookselling trade as compared with many others. From the almost professional character of the knowledge required by an intelligent bookseller, it is to be deplored that the trade is not more financially attractive. If profits were greater, the status of the trade would be raised and its members would be compelled to learn more of the technical knowledge required by the practical bookseller, which is now occasionally ignored. If this were done, as population increased and education spread, shops presided over by a trained bookseller would be more general than they are to-day. There are, of course, now many agencies by which the book-buyer can obtain information about books, such as the exhaustive reviews and paragraphs in the daily and weekly newspapers—most newspapers having now a page for literary information and book reviewing. Yet with them all there are no opportunities of spreading and influencing the sale of good literature like that of the bookseller, and if it were only possible to make the trade more remunerative, there would soon be an increase in the number of booksellers' shops.

Towards this bettering of the condition of the booksellers, conferences for the interchange of opinions and the collection of information have been held during recent years between the Society of Authors, the Publishers' Association, and the Association of Retail Booksellers, but until January, 1900, nothing of a really important character was evolved. Upon that date there came into force what is known as the net system, which compels the booksellers to sell net books at their published prices; and, on the other hand, publishers agree to refuse to supply, except at the full published price, any bookseller who will not fall in with this arrangement. This system has undoubtedly been the most satisfactory yet propounded and enforced, and it has done something to raise the booksellers' profit. But it has met with much opposition in this age of free trade and dislike to business restrictions, and it is still a question whether it can be maintained in its present form. Possibly in the future some slight concessions will be made to the export trade, school agencies, and also Free Libraries (who are very much irritated by the present stringent regulations); and the net system may eventually become permanent and do much to revive the trade.

Readers of "Boswell's Life of Johnson" will remember the Doctor's letter to Wetherell, Master of University College, Oxford, about the terms on which the books of the University Press should be issued. It is strange that so many of the same difficulties exist to-day after a lapse of 125 years. Dr. Johnson says:—

The Booksellers who, like all other men, have strong prejudices in their own favour are enough inclined to think the practice of printing and selling books by any but themselves an encroachment on their fraternity, and have need of stronger inducements to circulate academical publications than those of another, for of that mutual co-operation by which the general trade is carried on the University can bear no part. Of those whom he neither loves nor fears and from whom he expects no reciprocation of good offices, why should any man promote the interest but for profit?

After protesting against the dearness of the books produced by the Oxford University Press and urging that the profit must be properly divided between the different hands through which the books pass, the Doctor lays it down as his opinion that the wholesale trade should get 10 per cent., and the country bookseller, selling a book published at twenty shillings should get 3s. 6d. profit. "With less profit than this the country booksellers cannot live, for his receipts are small and his debts sometimes bad." Such was the case in 1776 and little change has been made during the Nineteenth Century. All retail establishments exist either to create a want or to supply one. This applies equally to a bookseller—either he must help to educate the public to be lovers of books, or he must simply exist to supply such books as an educated public requires. The former is to be desired, and the greater the inducements held out to encourage men and women of intellectual aptitude to be distributors of books the better it will be both for themselves and for the trade they represent.

In the multiplicity of publishers and books it is, I think, quite impossible for the individual publisher to be his own distributing agent. What is wanted is that conditions satisfactory to the author, publishers, the wholesale agent, and the bookseller should be permanently arranged without too much interference with individual liberty, except so far as preventing excessive discounts. But the onus of carrying out such arrangements must not be placed solely on the Publisher.

The question of discounts has been a thorny one for more than half-a-century. But during that period no such strong organizations existed as the present Publishers' and Booksellers' Associations. Whether the plague of excessive discounts can be stayed remains for the present only a partially settled problem. Publishers should, however, as far as terms for net books are concerned, work in harmony with each other. Variation in terms causes irritation, and if the publishers who enforce the regulations do not agree, uniformity cannot be expected among those who are most interested in carrying them out.

In connexion with book distribution there has recently come into our midst a factor of great power which has had its origin in America. This is the supply of expensive works upon the instalment system. The method is strongly objected to by the retail bookseller, and for three reasons—the supplies do not come through his agency; people who buy these expensive books have spent for a time all they intend spending on books; and these big books take up so much room that the book space at the disposal of the purchaser is exhausted. These are fair arguments; but economic conditions frequently run counter to rooted ideas of trade, and in trade it is difficult to get away from our surroundings. Little harm can occur to the bookseller if this movement applies to big works only, such as the "Encyclopædia Britannica," Punch, and other works whose sale through the ordinary channels has practically ceased. The danger arises when it is extended to the more general classes of literature. Nothing can exceed the immense power for advertising possessed by our leading newspapers, which can always make space for "fill-ups." Some years ago the sale of books was considerably affected by the newspaper review; now it is affected much more intensely by advertisement. Hence the success of newspaper publication by instalments. No steps have yet been taken by the bookseller to meet this new departure; but it has, I know, exercised the thought of many of the more thorough booksellers. In some cases where the system has been tried by a leading publisher the bookseller has been conciliated by having a working profit allowed him. On the other hand, newspapers have given him but slight consideration, and the arrangements they make yield him a profit hardly worth mentioning. If this system is to become more general the booksellers' profit should be considered, and thus any opposition that may arise from within the trade to this method of distributing would be disarmed. It would be a deplorable event if the great power wielded by our daily and weekly newspapers was used to such an unsatisfactory end as that of crushing out the retail bookseller and his wholesale agent. Judging from the position held by most of the leading publishers of to-day, it is certain that they will confine their energies to that most fascinating occupation, publishing, and leave the distribution of their productions in other hands. It is therefore a question of who shall come between the publisher and the public.

Beside the discount question there have been of recent years other points at issue connected with the distribution of books. One is this—both the bookseller and the publisher have expected a little too much of each other. The bookseller has considered that it is the publisher's duty to create a demand, and that he himself exists principally to satisfy it. But the publishers have expected the bookseller to help in creating the demand by introduction or by circularizing the public; and this has not always been done to the extent anticipated. If we acknowledge that the bookseller, with his wholesale agent, is the right and proper medium for reaching the public, the question is how this medium can be best utilized. I advisedly mention the wholesale agent, for it is impossible, when books are so many and the number of publishers so continually increased, for a bookseller to stock or remember a tithe of the books issued. I would therefore submit that if, by firm but judicious conciliation, the various outlets in the retail trade can be brought into line, both as regards books issued at net as well as at ordinary prices, so that livable profits are secured; if due regard is given to the agencies who can and do use books largely; and if some individual freedom is allowed, and at the same time used with a due consideration to others, the bookseller will come to his own again, and bookselling will continue a flourishing and attractive trade. Publishers should on their part strive for unity amongst themselves, so as to prevent any unnecessary competition, and the bookseller should feel confident that he is not likely to be undersold through any fluctuation in the publisher's prices, or suffer through the publisher attempting to supply the public direct.

Under these conditions, with better profits and sound business arrangements, the distributing of books can be safely left in the hands of those who have for the last half-century so ably carried it on; and in the hands of the booksellers in both town and country, with the help of the wholesale agent, results will be attained which will be satisfactory to all who are engaged in making and distributing the works produced from the brains and by the energy of the great army of literary workers.

JOSEPH SHAYLOR.

FORTY YEARS OF MODERN ILLUSTRATION.

We have it on the authority of Mr. Henry B. Wheatley's lucid introduction to the official catalogue that the present Exhibition at the South Kensington Museum of Specimens of Modern Illustration from 1860 to 1900 may be considered as a sequel to the Exhibition of Lithographs held there in 1898-99. The Society of Illustrators contemplated, some time back, the arrangement of an Exhibition of Modern Illustration, but owing to various reasons they did not carry out their proposal. Some members of that society, however, brought the matter before the council of the Society of Arts, who appointed a committee to consider and report on the subject. The Society of Arts asked the Science and Art Department (now the Board of Education) if they would take a similar action to that taken with respect to the Exhibition of Lithography, and arrange for an exhibition in the galleries of the Victoria and Albert Museum. In response to this appeal the Board of Education undertook the organization of the proposed exhibition on condition that the Society of Arts undertook the preparation of the catalogue.

It was decided by the Board of Education that the exhibition should be restricted to typographic work suitable for book, magazine, and newspaper illustration, and that it should comprise reproductions and the original drawings executed since 1860. The commencement of the period covered by the exhibition was fixed at 1860 for two reasons—(1) because about this time there was a most remarkable outburst of beautiful designs for the illustration of books and periodicals, the work of the chief artists of the day, so that the period has come to be specially distinguished in the history of Art as "The Sixties"; (2) because this period covers the time during which photography has been available for reproductive purposes, and process work has come into being. The time selected, therefore, includes the transition period from wood to zinc, and, what is of special interest, the period during which the preservation of the artist's original drawing has been possible. The exhibition is restricted to illustrations printed with the text, and excludes processes which are printed separately. It is hoped that on some future occasion it may be possible to arrange an exhibition of the various processes in use for the illustration of books other than those used for typographic work.

From the first production of printed books until the present time they have been chiefly illustrated by means of surface blocks set up with the type in the printing-press; and wood-engraving for this purpose was, until its practical supersession by "process," one of the longest-lived of the arts of book illustration. In the second half of the sixteenth century copper-plate engraving gradually ousted woodcuts for ambitiously illustrated books, and in the seventeenth century copper-plate engravings were almost universal, being freely introduced into the printed page. The well-known editions of Rogers' "Italy " and "Poems" and of Dibdin's bibliographical works established a fashion in the early part of the nineteenth century. In the former the copper or steel plates are printed direct on the printed page, but in the latter the plates are sometimes printed on India paper and fixed on the page.

The early block books consisted of large woodcuts in which text and illustrations were cut on one plank of wood, and therefore they do not need more than a casual mention in a slight review of the history of book illustration. In the earliest books printed with movable type woodcuts were generally used for initial letters, and other illustrations soon followed. France and Italy formed schools of engravers, and there is reason to believe that in many cases the original artists of these schools themselves cut their designs upon the wood.

After a century of decay, Thomas Bewick revived the art of wood-engraving. A great change was made when wood-cutting

VIA CRUCIS. ("A Farm in Fairyland.")

Print from a wood engraving from a drawing by Laurence Housman.
[By permission of Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co.]

was superseded by wood-engraving. Bewick has the credit of inaugurating this revolution, but this claim has been disputed. The late Mr. W. J. Linton said that Bewick was wrongly credited with the invention of the method, although the palmy days of modern wood-engraving must be distinguished as the Bewick period. This distinction of knife work and graver work is of considerable interest in the history of wood-engraving. The knife worked on the flat grain, cutting away the wood between the lines, and thus leaving the lines upstanding. The graver had two advantages over this method. (1) It worked on the section of the tree, a round surface of wood, undisturbed by the grain. (2) Unlike the knife which cut the wood away between the lines, the graver drew directly on the wood, cutting out white lines on the black surface. Great stress was laid upon this by Mr. Linton. He wrote:—

The graver came into use when it was thought of cutting box-wood in rounds, so that the graver could be used without hindrance of the grain. This does not seem to have been found out before the beginning of the last century; the exact date of its first use is very uncertain. The use of the graver gave opportunity for a new and more artistic employment of our art. The engraver might now choose his own lines, literally drawing them with his graver, whether to express form or to give gradations of colour. This is what we call white-line work.

In the time of wood-cutting, before the cross section of the box-tree block was engraved upon, the woods chiefly used were apple, pear, service, and beech. Bewick's followers carried on the traditions of their master, and, in spite of a certain falling-off at times, the English school of wood-engraving has taken a high rank in the history of the art.

Various attempts were made to photograph the drawings upon the wood blocks in order to save the original design. In 1857 and subsequently patents were taken out for photographing upon wood, which will be found described in the volume of "Abridgments" relating to Photography (Patent Office Publications). Sir William Crookes published in the Photographic News (December 31st, 1858) a description of a method of producing photographs on wood blocks ready for the engraver, a process which is still practised. In the "Lyra Germanica" (Longmans, 1861), which was compiled by Mr. John Leighton, the drawings of the artists were photographed on to the wood, and in one case Mr. Leighton photographed direct from a bas-relief of Flaxman, so that the wood-engraving was obtained without any drawing at all. This is described in Bohn's edition of Jackson's "Wood Engraving" (1861) as one of the first successful photographs on wood, engraved by Thomas Bolton. Soon after this it became a common practice to photograph direct on to the wood block; and the late Mr. W. L. Thomas, of the Graphic, was one of the first to make a considerable use of photography on wood.

At the present Exhibition for the first time are shown a series of illustrations made during forty years, with the drawing and reproduction side by side, so that it is possible to see how far the reproduction is a satisfactory copy of the original artist's work. The first portion of the exhibits consists of fine wood-engravings and the last shows the perfection of process work. The Exhibition owes a large part of its interest to the practical illustration of the transition from wood blocks to the so-called process blocks. For years attempts were made to obtain by means of photography a satisfactory process of automatic engraving, but, although many very ingenious processes were invented, it was not until about the year 1880 that process work became at all general. Since that time great improvements have been continuously made. Several books have been published on process illustration, but some of the latest information can be obtained from a paper read by Mr. Carl Hentschel before the Society of Arts on April 3, 1900.

Mr. Carl Hentschel has given a few facts respecting the dates of the use of process in newspaper work which are of interest. He writes:—

Both the Illustrated London News and Graphic were very chary for a long time in using process blocks; occasional blocks were used in the Graphic. The first line block, which was a map, was printed in 1876, and the first half tone by Meisenbach was in 1884. The Illustrated London News used an occasional map about 1880, and in 1886 a double-page appeared, partly consisting of wood engraving and partly of process work which had been drawn on chalk grain paper. The same year some very good specimens of Gillot's blocks

TO THE VIRGINS

FATHER TIME. ("The Hesperides.")

Print from a process line-block from a pen drawing by Paul V. Woodroffe.
[By permission of Mr. George Allen.]

appeared, and in 1887 a half-tone block (very fine grain) by Goupil appeared—it was one of the Paris Salon pictures. In 1888 Meisenbach blocks obtained a footing, and from this year onward half-tone blocks and line blocks, steadily but surely crept in and wood engraving had to give way.

It may be of interest to ask—what is this “process” which has had so remarkable an effect upon book illustration? Put briefly, it is the substitution of a scientific mechanical method of reproduction for hand labour—the employment of the camera and the acid bath in place of the wood engraver. Its advantages are rapidity, cheapness, and accuracy, and it is not to be wondered at that process has “killed” all but the very finest wood engraving. It has certainly entirely superseded the art of the wood chopper.

THE LAST OF THE ARMADA. ("The Blue Poetry Book.")

Print from a process line-block from a pen drawing by Lancelot Speed, much reduced
[By permission of Messrs. Longmans & Co.]

“Process” for illustrations that can be printed simultaneously with the type is to be divided into two divisions—line work and “half-tone” process. In the case of line work—of drawings made without wash—the line drawing is photographed either by sunlight or by electric light—more usually the latter in England—in the ordinary manner of taking a photograph, directly on to the zinc plate which is ultimately to be printed from. The lines of the original drawings are thus photographically transferred rapidly and accurately to the metal plate. Ink is then applied to the lines by means of an ordinary ink roller, the sticky ink adhering only to the lines that have thus been photographed, and protecting them during the next “process.” This next step is to take the zinc plate with the lines thus protected by the ink and place it in a bath of acid which is very rapid in its action. The parts of the zinc plate which are not protected by the ink—the “whites” that is—are eaten or “etched” away by the acid to the depth required to prevent them printing. The lines which have been protected by the ink are left unaffected by the acid, and from these lines, standing “type high” when the block is properly mounted, the printing is effected. The block is then carefully gone over by an engraver, any roughness of edges and any spots or blemishes removed; the etched plate of metal mounted on wood, and the block is a faithful reproduction of the artist’s sketch ready to be printed from. This is the process usually employed. So simple is the “process” that a block of this kind can be made in a few hours, and it is by no means uncommon nowadays for a large publishing house or newspaper printing office to have a “process” department of its own. Electros or stereotypes can be readily obtained from “line” blocks, and consequently the number of reproductions that can be secured from one original line drawing is almost illimitable.

“Half-tone process” is neither quite so simple nor so effective. How could fine gradations, or any gradations, of flat tone be reproduced in printing? The difficulty was circumvented rather than overcome. An absolutely flat wash is not reproduced; but the effect of one is gained by an innumerable number of lines intersecting at right angles. As in the case of the line block the photograph is the basis of the ultimate result. A photograph is made of the drawing or object which is to be reproduced, but a “screen” is introduced between the object to be photographed and the sensitive plate upon which the image of the original will ultimately appear. In the early days of the half-tone process this screen was made of very finely woven gauze, but this in turn has been superseded by glass screens mechanically engraved with crossed lines. These lines occur at such minute distance that they give to the eye the impression of being flat washes of colour. The little spaces in the screen through which the light passes become more or less conspicuous as the light is stronger or weaker; and where the light is very strong, the black lines disappear and the light spaces merge into one another. Where the light is not quite so strong the intersection of the lines creates a number of little black dots. As the shadow deepens, the lines appear, and the white spaces grow smaller and smaller until they are lost in blackness. This result may be clearly seen if the reproduction be placed under the microscope. It may be added that this extreme delicacy is one of the drawbacks to half-tone process, for unless the printer is really skilful the result will be a dull, characterless grey “ghost” of the original. These dots or squares thus produced are photographed with the drawing on to the zinc or copper plate, and thus yield a more or less satisfactory printing surface. The block is etched and mounted in the same manner as the line block. “Half tone” is not in the same sense as “line” a facsimile reproduction of the original, but when carefully printed gives results which are often satisfactory and sometimes brilliantly successful. Where neither time nor expense has to be considered, a half-tone block can be much improved by subsequent hand engraving. It is done with marked success in America, but very few publishers appear to be willing to go to the unavoidable extra expense in England.

The present exhibition provides numerous examples of wood engraving both from wash and pen drawings and from photographs; in fact the first seven bays are almost entirely devoted to this older form of reproduction. “Process,” reproduced from almost every conceivable kind of original, mainly fills the remaining nineteen bays and the screens. The reproductions are hung side by side with the originals, and thus afford a valuable object lesson. From amongst the 1,623 exhibits we have chosen a few which are typical of the phases of illustration which they represent, and the blocks are printed by the courtesy of the several publishers. The work of the famous band of the illustrators of “the Sixties”—of Boyd’ Houghton, Sandys, Hughes, Walker, Pinwell, Millais, Leighton—of Sir John Tenniel and Leech, have their place in the history of the art. Of the more modern men Claud Shepperson, Brock, Arthur Rackham, Laurence Housman, Bernard Sleigh, Paul Woodroffe, Lancelot Speed, Bernard Partidge, Henry Ospovat, E. T. Reed, Linley Sambourne, E. J.

Sullivan, Alberto Martini, and E. A. Abbey have taken very kindly to process; and the success which attends some attention to the slight limitation of its requirements is shown in this really admirable exhibition. The exhibits by Messrs. Carl Hentschel and Edmund Evans are most useful as showing the stages of "process" as worked and printed.

An Illustration to "The Rivals."
Print from a process line-block from a pen drawing by Edmund J. Sullivan.
[By permission of Messrs. Macmillan & Co.]

THE DRAMA.

"LE THÉÂTRE FRANÇAIS ET ANGLAIS."

Mr. Charles Hastings, a Frenchman with an English name and a Teutonic appetite for facts, has condensed a vast subject into a compact manual in "Le Théâtre Français et Anglais, ses origines Grecques et Latines" (Paris: Firmin-Didot). He tells you all about "the rise of the drama, a question invariably set," tracing it through Athens and Rome, medieval mysteries and moralities, and bringing it down to M. Maurice Donnay and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones. His facts are chronologically arranged, are as valuable as they are recondite in the earlier periods, and are apt to degenerate into mere cataloguing in the later. That is the worst of the attempt to include everything; there is bound to be inequality, lack of proportion. The reader will acquire valuable information about Alexandre Hardy, say, or Rotrou; he will get a good bird's-eye view of the Elizabethan stage; and he will learn nothing of any value from such a paragraph as this:—"Les pièces de MM. Pinero, Arthur Jones, Sydney Grundy, reparaissent constamment sur l'affiche et trouvent toujours d'excellents interprètes dans MM. George Alexander, Forbes-Robertson, Wyndham, John Hare, Martin Harvey, admirablement secondés par des actrices telles que Mrs. Kendall (sic) et Mrs. Patrick Campbell." Indeed, the author's treatment of the whole nineteenth century is very superficial. I suspect him of confusing father and son in the case of the Kembles, and in that of the Keans. He overlooks Charles Kean's Shakespearian revivals. He dates Edmund's career from 1820, which is too late by several years, and seems to regard his period as contemporaneous with Macready's instead of as overlapping it. But he promises to deal more fully with the drama of the last two centuries in a second volume, and in that no doubt he will be more accurate. The real worth of his book lies in its design to exhibit the continuity of the drama through the ages. For this alone—with a little correction here and there—it would be well worth translating into English.

In any case, it is a book to consult rather than to read. To work steadily through its 400 pages is to have an indigestion of facts. It is all very well to learn who were Ambirius Turpio and Hatilius Prænестinus, or that "les 8e et 9e Chester-Plays, le 15e Widkirk-Play, les 19e, 20e, et 21e Coventry-Plays, contiennent dans leur ensemble les divers éléments du mélodrame," but one ends with a wild yearning to swap some of these minute facts for a little ratiocination. To learn res by rote is no doubt a good discipline, but rerum cognoscere causas is a better. One pines for general ideas in a survey of this sort, and general ideas (as M. Renan once said of the Goncourts) do not seem to be much in Mr. Hastings' way. Without them you cannot see the wood for the trees. To the question When, or Where? Mr. Hastings generally has an answer pat, but seldom to the much more important question Why? Let me give an example or two. The book offers you successive slices of English and French theatrical history in alternate chapters, suggesting some sort of parallelism. But you find that it is merely a parallelism of dates, and therefore meaningless. Why was it that in the same period on opposite sides of the Channel the English drama made for freedom, almost for "go as you please" methods, while the French made for symmetry and "the rules?" Mr. Hastings never hints at an answer; you must go to M. Jusserand for that. Mr. Hastings tells you, as in duty bound, how the drama grew out of a religious ceremony, both in Pagan Greece and in Christian Gaul. But he does not tell you why, it is that early religious exercises spontaneously breed drama. He is apt to record facts without perceiving—or at any rate without expounding—their significance. As thus:—"Les plus célèbres représentations de Londres, au XIVe. siècle, furent celles des 'Parish Clerks' qui entreprennent de jouer des mystères en plein air. Ils firent choix dans la paroisse de Clerkenwell d'un lieu appelé Skinner's Well, où se trouvait une source célèbre, et, là, ils donnerent des représentations sensationnelles." The interesting point, which Mr. Hastings entirely misses, is that this was but a particular instance of a general tendency—the tendency to perform religious drama round holy wells, and thus to present a "survival" of Pagan well worship in Christian times. Mr. Hastings says, e.g., that the "Curtain" theatre was in Shoreditch, which is true but not significant; had he said that it was in the Liberty of Holywell he would have given the reader a hint that what seems an arbitrary fact is really part of a general law. What, I submit, is chiefly needed in a comprehensive survey of the drama is not a mass of facts but a steady tracing of cause and effect, a few broad and luminous generalizations, and indications not that certain things merely happened but that, for reasons given, they were bound to happen as they did and not otherwise.

But I seem to be carping at Mr. Hastings' book, whereas, one ought to have nothing but gratitude for so earnest, conscientious, and laborious a study of our literature. Let me say then, again, that for facts, particularly for early facts, this résumé of dramatic history is extremely valuable. Mr. Hastings writes always pleasantly and, as M. Larroumet says—who ought to know far better than any English reader—"dans un français aisé et précis."

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

BOOKS ABOUT INDIA.

A HISTORY OF BRITISH INDIA. By Sir WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER, K.C.S.I., M.A., LL.D. Vol. II. (Longmans, 16s.)

The regretful memories that will be awakened by the appearance of Sir William Hunter's second volume, completed by another hand and published posthumously, are fitly expressed in the introduction. Of the monumental work he hoped to achieve, and in the preparation of which he had laboured so long and earnestly, he has left little more than the beginning. In the wreck of a mail steamer some years ago he lost a collection of notes and material, but with undaunted resolution he set himself to repair the disaster. As much was recovered, by renewed researches, as sufficed for the project of a history of less ambitious dimensions, and of this we have the first and the better part of a second volume. But though the work is to be carried on by a writer who will use his documents and was practised in his methods, Hunter's history is left by his premature death an incomplete fragment. Once again the doubt suggests itself whether it is possible for a man to store up the necessary knowledge and experience of India and its people during long residence there even under favourable conditions, then to undertake the researches which are only possible in England, and then to write his history, if he can, on the grand scale. As with Browning's Grammarians—“Still there's the comment.” Brian Hodgson, the great scholar whose life was written by Sir William Hunter, never began his comment, properly speaking; Hunter died as he was just beginning.

In his second volume the historian relates the fortunes of the old East India Company, from the days when its rivalry with the Dutch in further India was darkly terminated by the massacre of Amboyna, down to the time when amalgamation with the later enterprise of the New Company was forced on it by commercial jealousy and intrigues in Parliament and at Court. The narrative also covers the early records of the settlements at Surat, Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta. We trace the transition from the ventures of an association of merchants, adhering to the principles of unarmed traffic laid down by Sir Thomas Roe, to the larger design which aimed at acquiring a defensible foothold in India, when the English in the East showed that, in spite of their earlier misdeeds, “they understood the greater game of Indian politics better than their Dutch rivals,” and laid the foundation of a power which was to swell into an Empire. In the chapter relating to Cromwell's dealings with the East India Company will be found a good deal of information, extracted from the old records at the India Office, which has been overlooked by previous writers. Under Cromwell, the author points out, “the East India trade ceased to be a pawn sacrificed to Kings and Queens in the game of Royal marriages.” It began to be recognized as a national interest, which it behoved England to maintain by European treaties and to enforce, if need be, by European war:—

Cromwell laid the groundwork of the modern constitution of the East India Company. Under the regulations based on his Charter it cast its medieval skin, shook off the traditions of the Regulated system, and grew into one united, continuous, and permanent Joint Stock Corporation in the full sense of the word.

Cromwell's Charter of 1657 has faded out of existence—the researches made at Sir William Hunter's instance, not only in London, but also at the Hague and in Batavia, having proved futile. Enough is known, however, of its contents to enable the historian to reconstruct the provisions of this important document, which, as he points out, marks one of the three cyclic dates of British India. Plassey was fought a hundred years later, and the Sepoy revolt broke out in 1857. The chapter ends with the mention of two facts which, though not new to the student, may be less familiar to the general reader. A Milton, the grandson of Cromwell's Latin secretary, became a parish clerk in Madras, and two of Cromwell's descendants were Governors of Bengal.

The contemporary records preserved at the India Office and at the Indian Presidency towns had been more or less ransacked by previous writers for such evidence as they throw on the history of our earlier settlements in India. Sir William Hunter owns his obligations to works like Talboys Wheeler's “Madras in the Olden Time,” Sir Henry Yule's “Diary of William Hedges”—a mine of curious information; and the volumes of India Office Records edited by Sir George Birdwood, Mr. Danvers, and Mr. William Foster. The author, perhaps, is a little too hard on those of his predecessors who have told “the popular story of our settlement in Bengal.” Moreover, he has to admit that he himself in an earlier work gave more credit than was due to the ship's surgeon, Gabriel Broughton, who was thought to have won the right of free trade in Bengal by restoring a Princess of the Imperial house to health. A settlement, of course, was effected before Broughton prescribed for Shah Jehan's daughter, and the exact terms of the privilege he obtained may be doubtful. There is little question, however, that he richly deserved not only the suit of gay apparel presented to him by the factors at Masulipatam, but in some measure also the gratitude of posterity.

But Broughton's is only one among many names of early Anglo-Indians mentioned in the volume whose memory should be kept green. There is Francis Day, who built an embrasured factory at Madras, which he called after England's St. George, being taken to task for mischievous activity by the managers of the Company at home. There was Sir George Oxenden at Surat, who defied Sivagi, the Mahratta, and was rewarded for his staunchness by Aurunzib, the Great Moghul, with a robe of honour, and by the Company with a gold medal and £200. Gerald Aungier, the real founder of Bombay, who built martello towers and other defensive works to protect the place both against the “Savages,” as the Mahrattas are often called in the old records, and the Malabar pirates, did even better work. “With the calmness of a philosopher and the courage of a centurion,” as old Orme writes, he defied the Dutch as well. The Bombay Council wrote in their despatches:—“Multiplicity of words may multiply the sense of our loss, but cannot depict his greatness.” The Court of Directors at home suspected that he was “making up his bundle” for himself; but the Court in those days was not infrequently mistaken about the character of its servants. The career of Job Charnock, of Bengal, is told at length in Chapter VII. He, too, suffered from unmerited depreciation at the hands of his masters. At one time, indeed, they used to be loud in their praises of “our old and good servant Mr. Job Charnock,” who, they declared, was “no prowler for himself beyond what was just and modest”; but they never praised him for his magnificent defence of Hijili, and blamed him for not marching to destruction with but a handful of men against the forces of the Moghul. The names of the two brothers, Josia and John Child, figure yet more largely in the early annals of Anglo-India. It was Sir Josia who wrote to the Governor of Bombay that he expected his orders to be followed and not the laws of England, which he declared were a heap of nonsense, compiled by a few country gentlemen who hardly knew how to make laws for the good of their own families. By Sir William Hunter he is described as “practising to perfection some of the least creditable devices of the modern Stock Exchange.” He made a desperate effort to keep the old East India Company on its legs as a separate and privileged association, spending in one year between £80,000 and £90,000 in corrupting the Ministers and Court. But the end of the struggle is told in the chapter written by Mr. P. E. Roberts, to whom has been committed the completion of the work. He winds up the present volume with Godolphin's award, by which the details of the amalgamation of the Old and New Companies were finally settled. We have found no reference, indeed, to Evelyn's statement that the Old Company lost their business against the New one because so many of their friends in Parliament, instead of voting for them, went to see a tiger baited by dogs; but generally this final chapter is written with a precision and lucidity which promise well for the continuation of the work. The further volumes will, at any rate, be awaited with interest and respect, though every one must feel that the premature loss of the guiding hand and brain is irreparable.

THE FORWARD POLICY AND ITS RESULTS; or, Thirty-five Years' Work amongst the Tribes of our North-Western Frontier of India. By ROBERT ISAAC BRUCE, C.I.E., formerly Political Agent, Baluchistan. (Longmans. 15s. n.)

There is an impression in some quarters that Lord Curzon, since he became Viceroy of India, has discerned the perils of a forward policy, as it is called, on the North-West Frontier, and that, to use a not inappropriate metaphor, he has reversed the engines. From the title of Mr. Bruce's volume it might be hoped that he would enable his readers to judge how far this belief is well-founded, and whether the Viceroy's measures, whatever they may be, are prudent. Titles, however, are not always to be depended on. The author's reminiscences of his own work on the frontier, interesting as they are, do not touch upon more than a few aspects of a very wide problem. It would be better to describe the book as an account of one particular form of frontier policy, which, for want of a more exact phrase, may be called the Sandeman method, after the distinguished officer who, if he was not the sole inventor, showed how it was to be done. After helping Sir Robert Sandeman to establish and extend British influence in Baluchistan and adjacent districts, Mr. Bruce was transferred to the Punjab, where, on the Derajat frontier, he practised, as far as the Punjab Government and local conditions would permit, the principles he had learnt in Baluchistan. Thus his book, besides being a sufficiently exciting narrative of personal adventures and a useful supplement to Dr. Thornton's biography of Sir R. Sandeman, is a trustworthy record of frontier administration in the Derajat, as long as Mr. Bruce held office there. In this latter part, of course, there is a good deal about the Waziris; and Mr. Bruce, who accompanied Sir William Lockhart's expedition, adds considerably to what is known of the causes of that miniature war. On the other hand, while we must look elsewhere for elucidation of the present trouble with the Mahsuds, it can hardly be pretended that the book deals comprehensively with frontier policy outside the regions specially referred to.

In talking about the forward policy it would be as well to define more clearly what is meant by the phrase. Possibly Sir Robert Sandeman's method might be roughly described in the words used by the Knight of Malta in Massinger's "Maid of Honour":—

I must tell you, Sir,
Virtue if not in action is a vice;
And, when we move not forward, we go backward;
Nor is this peace, the nurse of drones and cowards,
Our health, but a disease.

With or without the approval of his Government, Sir Robert Sandeman was constantly projecting and carrying into execution plans for enlarging the area under his control. Mr. Bruce relates that Sir Mortimer Durand once said:—"Sandeman and you have a way of sitting down quietly and occupying a tract of tribal territory and reporting that you have done so at the earnest wish of the tribes." Not that it was a policy of annexation pure and simple. The essence of Sandeman's method, as Mr. Bruce points out, was

The setting on their legs of the hereditary chiefs and maliks, Pathan as well as Baluch, supporting them and working through them, and bringing them into line with ourselves in all matters connected with the good administration of the frontier, at the same time that he exercised a healthy control and supervision over their actions.

It is, perhaps, in the phrase "healthy control and supervision" that we may discover the secret of Sir Robert Sandeman's success; and, passing over a doubt as to whether a Sandeman policy is not apt to fail unless there is a Sandeman behind it, we shall come to a perception of what he and Mr. Bruce seem to have meant by a forward policy. It was not exactly the Roman art—parcere subjectis et debellare superbos. Nor did Sandeman adopt Sir Charles Napier's maxim—"Barbaric chiefs must be bullied, or they think you are afraid; they do not understand benevolence or magnanimity." Sir Robert Sandeman preferred to try benevolence and magnanimity first; and though at times he had to war down the proud, it was not till every form of conciliation proved futile. However, the end aimed at was the same in every case—the establishment of a "healthy control" over the widest possible area. But Sir Robert Sandeman knew what he was about. He was too energetic a man, indeed, never to begin a new piece of work before he had finished the old; but he was too clever to attempt too much at a time. Above all, though his views were wide and far-reaching, he could always concentrate himself on his immediate purpose of establishing control over any tribe within reach—control, according to his theory, being good for tribesmen, and English officers having a Divine right and mission to exercise it.

Now the forward policy which took us to Chitral, into Kurram, and to the back of Waziriland was different alike in its motives, in its means, and in its consequences. Mr. Bruce, indeed, makes some allusion in his introductory remarks to the difference. He writes:—

The forward movements on the Northern frontier appear to lack the essential principle—the carrying the tribes with us. The Sandeman policy should not, at any rate, be founded with a policy which may either have been only an imperfect imitation of it, or with one which was totally different, as was that in the Khaibar.

This, by the way, would have been a good reason for calling the book by some other title. What is usually meant by the forward policy had for its primary motive not so much the extension of British influence and the establishment of a wider control as the securing of a more convenient frontier. In obtaining points of vantage the Indian Government failed, in places, to provide for the maintenance of an adequate control, sometimes because the local conditions were misunderstood, sometimes because the cost was prohibitive. To have justified his title, Mr. Bruce should have discussed these points at greater length, and not, as he does, incidentally. Had he done so no doubt the reader would be better able to comprehend and appreciate Lord Curzon's recent measures and to see whether they really amount to a reversal of the forward policy.

What Mr. Bruce has to say about the employment of middlemen in dealing with the independent tribes deserves particular attention. It has sometimes been thought that recent troubles on the Punjab border were largely due to the excessive confidence reposed in the middlemen, or go-betweens, who served as the medium of communication between frontier officials and the tribesmen. Sometimes, too, Sir Robert Sandeman has been held up as a praiseworthy example of an administrator who dispensed with the services of these intermediaries. In regard to the first point, it should be noted that the middleman, like the close border system, was a legacy from the Sikhs, and that of late years much has been done in the Punjab to get rid of him. But, as Mr. Bruce rightly remarks, his chief was by no means averse to the employment of such men. "Sandeman in all his tribal arrangements, from start to finish, employed go-betweens, with the best results." His middlemen, however, were also kept under "healthy control and supervision." Another technical issue raised by the author is whether the old contention is correct that Pathans are more difficult to manage than Baluchis because, while the latter obey tribal chiefs, the Pathan is more of a democrat, and only recognizes the authority of his tribal council, or jirga. Mr. Bruce argues that, in the first place, Sir Robert Sandeman had to manage both Baluchis and Pathans, and that he was equally successful with both; and that, secondly, it was Sandeman himself who set the hereditary chiefs and maliks, both Baluch and Pathan, on their legs. But, after all, it only brings us back to the suspicion already expressed—that the Sandeman policy needs a Sandeman to work it. Even Mr. Bruce, we imagine, would admit that, somehow or other, it has not entirely succeeded with the Mahsud Waziris.

It will be remembered that Lord Roberts, in his "Forty-One Years in India," expressed a strong opinion about the garrison which he relieved at the end of the famous march from Kabul to Kandahar. "I confess," he wrote, "to being very greatly surprised, not to use a stronger expression, at the demoralized condition of the greater part of the garrison. . . . They seemed to consider themselves hopelessly defeated, and were utterly despondent." And abundant particulars follow. An indignant reply to this charge, by Major-General Sir John Hills, R.E., K.C.B., is published under the title, THE BOMBAY FIELD FORCE, 1880 (Brimley Johnson, 1s. 6d. n.). It is practically a case of one man's word against another's, and we excuse ourselves from judging between them. We note, however, that General Hills only defends the force by throwing over its superior officers, saying that

The Bombay Field Force of 4,000 men was commanded by an officer weak in body and character. The two next senior generals were untried and inexperienced, and the third known to possess no military capacity.

As the book is in effect an appeal to public opinion against Lord Roberts, and as its publication "as it was held undesirable that it should take place during the absence of Lord Roberts from England," it is probably intended to inaugurate a controversy and the bandying of recriminations, and will very possibly achieve that end.

Mr. Vaughan Nash went to India on behalf of the Manchester Guardian to write about the famine, and his letters, or a selection from them, are published under the title THE GREAT FAMINE AND ITS CAUSES (Longmans, 6s.). It is the work of a careful observer who is very anxious to state all the facts accurately. It is impossible to gather from his pages what the famine looked like, but there are plenty of figures to show us what it was, and there are elaborate arguments to indicate the causes of famines in the past and the means by which they may be avoided, or, at least, mitigated, in the future. The reforms which Mr. Nash advocates are the restriction of the power of alienating land, a more elastic system of land revenue fluctuating with seasons of crops, the introduction of usury laws, more indulgent to the debtor than those at present in force, and the creation of a system of Government credit to assist the peasantry in periods of distress. These proposals are supported by careful arguments, and the book really merits a consideration which its rather bald style will probably prevent it from obtaining from any one not directly and professionally interested in the subject with which it deals.

INDIA AND IMPERIAL FEDERATION (Chapman and Hall, 1s.) is a reprint of some correspondence that recently appeared in support of the Imperial idea in the Calcutta Englishman. There are many admirably loyal letters from Indian Princes, and we read that prayers for the success of British arms were addressed at Chandpiur (Tuppera) to the Rajrajesvari.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Drama.

The secret of being wearisome, says the proverb, is to tell everything. We do not suppose that Mr. Bernard Shaw shows us his whole soul in the various literary articles with which he overlays his new volume, THREE PLAYS FOR PURITANS (Grant Richards, 6s.), but he has certainly discovered something of the secret of being tiresome. In these plays, The Devil's Disciple, Captain Brassbound's Conversion, and Cæsar and Cleopatra, there is much that is delightful; and the wit and élan of, for instance, Captain Brassbound's Conversion shine conspicuously when presented by competent actors and before a special kind of audience like the Stage Society, not too much dominated by conventions. Despite all Mr. Shaw's explanations, we can still discern in the plays when printed and bound up together the sparkle necessary to provide a pleasant evening's entertainment. Mr. Shaw, indeed, has one quality which goes a long way towards securing such a result, a quality which he shares with all his countrymen, and especially his literary countrymen—unintentional humour. We have heard Mr. Shaw complain that his serious plays become farces in the hands of competent actors, but the actors are not to blame—they are often unintentional comedians too—it is Mr. Shaw's own laughable qualities which have forced themselves over the foot-lights in spite of the author's efforts to be staid. The worst point about unintentional humour as applied to the stage is its quality of caprice. Just when the exigencies of the play require it most, then it evaporates. Moreover, the longer you continue to rely on unintentional humour the more elusive it will become. The chance fun of Widowers' Houses and Arms and the Man was frequent and entertaining, but as time goes by and Mr. Shaw continues to risk play after play the weakness of his laissez-faire system becomes more apparent, until at last a critic's crown of sorrow is remembering happier plays from the same pen. Mr. Shaw's talent does not always sustain him throughout a long play; he loses, at vital moments, his grip upon his theme and disguises his mental lapse with an idle jest or a pantomime effect. No amount of amusing preface removes that fact, although it may go to prove again that as a critic of all the arts and of most of the artists, including himself, the writer of "Plays for Puritans" is one of the most acute and amusing "gentlemen and literary workmen" that modern journalism has produced.

Mr. William Heinemann's WAR (Lane 3s. 6d.) is the second of the plays which are intended to constitute his trilogy, "The Finger of God." The third is not yet announced. To persons acquainted with Æschylus, there is something so awe-inspiring in the mere word "trilogy" that one hesitates to apply it, as Mr. Heinemann does, to a series of dramas as slight as "War." There is no change of scene through the three acts. The action is conducted outside on the Sussex Coast, where the Dutch, in sympathy with their kinsmen, have landed a hostile force while our Army is engaged in South Africa. On the stage, in the library of General St. George, we have the echoes of war, and the persons appropriate to a military drama—the retired general, the cripple raging at his impotence, the worldly mother, the girl in love with a meritorious Major of humble birth, and the wife of a guardsman who is all that the detractors of our cavalry would wish him to be. In fact the play is a kind of foot-note to the question of Army Reform, and the best thing in it is the presentment—in the persons of the guardsman, his wife, and his mother—of the aristocratic service point of view on its worst and most snobbish side. The play ends on a sad and tragic note, but we need not spoil the story by describing it. The interest of the play, from the stage point of view, lies in the fact that the determining events are going on outside, and the air is thus charged with a dramatic excitement which the audience shares with the actors.

TENNYSON'S PRINCESS, one of the "Plays for Amateur Performances" (Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. n.), makes a very pretty performance for girls, and we may praise highly the careful instructions—they can hardly be too careful—for proper elocution, business, and dressing of the stage, the latter being illustrated by plans. There are also pictures illustrating the dresses, notes as to the music, and much other matter helpful to the amateur.

This kind of instruction would improve THE GENTLEMAN IN THE NEXT HOUSE, a farcical comedy founded on Mrs. Nickleby's experiences in Nicholas Nickleby, by Isabelle M. Pagan (Dent, 1s. n.). The dialogue is well enough done; but, apart from its literary associations, the play does not rise above the numerous original pieces suitable for amateurs.

Captain Slocum.

Perhaps no better example among travel books of the success of a journey or voyage, and the failure to record it properly, could be found than Captain Joshua Slocum's SAILING ALONE AROUND THE WORLD (Sampson Low, 8s. 6d.). Captain Slocum, to use an Americanism, is as "gritty as a grindstone," and his courage never failed him in his arduous undertaking. To take a boat, thirty-seven foot over all, round the globe, covering in all about 46,000 miles, and to do it singlehanded, is no mean feat for any modern viking from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. Such a task requires a combination of courage, readiness, resourcefulness and sanity, not by any means common even among seamen. So much we must allow to Captain Slocum. At the same time, it is difficult not to regret that he was alone. Had he had as a companion any one of half-a-dozen men whom it would not be difficult to name, the story of this unique voyage would have been no mere log of the surface of the sea, but would have gone deep into the very mystery of nature. What a book, indeed, would Herman Melville, author of "Moby Dick" and "Typee" and "Omoo," have produced in the vast solitudes of the Pacific, as he seemed to sail the very world itself single-handed among the stars. But Captain Slocum, tense and hard-handed and level-headed, though he, indeed, may have felt the terrors and wonders of the great deep, could hardly bring himself to explore in his own mind as he sailed alone. So strong and doughty a sailor may have looked upon such exploration as signs of weakness, avoiding them as he would have avoided shoal water or some heavy "overfall." Nevertheless, it is a pity to think of it, for few men are likely to attempt the big round world again as Captain Slocum did. And even fewer are likely to succeed.

Bishops.

THE FATAL OPULENCE OF BISHOPS (A. and C. Black, 5s.), by a London clergyman, the Rev. Hubert Handley, starts from the statement of the late Bishop Thorold that "Christianity is not in possession of South London." For the comparative failure of the Church the author endeavours to find reasons, and one of them is the wealth and social position of the Bishops—which, however, is, to a degree hardly recognized by Mr. Handley, part of a larger question; it is a simple and inevitable result of the social prestige of the Church. The subject is a well-worn one, on which a great deal of ignorant verbiage has been expended. Mr. Handley puts the question on a different plane. He discusses in a detailed and practical manner the familiar assertion that Bishops are nowadays poor men, though he does not, we think, recognize the vast change that has taken place since the old days of Episcopal magnificence. The book should certainly attract attention, for the author's good taste, moderation, and sincerity are conspicuous; and he writes in a forcible and interesting style.

The War.

The high reputation of Australian war correspondents is well maintained by Mr. Frank Wilkinson, of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, in his AUSTRALIA AT THE FRONT (John Long, 6s.). Mr. Wilkinson has the colonial prose style, but he only has it mildly. He resembles Mr. Hales in giving impressionist pictures instead of a direct relation of events. The result is a bright, agreeable, well-written book, though it is a pity that the author sometimes exercises his patriotism at the expense of his fellow subjects, as in the remark that "it is good fun to see the Imperial Yeomanry ride, as they fall at the rate of one a minute." As a matter of fact, this is exactly what the Rhodesian police say of the Australians.

After reading almost every book about the war that has appeared, we were still able to find pleasure in Mr. Julian Ralph's TOWARDS PRETORIA (Pearson, 6s.). The volume is evidently by way of being an afterthought, since it contains little narrative, but mainly consists of random reflections on all sorts of subjects. However, it is readable, and most of the war books have not been readable. It will be observed that Mr. Ralph does not think equally highly of all the war correspondents whom he met in Africa, and does not hesitate to say so:—

To send men whom it was impossible for the officers to regard as comrades, and men who would not hesitate to break the rules of the guild unless they were certain of severe punishment, was a crime against the honour of the profession. It was to govern such men that the strictest of the censorship rules had to be made. The result was that the representatives of the dignity and honour of the profession were beset with limitations which carried with them both reproach and distrust, and crippled their work. To put the case in another way, there were correspondents at the front who would have been trusted to write whatever they desired, had it not been that there were other correspondents whose poor judgment, worse taste, and careless treatment of facts dragged the entire corps down to a low level.

These are strong words, but we have no reason to believe that there is not some justification for them.

Major C. E. Callwell tells us that his TACTICS OF TO-DAY (Clowes) was written while he was marching with the Natal Field Force from Laings Nek to Lydenburg. It is an attempt to show how tactical problems have been modified by recent improvements in the weapons of war and how the teaching of the Franco-German War has been superseded by the teaching of the Boer War. The author gives up the artillery duel, shock tactics, and volley firing, and points out that even the counter attack, on which most military writers lay so much stress, may, under modern conditions, be a rash and costly defensive experiment. His remarks on the subject of the scouting of our cavalry in South Africa are pungent:—

In scouting, in obtaining information as to the doings of the Boers, in safeguarding infantry and artillery against surprise when on the march and when at rest, our mounted troops have failed most signally. Some irregular corps, it is true, have proved quite invaluable; but the regular cavalry, of which the country have been so proud, has been no match in cunning, in self reliance, or in resource for the singular antagonists with which it has had to cope. If the troopers venture far afield they fall into an ambush; if they cling to the other arms these become a prey to unexpected shell fire, to sudden onslaughts on their baggage, and to similar annoyance. There has been a touch of humour in the patrollings of our mounted men by day, designed to frustrate the enterprises of a wily foe who prepares his neatest strokes by night. A cavalry which sweeps out fanwise well in advance of the army in the morning and gains important ground, but which retires to some central bivouac as the sun goes down, does not give its side much help.

After this it is a relief to find Major Callwell adding that he is doubtful whether the mounted troops of other European armies would have done better or even have done so well.

Vol. IV. of the Memorial Edition of G. W. Steevens' works contains FROM CAPE TOWN TO LADYSMITH AND EGYPT IN 1898. The former work contains a few fresh letters found among the author's papers. They hardly rank with his most notable work, but one is glad to have them all the same. (Blackwood, 6s.)

The Daily Motto.

All those who chance to be interested in Buddhist doctrine will welcome the new edition of Mr. Ernest Bowden's volume of quotations from Asiatic literature arranged for each day in the year. THE IMITATION OF BUDDHA (Methuen, 3s.) was first compiled some years ago, and since then a considerable number of fresh translations of Buddhist works have been issued, of which Mr. Bowden now makes use. The collection has a preface by Sir Edwin Arnold, who praises it highly. The texts are of Catholic application and give no room for polemics. We can recommend it to all who like to use a day-book of moral aphorisms.

THE CALENDAR OF EMPIRE (Blackwood, 5s.), compiled by Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., is very beautifully got up, and has the laudable purpose of paying "a tribute to lives, deeds, and words that have gained glory for great and greater Britain." Most of the days have an Imperial event, and all of them have apt patriotic quotations, chosen with much skill. Here are three of them:—

October 10.

President Kruger born, 1825.

"The fly sat upon the axle-tree of the chariot-wheel and said, 'What a dust do I raise.'"—Æsop.

June 1.

Shannon and Chesapeake Action, 1813.

"June 1st. Off Boston. Moderate. N.W. Wrote Laurence. Took Chesapeake."

—Entry in Captain P. V. Broke's Diary.

October 5.

Life Peers created, 1876.

"The throne is the fountain of honour—not a pump."

—Disraeli.

The compiler of THE TENNYSON BIRTHDAY BOOK (Ward, Lock, 1s. 6d.) is undaunted by the quotation which he attaches to October 6 about one good custom corrupting the world, and addresses himself to the business—which is becoming almost one of the liberal professions—of finding (in this instance, of course, from Tennyson) a suitable quotation for each day in the year. It is a pretty little book with floriated borders and well-selected verses, uniform with other similar books from the same publishers.

We have received from the Oxford University Press the new edition of the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, embodying the necessary changes in the forms of petition for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the Royal Family, and also the special form of service in commemoration of her late Majesty "to be used in all Churches and Chapels in England and Wales, and in the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, either on the day of the funeral or on the most convenient day within the Octave."

There is little that is new or suggestive in THE POET OF HOME LIFE (Home Words Office), a volume of miscellanea called forth by Cowper's centenary last April. The sermons by Dean Farrar and the Rev. John Callis here reprinted were well suited to the occasion, but were scarcely worth being republished in a book. A melancholy interest attaches to the brief life of the poet by the late Mr. Andrew James Symington, owing to the recent death of the writer. It is, moreover, written in a lucid and sympathetic manner, though it covers quite familiar ground. The Rev. Canon Wilton contributes an entertaining account of his moderately successful attempt to emulate Cowper in taming a hare.

THE WILDFOWLER IN SCOTLAND (Longmans, 30s.) is another of Mr. John Guille Millais' fine sporting books, which for the artist has an especial interest in a frontispiece by his father Sir John Millais. But Mr. Millais is of course an artist himself; and apart from the pleasant records of his own experiences among shore birds in the North and his useful appendix on the northern Firths, a great value attaches to this book from its pictures. There is one beautiful coloured landscape; but Mr. Millais' speciality is his intimate knowledge of the appearance of wild birds on the wing and their attitudes at rest. The numerous pictures he here gives us are to the sportsman and ornithologist of the greatest interest.

Knutsford has been a little overdone of late, and save for its photographs and portraits MRS. GASKELL AND KNUTSFORD, by the Rev. G. A. Payne (Gay and Bird), has no great merit. It contains topographical notes about Knutsford, a short biography of Mrs. Gaskell, a collection of notices about her works, and a bibliography—incomplete as far as recent editions are concerned.

The articles in which various contributors to the Daily Chronicle, including Mr. William Archer, Mr. Arthur Waugh, Mr. Joseph Pennell, and Major Martin Hume, recently traced the progress which the century has seen in the different departments of human endeavour are reprinted in volume form under the title THE MIND OF THE CENTURY (Unwin, 2s.). Many readers will, no doubt, be glad to have them thus made readily accessible.

THE BOOK OF PEACE, made by Pamela Tennant (The Chiswick Press, 6s. n.), consists of a collection of passages from the Bible, the Apocrypha, and the Imitation, arranged for daily reading morning and evening during a space of four weeks. To each reading is appended a poem drawn from such varied sources as the old English carols, Emily Brontë, Walt Whitman,

Mr. Yeats, and Shakespeare. There is a frontispiece after Bellini, a tail-piece showing one of Della Robbia's beautiful Holy Innocents from the Foundling at Florence, and other illustrations after Blake. The book would, no doubt, form an acceptable present, at certain seasons, to a woman of a religious and reflective turn of mind.

Messrs. Bell have had the happy idea of issuing volumes on Continental Churches, uniform, or nearly uniform, with their Cathedral Series. They begin with ROUEN, by the Rev. Thomas Perkins, and CHARTRES, by H. J. L. J. Massé (2s. 6d. each), two early accessible centres of interest to those interested in ecclesiastical architecture. Such visitors will find the books indispensable. They are carefully written and admirably illustrated, mainly but not exclusively from photographs. We see that "Paris (Notre Dame)" is announced, and we hope that volumes on Bruges and Cologne are contemplated. To the Cathedral Series is added WORCESTER, by Edward F. Strange (1s. 6d. n.).

RUMANIA IN 1900, by G. Benger (Asher, 10s. n.), may be described as a year-book de luxe. It contains the history of the country, with its educational, commercial, agricultural, and other statistics, and a handsome collection of photographs of towns, public buildings, characteristic scenery, and illustrious men. The general impression left is, of course, that Rumania is getting on nicely, an impression which should, perhaps, be checked by a perusal of Mr. Conybeare's remarks in the National Review, to which we refer elsewhere.

Gowrie is a portion of North Britain on the banks of the river Tay. SONGS AND SAYINGS OF GOWRIE, by the Rev. Adam Philip (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, 5s. n.), reviews, with profuse quotations, the literature of the locality. Lady Nairne is one of the authors concerned. James Beattie is another. A volume compiled with care, and obviously a labour of love.

LANCASHIRE HUMOUR (Dent), by Thomas Newbigging, is rather for local consumption. The humour is there, but it is not always conspicuous, and it is overlaid with dialect. Mr. J. A. Symington's little illustrations, however, add much attraction to the text.

ART.

THE LATER WORK OF AUBREY BEARDSLEY (John Lane, 42s. n.). It is characteristic of the various books that have contained collections of drawings by the late Aubrey Beardsley that very few words are deemed necessary to explain or introduce them. The cleverness of the young draughtsman is admitted, but the position which he occupied during a very short life was never definitely assigned, and how far his reputation will increase or decrease in the future none can venture to prophesy. He was the despair of those who—recognizing talent—felt that the expression of his art was unhealthy. There was a decorative sense so strongly developed, a knowledge of the close interrelation of different parts of a design, and, above all, a disposition of the blacks of his drawings, which placed him apart from every English artist of his time. And yet this young illustrator, such is the irony of genius, more often than not feasted his fancy upon unwholesome and revolting types, and let loose an unbridled immorality which was the more dangerous since it was presented with the rarest ability. There is, in fact, little in common between the illustrations to the Morte d'Arthur and the design for his own bookplate which was published for the first time amongst "A Book of Fifty Drawings," in 1897. We do not object because of its inaccuracy to the title of this new collection of drawings. It gains in interest from the fact that many examples of Beardsley's more youthful productions have been included under the title of "Later Works." The earlier works show influences which must be well understood if we are to place Beardsley at all in his proper position. Here in the "Hamlet" (1892), the "Adoramus Te," "A Christmas Carol," "The Virgin and Lily," "Die Gotterdammerung," is evidence of the strong influence of Burne Jones, and, through him, of the Early Primitives. All this disappears, and a certain early woodcut method grafted upon a Japanese sense of the use of massed black declares itself in "How Queen Guenever made her a Nun." Once again we get the "Madame Réjane," the Avenue Theatre and the Pseudonym Library posters, the wonderful frontispiece for "Venus and Tannhauser," which is, possibly, one of the artist's greatest decorative successes, and the hitherto unpublished frontispiece for the Sixth Satire of Juvenal, which is as classic in spirit and as subtle in suggestion as the great original demanded. In fact, looking at these conceptions and "The Return of Tannhauser to Venusberg" it is impossible to deny great occasions to this strange produce of the fin de siècle. Our dread of the mind diseased is quickened by the eight designs which originally appeared in a privately printed edition of the "Lysistrata," of Aristophanes, in the "Cave of Spleen," and the "Lady with the Monkey," only to be healthily pacified by "A Christmas Card." There is, in fine, nothing in "The Later Works" to assist the critic to arrive at any definite opinion concerning this extraordinary and complex art personality. It is impossible to deny the sense of sumptuous decoration, for Beardsley fully recognized that book illustration should also be book decoration. The occasional landscape, conventional but seldom imitative; the flow and rhythm of his line; the use of black and white in broad masses without any effect of patchiness; the malicious enjoyment of the unwholesome; the riotous splendour of so much that was, morally speaking, undesirable, these are some of the qualities of Aubrey Beardsley's art, but whether as a whole his work was good or bad for art it is almost impossible to decide. We are inclined to think that his influence has passed and that Art is the better for the release.

FICTION.

Miss Mary Angela Dickens.

Miss Mary Angela Dickens' latest book THE WASTREL (Hutchinson, 6s.) is in the same fluent and popular style as her other recent books. Here will be found reversions of fortune, divorce, bankruptcy, the wicked loves of married ladies, the virtuous affections of candid maidens, the black arts of subtle men, the high faith and honour of the indolent and brave, and the whole wrought together with skill and knowledge. There are flashes of real observation in "The Wastrel," but the author allows the conventional and melodramatic to press in and crush the life of her story. The hero, Keir Kingsmead, is an agreeable villain somewhat of the old Haymarket, Captain Swift type. Herr Otto Schnick, also a black-hearted fellow and always called Herr, is an American German who, while speaking English fluently and correctly, still places the verb at the end of his sentence, "You may for the moment the advantage have." This becomes exasperating in dramatic moments; and the affair of the verb is one which a German who speaks English corrects very quickly. Other characters are drawn with more courage and less convention; Mark Awdrey is pleasant to know, and his wife will interest. If one might give a word of advice to a gifted lady, it would be "Observe, observe, don't imagine—on the lines of previous romances."

Two Hard-working Novelists.

Mr. Thomas Cobb and Mr. Richard Marsh are both endowed with some share of the divine gift of story-telling; they can both devise a good plot, string it well together, and tell it in readable, straightforward King's English. But they would both do well to realize that novels worth reading cannot be turned out in too quick succession. To Mr. Richard Marsh's last two books we have already alluded. THE CHASE OF THE RUBY (Skeffington, 3s. 6d.) shows him at his best. THE SEEN AND THE UNSEEN (Methuen, 6s.), full as it is of good ideas, of ingenious experiments in the weird, shows an immaturity which greater care would have avoided. Many of the stories leave the impression that they might have been better, that the right points are not brought out, that the dénouement is poor, or is not properly worked up to. "The Chase of the Ruby," on the other hand, is well thought out, an excellent, brisk story, starting from a good situation; and a story on which each chapter only raises a sense of pleasurable excitement in preparation for the next. Mr. Cobb is just as unequal. THE DISSEMBLERS (Lane, 6s.), though its main motive, by which a marriage engagement de convenance converts itself into a love match, is not unfamiliar, is in other respects original, and it is admirably told, with very little waste of power and a true feeling for the effective development of events. THE BISHOP'S GAMBIT (Grant Richards, 6s.) is much less closely knit; the characters are less vivid, and the secret, which is at the bottom of all the trouble, is let out quite early, and one waits rather impatiently for the knot to be cut, without much help from the author to enliven the period of waiting. The Bishop, too, is a little too much of a stage Divine, the conventionally sanctimonious superior person. Bishops are not, as a rule, made like that nowadays. Still we would not dissuade those who have liked Mr. Cobb's other novels from reading "The Bishop's Gambit." It will interest them, but it is not his best work, and we would urge Mr. Cobb, as we would urge also Mr. Richard Marsh—though we note what he says in a letter we publish to-day—not to be too prodigal or too ready to give the public, however much they want it, anything that falls short of their highest level.

Extravagances.

Mr. Philip Treherne's story, FROM VALET TO AMBASSADOR (Sands, 3s. 6d.), is very much what might be expected from the title. It is farcical, up-to-date, makes some attempt at sketching modern smart society, and, on the whole, produces a rather wearisome effect. Barnes, the millionaire, is a grotesque figure, but the only one in whom it is possible to take the slightest interest. The wildest improbability in the narrative and the most industrious search after amusing incident cannot save Mr. Treherne from dullness. He succeeds only in being extravagant.

Lady Helen Craven has got hold of a good idea in THE OUTCAST EMPEROR (Hutchinson, 6s.), but it would be flattery to assert that she had made a good novel out of it. Obviously there are possibilities, both of the humorous and sensational order, in the flight of the half-murdered Emperor of Cathay, his rescue by an English millionaire on board his yacht, and the subsequent attempts of numberless emissaries from the truculent Dowager Empress upon his life. It may be conceded, too, that the authoress has imagination and the courage to use it. She does not hesitate over the improbable; she handles her yacht and her Celestials as though she knew something of both. She can conceive a humorous situation—if the humour is broad enough to be unmistakable. The trouble is that she cannot write. It would be difficult to imagine anything more trying than the perpetual circumlocution of the narrative or the unceasing slanginess of the dialogue. The young men, one and all, talk like overgrown schoolboys. Were it not for the writing, and an occasional lapse from good taste, the story would be a passable example of the sensational novel. The construction is not amiss, and there is plenty of exciting incident.

Most of the probabilities are outraged in Mr. Godfrey Bosville's PUBLICANS AND SINNERS (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.), concerned as it is with the amazing good fortune of a ne'er-do-well. "Miracles may happen," Meredith says, "but it's best to reckon that they won't." And so it may be within the bounds of possibility that a down-at-heel piece of human flotsam may be solicitously provided for by a beneficent genius who keeps a hotel and a yacht and racehorses whose jockeys are not decided upon until the last moment; but these things are hardly life. Provided one can overlook wayward violations of all social codes, a new and fanciful rendering of human nature, and a rather loud, not to say vulgar, style in narration, the story possesses just enough interest to make it tolerable.

THE ORDER OF ISIS (Skeffington, 6s.), by Mr. James Bagnall-Stubbs, is rightly called a story of mystery and adventure in Egypt, with plenty of army men and beautiful ladies, and "hussars to the rescue," and meetings of East and West, and Papyri, and Dervishes, and Arabs. Those who enjoy a cleverly woven story of rather fantastic adventures in the East will have no reason to complain of the way Mr. Bagnall-Stubbs tells how "the world is rid of a most perfect villain."

HER FATHER'S TRUST, by Mary Maher (Burns and Oates, 2s. 6d.), is a sincerely told though not remarkable story of a daughter's fidelity. It reflects glory on the Roman Catholic religion as a means of nourishing a sense of duty. We do not quarrel with it from this point of view, although we do resent a little the emphasis with which the moral is driven home, so that the story, which treats conventionally of Irish life, is in danger of being regarded as a tract.

The gentleman who writes under the name of "David Lyall" has an ineradicable fondness for the first person, and a fund of sentiment which is apt to degenerate into sentimentality. THE FLOWERS OF THE FOREST (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) combines in a curious fashion the vices of the kailyard school with the more modern vice of seeking realism by the introduction of the actors and the scenes of yesterday. "David Lyall" goes as a war correspondent to the Cape; he is present at Belmont and Magersfontein, and he talks with the ill-fated General Wauchope on the eve of that battle. The author is present also at Paardeberg Drift. As journalism his descriptions of these scenes of war might pass; as digressions from a sickly romance they are unpardonable.

We remember Mr. Louis Tracy's war of the future book, "The Final War." The fighting in it was an obviously civilian invention, but the story rattled along rather vigorously. In THE INVADERS (Pearson, 6s.), Mr. Tracy tries to repeat his success with a story in which French and Germans land at Liverpool and play havoc in the Midlands, but fails to hold our interest. His work is merely melodrama, suitable perhaps for serialization in popular periodicals designed for the illiterate, but unfit to serve any higher purpose.

About one-quarter of THE VEREKER FAMILY (Digby, Long, 6s.) is concerned with the history of that interesting clan—a history which is confined almost entirely to the love-stories of the various Misses Vereker. The rest of the book is filled up with short stories, of varying degrees of merit. When Miss May Crommelin essays the terrible, as with "In the Garden Pavilion," she lays on the colour with no sparing hand. Sometimes she even becomes a little hysterical in her anxiety to produce a strong effect. But her stories are generally readable, and some of them are constructed with a good deal of ingenuity.

Miss Olive Birrell's story is too minute and too much concerned with the non-essential to be an engrossing novel. But LOVE IN A MIST (Smith, Elder, 6s.) is a pleasant title, and the book is carefully written and fairly true to modern life. Keith Hamilton is a sympathetic character whose fortunes may be gladly followed, and Lincoln, who devotes his life to the service of the world, "like a soldier leading a forlorn hope," is a powerful sketch. The style of the book is a little old-fashioned. It conveys, in fact, some hint that—

Old-fashioned blossoms cluster in the borders,
Love-in-a-mist and crimson-hearted clove.

The practised novelist who writes under the name of Curtis Yorke has—her publishers inform us—resided for several winters past in Spain. Hence CARPATHIA KNOX (Jarrold, 6s.) with its wealth of local colour, its frequent "paseo, or promenade," "poplars or chopas, as they are called here," and other numberless foreign phrases courteously translated for the benefit of the untravelled reader. To our thinking the pages of this novel are sown rather too thickly with these exotic flowers. The story in itself is good enough to stand without assistance of this kind, and the author knows enough of Spain (to say nothing of its language) to paint a life-like picture of that land of leisurely progress. Travellers intending to visit the country might do worse than take "Carpathia Knox" as a guide-book—and phrase-book. We are requested to note that the volume contains a photogravure portrait of the author. We have noted it.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The library world has much reason to be grateful to Mr. Frederick G. Horniman for his generous gift of land to the London County Council, including a vast museum and a library of 6,200 volumes, containing many rare editions. The library has previously been open to the public, but the books were inadequately housed.

Some months ago we noted that the Hampstead Library authorities had decided to erect an art gallery, and that, in the meanwhile, the Town-hall would be temporarily used for the purpose. A committee has now been appointed, including Sir L. Alma-Tadema, Mr. E. A. Storey, and the Hon. John Collier, to assist in choosing the works of art to be exhibited. In the lending libraries the age limit for children has been reduced from fourteen to twelve years. A new branch library for West-end will shortly be opened.

We have referred before to the work which the Bethnal-green Free Library is doing on insufficient means. The use made of it by the working people and poor of the district is probably greater in proportion than in any other London library. Series of lectures and free concerts are well attended, while a number of technical works are available for the artisans of the district. No institution is more worthy of support for the character and necessity of its work.

A most encouraging report comes from the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh. The number of items received last year was greater by 1,007 than the total for 1899 and more than 12,000 in advance of the accessions for 1890. The additions of works deal for the most part with the history and topography of Scotland. Some of them come from the Scottish local Press. They will in some cases replace works reported as "missing" from the library. In all 233 volumes of local interest were purchased at a cost of £40—not an extravagant outlay—and 3,329 ordnance and other maps were received.

There are signs of progress in the report of the Salford and Aberdeen Public Libraries. There is an inspiring account of additions to the art galleries and museum at Salford. The library and reading-room are used to an increasing extent, and the product of an extra halfpenny library rate is to be used in bringing the institutions into line with modern requirements. At Aberdeen a collection of works for the blind has been commenced with a stock of 132 volumes. The report also gives us a list of additions to the library, but it is arranged in a pseudo-alphabetical order which shows an amazing absence of method.

A good example of what may be done by voluntary aid has been shown us in Lancashire. The cost of building a new technical institute and public library at Old Trafford—£9,000—has been defrayed by subscribers. Only the expenses of maintenance will fall upon the rate.

The first number of a Quarterly Library Bulletin comes from the University of St. Andrews. Besides a record of the notes and news of the library, which should be useful, lists of books on special subjects will be given from time to time. The Quarterly is to take the place of the former annual catalogues.

To go further afield, the report of the San Francisco Public Library records a large increase in circulation. More than $15,000 have been spent on books and periodicals during the year.

English writers of to-day are treated with some contempt in the January number of Public Libraries (Chicago). In a list of the hundred best books of 1900—excluding fiction and foreign writers—England is responsible for about six out of the hundred—a striking testimony to the value of American literature in America. There is also a report of the annual meeting of State Librarians, a body for which in England we have no real equivalent.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.—II.

The latest claimant for notice is the Empire Review (1s. n.), edited by Mr. C. Kinloch Cooke, who has edited many other papers in his time, including the Observer, the Pall Mall Gazette, and the English Illustrated Magazine, and published by Messrs. Macmillan. The contributors to the first number are at least illustrious. "The British Empire"—a large subject—is summarily dealt with in three pages by the Duke of Devonshire. The Bishop of Calcutta follows on "The Church and the Empire," insisting that "a good understanding between them is desirable and even necessary." Then General Mackinnon has something to say about "The C.I.V.'s on Active Service," and Sir Charles Dilke about "Imperial Reserves"—mainly a suggestion for increasing and improving the Yeomanry. "Victoria as I left it" is the title of an article by Lord Brassey, and Sir Lepel Griffin relates his "Reminiscences of the Amir." Altogether a notable first number. If the standard can be kept up, a valuable periodical will result. A good permanent feature is a survey of the finance of the Empire, with tabulated lists of prices of Indian and Colonial Investments, including municipal as well as Government securities.

Longman's makes a hit with something original about the Boer War, viz., some "Notes on Reconnoitring in South Africa,"—a sort of hand-book of useful information (containing a vocabulary) for scouts, which conveys a very vivid picture of the country. Mr. Tallentyre continues with Madame de Staël his studies of "The Women of the Salons." Mr. John Isabell writes agreeably enough of "Fishes and their Ways."

The Anglo-Saxon Review (London, Mrs. Cornwallis-West, 49, Rupert-street) presents its seventh volume from a new publishing office. It further marks the departure by becoming more topical than formerly. "The Poetry of the South African Campaign," for example, is taken more notice of by Mr. Arthur Waugh than its merits deserve. Although the essayist very properly remarks that current criticism can never be final, we can hardly agree that it helps much towards a final judgment to record and analyse the circumstances of production. It can effect the final judgment upon poetry but slightly to know that Chatterton wrote in a garret and "Owen Meredith" in an Embassy. It is a dangerous criticism to assert that "the poetry of the present war has to be judged by the standards of literary excellence and the needs of the hour." Criticism according to these shifting standards can be but of small value. Mr. J. M. Bullock is topical only in the title of his article on "The Strange Christening of the Orange River." The article itself deals with the personal history of Colonel Robert Jacob Gordon, a Dutchman of Scots descent, who had discovered the river in 1777, and who, with Jacobus van Reenan, a typical Afrikaner, and William Paterson, a British officer, probably of Scots birth, pushed off in a little boat from the banks of the "Great River" on the night of August 17th, 1779, and christened the water "Orange River" in honour of William, the Hereditary Stadholder of the Netherlands, whose mother had been an English Princess. Mr. Clarence Rook deals sentimentally and, on the whole, fairly with "St. Patrick Hooligan," finds much saving grace in him, and maintains that the character which naturally breaks into lawlessness contains splendid possibilities. Not less topical than these articles is Mr. Arnold White's essay upon "England and America: Strangers Yet." It is not very hopeful reading for our quiet island firesides. "The British Empire," says Mr. White without an apparent quiver, "is 'soup' of which the rapidly expanding German nation hopes to partake in the good time that is coming, when the colonies of Britain will drop off like the elm leaves that sweep through the air in October." Mr. Arnold White does not consider that there is sufficient accurate information offered to the American people by English correspondents; he believes that Englishmen have yet much to learn as to the true feelings of Americans; he maintains that there should be sympathetic cooperation in regard to the question of the Irish Celt, and that there should be a recognition on both sides of the identity of commercial interests in maintaining the open door. It is an able if not exhaustive discussion of several important international questions. The present issue of the Anglo-Saxon Review is bound in a binding copied from that which covers the folio edition of Soriano's Messes, supposed to be unique, and now in the British Museum. If Mrs. Cornwallis-West's quarterly has done nothing greater it serves a most useful purpose in drawing the attention of publishers to the wealth of fine bindings to be found and copied—for the asking—in Bloomsbury.

The Nineteenth Century and After provides much matter for a hot brain. On the literary side Professor Posnett gives us a most remarkable account of "the masterpiece of the Chinese Drama," the play Pi-Pa-Ki, first performed at Peking in 1404, and Mr. George Moore pleads for "the soul of the Irish people." Mr. Moore is an interesting writer but hardly a convincing one, because he never quite thinks out his subject. He thinks that Irish is now much more pregnant with the seeds of good literature than English. His extracts hardly establish this proposition, nor does his reasoning. In one place he tells us that literature flourishes in "virgin languages"; in another, that it is small nations that produce poets. Whether a small nation without a virgin language is a favourable soil or not we do not make out; nor do we know whether Irish can properly be considered a virgin language. An important article is Dr. Robert Anderson's on the punishment of crime—for him the really essential thing is not so much to punish the habitual criminal but to get rid of him—by detention in an "asylum prison." But the article is too weighty and suggestive to summarize. The Gackwar of Baroda's account of his daily life is a fresh and entertaining item; and Dr. Smythe Palmer's argument that the Cherubim represent the winds is learned and ingenious. There are many other articles which should not be missed, as Mr. John Macdonell's on the Native Races of South Africa; Mr. A. R. Markham's on the Economic Outlook in the Transvaal; Col. Lonsdale Hale's on Home Defence; Mr. Herbert Paul's on Indulgences.

The Contemporary seems disinclined to let the new Liberal Review stand alone in its task of waging relentless war against the Government. Mr. Herbert Paul's article on "The Decline of the Government" is quite relentless enough for all practical purposes towards the Government in general and towards Mr. Chamberlain in particular. A strong defence of "Lord Wolseley as Commander-in-Chief," by an anonymous contributor, also seems intended to make the Government uncomfortable by the suggestion that Lord Wolseley has been made the victim for its blunders. The inevitable paper on Military Reform is by Colonel Maude; and Mr. Edmund Gosse draws the attention of English readers to the novels of Mr. René Bazin—a writer whose reputation stands high in his own country. He seems to be the one contemporary French novelist who is an artist and yet is not prurient—though some might place M. André Theuriet in the same category. "His Stories and Sketches," Mr. Gosse declares, "might have been read, had chronology permitted, by Mrs. Barbauld to Miss Hannah More. . . . With all this, they are not dull, or tiresome, or priggish. They preach no sermon, except a broad and wholesome amiability; they are possessed by no provoking propaganda of virtue. Simply, M. Bazin sees the beauty of domestic life in France, is fascinated by the charm of the national gaiety and courtesy, and does not attempt to look below the surface." Mr. Leslie Stephen's "English Utilitarians" is reviewed in the same number by Mr. William Graham.

It takes a man of Mr. Leslie Stephen's breadth of mind to write sympathetically about Emerson in the National Review after publishing a couple of tomes upon the utilitarians. No writer is further removed from Bentham or Mill, or, indeed, any philosopher who prided himself on a system, than Emerson. As Mr. Stephen says, "We are not to take his philosophy for a system of truth, but for a series of vivid intuitions." The writer also lays stress on the curious blend of mysticism and common sense in Emerson. Coming to matters of more immediate concern, Mr. H. W. Wilson pleads for large reinforcements in South Africa, and Captain Cairnes estimates the strength of our Army and Navy and finds it wanting. Mr. Conybeare once more takes up the cudgels for the Jews. In a powerful article on "Rumania as a Persecuting Power" he shows how badly the Rumanian Government have kept their promises to Europe touching the enfranchisement of all subjects, whatever their beliefs. But the most fascinating contribution is a paper called Mafia and Omertà, by Mr. Richard Bagot. The Mafia in Sicily, which most people imagine to be simply a secret society analogous to the Camorra of Naples, Mr. Bagot dignifies with the phrase "social growth in Sicily," and shows what a terrible hold the organization which led to the murder of Signor Notarbartolo has on the people in general. Mr. W. J. Ford's conclusion in his article "To Bowl or to Throw" seems to us very ill considered. Since a throw is so difficult to define, why not legalize it? This is Mr. Ford's argument. Surely this would deprive the "attack" in cricket of all its art.

Blackwood has a notable article by Colonel Henry Knollys on "Maladministration of Messes"—a suggestion towards a very desirable Army reform. The author shows how a coach and four may be driven through a sumptuary law:—

When Sir Hope Grant overcame the objections of Pall Mall and succeeded in initiating autumn manoeuvres, he endeavoured also to initiate a temporary abnegation of comforts among officers, and a frugality appropriate to this particular soldiering exercise, and limited his baggage to the regulation weight. His efforts were vain, because derelictions were countenanced, and even encouraged, by those against whom it was difficult to appeal. Certain regiments organized strings of nominally private traps, but really of contractor's transport, to move in their wake along public roads, with an audacity contemning concealment, and conveying supplies utterly inconsistent with the training of tent-life. Thus, while the general was contenting himself with chops and sherry, subalterns and captains within a stone's throw were revelling in delicacies provided by an expensive French cook, and in champagne and claret-cup, and their mess marquees were open to every rowdy Tom, Dick, and Harry who came touting to the site. The cost was, of course, enormous. In one case a single week's bill amounted to £70.

In the "Musings without Method" department there are some strong words on the subject of modern languages. Lord Rosebery, who insists upon them, is described as "haunted by more bogeys than any living statesman," and the Universities are implored to continue to exclude them from the curriculum.

Temple Bar, besides a good deal of fiction, has an article on the women of the days of Hannah More, and a pleasant reminiscence of Stevenson. But its best item is an extremely interesting and well-written article on St. Helena vividly describing the features and history of the island, and giving, what we have not had elsewhere, a graphic description of the life of the Boer prisoners.

In the United Service Magazine Colonel Maude continues his notes on the evolution of cavalry, and Judge O'Connor Morris adds a new instalment of his study of Frederick the Great. Captain Slessor, Adjutant to the Oxford University Volunteers, states the reasons why it seems desirable to get more University men into the Army, and discusses the difficulties at present thrown in their path. "Encourage the University candidate to remain on at his University and get the full benefit of it, for it is easy to add such technical science, or at least such knowledge of drill, as may be necessary for an officer when he has become one."

The Universal Magazine opens appropriately with a reprint of Miss Marie Corelli's "The Greatest Queen in the World," and the article which follows on "The Courtship of Holland's Queen" by Comrie Colquhoun gives the picture of a girl queen captivating her people which cannot fail to remind us of the early days of Queen Victoria. The "Immortal Forty" by Mr. Frederick Dolman reminds us that the French Academy is not simply an institution for refusing literary distinctions to great men. We hear too little of another side of its duties—the distributions of rewards for virtue. A brave fisherman stands his chance of an Academy prize as well as a rising novelist. Apparently there has not been time to take out the name of the Duc de Broglie from the list of titled members of the Academy. Mr. Hugh W. Strong gives us a graphic account of the encenia at Oxford when degrees were conferred on Mr. Cecil Rhodes and Lord Kitchener. The illustrations glow with academic splendour.

In the Magazine of Art, with Mr. Spielmann's study of Louis Morin, the article on that excellent landscapist E. M. Wimperis will attract attention. It contains four capital small reproductions from his work. The Art Journal has some excellent reproductions from Mr. J. J. Shannon's pictures in an article on that artist. This number is very varied in its contents, and devotes much space to decoration in articles on "Mere Ornament," "Art in the Church," and "Decorative Flower Studies" (finely illustrated). Another conspicuous feature is an exhaustive article by Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse on "The Equestrian Statue of King Charles at Charing-cross."

The Gentleman's Magazine has its usual programme of pleasant literary and antiquarian lore delightfully aloof from anything topical. The literary element is represented by a paper on Ford's plays, and another on Shakespeare's Dogs, which reveals the dramatist as an authority on dog lore. But the two best articles are an account of diplomatic etiquette in the seventeenth century, and a very interesting account of Rubinstein, who, though he died six years ago, has no adequate biography in English.

The feature of Cassell's Magazine is the second instalment of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "Kim." Every variety of fiction is also well represented by Mr. Max Pemberton, Mr. Lewis Baumer, Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe, and others. Some capital photographs of the chief streets in New York form a good background to some chatty remarks by Elizabeth L. Banks, and in the course of an unusually smooth journey across the Channel Mr. F. M. Holmes lets us in to some of the inner secrets of the Arundel, the latest addition to the Newhaven and Dieppe steamers.

We have already said something, in anticipation, of the contents of the New Century number of the Student, the Edinburgh University Magazine (Grant Richards, 6d.). It has all the merit, and no more, that might be expected from a collection of short pieces, printed in various type, written ad hoc, by well-known writers. To our mind the most interesting thing is Mr. J. W. Mackail's essay in translating the Odyssey into four-line stanzas, as thus:—

And now that island far amid the foam
Reaching, from out the violet sea he clomb,
Over the mainland, to the cavern great
Wherein the fair-tressed nymph had made her home.

The metre gets a little monotonous; but the version is thoroughly scholarly and full of Homer's archaic simplicity.

The Argosy is an improving magazine, and one that deserves encouragement for its brave avoidance of "trick" articles. Light travel papers have long been one of its specialities, and in the current issue there is an account of "A flying visit to Holland," by Mr. F. L. M. Davidson, with illustrations, that can be highly commended. There is also a good deal of fiction, the most notable contributor in this department being Mr. Eden Phillpotts.

The two most interesting papers in Sunday at Home both touch upon China. In an article on "The Relations Between the Nations" the late Bishop of London enforces the duty of the European conqueror to try and understand the heathen Chinese, and Mr. T. C. Collings gives us "China of To-day" from the point of view of the missionaries, after a talk with the quondam Light Blue Mr. Stanley P. Smith, and with the Rev. T. W. Goodall, of Chile. Besides the regular features of the magazine there is some well-chosen biographical matter.

With Mr. Warwick H. Draper's discussion of copyright legislation in the Law Quarterly many authors will disagree. "The plea," he writes, "for a perpetual or lengthy copyright is an insult to men of letters," and there would be a practical difficulty in "providing against the endless disputes of many claimants after two or three generations." The latter difficulty could be easily dealt with by means of some simple system of registration. The former point is one on which the men of letters do not themselves lay stress; and they are not likely to thank lawyers for insisting on it on their behalf. It may be true that the countries in which the duration of copyright is greatest are not the most civilized countries. China, where copyright is perpetual, is one of them. But it is also true that in all civilized countries, the tendency of legislation is to extend and not to contract the rights of authors.

The Northern Counties Magazine well preserves the balance between local research and lively local colouring. While Mr. Walter Wood continues his short histories of Famous Northern Regiments with "The West Yorkshire," and Mr. G. M. Trevelyan writes on "The Last Rising of the North, 1715," in "Hirings in the Dales" Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe introduces us to a picturesque scene that may be still witnessed in the otherwise sleepy little village of Kettlewell. Dr. E. M. Provost laments the growing disuse of the Northern dialects, and as if to reassure us Mr. B. Kirby gives us a dialect sketch of a Westmorland Parish Council which is quite sufficiently unintelligible to the Southerner. The romantic element in the North is safe in the hands of Mr. Wilfrid Wilson Gibson, who sings a stirring ballad on the sanguinary fate of Hermaunce, King of the Red City. Mr. E. V. Lucas' capital literary comments are continued.

The Poster and Art Collector appears in an enlarged form with the January issue. It is larger in size and somewhat broader in scope, and promises, under the editorship of Mr. Charles Hiatt, to be more than an ephemeral commentary upon the short-lived craze of poster collecting. Mr. Hiatt talks pleasantly about Pictorial Book Advertisements in America and concerning the Oxford University Press bindings; there are some historically interesting examples of the huge painted advertisements which hung outside the booths and purported to depict the marvels that were within at Bartholomew Fair; and a few specimens of placards taken from paintings by the old Dutch masters. The illustrations are good examples of modern "process" and unusually well printed.

The Genealogical Magazine contains a criticism of the Heraldry of the Lyceum Henry V., which will interest antiquarians, who will, however, we hope, remember that heraldic exactness has not much to do with drama.

The School World has an admirable feature in its notes on Recent Historical Novels—with, this month, a good comment on "Richard Yea and Nay." Many such books have real educational value, but teachers want a guide to them.

The House contains an article which our readers will find interesting on "Molière and his Birthplace." The illustrations are excellent.

Correspondence.

"THE STRANGE WOOING OF MARY BOWLER." TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you allow me to state that my story "The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler," which I have just seen that Messrs. Pearson are announcing as an "Important New Six Shilling Novel," was issued by them in 1894 at 6d. as No. 4 of "Pearson's Library?" As the work is not my property I have no control over it.

I have frequently been the victim of this kind of thing. During the last year or two work of mine which appeared in print twelve years ago has been brought out as new. The impression has consequently grown up that I flood the market with books turned out by machinery. As a matter of fact since I finished "The Beetle" in the spring of 1896 I have not written on an average one novel a year.

An author can have no reasonable objection to the production of fresh editions of his books; but he has every right to protest against his old work being issued by owners of copyright as if it were new.

It is unfair to the public; to the reviewers; and to the writer himself.

Faithfully yours,

RICHARD MARSH.

Three Bridges, Sussex, Feb. 2nd.

"A" WAS AN ARCHER. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—If it is true that one year's Christmas books are no sooner out than the next are in preparation, now is the time for some influential paper to draw the attention of the many talented artists who illustrate children's books to a neglected nursery classic.

For many years I have vainly tried at intervals to get a good illustrated edition of "A was an Archer, &c." Once a friend sent me a horrible garbled version in which the "Esquire with pride on his brow," became "an Engineer getting up steam!"—and the Drunkard, whose complexion was such an awful warning in my youth, "a Drover, who drove on apace" (very bad for the animals under his charge, by the way).

If the three-year-old I have to cater for is a fair sample of his generation, children do like the good old rhymes, appropriately illustrated, better than the drivel written up to the prettily coloured but often incorrectly drawn "Our Farm Friends," "Toyland Alphabet," and such like. At least he always asks for R. Caldecott's "House that Jack built" and "Song o' Sixpence." Whether an artist's turn is for the comic, the graceful, or the gruesome, the old alphabet gives him ample opportunity.

Yours faithfully,

A. G.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

New biographies of the late Queen—or, rather, old biographies revived and brought up to date—have just lately been the only features worth noting in the book trade, apart from the inevitable run on the revised edition of the Prayer Book. It is hardly likely that the national mourning will seriously affect book sales, though some curious speculations are being made as to its influence on current literary taste. For a time, perhaps, readers may turn from lighter literature to books of a more serious character. Fiction has had a good innings, and one authority who is always quick to detect the tendencies of the trade has told us that novels, in his opinion, would play a less important part in the book market this year than they did last year. Biographical works he thinks—as we suggested a few weeks ago—will be the chief feature of the current year; and for the spring, at least, he anticipates a smaller output from the publishers than usual. The publishers are, nevertheless, announcing some dozens of novels by more or less well-known authors; but how many will make their appearance during the spring remains to be seen.

Here is a preliminary list of some novels already promised:—

"Mononia: A Love Story of 1848." By Justin McCarthy.

"The Church of Humanity." By David Christie Murray.

"The Adventures of a Merry Monarch." By Robert Barr.

"As a Watch in the Night." By Mrs. Campbell Praed.

(Chatto and Windus.)

"The Eternal Quest." By John A. Steuart. (Hutchinson.)

"Mistress Barbara Cunliffe (The Combers)." By Halliwell Sutcliffe.

"The Wizard's Knot." By William Barry.

"By Rock and Pool." By Louis Becke.

"Sister Theresa." By George Moore.

"Among the Syringas." By Mary E. Mann.

"A Jilt's Journal." By Rita.

(Fisher Unwin.)

"The Sacred Fount." By Henry James.

"The Frobishers." By S. Baring-Gould.

"A Narrow Way." By Mary Findlater.

"The Supreme Crime." By Dorothea Gerard.

"Belinda Fitzwarren." By the Earl of Idlesleigh.

"Prince Rupert the Buccaneer." By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne.

"The Third Floor." By Mrs. Dudeney.

"The Adventures of Princess Sylvia." By Mrs. C. N. Williamson.

(Methuen.)

"Once Too Often." By Florence Warden.

"The Royal Sisters." By Frank Mathew.

"Plato's Handmaiden." By Lucas Cleeve.

(J. Long.)

"Anne Mainwaring." By Lady Ridley.

"Pastorals of Dorset." By M. E. Francis.

(Longmans.)

"The Silver Skull." By S. R. Crockett. (Smith, Elder.)

"The Wings of the Morning." By Helen V. Savile.

(Sonnenschein.)

Other novels are expected from Mr. Richard Whiteing, Mr. Francis Gribble, Mr. J. S. Fletcher, Mr. Clark Russell (two), Mrs. Woods, Mrs. Lovett Cameron, and Miss Marie Corelli (a tale of considerable length, but not so long as "The Master Christian"). Miss Corelli is publishing two other books with Messrs. Methuen, one being a tribute to Queen Victoria, entitled "The Passing of the Great Queen," and the other a collection of stories of child life, entitled "The Book of Little Children."

Mr. John Cordy Jeaffreson did not long survive the Sovereign whose life—"Victoria, Queen and Empress"—he published (with Mr. Heinemann) in two volumes in 1893. But most of his books appeared through Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, and nearly all of these—including his "Book of Recollections," and his "Books About" the clergy, lawyers and doctors—are out of print. "The Real Lord Byron" can still be obtained in the one-volume edition, with the preface on the heated controversy which the publication of his book aroused. The only other work by Mr. Jeaffreson of which copies can still be obtained through Messrs. Hurst and Blackett is his "Lady Hamilton and Lord Nelson"—a new and revised edition in one volume. His "Middlesex County Records," in four volumes, was published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

The council of the Publishers' Association, at a special meeting convened by the president, Mr. Frederick Macmillan, adopted and forwarded the following resolutions to the Secretary of State for the Home Department:—

The council of the Publishers' Association, on behalf of the publishing trade of Great Britain and Ireland, desire to give expression to their profound sorrow at the loss which the nation and the Empire have sustained by the lamented death of her Majesty Queen Victoria, and to offer to his Majesty the King and the Royal Family their respectful sympathy in their great bereavement; the council of the Publishers' Association humbly and sincerely tender their dutiful congratulations to his Majesty King Edward VII. on his accession to the Throne of this great Empire, and assure him of their loyal wishes for the happiness and prosperity of his reign.

Mr. L. S. Amery writes to The Times :—

May I, like Colonel Henderson, claim for "The Times History of the War" the courtesy of your columns to ask officers and others who have been out in South Africa to be kind enough to help me with any information at their disposal or to lend me, for strictly confidential use, any letters, diaries, or sketches which may serve to supplement or correct the necessarily hasty or one-sided accounts that appeared at the time of the events themselves or in the books hitherto published? Such help would be valuable for every part of the campaign, but more especially so for its later period with regard to which, owing to the peculiar character of the operations, very little accurate or detailed information has yet been made public.

That exquisite draughtsman Daniel Vierge has prepared over a hundred plates for a limited edition of Querredo's masterpiece, "Pablo de Sergovie," a new translation of which has been made into French by MM. J. and H. Rosny. The original drawings have just been put on view at George Petit's Gallery, in Paris, and are attracting great attention. Vierge, whose entire right side has been paralysed since 1880, has learned to work with his left hand, and the drawings he has thus executed are not inferior to his former work. "Pablo de Sergovie" is to be published by M. Vierge at No. 20, Rue Gutenberg, Boulogne-sur-Seine.

"The Life of William Pitt," which is to be added by Messrs. Putnams to "The Heroes of the Nations" Series next month, ought to supply a real want. Besides some memoirs of the eighteenth century, Francis Thackeray wrote a history of the Earl of Chatham in 1827, and there are one or two volumes of anecdotes, and also the Chatham Correspondence. But there is no really adequate life of the statesman who had so much to do with "the growth and division of the British Empire," a phrase which forms the sub-title of the new memoir. Another volume of the same series is to deal with Owen Glyndwr.

The history of the "Campaigns of the Derbyshire Regiment" (Sonnenschein) will now need a sixth volume, as the old 95th has been heavily engaged in the South African campaign. Meantime the volume dealing with the Egyptian campaign of 1882 is announced, written by Major E. A. G. Gosset, with an introduction by Colonel Smith-Dorrien. Among the other works coming from Messrs. Sonnenschein are three new volumes for their Library of Philosophy—Professor E. Albee's "History of Utilitarianism," Hegel's "Phenomenology of the Spirit," translated by J. B. Baillie, and Dr. Max Heinze's "History of Contemporary Philosophy," translated by Professor William Hammond, of Cornell—"King Marchaunt and his Ragamuffin: An Allegory Concerning Universities," by Helier Bumstead; two volumes in the new series of "Standard Plays for Amateur Performance in Girls' School"—Euripides' "Alkestis" and Sophocles' "Antigone"—"The Specious Present," a metaphysical treatise by Alfred Hodder; "The Kingdom of Love," an essay on problems of the day, by Z. H. Lewis; "Physiological Psychology," translated from the fourth German edition by Professor E. B. Titchener (two vols.), and "Sports, Athletics, and Training," adapted from the German of Dr. Schmidt by Eustace H. Miles, M.A., the amateur tennis champion of England.

Captain H. H. P. Deasy's record of three years' exploration "In Tibet and Chinese Turkestan," announced by Mr. Fisher Unwin last August, will be ready this spring. Captain Deasy was presented with the Founder's Gold Medal of the Royal Geographical Society last year. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's "Fifty Years of Catholic Life and Progress" is in the press and will be issued by the same publisher shortly. Among the other books announced in Mr. Unwin's new list are a collection of essays by Canon Jessopp under the title of "Before the Great Pillage"—mainly concerned with parochial and church life in England before the Reformation—"Meanings and Methods of Spiritual Life," a series of eighteen sermons by Henry W. Clark; "As the Chinese See Us," by the Rev. T. G. Selby; "Hoch der Kaiser: Myself und Gott," the humorous poem on the German Emperor—from the United States—by A. McGregor Rose, illustrated by Jessie A. Walker; "Another Englishwoman's Love Letters," by Barry Pain; and "The Book of the Cheese: Being Traits and Stories of 'Ye Olde Cheshire Cheese,' Wine Office Court, Fleet Street," by the late T. W. Reid, revised, and illustrated by Seymour Lucas, Joseph Pennell, &c.

The American Bookman finds readers in England, and it is therefore, perhaps, as well to say that there is no truth in its statement that Mr. Maurice Hewlett's next novel will be called "The Tuscan Crown" and deal with Florence at the height of her greatness.

A Life of Sir Edward Burne-Jones is, so the Bookman says, being written by Lady Burne-Jones.

MM. Calmann Lévy are now publishing the new volume by M. Anatole France, "Monsieur Bergeret à Paris," and a study by Comte d'Haussonville of "La Duchesse de Bourgogne" which has appeared serially in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and is the second volume of a work already noticed by us. We are to have soon also the fourth volume of the "Theatre" of Meilhac and Halévy.

Messrs. Skeffington announce a book entitled "Scriptural and Catholic Truth and Worship," written, at the request of "The Ladies' League," by the Rev. Canon F. Meyrick.

The Scottish publishers Messrs. Frederick W. Wilson and Co. announce a volume entitled "Frivolous Glasgow," by Mr. William Ernest Cameron. It will be illustrated.

Mr. Lane announces another collection of stories by Baron Corvo, under the title of "Mortal Immortals," being a continuation of "Stories Toto Told Me."

Books to look out for at once.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY—
"Occasional Essays on Native South Indian Life." By Stanley P. Rice, I.C.S. Longmans. 10s. 6d.

"French Life in Town and Country." By Hannah Lynch. Newnes. 3s. 6d. net.

[The first volume of "Our Neighbours" Series.]

"Falaise, the Town of the Conqueror." By Anna B. Dodd. Unwin. 7s. 6d.

"Mount Orni and Beyond." By A. J. Little. Heinemann. 10s. net.

"The Highland Tay from Tyndrum to Dunkeld." By Hugh Macmillan. Virtue. 15s. net.

THEOLOGY—
"Atonement and Personality." By Professor R. C. Moberly. Murray. 14s.
"The Teacher's Commentary on the Gospel according to St. Mark." By F. R. Peloubert. Oxford Univ. Press. 5s.

BIOGRAPHY—
"The Countess Cosel." By J. J. Kraszewski. Translated from the Polish by S. C. de Soissons. Downey. 10s. 6d. net.
[A Picture of the Court of Augustus the Strong of Saxony.]

POETRY—
"A Life for Love and other Poems." By J. A. Langford. Simpkin. 3s. 6d. net.
"Village Life and Feeling." By "Rupert Upperton." Greening. 6s.
[Humorous verse, by a vicar in one of the Midland counties.]

FICTION—
"According to Plato." By F. F. Moore. Hutchinson. 6s.
"The Sacred Fount." By Henry James. Methuen. 6s.
"Street Dust and other Stories." By Ouida. F. V. White. 3s. 6d.
"A Soldier for a Day." By E. Spender. F. V. White. 6s.
"A Syndicate of Sinners." By Gertrude Warden. Digby, Long. 6s.
"Veronica Verdant: her Vanities." By Mina Sandeman. Long. 6s.
"Ray's Daughter." By C. King. Lippincott. 6s.
"The Monster and other Stories." By Stephen Crane. Harper. 5s.
"The Tapu of Banderah" and other Stories. By Louis Becke and Walter Jeffery. Pearson. 6s.
"The Black Tortoise." By F. Villier. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.

SOUTH AFRICA AND CHINA—
"Ten Months in the Field with the Boers." By De V. Mareuil. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.
"The Real Chinese Question." By Chester Holcombe. Methuen. 6s.
[Mr. Holcombe was for some years connected with the Legation in Peking, and he endorses Sir Robert Hart's views.]

EDUCATIONAL—
"Demoethenes, De Corona." Edited by Prof. W. W. Goodwin, of Harvard. Cambridge Univ. Press. 12s. 6d.
"Advanced Exercises in Practical Physics." By Prof. Arthur Schuster and Charles Lees. Cambridge Univ. Press. 8s.

MISCELLANEOUS—
"The New Platonists: A Study in the History of Hellenism." By T. Whittaker. Cambridge Univ. Press. 7s. 6d.
"The Jātaka." Edited by Prof. E. B. Cowell. Cambridge Univ. Press. 12s. 6d. net.

[The fourth volume—by W. H. D. Rouse—of the translation of the Pali Jātaka, which is to fill six or seven volumes.]
"Alpine Plants." By W. A. Clark. L. U. Gill. 3s. 6d. net.
"Glimpses of English History." By F. M. Allen. Downey. 3s. 6d.
[A book of humour. Illustrated by J. F. Sullivan.]

NEW EDITIONS—
"Pride and Prejudice." By Jane Austen. Edited by E. V. Lucas. Methuen. Two vols. 1s. 6d. net and 2s. 6d. net each.
[The Little Library Series.]
"In the Midst of Alarm." By Robert Barr. Methuen. 6d.
[No. 19 in "The Novelist" Series.]
"Kolokotronis: Klepht and Warrior." Translated from the Greek by Mrs. Edmonds, with an introduction by H. Gennadius. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.
[No. 12 in "The Adventure" Series.]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

- Victoria the Good. New Ed. By Clare Jerrold. 7½x5in., 118 pp. Jarrold. 1s.
- Alfred, the West Saxon King of the English. (Saintly Lives). By D. Macfadyen. 8x5½in., 378 pp. Dent. 4s. 6d.
- The Letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. 2 vols. Ed. by Stdney Colvin. 8x5½in., 375+389 pp. Methuen. 12s.
- Mémoires du Général d'Andigné. Publiés avec Introduction et Notes. By Ed. Bire. Vol. II. 1765-1867. 9x5½in., 434 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr.7.50.
- Correspondance Intime du Général Jean Hardy de 1797 à 1802. Recueillis par son petit-fils le Général Hardy de Perrini. Avec un Portrait. 7½x4½in., 300 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr.3.50.

CLASSICAL.

- Plato: The Apology of Socrates. Trans. by D. F. Nevill. 6½x4½in., 85 pp. Robinson. 1s. 6d. n.
- The Idylls of Theocritus. Trans. into English Verse by J. H. Hallard. 8½x6½in., 144 pp. Rivington. 5s.

DRAMA.

- War. A Play in Three Acts. By W. Heinemann. 8½x6½in., 123 pp. Lane. 3s. 6d. n.

ECONOMICS.

- The Industrial Revolution. By C. Beard. 7½x5in., 105 pp. Sonnenschein. 1s. n.
- Elements of Statistics. By A. L. Bowley. F.S.S. 8½x5½in., 330 pp. King. 10s. 6d. n.

EDUCATIONAL.

- Preparatory German Lessons. By S. E. Bally. 6½x4½in., 103 pp. Allman. 9d.
- Shakespeare: Henry the Fifth. Ed. by J. Lees. 7½x5in., 135 pp. Allman. 1s.
- Questions on Shakespeare. "King Henry V." By J. Lees. 7x5in., 94 pp. Allman. 2s. 6d.
- Practical Book-Keeping. By W. D. Oldham and W. E. Holland. 7x5in., 124 pp. Allman. 2s.
- New Methods of Education. (Students' Ed.) By J. L. Tadd. 9½x7in., 352 pp. Sampson Low. 8s. 6d. n.
- School Grammar of Modern French. By G. H. Clarke and C. J. Murray. 7½x5in., 370 pp. Dent. 3s. 6d. n.

FICTION.

- The Prettiness of Fools. By E. Hewitt. 7½x5in., 351 pp. Greening. 6s.
- The After-Taste. By Compton Reade. 7½x5in., 308 pp. Greening. 6s.
- A Wayside Weed. By A. F. Slade. 7½x5in., 376 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.
- Quality Corner. By C. L. Antrobus. 7½x5in., 367 pp. Chatto. 6s.
- The Believing Bishop. By H. Bates. 7½x5in., 280 pp. Allen. 6s.
- The Lost Land. By Julia M. Crotchie. 7½x5in., 266 pp. Unwin. 6s.
- Naomi's Exodus. By Lily H. Montagu. 7½x5in., 208 pp. Unwin. 3s. 6d.
- Courtisane. By Maxime Formont. 7½x5in., 242 pp. Paris. Lemerre. Fr.3.50.
- Hania. By H. Sienkiewicz. Traduit du Polonais par Henri Chirrol. 7½x4½in., 286 pp. Paris. Calmann Lévy. Fr.3.50.
- Au Coin d'une Dot. By Leon de Tinscau. 7½x4½in., 357 pp. Paris. Calmann Lévy. Fr.3.50.

HISTORY.

- A Century of Scottish History 2 vols. By Sir H. Craik. K.C.B. 9x6in., 486+472 pp. Blackwood. 30s. n.
- Speeches of Oliver Cromwell. 1644-1658. Ed. by C. L. Stainer. 7½x5in., 429 pp. Frowde. 6s.
- The Men who Made the Nation. An Outline of United States History from 1790 to 1863. By E. E. Sparks. Ph.D. 7½x5in., 415 pp. The Macmillan Co. 8s. 6d.

- China: Her History, &c. By E. H. Parker. 8½x5½in., 332 pp. Murray. 6s. n.
- Essai d'une Psychologie Politique du Peuple Anglais au XIXe Siècle. By Emile Boutney, Membre de l'Institut. 7½x4½in., 455 pp. Paris. Colin. Fr.3.50.
- La Noblesse Française sous Richelieu. By the Vicomte G. d'Avenel. 7½x4½in., 360 pp. Paris. Colin. Fr.3.50.
- Histoire de la Guerre Franco-Allemande. 1870-71. Illustré de 110 Portraits et de 32 Cartes et Plans. By Amedée Le Faure. Nouvelle Ed. revue et annotée par Désiré Lacroix. Tome I. 7½x4½in., 488 pp. Paris. Garnier. Fr.3.50.
- Les Amazones. By Paul Lacour. 7½x4½in., 306 pp. Paris. Perrin. Fr.3.50.
- Paris de 1800 à 1900. By Charles Simon. Part II. 11x7½in., 126 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr.1.75.
- La Duchesse de Bourgogne et l'Alliance Savoyarde sous Louis XIV. Les Années Heureuses et la Rupture de l'Alliance. By Comte d'Haussonville de l'Académie Française. 9x5½in., 476 pp. Paris. Calmann Lévy. Fr.7.50.

MILITARY.

- From Capetown to Ladysmith and Egypt in 1898. By G. W. Stevens. (Memorial Ed.) Ed. by V. Blackburn. 7½x5½in., 347 pp. Blackwood. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Ideals in Ireland. Ed. by Lady Gregory. 7½x5½in., 107 pp. Unicorn Press. 3s. 6d. n.

PHILOSOPHY.

- Greek Thinkers. A History of Ancient Philosophy. By T. Gomperz. Trans. by Laurie Magnus. 9x6in., 610 pp. Murray. 14s. n.

POETRY.

- A Life for Love. and other Poems. By J. A. Langford. 7½x4½in., 131 pp. Birmingham: Taylor. London: Simpkin.

REPRINTS.

- The Works of Lord Byron. (Letters and Journals, Vol. V.) Ed. by R. E. Prothero. 8½x5½in., 607 pp. Murray. 6s.
- The Paston Letters. 4 vols. Ed. by J. Gairdner. 7½x5½in. Constable. 21s. n.
- The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living. By Jeremy Taylor. (Temple Classics.) 6x4in., 263+206 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d. n. each vol.
- Voces Populi. (Reprinted from "Punch.") By F. Anstey. 2nd Series. 7½x5in., 272 pp. Longmans. 3s. n.

SPORT.

- The Wildfowler in Scotland. By J. G. Millais. F.Z.S., &c. 12½x10in., 167 pp. Longmans. 30s. n.

THEOLOGY.

- Handbooks to the Bible and Prayer Book. Vol. I.—The Pentateuch. By the Rev. H. C. Batterbury. 7½x5in., 291 pp. Rivington. 2s. 6d.
- The Books of the Bible: Genesis. (Rivington's Edition.) Ed. by Rev. T. C. Fry. D.D. 7x4½in., 140 pp. Rivington. 1s. 6d.
- Sermons on Faith and Doctrine. By the late Benjamin Jowett. Ed. by W. H. Fremantle. D.D. 7½x5in., 354 pp. Murray. 7s. 6d.
- Two Lectures on the Gospels. By F. C. Burkitt. 7½x5in., 94 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. n.
- Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament. By G. A. Smith. D.D. 8½x5½in., 325 pp. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

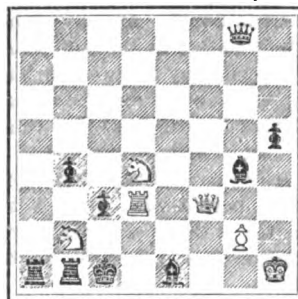

TRAVEL.

- Abyssinia. By H. Vivian. 8½x5½in., 251 pp. Pearson. 15s.
- Helwan and the Egyptian Desert. By W. Page Maugham. M.D., &c. 6½x4½in., 94 pp. Allen. 3s.
- Pages from the Journal of a Queensland Squatter. By Oscar de Satge. 9x6in., 416 pp. Hurst & Blackett. 10s. 6d. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXXV.
By J. V. MARIK, Bohemia.
BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 6 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CXXVI.
By BLAZEJ STRITECKY, Bohemia.
BLACK. 10 pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.
White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 127, by Karl Kondelik, Bohemia.—White (4 pieces)—K at Q Kt 6; Q at K R 7; R at Q Kt 5; pawn at Q Kt 4. Black (6 pieces)—K at Q R sq; Q at Q B sq; pawns at K B 4, Q 2, Q 3, Q 4. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 128, by V. Kosek, Bohemia.—White (4 pieces)—K at Q B 4; B at Q B 3; Kt at Q R 3; pawn at Q Kt 3. Black (4 pieces)—K at Q R 8; R at Q Kt 7; pawns at Q R 5, Q R 7. White to play and win.

Above problems are from the new issue of Sachov Listy, the Bohemian chess magazine in which the celebrated problemists issue their productions.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem No. 100, Wainwright (2), R×Q P. No. 110, Meyer (3), author's key, Q—K 2, but defective. No. 111, Troitzky, White wins by 1. R—K 2 ch, P×R; 2. Q×P ch, K—Q 4; 3. Q—Kt 5 ch, K—K 5; 4. Q—Q 3 ch, K—K 4; 5. Q—Q 4 ch and wins the Kt with ch next move. No. 112, Hawkins (2), R—Q B 2. No. 113, Meyer (3), key, Q—K Kt 3, threatening Kt—K 3 ch, &c. No. 114, Troitzky, White wins by 1. P—Q 7, Kt—B 3; 2. Kt—Kt 4, R—Q 7; 3. Kt—B 6, Kt—K 2; 4. K—Kt sq, P—Kt 4; 5. K—Bsq, R—Q 5; 6. K—B 2, P—Kt 5; 7. R—Kt 4 and wins. No. 115, Mackenzie, White wins by 1. P—K 4 threatening 2. P×P ch, Q×P; 3. Kt×Q, &c. The win is forced in a few moves. No. 116, Kosek (2), B—Q B 4. No. 117, Kosek, defective. No. 118, Behting, 1. P—K 7, K—B 2; 2. K—B 3, K—K sq; 3. K—K 4, P—B 4; 4. K—Q 5, &c., soon winning by obvious play. No. 119, Neustadt, A.C.W. suggests 1. B—Kt 5, B×B; 2. P×P ch, K×P; 3. P—R 5, P—B 4; 4. P—Kt 5, &c. This is probably the author's key, but that is not yet published. No. 120, Cardoza (2), R×Q P. No. 121, Kondelik (3), 1. Q—K B 8, threatening 2. Q×B ch, &c. Ending A.—The true key is 1. Q×R ch, P×Q; 2. B—B 2, &c., mating easily, but Mr. Waters sends Kt—B 2 ch, which appears an easy win also.

Correct Solutions received by Saturday last:—J. D. Tucker (Ilkley), 108, 109, 112, 116, 117; R. E. Strong (Bletchley), 107, 111, 114; M. A. Spooner (Guildford), 106, 108, 116; S. R. M. (Hampstead), 104, 107, 115, 118, 120; D.A.S. (Dunlop Bridge), 102 to 107 and Ending Miles v. Biggs; A.C.W. (Bromley), 106 to 121 and Ending A, Jan. 26; Otto Würzburg (Michigan), 101 to 113; R. M. Osmond (Salisbury), 104, 107.

GAME No. LXII.—The following is another specimen of the recent play of Lipschütz. It was played in the New York tourney:—

IRREGULAR GAME.
WHITE.		BLACK.
S. Lipschütz.		F. J. Marshall.
1. P—K 4	P—K 4	28. P—Q 5	K—B 2
2. Kt—K B 3	Kt—K B 3	29. B—B 3	K—K B sq
3. Kt—B 3	B—Kt 5	30. B—K sq	R×B
4. Kt×P	Castles	31. R×R	R—K sq
5. B—B 4	Q—K 2	32. R×R	B×R
6. Kt—B 3	B×Kt	33. B—Q 4	P—Kt 3
7. Q×P ch	Q×P ch	34. P—Kt 4	K—K 2
8. Q—K 2	Q×Q ch	35. K—B 4	Kt—Kt sq
9. B×Q	R—K sq	36. P—B 4	K—B 2
10. P—K R 3	Kt—B 3	37. P—B 5	Kt—K 2
11. Kt—Q 4	Kt×Kt	38. P—B 6	Kt—B sq
12. P×Kt	P—Q 3	39. K—Kt 5	P—QR 3
13. P—Q B 4	Kt—K 5	40. B—Q B 2	R—Q 2
14. B—B 4	B—Q 2	41. P—B 4	P—QR 4
15. P—B 3	R—K 3	42. P×P	P×P
16. R—Q B sq	QR—K sq	43. B—B 3	Kt—Kt 3
17. Cast	Kt—B 3	44. B×M P	B×R P
18. B—Q 3	Kt—R 4	45. B×R	Kt×B
19. B—B 2	P—K B 4	46. P×P	Kt—B 4
20. P—K Kt 4	P×P	47. K—B 4	Kt—Q 6 ch
21. R×P	R—K 6	48. K—K 4	Kt—K 4
22. Q—R—Q sq	Kt—B 3	49. P—B 5	Kt×P
23. B—B 4	R(K 6)—K 2	50. B×P	Kt×P ch
24. K—B 2	R—B 2	51. K—Q 4	Kt—K sq
25. K—Kt 3	R(B 2)—K 2	52. B—B 4	K—K 2
26. R—K R sq	P—K Kt 3	53. P—B 6	Kt—Q 3
27. B—Q 2	K—Kt 2	54. K—B 5 and wins.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 174. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	111, 112
PERSONAL VIEWS—"On the Alleged Importance of Walt Whitman," by S. K. Ratcliffe.....	113
POEM—"Victoria," by Charles Camp Tarelli	113
THE GOLDEN BOUGH	115
FOREIGN LETTER—Russia	115
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley.....	117
REVIEWS—
A Century of Scottish History	117
Algernon Charles Swinburne	119
The Rulers of the South	119
From Cape to Cairo.....	120
The Voyage of Robert Dudley—The Narrative of General Venables— L'Empire Libéral—Le Prince de Bismarck—Bismarck—Le Prince de Bismarck—Ideals in Ireland—Ten Months in the Field with the Boers—Paris in its Splendour—Our Naval Heroes—Ships and Havens—Le Second Empire—Napoleon III. at the Height of his Power—Under England's Flag—By Land and Sky—Madagascar, Mauritius, and Other East African Islands—Abyssinia—The Language of Handwriting—Reprints, &c. 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126
Verity—In the Palace of the King—A Hero of Romance—The Duke—The Man with the Parrots—The Inimitable Mrs. Massingham	126, 127
ART NOTES	126
CORRESPONDENCE—Decadent Metres (Mr. C. C. Tarelli)—The Split Infinitive—"A Apple Pie," &c.—Central Circulating Library for Working Girls' Clubs and Kindred Associations (The Librarian) ..	127
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for... ..	128, 129
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	129

NOTES OF THE DAY.

It is seventy-five years to-day since Lindley Murray died, and though his great work, like the Eton Latin Grammar, no longer holds the place it once did, the very multiplicity of modern manuals gives it a lonely pre-eminence. Is it, perhaps, a tribute to his long sway that few questions arouse more interest than some small point of grammatical impropriety, or misuse of language, such as that on which we publish a letter in another column? Lindley Murray was colonial born. He was a Quaker of Pennsylvania, and his famous grammar was written for the Friends' School for Girls at York. He was author of other works besides the grammar; he wrote "Some Account of the Life of Sarah Grubb" and a book on "The Power of Religion in the Mind," which ran through a score of editions and was translated into French.

The Society of Authors reports progress. During the twelvemonth the secretary has written over 1,000 letters of legal advice, and has handled 135 cases. Of these thirty-eight were for the recovery of MSS. Improperly detained, forty for the recovery of money due, and nineteen for the delivery of accounts not rendered. The society has also been engaged in eleven bankruptcy cases and five cases of infringement of copyright. One of the latter is interesting, as showing the wide range of the society's usefulness. A novel of Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne's running serially in an English magazine took the fancy of the editor of the Spanish magazine, Por Esos Mundos. He reprinted it, and refused to pay for it. The secretary of the society approached him through the Spanish Consul-General, to whom the editor condescended to explain that "he considered the purchase of the blocks included the purchase of the text." Then the British Consul at Madrid was written to. He recommended a Spanish lawyer, who took the matter in hand, threatened proceedings, and obtained an offer of settlement which was accepted. An author acting independently of the society would probably have found it impossible to enforce his demands without more trouble and outlay than the gain was worth.

Dr. Murray has lost one of his most valued helpers in connexion with the "Oxford English Dictionary" by the death of Dr. Fitzedward Hall. Dr. Hall worked hard and unselfishly in reading and collecting materials before the preparation of the Dictionary in its present form was begun in 1879, and his later labours were still more valuable. Dr. Murray, in the preface to the first volume of the Dictionary, thanks the scholars who assisted him. "And first of all," he continues, "and above all others, Mr. Fitzedward Hall, D.C.L., who, as a voluntary and gratuitous service to the history of the English language, has devoted four hours daily to a critical examination of the proof sheets, whether in the vocabulary or the quotations." Dr. Hall, he says, puts the whole wealth of references which he had collected at the service of the Dictionary. Dr. Hall's "Modern English" was published by Messrs. Kegan Paul as far back as 1870 and has long been out of print.

Thackeray figures in at least two lists of announcements. "Thackeray," by Mr. Charles Whibley, is to be the next volume in Blackwood's series of Modern English Writers, and Messrs. Hutchinson announce the long promised volume of Thackeray's "Stray Papers: Being Stories, Reviews, Verses, and Sketches (1821-1847)." The collection has been edited by Mr. Lewis Melville.

Much stir is being made in Paris over the appearance of the second volume, entitled "Les Tronçons du Glaive," in M. Paul et Victor Margueritte's series of historical novels begun last year by "Le Désastre." This stir is to a certain extent due to generous log-rolling, but for the most part it is justified. Not that it is a successful historical novel; in this respect it is certainly inferior to "La Débâcle." As M. René Doumic has said in the Débats:—"The portion open to criticism . . . is that which proceeds solely from the art of the novelist. The drama of the agonizing patrie the authors have framed in the private drama of imaginary personages created by them. There are marriages, births, separations, private sorrows, and it is incredible how insensible we remain to these trifling matters." The heroes of this tale are not the creations of the brothers Margueritte, but the familiar actors in the great drama of the National Defence. As fiction the work is a failure. This does not prevent it from being an extraordinarily well-written book, and even a contribution to the history of France in 1870 and 1871. Chanzy and Gambetta are the protagonists of the drama, and if there be a unifying conception in their book it is that France, had she been better aware of her opportunity, might, like the Boers, have astonished the world by the prolongation of her resistance, and eventually, perhaps, fatigued the Germans into an issue of the struggle less humiliating for France. Two volumes are to complete this series, one "Episodes," and a final one, "La Commune."

Probably very few Englishmen, who do not closely follow German literature, have heard of Peter Rosegger. He was a forest peasant in Steiermark, Austria, till the age of 18, when he was apprenticed to a travelling tailor. Then he spent four years as a charity scholar in the commercial school at Graz, devoted his spare hours in a hard-working life after he left school to literature. He was so successful that he gave up all other pursuits, and in the last 30 years forty of his works have been published. The first translation of any of them into English is now appearing in serial form in the Critic (New York), and is entitled "The Forest Schoolmaster." It will be published by Messrs. Putnams in book form early in March.

Some substantial testimony to the "Celtic Revival," in Dublin at any rate, has been afforded by the sale of the Library of Miss Margaret Stokes. Many first editions of notable English authors went for trifling sums, while books on the language and antiquities of Ireland and Scotland showed a remarkable rise. Some books like O'Brien's "Round Towers of Ireland," or Vallancey's "Collectanea," have decreased in price in proportion as others of real value have risen. The highest price (£10 10s.) was obtained for O'Neill's "Sculptured Crosses of Ireland," a complete set of the Irish Ecclesiastical Record fetching £11 10s. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters" went for £6 10s., Dunraven's "Notes on Irish Architecture" for £5 5s., while Stuart's "Sculptured Stones of Scotland" brought £4 10s. Other prices realized were Petrie's "Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language" (£2 5s.); "The Atlantis" (of which only nine numbers appeared, and to which O'Curry and O'Donovan contributed) complete (£3 5s.), Petrie's "Round Towers of Ireland" (£1 15s.); O'Curry's "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," thirteen sets (25s. each); Miss Stokes' "Early Christian Art in Ireland," with MS. corrections by Whitley Stokes and Dr. Reeves (24s.); Miss Stokes' "Key to the Sistine Ceiling" and "Early Christian Art in Ireland" together (21s.); Romilly Allen's "Early Christian Symbolism in Great Britain and Ireland" (30s.); Todd's "Liber Hymnorum," edited by Bernard and Atkinson (21s.); O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of O'Dugan and O'Heerin" (25s.); O'Donovan's "Irish Grammar" (20s.); W. Stokes' "Life of George Petrie," specially bound (£3); Miss Stokes' "Early Christian Architecture in Ireland," with MS. notes (36s.); an almost complete set of the Dublin Review (£13); Thompson's "Natural History of Ireland" (28s.); Watty Cox's notorious Irish Magazine, very imperfect (£4); and Lynch's "Cambrensis Eversus" (22s.). The prices quoted may not seem surprising to the English bookbuyer, but they unquestionably show that Irish books of the class specified are becoming a good investment.

The opinion was recently expressed by Mr. Balfour that the Crown is an "increasing factor" in English life. With the political bearings of that statement we have, of course, no concern. But in reviewing the relations of the Crown towards other phases of the national life, and its influence over them, there is one question which it may be not inappropriate to discuss at the present moment. The question refers to the attitude of the Crown towards literature and literary men. Turning to history for light upon the subject, we begin by making a somewhat discouraging discovery—that since the day of the Tudors at any rate, the Sovereigns who, in the past, have smiled most beneficently upon letters and done most to earn the gratitude of men of genius and learning have not, on the whole, been the Sovereigns who have in other respects gained the most enviable reputations. Charles II., as we know, displayed a considerable interest in the drama. But his interest in literature extended far beyond the drama, and one associates his name with the origin of the Royal Society. A charitable chronicler of the life of George IV., again, will prefer to think of him as the Monarch who liked to have literary men about him, who founded the Royal Society of Literature—a proof, it is true, rather of his good intentions than of his perception of what such a society ought to be—and who presented the King's Library to the Trustees of the British Museum. On the other hand, Sovereigns whose general conduct has been estimable have too often, in a greater or a less degree, displayed indifference in this matter. The time has passed, indeed, when literature was recognized only in the persons of party writers whose pens could be hired to support or to attack a Ministry; but that change was brought about not because the Sovereign insisted on a more enlightened policy, but because Sir Robert Walpole decided that it would save trouble to bribe members of Parliament instead of bribing men of letters. The general attitude of the Court has been, save in the reign of George IV., one of comparative aloofness from literature. Her late Majesty Queen Victoria evinced a continuous and sympathetic desire to associate herself with all the interests of all her people; she herself was widely read in English and foreign literature; she admitted to her intimacy at least one great poet; yet it was impossible to help feeling—it was in fact respectfully remarked by Sir Walter Besant among other critics—that the Court failed to grasp the fact that English books, no less than English victories, are a portion of the glory of England, and that great events take place in the world of intellect as well as in the world of politics and of war. In the years immediately before us there will doubtless be changes of social policy, and it is not perhaps inopportune to express the hope that the question may be recognized as one which deserves consideration, being as it is so intimately connected with the higher life of those subject peoples throughout the Empire who are now tendering their loyal devotion to a new Sovereign, and embracing so large a part of their interests and activities. Such an aspiration may easily be expressed; we are well aware that it is not so easy to realize it. To some it may seem that the foundation of an Academy of Letters would be a worthy memorial of a new reign begun under happy auspices. The proposal has more than once been criticized in our columns, and we are not concerned here to enter at large on the discussion of a scheme of such magnitude. There are matters of less scope and of a less debateable character which suggest themselves. There can be little doubt that in the view of those who have the cause of letters at heart the administration of the Civil List Pension Fund is not conducted on ideal lines. They would urge that the present moment is a favourable one in which to inaugurate a reform by which the pensions should be utilized for the benefit of men of learning for whom they are primarily intended, rather than for the benefit of Government officials. In the distribution of honours, again, it might well be urged that a more adequate recognition should be given to the claims of men of letters. To this recognition by the Sovereign of men who have achieved honourable distinction or benefitted their country, eminent men of letters have a claim surely equal to that of eminent doctors, and greater perhaps than that of eminent tradesmen; and if it be considered that the existing decorations are, for some mysterious reason, unsuitable for men of letters, it would not be impossible, nor as far as we can see inexpedient, to follow the example set in other countries, and institute a new order, like the Prussian Ordre de la Mérite. But we have no wish to lay excessive stress upon any detailed suggestion. It is the end that is important, not the means. We have no desire to draw up honours lists, to specify proper recipients of pensions, or to dictate any line of social policy for a Court which stands so high in the estimation of the nation or of the world. But we do not go too far in expressing the hope that the future may see a more direct recognition by the Crown of what is best and most representative in the intellectual life of the Empire. A sympathetic and appreciative connexion between the two would further the interests alike of the nation and of the world of letters, and would certainly not lessen the prestige attaching to the Throne of a country which has produced the greatest literature of the modern world.

VICTORIA.

England girt with her seas,
And the far fair lands by all the seas of the world
Washed, that are trodden of English limbs,
Or tilled of the myriad tribes that have reaped in English bonds
Peace and an equal law,—
Suddenly darkened and hushed to a silence heavy with tears,
Mourn, as children mourn
Who watch the last light die from the eyes their eyes beheld
When they opened first on a world unknown and dark ;
Who feel the cold invade the breasts that have given them suck,
The pale brows crowned with hair for them grown grey.

O Lady loved as a mother of all thy lands,
Hardly in dreams had we deemed that thou couldst die—
We who have known but thy day, who were born in the shadow of thee ;
Who have seen on the throne of our turbulent kings
No form but thine, and under a crown that has clasped
Tragic and terrible brows no face but thine—
Thy face that, sweet with the tremulous beauty of youth,
Dawned on an ancient kingdom big with change ;
Grew, in the changing clamour of difficult days,
More loved, more honoured of all thy realm, more fair,
With a deeper life looking out at the eyes
From a heart grown rich with ripening years and sweet
With joys and fruitful griefs of home and throne,
Of wifehood, motherhood, queenhood.—O my Queen,
All that we worship in woman—the virginal soul,
And royal grace of high simplicity,
The love that exalts and ennobs and blesses the heart that it loves,
The smile of the mother who clasps to her breast the fruit of her pain,
The faith that feels God near in the night of anguish and loss,
The fervour of hope and remembrance that joins the living and dead—
These in thee we beheld enthroned, and the throne with these Made lovely grew for us all
A centre of holy influence exquisite,
The shrine of a heart that beat with all our hearts,
That pulsed with an Empire's glory and grief,
And knew all pains, all cares that are known of the humblest heart ;
That the widow bowed in the hush of a lonely home,
And the mother who knelt for her son in peril of wave or of war,
And the soldier fall'n in thy battles with alien shouts in his ears,
And the lowliest toiler at rest in a haven of circling smiles, Ay, all in thy far-strewn realm who laboured or wept or rejoiced—
Looked to a crowned grey head that even as theirs had endured
Labour and sorrow and joy in the flight of the changing hours ;
Felt in all that they felt a bond that bound them to thee ;
O Woman whose white hairs hallowed with sacred grief
Are twined so close with all the threads of our fate,
We cannot think 'tis thou,
Yonder, through thronged and silent streets,
With muffled thunder of guns in the air,
With mournful splendour of kingly pageantry,
And music of solemn instruments,
Borne to thine endless rest.

Alas ! to us 'tis hard
To know thee gone from a world thou hast served so well,
From an Empire that in thee its oneness knew ;
Yet to the longest day
Night comes, and an end to the longest task ;
And thou—thy long day filled with its arduous task well done

At last is closed, and the solemn night is here—
Ah rest, with the heart thou hast mourned so long
Rejoined, and with all thou hast loved and bidden adieu ;
Rest—if rest be indeed the reward of the faithful dead ;
Rest, if thou wilt, if thou canst—for who knows if love, set free
From the weight of cumbering flesh, from the tired limbs bent with age,
Rests, or desires to rest, nor rather yearns,
In that great day beyond the night we fear,
For larger tasks and nobler ministries,
Free service of free love
In all the many mansions of God's house ?
O Spirit in that ampler world unseen
At rest, or ruler of kingdoms ten times ten—
If aught of our dark earth can touch thee yet,
Forget not this thy kingdom, lorn of thee
In a troubled and dubious time, with mighty toils
Unfinished, stubborn foes unquelled, and lands
Bleeding and torn with lingering war to atone
To our wide Imperial peace—ah, still,
A centre of holy influence exquisite,
Hover about the King thy son, who now
With eyes still wet with thy loss puts on thy crown and thy cares,
In the sight of us thy people, one with him
In grief and tremulous hope.

CHARLES CAMPITARELLI.

Personal Views.

ON THE ALLEGED IMPORTANCE OF WALT WHITMAN.

A recent plea in these columns for a consideration of Walt Whitman contained the rather novel suggestion that an estimate of "Leaves of Grass" and its author should be imposed as a kind of diploma work upon every one aspiring to write criticism. Whitman, it was urged, is a man concerning whom the critic ought not to be permitted to keep silence. He deserves to be studied, if only as a phenomenon to be explained. For one thing, we were told, "his influence on the vocabulary and syntax of English prose is already strong and may well become irresistible." This last dictum is, perhaps, the most disputable statement in an article generally temperate in tone. Where, one may be pardoned for inquiring, is this influence especially discernible? Whitman's vocabulary—an extraordinary composite and unrelated jumble—remains his own uninvaded domain ; so, fortunately, does his syntax, which no writer with anything definite to say has any temptation to imitate.

Let us, however, examine a few of the claims so frequently made on Whitman's behalf and now repeated by his latest apologist. First, then, it is necessary to dissent from Mr. Carlill's assumption that the ability to appraise "America's most original writer" may be taken as proof of a faculty of literary judgment. The truth would seem to be that the part of Whitman's work which comes legitimately within the critic's purview is only a fraction of the whole. He is essentially an extra-literary phenomenon, counting, if at all, as a personal force rather than a literary influence. Nor is it quite accurate to say that "at least he makes an impression of some sort." Nothing is easier, as the literary history of the last half-century sufficiently shows, than for the majority of cultivated people to remain indifferent to him. What amount of truth there is in the contention is comprised in the fact that the impulse to the acceptance of his work is almost wholly a temperamental response. He asserts dominion over a certain type of mind, particularly, of course, in youth ; and no amount of demonstration that a huge part of "Leaves of Grass" is monstrous rubbish will avail to overturn the assurance of these his devout disciples that Whitman stands apart with the master spirits of religion and song.

Again, there is the common impression that Whitman owes little or nothing to the past. He invents, says Mr. Carlill, "his literary form, his system of ideas, his very language." I am inclined to think that it is by means of a consideration of these and similar points that we shall arrive at the most reasonable estimate of Whitman's significance in literature. In what sense can he be said to invent his literary form since there is at bottom no essential difference between it and the irregular rhythm of nearly all primitive literatures ? As for his system of ideas, the unavoidable comment is that he has no system, and that nobody is more perfectly aware of the fact than Whitman himself. His one irrepressible idea is merely a re-statement of the Individualism, the spiritual Anarchism, which seems indigenous to the United States—finding expression in her men of genius, her Emersons and Thoreaus, as much as in the numberless sects and communities which are continually and fruitlessly setting out for the ideal life of absolute freedom from external law. So far from Whitman's "hymning of the Ego" and his glorification of splendid savagery being the annunciation of a new democratic gospel for the age to come it is in effect, simply the final outburst of rejoicing in the ample freedom of a great new nation just emerging into self-consciousness. Equally misleading, I submit, is it to say that Whitman invents his language. He borrows, of course, from foreign tongues or from any jargon that can furnish him with the word he needs. But the attentive reader would have little difficulty in showing that the effect of Whitman's appropriated words is for the most part to add absurdity to passages already absurd enough ; and that whenever his imagination triumphs over his theory he relies on the gift, shared with every other master of speech, of endowing common words with the fresh significance and beauty that come of unexpected use.

It is argued further that accepted canons of criticism do not apply in Whitman's case. He denies the premisses. Be it so. Let us try him strictly by his own test :—"The proof of a poet shall be sternly deferr'd till his country absorbs him as affectionately as he has absorb'd it." Whitman sent his book forth as the harbinger of a new race of national poets, "orbic bards," "sweet democratic despots of the West." They have not appeared. He has no poetical offspring. The impulse and direction which he conceived himself to have given to a new literary form, or a new literature without form, ceased with himself. If it be true that Whitman's chosen manner is, as his latest critic affirms, the only possible form for his philosophy, it is also true, apparently, that it is a possible form for no other philosophy of poetry or life. The old forms which he wished to cast off from literature are capable of infinite use. It is as easy for an original poet to be original in them to-day as it was a century or three centuries ago. But the writer who adopts Whitman's method is foredoomed to Whitmanese. The tentative and ineffectual experiments of his few avowed disciples have produced only feeble, and mainly foolish, echoes of himself. Moreover, it must be remembered that Whitman could not have used the traditional forms however he may have wished to do so. On the one or two occasions when he tried to move in what Cobbett called "the gewgaw fetters of rhyme," he failed almost pitifully. "Captain, my captain" is to "Come lovely and soothing Death" as an official ode to the "Adonais."

And, once more : It cannot be conceded that in order to discover and understand the merits of "Leaves of Grass" as poetry it is necessary to formulate fresh standards of criticism. If we grant that Whitman's theory of literature or his attitude towards life in general demands a readjustment of the intellectual vision, it must still be maintained that his literary product does not. And we may note that the very critics who plead for the adoption of a new standard are unable to abide by their own conditions. When, for example, they would enumerate the literary virtues of their supreme poet they point, like Symonds, to his "countless clear and perfect phrases," or, like Mr. Carlill, to the faultless and noble sadness of his tone when he speaks of the dead. Both criticisms are entirely justified ; but they mean that when Whitman's elemental struggle after self-expression issues for a godlike moment or two in a glimpse of pure serene, he writes literature, and may quite simply be tried by the accepted canons of poetry. His utterance becomes rhythmic ; his style attains a fine level of passionate directness and simplicity ; he approaches even the measured and regular expression of the "unregenerate" singers whom in his polemic mood he despises ; and we judge him necessarily according to the sincerity and depth of his emotion, the rightness and beauty of the language in which his imagination takes shape. There is no other way, for Whitman or any other.

It will be obvious to any one that observations such as the foregoing cannot in any wise be supposed to stand as a full criticism of Whitman. There remains something to be said, something which all who have undertaken to expound the "Leaves of Grass" seem to imply must always remain unsaid. It may well be that Whitman attempted the impossible. He sought to express in words the amplitude and multitudinousness of "These States," and to make his book the nakedly faithful revelation of life "immense in passion, pulse, and power" as embodied in what he was pleased to call a "composite democratic individual." If he has not succeeded, if he has not even written, as he proposed to write, "the evangel poem of comrades and of love," he has impressed himself upon a great page of his nation's history by living that evangel poem in his own proper person. The doctrine of fellowship is as old as religion itself, but the men in whom the spirit of fellowship is incarnate are the rarest examples of our race. It is Whitman's especial praise that he is one of these and that the passion of humanity which inspired his whole being has in some degree got itself compressed within his inchoate and exasperating rhapsodies. They will endure, no doubt, as a quite unique revelation of a powerful and original character and as a spiritual influence strangely vivid and salutary. But that they can ever be recognized as fulfilling the enormous claims made for them as the inspired scriptures of a revolution in literature is not to be believed for a moment. "Undifferentiated literary protoplasm" is the description applied to "Leaves of Grass" by the critic whose plea for their consideration I have endeavoured to pass in review. The phrase is a condemnation in itself. The product even of a great poetic temperament—though it be rich and abundantly receptive, as Whitman's unquestionably was—remains undifferentiated, protoplasmic, so long as it is not moulded by the creative force of an intellectualized imagination.

S. K. RATCLIFFE.

THE GOLDEN BOUGH.

Comparative mythology, or religion, is a fascinating study, and many have been its vicissitudes. Each generation, like Mr. Casaubon, has its own key to all the mythologies—now the sun, or the dawn, or the clouds of heaven; again, some disease of language; even intoxication has, we believe, been suggested (in a preface of five hundred pages to a work which has fortunately not yet come out) as the one principle common to them all. It has been reserved for this generation, following the lead of Mannhardt, to strike out a new and most fruitful line of inquiry through the folk-lore of civilized and uncivilized races. The new study has been made light of by many, even by so keen a thinker as Sir Alfred Lyall; but in the hands of Mannhardt it is a science. The worst of it is, that it is so easy to dabble in. Mr. J. G. Frazer, however, is a faithful disciple of Mannhardt; and if he is occasionally fanciful, such occasions are very few in comparison with his general tone of sanity and logic. The publication of his "Golden Bough" ten years ago was something of an epoch in the history of the new science. Its comprehensiveness and originality have made it a standard work for the student; its fascinating style has attracted a wider circle. We referred to the appearance of a new and revised edition on December 29, promising to return to it; and it may not be uninteresting, well-known as the book is, to give some account of Mr. Frazer's theory as he now presents it to us.

The problem he sets himself to solve in this book is the origin of the customs connected with the King of the Wood at Nemi. In the wood grew a special and sacred tree, guarded by a person called King of the Wood, who kept his place only until some more stalwart ruffian, after breaking a branch from that tree in the wood, should defeat and kill him in single combat. The event is picturesquely described in Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Eleanor," and the scene is familiar even to those who have never visited Italy, from the picture by Turner. The branch was believed to be that Golden Bough which Æneas broke before visiting the shades, and which gives its title to this book. Mr. Frazer elucidates the tradition by investigating the relations of King and priest to the people as shown in custom. He brings instances of human beings who are at this day regarded as departmental kings of nature, like the African Kings of Rain and Storm; he then traces the history of tree-worship, and shows how the tree-spirit is personified by human beings, who by mimicry strive to bring about the fertility of nature. Hence he interprets the priest of Aricia as embodying the spirit of vegetable life. Now, savages often believe that the commonweal depends upon the health and strength of their King, who is, therefore, not permitted to grow old and die, but is carefully preserved, or is killed by a stronger before he grows old. Hence Mr. Frazer infers that the King of the Wood must needs perish while still in his prime, "in order that his sacred life, transmitted in unabated force to his successor, might renew its youth, and thus by successive transmissions through a perpetual line of vigorous incarnations might remain eternally fresh and young." The Golden Bough he regards as the seat of the King's soul; for it is a common belief that the souls of men are preserved in some place outside them. The bough he believes to have been originally the mistletoe, and the sacred tree, the oak; for reasons which are not so convincing as those he gives for the other parts of the theory, yet which afford a fair presumption.

The custom is odd, and is worth explaining; but one can hardly help feeling that there is very little bread to a vast deal of sack. In fact, one may quarrel with the title. The work really examines in great detail a certain number of questions suggested by the custom of Nemi—sympathetic magic, tree-worship, the external soul, taboo, the scape-goat, and many others. Each of these is a fascinating little essay, and just as we are enjoying our trip into strange lands, and have forgotten all about Nemi and its woodland King, Mr. Frazer reminds us with some severity that we are really not wandering from the subject. Well, it is true that all this has a bearing on the subject of Nemi; but let us whisper that a due sense of proportion would have suggested a more general title. And if we search for a title, we shall be forced to admit that the thread which binds together all the subjects here dealt with is of the thinnest. We wish to see general principles formulated and illustrated, not by the way, but of set purpose.

If, however, Mr. Frazer somewhat lacks a feeling for proportion and form, his wealth of illustration is something marvellous. For the minutest detail he has a score of quaint parallels. By the way he explains, with greater or less success, a number of ancient myths and customs, such as the sacrifice of Athamas, the rites of Adonis and Attis, the legends of Osiris, Demeter, Dionysus, Linus, and Lityerses. The Exodus he regards as originally commemorating the sacrifice of the Hebrew first-born; the story of Haman and Mordecai he explains by reference to mock Kings who live in clover for a time and are then killed; and the same principle is brought to bear upon certain features of the Crucifixion. This part of the work is largely new.

When we compare the present edition with the first we find that the difference is chiefly the addition of new examples, which quite doubles the contents. Many works of travel have been published since 1890, and all these, together with the volumes of the Folk-lore Society, seem to be laid under contribution. But there are a few important modifications. The theory of Nemi remains much as it was, although Mr. Frazer now withdraws part of the argument about the Golden Bough, which was based on a mistranslation of Pliny. Sympathetic and imitative magic are now clearly distinguished; and an attempt is made to define religion (i., p. 63). Sir Alfred Lyall's "Asiatic Studies" have convinced Mr. Frazer that magic preceded religion, and that it is in principle the same as science although based on wrong premisses. The remarks on totemism, though in the text practically unaltered, are modified in a note which calls attention to the remarkable discoveries in Australia recorded by Messrs. Spencer and Gillen. Our knowledge of the Roman Saturnalia is increased by the account of St. Dasius' martyrdom, which is here for the first time brought before English readers.

Foreign Letter.

RUSSIA.

A whole crop of books has sprung from the Suvorov Centenary, celebrated last summer in Russia. Kutuzov, Gourko, and Skobelev are more familiar soldier names to foreigners; but General Suvorov, the soldiers' general, who worked his way up from the ranks, defeated the Turks, put an end to Poland, and routed Napoleon's troops in France and Switzerland a hundred years ago, is still the popular favourite among the Russians. His name is handed down from generation to generation in endless songs and stories.

Even in his own day he was surrounded by a halo of myth. There is an old English print which shows him as a ferocious hairy monster, half Caliban, half Hercules, clutching a monstrous sword. "This extraordinary man," says the inscription on it, "is six feet ten inches in height; he never tastes either wine or spirits; takes but one meal a day, and every morning plunges into an ice bath. He wears no covering on his head either by day or night; when tired he wraps himself up in a blanket and sleeps in the open air. He has fought twenty-nine pitched battles and been in seventy-five engagements." In appearance Suvorov was one of the most harmless of men, rather below the middle height. The English portrait is wholly imaginary. But the inscription gives a fairly true account of his habits and experience. His better authenticated portraits show him with a lean satisfied smirking face, and an entirely mad expression. His behaviour was as mad as his face, or madder. He had a passion for exercise, indoors and out. He never walked about the streets but always ran; in the house he was for ever jumping over the chairs. He said it kept him young. Ambassadors were scandalized by seeing the little man hopping on one leg and crowing like a cock at the Winter Palace. His biographers have been at great pains to explain his behaviour; some say he did it to amuse the Empress; others that it was to make his rivals think he was a harmless idiot; they will none of them admit that he really was a little crazy.

Vladimir Korolenko, author of "Makar's Dream," "The Blind Musician," "The Saghalien Convict," and other stories which have been translated—very badly—into English, is at work on a historical novel dealing with Pugachev's revolt. This is good news, for Korolenko has produced very little during the last few years, and his later writings had shown symptoms of a decay which plainly arose from the wish to be topical and improving. His earlier stories displayed a wonderful gift for treating the pathetic objectively. "Makar's Dream" is a masterpiece of healthy humorous pathos, while "Tongue-Tied," one of the last, is a miserable shapeless thing, directed at the evils of Anglo-Saxon civilization. We are safe from anything topical or elevating if our author is confined to the eighteenth century. The subject of his new book is of the best. Pugachev's story is one of those extraordinary romances in real life of which Russian history is full. An ignorant and obscure Cossack of the Ural, Pugachev raised a rebellion which came near to driving Catharine the Great from her throne. He gave himself out for Peter III., who had died suddenly of what the official bulletins described as "a colic which had flown to his head." All South-Eastern Russia accepted him; a little more and he would have succeeded, like that monk-adventurer, the False Demetrius, a century before. But his Cossacks betrayed him. General Suvorov put him into a cage and took him to Moscow, where he was executed. Korolenko shows his courage in choosing the subject, because Pushkin, who wrote a history of the Rebellion, has already founded on it a well-known novel, "The Captain's Daughter."

"The Novel in the West" is the first half of a big work by Boborykin, designed to trace the development of the novel in Russia from the earlier stages of the novel abroad. The second half, which is still in the making, will deal with Russia; the part now published deals with Germany, France, and England. Mr. Boborykin is greatly hampered by his method, which is the method of the fantastic school of literary historians—the "evolutionary" school. His chapter-headings bristle with terrible phrases, such as "Æsthetics as the Science and Philosophy of the Beautiful," "The Psychic Basis," "Synthetic Study of the Genera and Species of Literary Creation." As a successful novelist with forty years of fame behind him, Mr. Boborykin should have known better. One generation of literature produces another; successive phases of public taste develop successive phases of literary creation; but the idea is no more than enough for a magazine article or an introductory chapter. Thrust into the body of a work on literary history and carried out into detail, the theory produces hideous results. While reading the scientific chapters one is haunted by the feeling that there is nothing in it. Relief comes with the chapters which the true scientist can regard only as excrescences. The gist of "The Novel in the West" lies in the supernumerary chapter on "literary landmarks," a critical survey of the great novelists and their works, which fills about a third of the book. On the scientific plan you first trace out the development of the "environment," of the "social and psychic" elements, the public, and the critical faculty; then into this environment you plunge a hypothetical literary germ, and trace the imaginary process of its evolution. The fundamental folly of the method is that you have to assume that literature is always improving; which is plainly a fallacy—as is shown, if by nothing else, by the continual increase in the numbers of the critical reviews, which are so many whipping-posts to accommodate the increase in the numbers of literary malefactors.

Fifteen years have passed since Count Tolstoi attacked the "social problem" in "What Must We Do?" and he now gives to the world a new version of his opinions in "The Slavery of Our Times" and "The Way Out." He is able at last, he says, to approach the subject in a calmer frame of mind. However, there is no change in his views. The chief difference between the new books and the old is that there is more of political economy and less of the gospel in the new. The Sermon on the Mount figures once more in his heading, but is backed by quotations from Ruskin and Robert Owen. The main argument of "The Slavery of Our Times" is once more that we must return to the life of agriculture if we would be happy. No amount of improvement in factories will ever make the factory life endurable. As a destructive criticism of all the arguments adduced in defence of our present way of life the book is excellent—pointed and humorous; but like all Tolstoi's philosophic works it suffers from his mistaking Russia for the world at large. The condition of the working class which he deplores is to be found nowhere but in Russia. Nor could his remedies be applied anywhere but in Russia. He lives in a country full of vast possibilities for the growth of corn, where there are not hands enough to gather in the crops, because every peasant must earn money as well as necessities in kind for the payment of his taxes. The Russian peasant goes perforce to the towns, ready to sell himself body and soul for three or four years to any one who will supply him with the roubles necessary to pay his taxes. It is very well to preach the Arcadian Gospel in such a country; but what would become of us in England if all our workmen swarmed into the fields demanding the right to grow barley? Count Tolstoi must discover a more universal law of salvation than this before he can convert the "effete Occident" to his views. The chief interest of "The Way Out" lies in the extracts from Tolstoi's letters at the end. "All my energies are concentrated on my work," he says; "the rest of my time I feel 'exhausted.' Strangely enough, this not only does not decrease my working powers; I daresay I am mistaken, but I feel that it increases them." He is justly indignant with a French review, which lately published an article on Chinese affairs over his signature, though he had nothing whatever to do with it; the more so as the article was "a churchy article, praising the missionaries, who are chiefly responsible for what has happened in China." He has felt a strong desire to send a letter to the Chinese, assuring them that the "Christians" they have had to do with are usurpers of the name, and that Christ would have loved the Chinese and taken their part against the "Christians." "What Must We Do?" is as popular as ever; the publishers of a new German translation lately sold 6,000 copies of it in two months.

Sienkiewicz, the Polish novelist, is expected soon to produce a sequel to "Quo Vadis?" that dismal but popular story of the days of Nero. He is fortunate in his admirers; they have raised a large subscription, and presented him with an estate and country house to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his appearance in Polish literature.

Under the title of "Third Collection of the Poems of K. R." the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences has just brought out a book of verses, the authorship of which is not hard to guess. The letters "K. R." stand for Konstantin Romanov, and the poet is the Grand Duke Constantine Constantinovich, president of the academy. This collection contains the output of the last ten years. The Grand Duke has a graceful lyrical gift akin to that of Lermontov, a musical sympathy with nature, and a pleasant melancholy such as a Grand Duke of good literary taste may be expected to feel face to face with the sphinx-riddles of life in a well-kept garden at Pavlovsk. There is no great depth of thought in his verses; but the Russian language is a rare instrument of music, and Constantine Constantinovich knows how to handle it. While he is purely lyrical he is charming; his mild and musical abstraction from the cares of men is a refreshment after the strenuousness of other Russian minor poets. His gift and his want are plainly seen in the poems written in camp at Krasnoe Selo. The grace which marks his communings with the muse in the solitude of his tent vanishes altogether when he comes to "Soldier Sonnets," "To a Recruit," "The Sentinel," &c. A poet may make one feel sorry for a recruit or a sentinel in war-time by painting him unhappy, timid, and home-sick; but there is not much literary capital in the loyal devotion of a cheerful and healthy conscript in time of peace.

THE DRAMA.

"TWELFTH NIGHT"—"THE AWAKENING."

Professor Saintsbury has defined criticism as "that function of the judgment which concerns itself with the goodness or badness, the success or ill-success, of literature from a purely literary point of view." This is the orthodox, judicial theory of criticism (judex damnatur cum, &c.), the theory which is preferred by the man in the street, who is impressed by dogmas and remembers from his boyish days the system of appraising by "marks." M. Ferdinand Brunetière is its chief champion in Europe, and by his brow-beating manner has probably done more to discredit it than any other living man. Anyway, I should be sorry to tackle Twelfth Night on the judicial system. I suppose one would have to say that the story of Malvolio is "good," because it is a perfect example of περσικία, &c., and that the story of Viola is "bad" because of its strain on probability, and so forth. What a futile business it would be! What spectator ever thought of the play in this fashion? Fortunately there are many theories of criticism, just as many, in fact, as there are critical temperaments. Gibbon found this out long before "impressionist" criticism got its (rather over-worked) name. He records the delight with which, after saturating himself with the "judicial" criticism of Aristotle, he came upon an entirely different sort in Longinus, who aimed at describing the sensations of pleasure or pain he received from the thing criticized. Give me the method of Longinus—at any rate, as Gibbon saw it—when a classic is in question. A classic is ex hypothesi a work which gives pleasure to successive generations—the pleasure, of course, varying in quantity and quality from age to age. Boileau's age liked Homer for his "regularity," his "correctness"; ours likes him for something very much more closely resembling Whitman's "barbaric whaup." So Voltaire's age disliked Shakespeare for his "irregularity," his wild and tangled fantasy—the very point for which ours likes him. And such a tangle as Twelfth Night is! We look for Viola and get Sebastian, and vice versa. What have Sir Toby and Sir Andrew to do with Illyria? And what does Malvolio in that galley? Of course, the commentators make their usual attempts to bring everything into a "concatenation according." One has even seen it gravely argued that Malvolio must not be played as too hopelessly foolish a person, because the Countess Olivia would never have selected such a mere ass for her steward. Can you not hear the laughter at The Mermaid over that desperately logical pronouncement? If there was one thing to which Shakespeare was supremely indifferent it was the business of "jining his flats." Twelfth Night is an absolutely wayward thing; a hotchpotch of every sort of fun, poetry, fantasy, and homely observation. Olivia and Viola are dreams of the Italian Renaissance, while Sir Toby comes staggering out of Stratford-on-Avon. Was there ever so delicious a mixture of the real and unreal? For sheer amusement there is nothing, I submit, to touch it in English or any other language. I should be insincere if I said that it had afforded me the greatest pleasure of any comedy I had ever seen. For me Signora Duse in La Locandiera represents the high-water mark of theatrical enjoyment—though that is on account of Duse rather than Goldoni. But, next after that, in my private Paradise of Dainty Devices, I must rank Twelfth Night at Her Majesty's.

Mr. Tree was bound to be a first-rate Malvolio. He is a highly artificial actor, working not by inspiration from within but rather by a keen perception of the appropriate and the "telling" which prompts him to superimpose detail on detail from without. He has a positive genius for "make up" and for "business." And he has a native distinction, which is bound to make him the central figure—even though it may be a grotesque figure—in any crowd. Also he has a tendency to be slow and stiff—a defect in a passionate part, but for Malvolio the very thing. In this part he has "made himself a head," as the French say, which will have to be the Malvolio-head for future stage tradition. His complacent pauses as he makes his little joke, followed by an angry start when he finds the joke has gone wrong, the extravagant affability of his demeanour, his gait which is too suave for a strut and too solemn for a prance, his ecstatic self-content in the letter-reading scene, his middle-aged Dan Cupid airs when he approaches Olivia cross-gartered and in yellow stockings—all these things make up a stage picture which is not readily to be forgotten. And, let me say in passing, his musical director has supplied him with an admirably appropriate march-tune for his entrances and exits. The Viola, too, is quite exquisite; Miss Lily Brayton is an ideal girl-boy of Shakespearian comedy. Then there is the prodigious fooling of Mr. Lionel Brough and Mr. Norman Forbes as Sir Toby and Sir Andrew, a handsome (if slightly over-dramatic) pair of sentimental amorists in Miss Maud Jeffries and Mr. Robert Taber, and the most musical of clowns in Mr. Courtice Pounds. Among the minor parts Mr. Fisher White's sea captain stands out as a fine piece of vigorous character. Mr. Hawes Craven's garden scene is one of the most beautiful pictures I have ever seen on the stage. Altogether, a worthy performance of Twelfth Night, ripe in humour, soft with sensuous enchantment.

After The Tyranny of Tears Mr. Haddon Chambers' new play is a disappointment. It is too obviously written to put Mr. George Alexander and Miss Fay Davis through their usual paces. We all know the mingled sentiment and man-of-the-worldism of the one, the girlish innocence of the other, as shown in many a St. James' play; excellent things of their kind, but becoming a little too familiar. Somewhat trite, too, is the theme of The Awakening, the conversion of an homme à bonnes fortunes by a pure love. Nor do my sympathies quite follow the author's beck and call; he is too anxious to provide a happy marriage for girlish innocence at other people's expense. The frail lady who has to give way to the girl is really treated very badly; but the author (with British propriety to back him) seems to have no pity for her. This lady is played with much tact and force by Miss Gertrude Kingston, especially in the cross-examination scene of the third act. Theatrical cross-examinations, it will be noticed, are "booming" just now. Miss Granville, for once, has a pleasant part and plays it pleasantly enough. Mr. A. E. Matthews is allowed to give us another of his inimitable "johnnies"; but Mr. H. B. Irving and Miss Julie Opp get no chance.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

SIR HENRY CRAIK'S SCOTTISH HISTORY.

A CENTURY OF SCOTTISH HISTORY, FROM THE DAYS BEFORE THE '45 TO THOSE WITHIN LIVING MEMORY. By SIR HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B., LL.D. (Blackwood. 30s. n.)

It is as difficult to isolate the history of any given term of one hundred years arbitrarily chosen as to confine the narrative of a nation within the limits of a single century as defined in the calendar. The stream of history is continuous; therefore, the title of his book notwithstanding, Sir Henry Craik has found it expedient to prelude his treatment of the period prescribed therein by a recapitulation of the chief events in Great Britain from the Revolution of 1688 onwards, and an examination of their effects upon Scottish circumstances and character in the middle of the eighteenth century. Hence the first 125 pages of the first volume lie outside the border of the hundred years which Sir Henry has set himself to describe and explain. The treatment of this part is necessarily synthetic, yet it lacks nothing in vigour and vividness. We do not remember to have read a more convincing description of the atrocious massacre of Glencoe; and, condensed though it be, the author finds space to relieve his feelings by unsparing denunciation of its authors. Its authors—for, albeit the execration for that deed of blood has been concentrated for generations upon the memory of the Master of Stair, the "Curse of Scotland," Sir Henry refuses to exonerate King William from an equal share in the guilt :—

In 1695 a commission was appointed to inquire into the report [upon the massacre], and all the documents were laid before it. That commission was sufficiently compliant to acquit William of full privity to the deed ; but Stair's part in it was condemned as having exceeded his commission, and the subordinate actors were demanded for prosecution. If the guilt of William were doubtful before, his action upon this report leaves no room for doubt. Stair presently obtained remission from the King, and his agents were not prosecuted, but received promotion. To plead for a suspense of judgment before such evidence is not argument but chicanery ; it is to palter with plain facts, and to reduce the tribunal of history to contempt. The conscience of humanity will ever brand the massacre of Glencoe as a heinous and unpardonable crime.

In regard to bribery, which has been alleged as the means whereby the legislative union of Scotland with England was accomplished in the teeth of a vast preponderance of national sentiment, Sir Henry Craik denies that there is any proof to support the charge. True, there was a sum of £20,000 paid from the English into the Scottish Treasury, avowedly to smooth the way for the union, but this undoubtedly went to liquidate arrears of salary and to defray necessary expenses.

An ideal standard of political rectitude might require a man to give as ardent a support to a Government which did not pay him what it owed as to one which met all its obligations. But human nature will not often show such cordiality to a defaulting creditor ; and, at least, we must admit that the man who bargains that he shall be paid his wages before he lends his support in a doubtful cause is entitled to have his case distinguished from that of one who sells his vote for a bribe. . . . If bribery there was, it was restricted to a settlement—possibly capricious and sometimes over generous—of claims which had a real existence.

We are surprised to find Sir Henry pronouncing Chancellor Seafield's famous elegy upon Scottish independence "an ill-chosen jest" and "a contemptuous epitaph." "Now, there's the end of an auld sang," sighed Seafield, as he handed the Act to the clerk after signing it ; a homely phrase, no doubt, but surely neither a jest nor implying any contempt. To us the words seem full of gentle pathos—acquiescence in the fulfilment of the dream of the wisest heads ever since the tragic fate of the Maid of Norway on the bleak Orcadian coast on the eve of her marriage to the first Prince of Wales, with much alloy of regret for Scotland's wasted blood and treasure during three weary subsequent centuries. There is no more of levity in the metaphor of "the end of a song" than there is in that of "the fall of the curtain," used by Sir Henry himself a few pages further on.

Sir Henry has made very clear the enduring repugnance to the Union on the part of the great majority of the Scottish nation, and has marked the effect of this repugnance as contributing to the movement for the restoration of the Stuarts. The material benefits of the Union were slow in being felt, for which the author throws the chief blame upon English statesmen, whom he represents as using Scotland only as a weapon of party or, at best, for the interest of their own nation. Has he made enough allowance for their excusable ignorance of Scottish character and circumstances ? It is easy to denounce the Intelligence Department, whether in affairs civil or military—easy to say, retrospectively, "You ought to have been better informed" ; yet Sir Henry has laid great and just stress upon the physical and political obstacles to English understanding of Scottish needs. The handful of Scottish members in the united Parliament were naturally disgusted to find how largely the affairs of their own nation were overshadowed by those of the predominant partner. The fact is that Englishmen knew as little about Lowland Scotland as Lowlanders, according to Sir Henry's own showing, knew about the Highlands and the Highlanders. Even as late as 1758, when practically the whole Scottish nation had accepted and loyally supported the Hanoverian dynasty, this was the condition of things :—

The relations between the two countries were but few, and the distinctive traits of national character were in sharpest contrast. . . . The wide gulf which divided the Highland clans from the Lowland Scots was one which the Englishman could scarcely grasp, and which he naturally ignored altogether. Even the Lowland Scot was a man whose ideas and manners were uncouth to him, and for all he knew and cared, the Lowland Scot was part and parcel of an alien nationality, mainly represented by the barbarous tribes of whom he had heard strange travellers' tales. . . . He was alien in religion, in manners, in politics, in law, and in the interests of his everyday life.

Add to all this the existing defects of communication, and there is considerable allowance to be made for the errors and apparent selfishness of English statesmen. In 1758 the ordinary post took from ten days and a half to twelve days and a half between London and Edinburgh. "For all practical purposes," observes Sir Henry, "Scotland was as far from the metropolis then as are the Western States of America from England at the present day" ; but this is vastly to underestimate the difference between then and now, for the telegraph has rendered communication instantaneous. We are inclined, therefore, to a more generous view than Sir Henry Craik presents of both the motives and accomplishment of the English and Scottish authors of the Union, and to credit them with far-seeing sagacity in anticipating the benefits to flow therefrom to both countries, as well as with the requisite resoluteness and patience to carry it through.

We have spent more than half the space at our disposal, and yet have not reached the beginning of our author's "century," which runs from 1745. But, as he admits, the subsequent course of Scottish history really hinges upon the Union. The chief effect of the brief and brilliant episode of the '45 was upon the national literature ; greatly as the romantic lore of Scotland has been enriched thereby, her steady progress towards prosperity, alien from her shores since the last of the "Kings of Peace," was scarcely interrupted at the time, and the outcome was a better understanding between the sister kingdoms. The story is succinctly told in these pages, and with admirable spirit. The sketches of the leading characters—Simon Fraser of Lovat, Cameron of Lochiel, Forbes of Culloden, and others—are excellent and convincing, though we may demur to the opinion twice expressed that Lovat lived out of his time. He seems to us, on the contrary, to have been the natural product of his time, though the atmosphere was clearer at the close of his long life than at the beginning thereof. Vignettes of later days—David Hume, Henry Dundas, "Christopher North," &c., are drawn with a touch as masterly as the others ; one cannot but deplore that it did not occur to the publishers to illustrate the text with such portraits as give so much vivid charm to Mr. John Morley's "Oliver Cromwell."

Perhaps the ablest chapter in this very able work, and that which bears most evidence of the author's insight into his subject, is that in which he reviews the Scottish school of philosophy. It may be heartily commended to the study of those who love to trace the growth of a nation's inner life, and expect more of the historian than a long succession of "rumours of oppression and deceit, of unsuccessful and successful war." Sir Henry Craik has made a very notable contribution to the history of the United Kingdom, and lent his aid to finish the process of which he has described the inception and gradual growth, videlicet, complete understanding between the peoples north and south of Tweed. He will bear with us if, in parting from his excellent book, we venture to express the opinion that he has exaggerated the poverty of Scotland during the eighteenth century, leaning, probably, too much on the authority of Mr. H. C. Graham's recent work. "Of the ornaments of life nothing was known" is an assertion wholly inconsistent with the existence, for example, of Pinkie House, where the author describes Prince Charlie lodging after Preston Pans. Pinkie was only one of numerous beautiful and refined country houses which existed or were built throughout the Scottish Lowlands during the eighteenth century, and true though it be that the general scale of living was modest, often descending to rudeness and penury, there is abundant evidence in the libraries of country houses, in the pictures on their walls, and in the old-fashioned pleasure grounds about them, that both time and money was forthcoming for the amenities of existence.

By-the-by, was it not from Doune Castle, not Edinburgh, that John Home, author of "Douglas," made his escape?

A STUDY OF SWINBURNE.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE. A Study. By THEODORE WRATISLAW. (Groening, 3s. 6d.)

A critical and biographical study which is published during the life of its subject labours under obvious disadvantages. Many biographical details, which appear quite inoffensive when the record of the life is closed, are neither seemly nor desirable while they can still be read by the eyes which have experienced them; and, on the other side, anything like definitive criticism is almost impossible in the case of a living writer. It is not, therefore, to be expected that a series of monographs such as these "English Writers of To-Day" should give us more than a partial estimate of their subjects; and their purpose is no doubt served if they fill the place of a sort of rough, appreciative introduction to the work of the poets and novelists whom they celebrate.

For such a simple function Mr. Wratismaw's study of Mr. Swinburne has several qualifications. Its author has a sincere enthusiasm for his subject, and a satisfactory acquaintance with the poems; his work also shows knowledge of the poetry of the nineteenth century, and certain undeveloped powers of comparison and co-relation which are very useful adjuncts of criticism. But the difficulties of the task have, on the whole, overweighed the writer's resources; and the criticism, of which, for the most part, the book consists, resolves itself into a procession of flashing superlatives from which the reader can derive but little sense of judgment or stability. A few specimens of Mr. Wratismaw's method will show our meaning better than a column of comment.

It was with the publication [he writes] of the first series of "Poems and Ballads" that he [Mr. Swinburne] made himself an eternal place in the literature of the world. There was no question henceforward possible as to the quality of the poet's capacity. Such a volume was absolutely unparalleled in the world's history, for originality and variety of metre, for fulness of utterance, for music, for volubility of erotic passion. . . . The volcanic exuberance of its metres and rhymes is not more astounding than its sustained ebullience of amorous imagination, its metrical music and beautiful verbiage than its frenzied erotomania.

Now, Mr. Wratismaw does right to point out the immense influence which Mr. Swinburne's metrical innovations have exercised in English prosody, but when he talks about "the world's history" he is wading into too deep waters. The Pindaric Odes and the choric songs in Æschylus made history in metre as no English bard could possibly make it; for, when the discussion is of "originality," it must be remembered that, though our poetry is not directly quantitative, its accentual emphasis can only be primarily imitated and developed from the Greek models. In the same way, in speaking of Mr. Swinburne's criticism, Mr. Wratismaw says: "A more lucid critic, one with clearer insight and stronger power of expression of his opinions, has never lived. If any earlier English poet has been gifted with so fine a critical faculty as this, he has not used it; and one may doubt whether any critic of any literature has possessed so wide a knowledge, so strong a memory, or so keen an intuition as Swinburne." The quality of Mr. Swinburne's criticism cannot be discussed within the limits of a brief review; there are, however, a good many things to be said about it which

Mr. Wratismaw seems to have overlooked. But, when it comes to challenging any earlier English poet to show a critical faculty equal to Mr. Swinburne's, we may perhaps remind Mr. Wratismaw of Dryden, who, even if he does not deserve Johnson's noble tribute to him as "the father of English criticism," did at least do an incalculable amount to define and exemplify those critical methods and that true dignity of judgment which Mr. Swinburne has not invariably preserved. It is, indeed, too favourite a caprice of Mr. Wratismaw to commend his poet by means of the condemnation of others, and we regret to notice that this condemnation is not always conveyed with taste. To talk about Byron's "intolerable doggerel" and "uninspired abortion of dulness," of Tennyson's "divorce-court atmosphere" and "mincing preciosity," and to speak of Matthew Arnold as "a poet who was transformed by the combined atmosphere of Rugby and Oxford into the likeness of a perfect prig" is scarcely to preserve the due amenities of literature. Matthew Arnold is, indeed, handled by Mr. Wratismaw with a lack of manner which we cannot sufficiently deprecate. His praise of Byron "damned" that poet "to all eternity"; and his own "Tristram and Isolt" consists of "slipshod inanities of tuneless jingle." Now, not only are these things not true, but the fashion of their expression is unpardonable in a young writer, who has yet to show that he himself possesses the critical faculty in any serviceable degree. Mr. Wratismaw's analysis of Mr. Swinburne's poems is a sort of easy, running commentary, sprinkled with coloured epithets, but marked only by superficial qualities of observation and ear. Of the true qualities and defects of Mr. Swinburne's poetry, of the changefully derivative nature of its inspiration, and of the individuality which differentiates it from other poetry of revolt, he seems to have but little appreciation. His "Study" would serve as a hand-book to the superficial contents of the poems, but it does not penetrate below the surface. It shows few signs of a sensitive critical faculty. Lacking this, Mr. Wratismaw should be the more careful not to mistake violence for judgment. One does not approve oneself to be endowed with criticism by shouting at the top of one's voice that a true and a great critic is an ass!

"RULERS OF THE SOUTH."

THE RULERS OF THE SOUTH (Sicily, Calabria, Malta), by Francis Marion Crawford (Macmillan, 21s. n.), is worthy of the reputation won by its predecessor—"Ave Roma Immortalis." The two books are identical in format, and owners of the one should not be content without possession of the other. Mr. Crawford is further to be congratulated on his artistic ally, Mr. Henry Brokman, many of whose hundred drawings are singularly beautiful. Most of them are fairly well reproduced, and some admirably in full-page autogravure. Some of the many autogravure plates, such as the "Ruins of Selinus," or "The Temple of Neptune at Paestum," or "The Temple of Segesta," are strikingly effective. The full-page reproductions—such as that of the Cavern at Laotamia Del Paradiso, near Syracuse, called "The Ear of Dionysius"; that of the ruined rampart of Girgenti; that of the Fountain and Cloisters of the wonderful Norman Cathedral at Monreale; or that of a lovely columnar section in the Cloister of San Giovanni degli Eremiti at Palermo—reveal in Mr. Brokman an artist after the heart (and in some degree the exquisite manner) of John Ruskin. The artist's self-selected sketches are equally attractive; for example, his "Mt. Etna at Sunrise, from the Sea," or the "Outside Wall of the Moorish Castle at Ravello, near Amalfi." Of three maps, two are of particular interest—that of Sicily with Greek and English names, and that of Italy and Sicily under Roman rule.

"The Rulers of the South" is difficult to criticize, because the book is not uniform in style, and because in parts the author appears to be either more, or less, familiar with his subject-matter than elsewhere. Mr. Marion Crawford's style again and again recalls the least admirable manner of those fine writers (fine in the true sense), John Addington Symonds and Ferdinand Gregorovius. These specialists on Italian history and art, however, he does not appear to have read or even consulted. Their names do not occur in his specific list of consulted authorities, neither does the greater name of Edward Freeman. To judge by his voluntarily conspicuous list, Mr. Marion Crawford has not availed himself of these authors, and yet, after perusal of his book, it rests almost incredible that he has not learned a great deal from Freeman's lucid, orderly, and scholarly writings on his vast and intricate subject—a subject so vast and intricate that when death came suddenly upon the great historian at Alicante, while he was on his way to fresh investigations, he was only well on the highway and not at the goal of his History of Sicily. Mr. Crawford seems to have gone mainly to Italian sources, and doubtless wisely; but from internal evidence we should certainly opine that he had obtained as much from Freeman as from Tomacelli. From the eminent German historian, Adolf Holm, he has evidently learned much. The only Anglo-Saxon work to which he alludes, after Gibbon, is Mr. Bryce's "The Holy Roman Empire," though he has been preceded by a compatriot, Mr. William Agnew Paton, whose excellent book on Sicily was published two or three years ago by the Messrs. Harpers. Then there are the French works and other contemporary writings.

In reviewing "Ave Roma Immortalis" we noticed Mr. Crawford's inequality in style, but it is much more marked in "The Rulers of the South." The best portions of the earlier work were not in the culminating but in the earlier chapters, with one or two later sections. It is not so here. The least satisfactory pages are those which introduce the grand theme. Indeed, so artificial and stilted are they that, were the book written throughout in a like jejune manner, it would be readerless soon after the initial chapter. Fortunately, Mr. Crawford in time relinquishes his efflorescent, pseudo-classical style (wherein he displays all the faults and nothing of the eloquence and distinction of Addington Symonds) and adopts that of a facile and accomplished expositor. Here he grows from fair to good, from good to better. When, at last, he reaches the ever dramatic and moving story of the Sicilian Vespers we realize that a master in his craft is retelling us an oft-told tale with that vigour and convincing novelty which alone justify all but purely scholastic retelling. The style of Edward Freeman lacks more than one cardinal virtue, but it was with singular refreshment that, after an impatient reading of Mr. Crawford's opening pages, we turned over those of the late historian in the admirable "Story of the Nations" Series. It was the good strong sea after a perfumed bath. But thereafter, as we have said, all goes well, and from good to better with Mr. Crawford. In "The Rulers of the South" the author tells picturesquely, and not infrequently with rare ability, a story of extraordinary duration in time, and one of continuous fascination.

A WALK THROUGH AFRICA.

FROM CAPE TO CAIRO. By E. S. GROGAN and A. H. SHARP.
Illustrated by A. D. M'Cormick. (Hurst and Blackett. 21s. n.)

This is a most readable book. A Cambridge undergraduate, Mr. Grogan, follows the route of the proposed railway which will sooner or later bind together North and South Africa. Where there is already steam communication he availed himself of it, but where that stopped he faced all the danger and weariness of long journeys in the African tropics with the patience and courage of the most experienced traveller. Mr. Grogan had a colleague, Mr. Sharp. They both kept notes, and, finally, Mr. Grogan wrote the book from their joint notes with the exception of one chapter of special English interest, "Uganda to the Coast," which was done by Mr. Sharp. From the literary point of view the work is brightly written, naturally youthful at times, but full of good bits of description which are never too long, and the political observations on the various foreign systems of administration they encounter are sound and sensible. The illustrations are capital.

Mr. Rhodes contributes a characteristic introduction, and when we find Mr. Grogan speaking in unbounded admiration of his "land accumulating, wind-raising, and administrative ability," Mr. Rhodes could hardly do less. He says this walk through Africa from South to North makes him the more certain that he will complete the telegraph and railway "for surely he is not going to be beaten by the legs of a Cambridge undergraduate." Mr. Rhodes adds:—

As to the commercial aspect, every one supposes that the railway is being built with the only object that a human being may be able to get in at Cairo and get out at Cape Town. This is, of course, ridiculous. The object is to cut Africa through the centre, and the railway will pick up trade all along the route. The junctions to the East and West Coasts which will occur in the future will be outlets for the traffic obtained along the route of the line as it passes through the centre of Africa.

"Qui vivra verra," but even Mr. Grogan, full of admiration of Mr. Rhodes as he is, in his veridical account of the tropical regions of Eastern Africa, unconsciously shows that a great deal of elementary settlement must precede the through railway, and he also shows that the climate, taken as a whole, leaves much to be desired. The business really bristles with difficulties. It is comparatively easy to run a military railway of vast length across Asia as the Russians have done. They do not look for any commercial reward, or, at any rate, they regard the questions of profit and loss and the development of the districts through which they pass as secondary considerations. It is still more easy to run extensive railways through countries where good administration has already found a footing, and where the cultivation of new crops and the development of indigenous products are only waiting the market which a railway would bring within their reach. But in vast tracts of country in Central Africa tribe is still against tribe, fever reigns in forest and swamp, big game is the only product to be found in great abundance, and in one considerable district even cannibalism is still rampant. Mr. Grogan speaks highly of what the English are doing. "The name of Englishman is held high throughout Africa, and the Union Jack is the surest passport in the land." He speaks equally highly of the German work. Their object, he says, is to make new markets and open up country for coming generations. But he describes the Belgians as only thinking of immediate profit, never of permanent developments. This is worth quoting of the Congo Free State:—

I saw myself that a country apparently well populated and responsive to just treatment in Lugard's time (and that under very trying conditions, owing to the numbers of destitute aliens in the country—to wit, the Soudanese) is now practically a howling wilderness. . . Chaos, hopeless, abysmal chaos, from Mwezu to the Nile. . . On Tanganyika absolute impotence. . . On Kivu a hideous wave of cannibalism raging unchecked through the land.

Mr. Grogan winds up these mild remarks by saying:—

I have no hesitation in condemning the whole state (Congo Free State) as a vampire growth intending to suck the country dry.

He agrees with most students of the Central African question that what is wanted is organization. But the impetuosity of youth cannot wait till organization is advanced enough to bring trade, and railways will naturally be required with their outlets to the east, south, and north. The production of coffee of excellent quality in abundance will soon, if order is established, become the great staple industry; and cocoa and rubber will also make a great item of trade. Further north cotton is already being planted with success. As the districts become peaceable, and planted and inhabited in a settled fashion, the ivory trade will naturally diminish in importance, but that is of little value compared to the other products which will come in time. There are, of course, in Central Africa the drawbacks to life which are found in all tropical climates, and Mr. Grogan suffered from them as did his predecessors in travel. Poisonous snakes, flies of every size, ants that destroy, ants that bite, abound as they do elsewhere; but the mosquito seems, according to Mr. Grogan, to have chosen Africa as its special hunting-field. Then there is the "jigger," a little insect that bores its way into your foot and makes its home there, producing much inflammation and lameness. Torrential rains alternate with great drought, according to the season, until you reach the lakes, of which the description is well done, if not for the first time.

Mr. Grogan is as much a sportsman as a traveller. Elephants, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, buffalo, lion, leopard, roe, and antelope all went down before his gun. For those who care for sport there is a good chapter on big game shooting. The book winds up with a notice of the amount of the great railway that is still unmade. The portion from Bulawayo, the present southern railhead, to Lake Tanganyika, about 860 miles, is surveyed and practically agreed upon. Thence, if the vast waterways are utilized, there remain only 410 miles still to be made to the north. Of the through telegraph 1,600 miles were still to be constructed when Mr. Grogan passed through, but much has been done since then. The residue of the railway seems small, but Mr. Grogan himself shows what obstacles have still to be surmounted in gradients over hills of considerable magnitude, through swamps of vast extent, and water channels obstructed by vegetable growth almost impossible to cut through and maintain open.

It is interesting to any one who knew the Sudan and Central Africa when Sir Samuel Baker described Khartum as a den of dishonest officials and the Upper Nile as the haunt of slave-hunters to read Mr. Grogan's account of how all his troubles and dangers ended at Bor, someway south of Fashoda. There he came upon a post of the Egyptian army, and Captain Dunn, who commanded it, came forward. The following conversation ensued:—

Captain Dunn.—How do you do?

I.—Oh, very fit, thanks. How are you? Had any sport?

Captain Dunn.—Oh, pretty fair, but there is nothing much here. Have a drink? You must be hungry. I'll hurry on lunch.

STORIES OF THE OLD WEST INDIES.

The West Indies have always had a peculiar fascination for lovers of the romantic in life or in literature, and two volumes which have recently appeared will help to sustain their place in the public imagination. From the Hakluyt Society comes THE VOYAGE OF ROBERT DUDLEY, edited by George F. Warner, and the Royal Historical Society is responsible for an edition of THE NARRATIVE OF GENERAL VENABLES, which is prefaced and annotated by C. H. Firth. No particular praise can be bestowed upon either of these editors, but Mr. Warner has at least succeeded in writing a thoroughly readable and accurate preface. Mr. Firth's interest in the West Indies is apparently so slight that he does not realize that the spelling (in his preface) of "Barbadoes" is mainly an old (and still too common) printer's error for Barbados, and he should have looked up a good French atlas or dictionary before indexing the island of Guadeloupe as "Guadaloupe." But the narratives themselves are of great value to any lover of the daring temperament which has done so much to build up the British Empire, and no one who has examined archives in the West Indies can turn to them without keen anticipation of an historical treat. Robert Dudley, that son of the Earl of Leicester (by Lady Sheffield) who lived to be created Duke of Northumberland and Earl of Warwick in the Holy Roman Empire, "was a person of stature tall and comely, also strong, valiant, famous at the exercise of tilting, singularly skill'd in all mathematick learning, but chiefly in navigation and architecture, a rare chymist, and of great knowledge of phisic" in mature manhood, so that it is not likely that he entered upon an adventure, even at the early age of twenty years, without possessing better practical qualifications for the enterprise than his "impulsive, chivalrous character." Mr. Warner's volume contains three narratives of Dudley's voyage—that of Captain Wyatt, that of Dudley himself, and that of Abram Kendall, Master. The first of these has not been printed before, and is both full and graphic; Mr. Warner thinks that the author may have been that Captain Thomas Wyatt who was Commissary of Musters at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1589, and headed a hundred men of Kent in the Cadiz expedition of 1596. Whoever the man may have been, he was evidently a sincere admirer of Dudley, and capable of setting forth excellent reasons for his admiration. Dudley's own account of the expedition may of course be read in Hakluyt's Voyages as well as in Mr. Warner's book. Kendall's narrative is "mainly a Portulano or Ruttier, recording the variations of the course pursued on the voyage," but it includes some matter of greater interest to modern readers than details concerning distances or directions of winds. The writer's references to the now famous Pitch Lake of Trinidad will be new to most students of West Indian topography; and he mentions the Trinidadian Marcasite Mine which supplied "much gold to the Indians, who dig it out for the purpose of making certain half-moons which they wear on the neck for ornament." As Dudley remarked, "All is not gold that glistereth," but that fact would not trouble Caribs. On the 4th of February, 1594-95 Dudley gravely affixed to a tree near the so-called gold mine a leaden plate embellished with the Queen's arms, and engraved with an arrogant Latin inscription. In Guiana, as in Trinidad, the hope of gold was the attraction. The soil of parts of Guiana to-day is undoubtedly auriferous. Dudley, however, failed to find the mine spoken of by one Armago, who showed him a few golden crescents. Perhaps the most interesting detail of Dudley's doings upon this expedition was the two-days' fight which the Bear maintained with a huge Spanish ship of war, that "went up-right as a church."

The "Narrative of General Venables" should stand next to Mr. Darnell Davis' "Cavaliers and Roundheads in Barbados" upon the shelves of students of West Indian history. It largely consists of an apology for the conduct of its writer while in command of the military forces of the expedition. And yet, the more one knows of West Indian "conditions," the less can adverse criticism of the actions of General Venables in the Caribbean Sea appear reasonable. Cromwell might wonder at the way in which Venables let his troops run loose after disembarking them too far from San Domingo, but what if it is true that Penn was detaining the "guides" elsewhere, and that neither Penn nor Dakyns did their duty in other respects? Besides this, we know that the English Government must be blamed for many of the defects of the equipment and even organization of the force; the men had no water bottles, and their arms were undoubtedly, as Mr. Firth very properly points out, "equally deficient both in quantity and in quality." Again, without admitting that Barbados was rightly described by Henry Whistler as "the dunghill whereon England doth cast out its rubbish," we can believe that the Barbadian contingent provided some rather inferior fighting material. However, neither the errors of General Venables nor the defects of his soldiers prevented Jamaica from falling into the hands of the English. It is true that St. Jago was little more than a town of empty houses when the English troops entered it, but this was at least partly owing to the bold manner in which General Venables had announced his intention of taking permanent possession of the island. After his too easy triumph, it was but natural that the real troubles of the expedition should begin. We can understand that what the soldiery desired was a little fighting and plenty of loot, such as might be obtained by a vigorous onslaught upon Carthage or Vera Cruz. To turn their hands to pioneering and peasant-proprietorship in Jamaica was the lot actually offered to most of them. Mr. Firth has furnished his edition of the "Narrative" with some valuable documentary appendices, but it is a pity that the space in his preface is so much taken up with the attempt to pass verdicts upon Venables' conduct and character—matters as to which other students of West Indian history will prefer to form their own opinions—and so little enriched by any statements of fact bearing upon the order of those events which the "Narrative" of General Venables deals with in a manner most confusing to any but a "specialist" reader.

CÆSARISM IN FRANCE AND GERMANY.*

With the fifth volume of his memoirs, which M. Ollivier, the notorious ex-Minister of Napoleon III., has now published, he reaches the turning point of the Second Empire, the famous decree of November 24, 1860, and treats, towards the end of the book, of the rise of a Bismarckian policy in Europe. The memoirs gather interest as they proceed. More and more vividly they depict two interesting psychological cases: The Emperor and M. Ollivier himself.

M. Ollivier reads the past with the preoccupations and bias which later events have given him; there has seldom issued from the pen of a skilful novelist a more ironical analysis of prodigious self-delusion. George Eliot always tried to trace to small beginnings, to minute causes, to some very trifling disregard of the moral law, the momentous tragedies in which her heroes generally terminate their career; but her Gwendolen Harleth and Tito Melema do not remain always blind to the change that comes over them. They lack the supreme distinction with which the artist invests his characters, a thin veneer of irony.

In 1860, the Emperor discovered that the time had come when the Empire might, from oppressive autocracy, suddenly lapse into Constitutional and Parliamentary Government. Haunted, no doubt, by reflections on his uncle's life, he fancied that he might succeed where the First Napoleon had failed, after Elba. Yet the decree of 1860 is the "Article Additionnel" of the Second Empire. The concessions granted to the Liberals were sufficiently meagre, and the enthusiasm which they caused now appears extraordinary. The Chambers were permitted to vote an address in answer to the Emperor's speech; the papers were allowed to print a report of the debates, and a kind of Ministerial responsibility was established with the curious innovation of ministres sans portefeuille.

M. Emile Ollivier's enthusiasm knew no bounds. His Republican faith, which the experiment of 1848 had considerably shaken, succumbed before the magnanimous offers of the Emperor to Liberal France. He has taken care, as is the wont of conscientious writers of memoirs, to explain his attitude. The explanation is full of interest and, read in the light of the recent explosion of nationalism, gives an insight into the working of the political conscience of such men as M. Méline and the members of the Patrie Française. A general principle overshadows his whole conduct:—"I held truly aloof from all parties, having to seek only for what was useful to the people, my only judge." His motto was to remain in the Opposition, non ut everteret, sed ut sanaret, and to help the Emperor to establish a Government of liberty. But what does M. Ollivier mean by liberty? Political liberty, that is, the right for all parties to express their opinions in Press, pulpit, or tribune, to elect their representatives to the various local or general assemblies, to control the deeds of Government, M. Ollivier cares little for. What he prizes most is social liberty:—

La véritable liberté, ou plutôt le fond, l'essentiel, la substance de toute la liberté, c'est la liberté civile ou sociale, c'est-à-dire celle de gérer ses affaires comme on l'entend, sans gênes inutiles et sans immixtions oppressives, sans autre surveillance que celle de la justice; celle d'être le législateur de sa famille, vivant, par l'éducation, mort, par le testament, de pratiquer librement sa religion ou sa philosophie, de s'associer pour la charité, pour la prière, pour la défense de son travail; d'être le souverain absolu de son corps et de son esprit, de sa conscience et de ses intérêts, en tout ce qui ne concerne pas les autres et n'est pas de nature à compromettre l'ordre public. . . .

All this is excellent, and no enlightened Liberal would dispute for a moment these golden sentences. But mark the closing restriction. M. Ollivier says several times that his ideal of government is the gouvernement fort that maintains order. Unfortunately the strong rulers of France have always considered it an imperative duty, in order to carry out their ideal, to disregard totally the individual right to a certain amount of freedom. M. Ollivier probably opposes M. Waldeck-Rousseau on principle, yet the latter may invoke the former's political theory to justify the trial of the Assumptionist Fathers, free to associate for prayer or charity, but not for political opposition. M. Ollivier fails to recognize that, so long as a form of government is not accepted without arrière pensée by an overwhelming majority, the spirit of persecution, the disregard for the rights of man, the morbid craving for espionage, police supervision, and State trials will be characteristic of the party in power. It is a mere question of self-defence; and the laws of war are more brutal than the laws of peace. After the decree of 1860, the Prefect of Police was, as before, the mainspring of the Empire. The good tyrant, the Marcus Aurelius in whom M. Ollivier awaits the saviour of his country, appears only when the world has passed into the hands of a single ruler. And yet, under the wisest tyrant whom the Aryan race has evolved, the opposition had to suffer arbitrary treatment. Such is the law of political necessity.

A last motive for his conduct M. Ollivier finds in the peculiar form of Napoleonic government. Cæsarism is at bottom democracy. With a dictator at the head of a country there is no aristocracy as in a Constitutional Monarchy or an opportunist Republic. The people are the rulers, for they have manifested their will in a plebiscite. Such an apology is merely the defence of expediency in politics. No doubt, had success attended the ex-Minister of Napoleon's plans, his attitude would now be deemed not only judicious, but laudable. Expediency is justified only by success. To fail not ignobly one must fail owing to too strict an adherence to general principles. Cato, Admiral Coligny, Montrose are illustrious vanquished; not so M. Ollivier. The good tyrant, on the other hand, becomes, in this fifth volume, more and more exhausted. There is nothing in his scepticism, his benevolence, his general indifference to strong measures, to recall the great Uncle. Read the chapter on the fall of Minister Thouvenel to discover where the weakness of the Empire lay; the Minister fell on the Roman question, for defending with too much zeal the interest of France, which was not that of the Empress. "You make people think you have abdicated, you lose your prestige," said Persigny, and Mérimée added, speaking of the Empress:—"Every evil, every mistake will henceforth be laid to her charge."

The rise in Europe of a Bismarckian policy, with which the book closes, gives us an opportunity of mentioning three different biographies of the great statesman, which have appeared recently, and which may be read with fruit in connexion with M. Ollivier's defence.

M. Andler's work is remarkable as being in distinct advance on all that has been written in France on the hereditary enemy. A professor at the Ecole Normale, a Socialist, and a fearless savant, M. Andler does not hesitate to pen such sentences as these:—"Bismarck a fait d'abord la puissance allemande en Alsace-Lorraine aussi douce qu'il a pu;" speaking of the Alsatian Deputies to the Reichstag, especially of the Catholic priests, he says:—"Ayant ridiculisé leur cause, ils la trahirent." "La bourgeoisie alsacienne est un peu canarde." "On peut admettre que la France n'ait que des droits médiocres sur l'Alsace-Lorraine, après qu'elle l'a vendue pour avoir la paix." This is not the maudlin attitude of the revanchard member of the Ligue des Patriotes, who feels equal to venting his fury against the enemy only on the Place de la Concorde, before the statue of Strassburg. Germany, concludes M. Andler, being now a revolutionary country, there is no

* "L'Empire Libéral." By Emile Ollivier. Vol. V. Paris. Garnier. Fr.3.50.

"Le Prince de Bismarck." By Ch. Andler. Paris. Bellais. Fr.3.50.

"Bismarck." By Welschinger. Paris. Alcan. Fr.3.50.

"Le Prince de Bismarck." By Ch. Benoist. Paris. Perrin. Fr.3.50.

reason for her not coming to an understanding with revolutionary France.

This is the voice of Socialist France. M. Welschinger writes from the Nationalist standpoint, and whereas M. Andler's book, issued by a firm of publishers mainly recruited among former members of the Ecole Normale, is intended for cultured readers only, M. Welschinger's short biography is for popular circulation. It is short, compact, brilliantly written, and rendered palatable to the average Frenchman by a furious denunciation of the implacable Prince :—

Maintenant, pour nous Français, que doit-il ressortir de l'étude de ce puissant homme d'état, adversaire acharné de tout ce qui pouvait empêcher la grandeur et la prospérité de son pays? C'est qu'il faut, en se gardant de ses injustices et de ses violences, avoir la même ardeur pour les intérêts de la patrie, la même confiance en elle, et pour cela maintenir fidèlement les traditions d'autorité, de respect, de religion sans lesquelles tout irait à la dérive, se serrer étroitement autour du drapeau aux trois couleurs. . . écarter les détracteurs du passé et les douteurs de l'avenir, les ironistes, les corrupteurs et les ennemis de tout idéal . . . enfin croire, dire et répéter que la France est toujours la nation noble et généreuse, avide d'honneur et de gloire.

Here we have the utterance of the bourgeois and the Philistine.

M. Charles Benoist's study is an agreeable and suggestive psychological analysis of an unscrupulous statesman's character. Bismarck is for him the "Prince" of Macchiavelli, a strong-hearted man, both of constructive and destructive genius, with dark hours of irritation, nervousness, and depression.

Perusal of these monographs on the once great enemy of France suggests the reflection that the temper of the nation with regard to Germany is changing. Does the hostility towards England mean sympathy towards Germany? One is inclined to think that there is more than a mere coincidence between the interest taken in Bismarck and the triumph of Germany at the Paris Exhibition.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Soul of Ireland.

In IDEALS IN IRELAND (Unicorn Press, 3s. 6d.), edited by Lady Gregory, we have a new phase of the Irish movement which Englishmen ought certainly not to ignore, and which finds expression in essays by "A. E.," Dr. Douglas Hyde, Mr. Standish O'Grady, Mr. D. P. Moran, Mr. W. B. Yeats, and Mr. George Moore. The politician, often noisy and intemperate, gives place to the literary man, who gives a very different and a far more attractive voice to Irish aspirations. The hate of England gives place to the love of Ireland, to the longing to realize in a national life the true "soul of the people" which is to find its free expression through the Irish language. The essays are interesting and moderate in tone; their fault is that they breathe little more than the well-meaning aspirations of literary enthusiasts. Disunion, the dominance of priests, the vast questions connected with commerce and industry—these and many other questions of practical statesmanship must be grappled with before the soul of the Irish can be even found, much less revived; and yet these questions are hardly touched upon. When six Irish littérateurs assure us that, if Ireland were only de-Anglicized, there would start into life "a thousand dormant energies, spiritual, intellectual, artistic, social, economic, and human," one can be hardly convinced by the assertion, though one may sympathize with the writer's sincerity, any more than after reading Mr. W. B. Yeats on "The Literary Movement in Ireland" does one find the certain signs of a reborn national literature fresh from "the soul" of the modern Irish in the revival by modern students, in a self-conscious critical age, of the old superstitious lore and legend of the early Celt. But the essays deserve to be read and pondered not only by Irishmen but by Englishmen.

The War.

The ex-Lieutenant of General de Villebois-Mareuil, who has written TEN MONTHS IN THE FIELD WITH THE BOERS (Heinemann, 3s. 6d.), is a truly remarkable person. His most distinguishing characteristic is his invincible but light-hearted ignorance. There is a blunder of some sort on almost every page. His account of our acquisition of the Cape Settlements is delicious: "England, anxious to acquire the Colony when it began to prosper, sent out a number of emigrants, reinforcing them steadily, till they became an important factor in the community." He does not seem to know that England took the Colony by force of arms from France, and in 1814 compensated Holland with £6,000,000. He says that England "confiscated" the Kimberley diamond fields, forgetting to mention that the dispute went to arbitration, and that the Free State got £90,000 for its claims. He says that the Convention of London "recognized the absolute independence of the Transvaal"—a statement disproved by Mr. Kruger's own efforts to get the Convention abrogated. After this the statements that "at Belmont Lord Methuen was repulsed with heavy loss," and that Mr. Rhodes tried to escape from Kimberley in a balloon are by comparison almost credible.

The writer's great complaint is that his Boer friends would not take his advice on military matters. We do not wonder at their reluctance to do so when we read the following passage :—

At the beginning of the retreat, a field cornet came to ask my advice, as often happened. He disregarded it, as always happened. I wanted them to destroy the reservoirs, burn the forage, and poison the wells all along the line of retreat.

The italics are ours. If, as we are told, "an English officer of rank . . . assured me that if the measures I had advised had been taken, Roberts' 40,000 men, for the most part mounted, would never have achieved their task," we are much afraid that that English officer, hearing a prisoner confess that he had proposed to defy the laws of civilized warfare, was polite enough not to believe him.

Paris.

Both the good American who hopes to find his Paradise in Paris, and his less worthy British brother who regards Goethe's "Universal City" in quite another light, will find something to amuse them in Mr. Reynolds-Ball's volumes PARIS IN ITS SPLENDOR (Dana Estes, Boston). He has gathered together an immense amount of material, and, beginning with medieval Paris, the author concludes by giving his readers a glimpse of the side-shows at the late Exhibition. Perhaps the most interesting chapters are those which deal with Paris under the Bourbons, for, though the city under the Revolutionary and Napoleonic aspects has been dealt with exhaustively, very little is known even of the history of France between the year which saw the disappearance of Napoleon and that in which Louis Philippe usurped his cousin's throne. Mr. Reynolds-Ball quotes Thackeray's wonderful description of the ceremony which took place in the Invalides when Napoleon's body was brought home to rest on French soil :—

While everybody's heart was thumping as hard as possible, Napoleon's coffin passed. It was done in an instant. A box, covered with a great red cross—a dingy-looking crown lying on the top of it—seamen on one side, and Invalides on the other; they had passed in an instant and were up the aisle. A faint, snuffling sound as before was heard from the officiating priests, but we knew of nothing more. It is said that old Louis Philippe was standing at the catafalque, whither the Prince de Joinville advanced, and said "Sire, I bring you the body of the Emperor Napoleon." Louis Philippe answered, "I receive it in the name of France." Bertrand put on the body the most glorious, victorious sword that ever has been forged since the apt descendants of the first murderer learned how to hammer steel, and the coffin was placed in the temple prepared for it.

The writer justly considers that no account of "Paris in its Splendour" would be complete without a more or less exhaustive reference to the wonderful museums and picture galleries which stud every quarter of the town, and of which only the world-famous collections—such as the Louvre and the Luxembourg—are really at all well known to the average English tourist; and yet not only the thoughtful student of French history, but every intelligent visitor to Paris, will find much to delight and absorb him in the minor marvels of the wonderful city. How few of the soldier visitors to Paris know, for instance, of the extraordinary collection of armour and weapons of war stored away at the Invalides, which date from the days of Louis XIV.; though, of course, the collection was much added to and improved under Napoleon I., who, with that versatility which seemed to distinguish him, found time to interest himself with the collection of pre-Revolutionary weapons. As for the Hotel Carnavalet, formerly the town house, or, rather, palace of Madame de Sévigné, it is scarcely ever visited by the foreign tourist; and yet there the municipal authorities keep not only their archives, but their relics of the Revolution; and the great rooms where Madame de Sévigné entertained her friends are so arranged as to give an almost startling idea of what the Paris of Danton and Robespierre was like. In the chapter entitled "The Boulevards and Cafés, and Some Literary Landmarks," the author takes his readers through the Paris made familiar in the hundred and one romances which deal with the Quartier Latin and Bohemian-Paris generally. Of more real value is an interesting account of a little known side of the city, namely, the municipal and legal worlds. There is an exceptionally good index.

Naval.

OUR NAVAL HEROES (Murray, 16s.) looks like a merely popular book. It is really written by specialists for students. The articles of which it consists are reprinted from the United Service Magazine, and are mostly written by descendants of the Admirals whose achievements are related. In these circumstances the standard of literary performance naturally varies. Some of the writers hardly get beyond short bald sentences, reading like a string of words of command. Others, like Professor Laughton and Vice-Admiral Colomb, write with the skill of practised essayists. In any case the reader will get from the book not a mere string of battle stories, but a critical appreciation of the development of naval strategy and tactics. Admiral Colomb's defence of the Earl of Torrington, against Macaulay's attack, is especially noteworthy. Macaulay was far too prejudiced a Whig to let considerations of naval policy influence his judgment when purely political interests had a bearing, real or apparent, on the discussion. In the matter of the controversy which has raged over Nelson's conduct at Naples, Professor Laughton sticks to his guns:—"His action was perfectly fair and above board, and those who have impeached his memory on this score have been misled by the lies of the Italian Jacobins." Misled or not, they have made out a case too strong to be dismissed in this very summary manner. The book on the whole, however, is one of great interest and value; though we are not sure that the list of Admirals selected for treatment is the very best that could have been made out. Would not the Duke of York, Sir Edward Codrington, and Lord Cochrane, of Basque Roads fame, have been better worth writing about than, say, Viscount Bridport, Viscount Exmouth, and Sir T. Byam Martin? Each Admiral's portrait is given, and there are plans of Quiberon and of Aboukir Bay. Other plans might have been included with advantage.

SHIPS AND HAVENS, by Henry Van Dyck (Nelson, 1s. 6d.), is a book with a misleading title. It commences with a discussion of ships only to lead up to a discourse on religious and moral problems, is sensible without being brilliant, and is chiefly remarkable on account of the fantastic manner in which it is printed.

The Second Empire.

Monsieur Armand Dayot has won a well-earned reputation by the albums with which he has illustrated various periods of French history. His latest album is entitled LE SECOND EMPIRE, and brings together old prints, old photographs, old caricatures, old playbills, old fashion plates, and everything else that can throw light upon the reign of Napoleon III. The book can hardly fail to interest any one who turns over its pages, and it should be particularly valuable to historical novelists and black and white artists who have occasion to deal with the period. With such a book in front of them it will be almost impossible for them to make their usual mistakes as to the costumes.

Miss Elizabeth Gilbert Martin's translations of Baron Imbert de Saint Amand's long series of books on the reign of Napoleon III. continue to appear. NAPOLEON III. AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS POWER (Hutchinson, 6s.) deals with the events of the year 1860—the year of the Syrian expedition, the exploits of Garibaldi, and the Chinese war. The author's anti-English, clerical, and reactionary bias are more in evidence than ever; but we would forgive him for it if the book were interesting. Unfortunately it is not. The books of Imbert de Saint Amand that really deserve to be translated are those about the Captivity of the Duchesse de Berry and the early life of Louis Philippe.

Captain Charles Boothby, R.E.

UNDER ENGLAND'S FLAG (A. and C. Black, 6s.) contains a selection from the memoirs and correspondence of Captain Boothby dealing with the period (from 1804 to 1809) prior to that treated of by the same author in "A Prisoner of France." During these years he served in the expedition to Italy and Sicily under Sir James Craig, and later under Sir John Stuart; in the expeditions to Sweden and Spain and Portugal under Sir John Moore, taking part in the battle of Corunna; and he was in General Sherbrooke's Division at the commencement of Wellington's Peninsular campaign. His memoirs, and especially his letters home, throw many sidelights on these important events, and are remarkably fresh and chatty. Letters in those days were apt to be rather formal affairs, but Captain Boothby's are as modern in tone (and as freely bedecked with slang) as any letters from South Africa to-day. They have the merit also of revealing the writer's character—his earnest and manly simplicity of faith and his devotion to his leaders. No general could wish for a nobler tribute than he has given to Sir John Moore—"the man I looked up to as a god, and held in the most cordial respect and affection"—whose treatment by irresponsible critics at home gave him temporarily a thorough dislike of military service. But the book is interesting throughout, and not only to the student of military history.

Ballooning.

IN BY LAND AND SKY (Isbister, 7s. 6d.) the Rev. J. M. Bacon gives a popular account of his recent ballooning exploits and observations. Mr. Bacon was first "balloon-struck" many years ago at Cambridge, but had few opportunities of practising aeronautics until recently; during the last few years he has made a number of ascents and has considerably extended our knowledge of aerial acoustics. Many terrible disasters have resulted from apparently unaccountable failures of the fog-signals off our shores to make themselves heard out at sea; this was notably the case when the Stella was wrecked barely two years ago on the Casquets off Alderney. Mr. Bacon's balloon trips, planned expressly for the purpose, have done much to clear up the circumstances under which the air, whether foggy or clear, may become thus impenetrable to sound-waves. But his ascents have not always been so successful. The failure of the Leonid meteoric shower to come off properly as predicted, in November last year, was a great disappointment to the scientific world in general; but probably nobody has more right to express discontent with the defaulting meteors than Mr. Bacon, who went, if not halfway, at any rate part of the way to meet them in a balloon. He gives a very graphic account of this ascent in his book, and points out that if he failed to attain his object on this occasion, he at any rate established the English ballooning record by remaining aloft for ten hours.

Off East Africa.

To Englishmen of the world-annexing type Madagascar must have a rather melancholy interest, since it is about the only great island of importance, with, perhaps, the one exception of Java, in which we had claims and from which we have been ousted. Though Alfred Grandidier was the first really accurate observer who worked and travelled among the Malagasy, he left much to be done. His work has been carried on in MADAGASCAR, MAURITIUS, AND OTHER EAST AFRICAN ISLANDS (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.) by Professor Dr. C. Keller, who not only writes clearly after the manner of his Gallic predecessor, but is thorough after the manner of the German. There is, perhaps, no book which gives within reasonable limits so clear a picture of the Malagan Hovas, the African Sakalavas, and the other less important ethnologic stocks of the island known to Ptolemy as Menuthias. In the scope of his book Dr. Keller includes Nossi Bé, and the Mascarenes, or Mauritius, Réunion, and Rodriguez, and he has something to say as well of the less-known Austral-African islands and of the Seychelles. The volume is well illustrated.

The Tourist in Abyssinia.

Mr. Herbert Vivian, who lately took a trip to Abyssinia, would, no doubt, be the first to admit that other people have done the same thing before him. It follows that his ABYSSINIA (Pearsons, 15s.) is merely a book of travel, and has nothing to do with exploration. The traveller went to Harrar and Addis Ababa, was received by Menelek, and came back again. He tells his story fluently, pleasantly, and in the tone of a man whose contempt for barbarians is mitigated by a lively sense of humour; but he had no adventures and has nothing of importance to say. It is at least gratifying to gather from his pages that English influence has begun to assert itself at the Court of the Negus; that the state of things at Jibuti affords an object lesson in the failure of French colonial methods, and that Menelek desires a quiet life, and is not in the least likely to go seeking adventures in the direction of the Sudan. But, of course, Mr. Vivian had to observe hastily, and his observations have to be taken at their face value. There are a good many photographs in the book. Some of them are better than others. One or two of them are quite good.

Graphology.

THE LANGUAGE OF HANDWRITING, by Richard Dimsdale Stocker (Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. n.), is a little book which may possibly give some people entertainment in assisting them to read, or misread, the characters of their friends from the way in which they form their p's and q's. The "science," however, is attended by many pitfalls, as the tyro will realize when he learns that one and the same stroke can stand either for "satisfied ambition," for "envious pride," or for "modesty." Think of condemning your friend for envious pride on the strength of the first stroke of his capital N and erasing his name from your address-book only to discover when it was too late that what you had mistaken for pride was but the shrinking modesty of the violet! It is not yet clear that graphology any more than phrenology can be reduced to a science at all. A few quite general rules may guide one in reading writing as in reading faces, but the finer modifications cannot be formulated and taught. One has but to remember the exquisitely ludicrous mistakes into which Lavater occasionally fell to be reminded how hopelessly even experts can go astray.

Reprints.

Among reprints we may note Walton's COMPLETE ANGLER (3s. 6d.), edited, together with the "Lives" in Messrs. Macmillan's "Library of English Classics," with a bibliographical note, by Mr. A. W. Pollard; THE GYPSIES IN SPAIN added to Mr. Murray's "Borrow" (6s.); Jeremy Taylor's HOLY LIVING (Dent, 2 vols.), added to the "Temple Classics," and edited by Mr. A. R. Waller, with a bibliographical note, an explanatory index of words, Taylor's own references being placed at the end; Carlyle's FRENCH REVOLUTION (2s.) added to Messrs. Ward, Lock's "Minerva Library," with an introduction by Mr. G. T. Bettany, and Nansen's FARTHEST NORTH (6s.) added to Constable's well-selected "Library of Travel and Biography."

The new edition of THE LETTERS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON (Methuen, 12s.), bound like the other Stevensons in dark blue buckram, has two new letters of the "composed" type—one to Mr. Austin Dobson, and one written in the character of Alan Breck replying to a letter written by Rudyard Kipling in the character of Mulvaney—and another of more personal interest to George Meredith, which suggests a classification of the letters into the natural and the artificial. "I am off business to-day," says the writer, "and this is not meant to be literature."

We welcome an abridged edition of EDWARD WHITE BENSON (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. n.), for, highly as we praised Mr. A. C. Benson's intensely interesting life of his father when it first appeared, its length must certainly have frightened off many readers.

In ELECTRICITY (Blackie, 4s. 6d.) Mr. J. D. Everett brings into line with modern electrical theory Part III. of Everett's "Deschanel's Natural Philosophy." It is a book for the serious and mathematical student, but a large amount of explanatory matter has been introduced in smaller print which will help beginners.

Messrs. Cassell are bringing out in parts (6d. each) an illustrated edition of Major Arthur Griffith's well-known MYSTERIES OF POLICE AND CRIME. The pictures, partly facsimiles of documents and reproductions of old prints, add much to its interest.

DEBRET'S HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE JUDICIAL BENCH (Dean, 7s.) contains all Parliamentary corrections up to Jan. 22, 1901. Those who have forgotten may be reminded that this work of reference gives particulars of colonial as well as of British and Irish Judges. Whitaker's PEERAGE (3s. 6d.) is a little expanded, especially on the subject of Bishops, and it has the distinction of giving the most accurate and complete guide to titles, such as the use of the word "Honourable," that we have seen.

It is impossible to take very seriously Mr. D. Macfadyen's ALFRED THE WEST SAXON: KING OF THE ENGLISH, in Dr. Horton's Saintly Lives Series (Dent, 4s. 6d.). The subject has been adequately treated by great historians, and it was hardly necessary to give the results of their researches with the addition of pious reflections. The author introduces, not very usefully, a discussion on the question: "May a Christian be a soldier?" The answer to the question hinges on the definition of Christianity. A strict definition leads to one answer and a loose definition to another. Nor would the contemplation of the career of Alfred enable us to decide between the two even if fact and legend could be disentangled. Mr. Macfadyen's book, in short, is half sermon, half biography, and is not quite satisfactory from either point of view.

In IMPOSSIBILITIES, by Hugh Beveridge (A. Gardner), we have a collection of the scattered writings of a young literary man who came to London to fight for opportunity, began to succeed, and then fell ill and died at the age of 32. There is some evidence in the book that he would have done well if his health had suffered him to persevere, though his work on the whole is more distinguished by promise than by performance. Some of the items printed are verse, which is good verse, without being poetry; the rest are mostly weird, pathetic, short stories of the sort that editors as a rule are more ready to admire than to accept. We trust that it is the printer and not either the author or his editor who speaks of a certain eminent patron of the arts as Mœœnus.

In CHINESE JEWS (Oxford: Horace Hart, 1s.), Mr. Marcus N. Adler throws light upon a subject about which most of us know very little. It has been known, however, that there were Jews in China ever since the first Jesuit missionaries visited the country, and there is possibly an allusion to them in the Prophet Isaiah: "Behold these shall come from afar; and, lo, these from the north and the west; and these from the land of Sinim." Subsequent research has elicited many interesting discoveries; the discovery that the Jews are known to the Celestials as "the sect that pluck out the sinews, and the discovery of a synagogue with a "chair of Moses" at Kai-Fung-Foo. To those who suggest that the Jews of China may belong to the lost ten tribes, Mr. Adler replies that he knows of no reason either for or against that theory.

Dr. W. Page May's HELWÂN AND THE EGYPTIAN DESERT (Allen, 3s.) is an acceptable new guide-book, drawing attention to a new health resort, fifteen miles south of Cairo, patronized by the late Duke of Coburg, and now coming deservedly into prominence. The photographs are so good that one is tempted to say that they alone are worth all the money; and there are special chapters on the archaeology by Professor Sayce, and on the flora by Professor Schweinfurth.

Major J. J. Crooks' SHORT HISTORY OF SIERRA LEONE (Dublin: Nation Printing and Publishing Company) is intended for use in the schools of the colony, and may be welcome in other circles in which information about Sierra Leone is desired. The narrative is straightforward and concise, as well as simple, and some interesting historical documents are printed as appendices. There are also maps and pictures.

Two new legal works must be mentioned with commendation—CHARTER-PARTIES AND BILLS OF LADING, and THE LAW RELATING TO GENERAL AND PARTICULAR AVERAGE, both by Lawrence Duckworth (Effingham Wilson, 2s. 6d. n. each). What charter-parties and general and particular average are underwriters do not require to be told, and other people probably do not want to know. The manuals are for underwriters, who will find what they want in them lucidly and briefly put.

ART.

The Ruskin Drawings.

Only those who know intimately the drawings at Oxford, certainly not those who drew their knowledge of Mr. Ruskin as an artist from the Severn collection recently exhibited at the Fine Art Society, could have been prepared for the exhibition which now holds place at the Old Water Colour Society in Pall Mall. It is so bright, so complete, that the public who takes the trouble can see in this collection the depth of the fallacy that only the unsuccessful painter is well fitted to become the critic. There is no sign of artistic failure, and there is even a danger that the hurrying public may forget Ruskin the teacher in Ruskin the artist. What they have neither time nor inclination to learn from the writings of the greatest art critic of our era they may gather from these four hundred painstaking achievements. The collection is unique, for it contains hardly anything, if we except the "Zipporah," beyond the pretensions of a sketch. And yet the beauty of the whole must appeal irresistibly to the artistic mind. The infinite variety, the love of colour which amounted almost to a mania, the delicacy and the firmness of touch, the observation and natural perception show the true artist on every square inch of paper. Ruskin was a superb copyist, and a copyist of Nature using water-colour in a clean bright manner entirely beyond the practice of his time and with a mastery over pencil quite unusual. And the pains shown in every detail free from any appearance of effort! The solid draughtsmanship of "Fondaco de' Turchi," the strength of the "Castelbarco Tomb, Verona," and of the "Study of Rocks and Lichens" (130), the pearliness of "The Approach from Mestre to Venice" and of a "Wayside near Bonneville," these are contrasts of vision enough, even if we take no account of the hard "Sunset at Lucca" and "Crossmount" compared with the gossamer-like "Old Bridge at Bonneville" and "Amboise." The marvel is that with all this conscientious work of the brush and pencil Ruskin found time to be so convincing a writer. Oxford during the past half century has had a proud roll of achievement; but is not Ruskin of the foremost?

AN ALBUM OF DRAWINGS, by James Guthrie (Shorne, near Gravesend, 1900), discloses an artist of more imagination than is usually to be found working within arbitrary and self-imposed limitations. He, it would seem, mixes his methods and combines a rugged line with washes of body colour, of Chinese white and Indian ink, which when reproduced have a tendency to "muddle." The ability to draw is no less uncertain than the technique employed, but overriding all is a poetic temperament which is the one thing which excuses the profession of art. If Mr. Guthrie can retain the poetry of such drawings as "The Wood Elf" and "The Watcher," whilst improving his handiwork, he has more than the average share of this world's chances. At present he has very little sense of the value of blank spaces.

FICTION.

A Tragic Romance.

That romance may bring us nearer to life than realism is a truth not fully appreciated by some novelists—perhaps because the true romance is less easy to capture than that form of realism which comes to the ordinarily gifted observer. Although in his latest book VERITY (Arnold, 6s.) Mr. Sidney Pickering is in some externals conventional, he is yet fortunate enough to give us a truly imaginative picture of the fortune of an extremely interesting girl and woman of the days of the Regency. It is not easy to catch the spirit of country life in the early days of the nineteenth century or to reconstruct the men and women of an age of social revolution. But the heroine, Verity, is admirably drawn—a type of changing times. Her father, the proud and passionate Vicar, with an old-fashioned code of manners, also helps the author to create a period and put his narrative in perspective. Such character drawing is rare and as pleasant as infrequent. In the first few chapters an atmosphere is produced, a charm is woven; romance is there, skill, conviction, life as it was in the beginning of the last century, and love and tragedy such as they always are. In the telling, Mr. Pickering gives many entertaining pictures, many vital sketches of subordinate but necessary characters—such as Zodak Tregoeze and Bob Griffiths—and does so with a spirit and élan that makes the reader feel the life-blood pulsing through the book. From the moment when Verity's lover—the picturesque young officer who has been "made by war and women"—awoke in her the first "thrill of passion which to a nature as crystal pure as Verity's is a revelation of a new heaven and a new earth," to the final inevitable catastrophe, we are held by the author's agreeable fancy and dramatic skill. Perhaps Verity's tragedy is a little too poignant for the highest art, a little too remorselessly driven home; but we are glad to welcome so much that is convincing, and delighted to overlook faults which will no doubt be avoided in the next work of so clever and sympathetic an author as Mr. Pickering.

A Good Historical Novel.

Mr. Francis Marion Crawford has produced a delightful "costume" romance which he calls IN THE PALACE OF THE KING (Macmillan, 6s.). It stands as a model to others of his craft who would essay this popular branch of fiction. "In old Madrid, long years ago," in fact in the romantic and sensational days of Philip II., the story is laid. Don John of Austria, the Most Christian King, the delightful lady of the Court, Dolores, and her sister Inez play their parts in a drama composed of every sort of intrigue and romance that the heart of adventurous man can desire. After more than 350 crowded pages of enthralling narrative the fortunes of all are righted, and the lurid picture ends in peace. Among the many things of beauty in Mr. Crawford's book must be counted the illustrations. In these Mr. Fred Roe gives us some excellent work. Almost all Mr. Crawford's thirty odd volumes, from "Mr. Isaacs" to "Corleone," have been distinguished, but in its especial genre "In the Palace of the King" is a masterpiece; there is a picturesqueness, a sincerity which will catch all readers in an agreeable storm of emotion, and even leave a hardened reviewer impressed and delighted.

We mentioned two of Mr. Richard Marsh's books last week, and might have mentioned a third, but the heroic pace at which his books come from the press and the varieties of his methods leave us a trifle bewildered. What stage in the development of Mr. Marsh as a literary force is marked by A HERO OF ROMANCE (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.) is the question one would like to ask the conscientious student of his works. Failing a reply, we read through the story of boy life beginning at a foolish private school, and then rushing through a course of adventures such as the author of "The Datchet Diamonds" and his readers love, and ending with the restoration of the youthful hero of romance to his devoted parents. We should say that the book leaves Mr. Marsh just where he was, but he may have added to his popularity in private schools.

Behind the solemn title of THE DUKE (Edward Arnold, 6s.) Mr. J. Storer Clouston has concealed much social satire and genuine fun. A fourth cousin, whose life has been passed in Australia, succeeds to the titles and possessions of the Duke of Grandon. He is a quietly humorous person, who assumes his heritage by a late and casual call at his town house, the only witness of his arrival being a not very clear-sighted caretaker. To him enters one Jack Kavanagh, an Australian Irishman with much gentlemanly effrontery and not immaculate minor moralities.

It is arranged that Jack shall be "The Duke" for one month. The month affords much amusement and instruction to the social observer, and its progress is very entertainingly described.

THE MAN WITH THE PARROTS (Sands and Co., 3s. 6d.) is not a genial essay on natural history. Au contraire it is a weird and complicated detective story. It has neither a striking vice nor a striking virtue in it—unless a somewhat cumbersome ingenuity in unravelling imaginary mysteries can be reckoned a virtue. Mr. A. Eric Bayly, its author, is a painstaking rather than a brilliant tracker of crimes. In the end the innocent are righted, the superfluous conveniently die off, and the unscrupulous are appropriately punished. It is not bad reading "for those who like that sort of book."

Mr. Compton long since won his spurs as a writer of adventure stories. His "Free Lance in a Far Land" was an admirable sample of his bent of mind. He discards the flash devices that give fascination, say, to "A Beautiful White Devil," and presents real men and real events in far lands and stirring times. The greediest of gore-loving gluttons cannot complain of the fare provided, yet the characters are singularly "alive" and the setting is convincingly real. Thus in THE INIMITABLE MRS. MASSINGHAM (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) we get a most vivid glimpse of the birth of Australia and of the England whence it was peopled. Bob Borradaile and his sweetheart, known to stage fame as Mrs. Massingham, deserve to live long beyond the span allotted to most heroes and heroines, and Mr. Compton's picture of the old convict days is masterly.

Correspondence.

DECADENT METRES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Patterson's misgivings as to the clearness of his article are quite needless. I understood him perfectly, though I do not seem to have made my meaning plain to him. He thinks our minor poets should enrich their metres by cultivating dactyls and anapaests on the model of Byron and Moore. I objected to his models, and gave my reasons for doing so as well as I could in the compass of a "Personal View." I did not quote Tennyson and Swinburne against Mr. Patterson's minors; I quoted them to illustrate my contention that our poets (major or minor) had the choice of better models than Mr. Patterson offered them. But my dear opponent (if I may adopt his genial language) insists that the melody of Byron and Moore is produced by legitimate means, while the melody which I admire is got by tricks of genius. The metres of Moore and Byron are "correct," while Tennyson's exquisite lyric is "only saved from doggerel by feeling."

Mr. Patterson has given me an admirable illustration of the terrible confusion which results from applying the terms of classical prosody to English verse. Mr. Patterson does not seem to catch my drift here at all. He asks triumphantly "what is classic but that which has sustained time and usage?" and pleads that our four proper metres are five hundred years old. I do not think my friend will find Moore-ish anapaests in the literature of the fifteenth century, but that is neither here nor there. I did not use the word "classical" in Mr. Patterson's sense at all; I meant simply Greek and Latin. We have as yet no accurate scientific nomenclature for English prosody, and the attempt to adapt the Greek terminology only leads to mischief; it leads to Moore with his anapaests! Cannot Mr. Patterson see that it is just the effort to be "correct," to count three syllables to every foot and to force the accent to keep its place, that makes the verses he loves so intolerably monotonous; that it is just the disregard for this artificial "correctness" and regard for truly English rhythmical effects, the judiciously shifted pause, the retardation and acceleration of the movement by varying the number of syllables, the subtle use of alliteration (sometimes degenerating into abuse in Mr. Swinburne's case, I admit)—in a word, the "fine sensitiveness to the melodic value of words, the exquisite feeling for the subtle effects of movement, accent, and pause"—that it is just these things that make the verse of Tennyson and Mr. Swinburne so rich in melody? These may be tricks of genius, but they are the only tricks that can make English words sing. The verses produced by such "tricks" are not really dactylic or anapaestic, of course. They are no more dactylic or anapaestic than the blank verse of Milton is iambic.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

CHARLES CAMP TARELLI.

41, Loughborough-park, Brixton, S.W.,

9th February, 1901.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I venture entirely to disagree with your judgment and that of Mr. Thursfield.

The interposition of an adverb in the middle of an infinitive may possibly be expedient, but is always incorrect, and if I had not arrived at that conclusion independently I think your paragraph would have converted me. You can certainly say that a man was guilty "of exactly describing," "of only describing," or "of not describing" a particular occurrence; but you cannot say that it was his duty "to exactly describe," "to only describe," or "to not describe" without writing both bad grammar and nonsense. Nor can you say that Lord Kitchener hopes "to entirely subdue," or "to have entirely subdued," any more than you can say that he fears "to not subdue," or "to have not subdued" the Boers; but you can say that he hopes "by entirely subduing them" to end the war—or that he fears "by not subduing them" the war will be prolonged.

It would be extremely interesting if the writer of your note would explain exactly the difference in meaning between these three sentences:—

I ask you kindly to clear out that drawer—

I ask you to kindly clear out that drawer—

I ask you to clear out kindly that drawer.

The meaning of the first is obvious—of the third obscure but conceivable—(e.g., if there were rabbits in the drawer). The second has and can have no meaning.

If you use "clear out" in the slang sense it may possibly be expedient to strengthen your slang by adding to it bad grammar. In fact, slang is little but bad grammar, and the split infinitive is slang, and, like all slang, is very often expedient and effective.

Yours,

M.

"A APPLE PIE," &c.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Apropos of "A. G.'s" letter last week on "'A' was an Archer," you might use your influence in favour of a new illustrated edition of "A, Apple pie—B, Bit it," &c. I am firmly of opinion that a revival of that ancient Alphabet would go a long way towards convincing people that it is quite wrong to talk of "Apple tart," "Cherry tart," &c., as is likely to become the established use. Did these persons, I wonder, when they were at the romping age, make each other "Apple tart beds"?

Yours faithfully,

J. C.

CENTRAL CIRCULATING LIBRARY FOR WORKING GIRLS' CLUBS AND KINDRED ASSOCIATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I through your columns call the attention of some of your numerous readers to the above library in its great need of books? The library, which is unsectarian, has been in existence three years, and was formed in order to give working girls and women those opportunities for reading not otherwise within their reach.

A working girls' club, or kindred association, may, on an annual subscription of 8s., become a member of the library, and is then entitled to a loan of ninety books sent in two consignments (one in March and one in October). Clubs whose funds make a still smaller fee desirable pay 4s. a year and receive forty-five volumes annually.

The hon. librarian ascertains from the various club leaders

(who are responsible for the books) the names of or class of books required, and the boxes are sent according to the lists received.

The work of the library has greatly increased lately, and twenty-nine large clubs for working girls and kindred associations now belong. Some of these are in London, some in the country, and some in Leeds, Leicester, Belfast, and other manufacturing towns. The club members consist chiefly of tailoresses, factory workers, and young women in business.

From all, the reports are full of appreciation of our work; for our books have proved a welcome addition to the limited libraries of the clubs, and by the slight guidance of the club leaders the taste of the workers has greatly improved. Wholesome novels are now the general taste, and the formerly popular penny dreadfuls are fast becoming things of the past.

Unfortunately our stock of books is far from equal to the demand! We cannot accept any new members now, for all our available books are at the clubs; our shelves are almost bare, and our funds (dependent on club fees and occasional donations) are not equal to the task of replenishing them.

I give these details in the hope that a few of your readers, realizing how many hard lives may be made a little brighter by means of our work, will spare some books for our library. So many people have more books than they can find room for, the volume bought at the station, read once and then thrown aside, the duplicate copy of the standard novel, yellow backs, bound magazines, fairy tales, the novel of purely ephemeral interest, easy science, historical and biographical works—all these would be a most welcome addition to the library, and those of your readers who could spare copies of the ever popular works of Anthony Hope, Stanley Weyman, Edna Lyall, Besant, Henty, or Mrs. Oliphant would indeed be benefactors.

Any parcels of books would be most gratefully accepted by the Library Committee, and should be addressed to the Hon. Librarian, Central Circulating Library for Working Girls' Clubs, Women's Industrial Council, 12, Buckingham-street, Strand.

Thanking you many times for your kindness in publishing this letter,

I am yours faithfully,

THE HON. LIBRARIAN.

12, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

"Beowulf and the Fight at Finnsburg: A Translation into Modern English Prose," by Dr. J. Clark Hall—to be published shortly by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein—is intended both for the student and the general reader. Archaisms have been avoided and it is accompanied by an introduction and a running analysis of the story. At the end of the book are notes, an index of things with archaeological illustrations, and an index of proper names.

Messrs. Methuen announce "The Relief of Kumasi," by Captain H. C. J. Biss, a complete history of the recent campaign in Ashanti by an officer who was with the relieving forces. Illustrated by photographs taken on the spot.

Stephen Crane's uncompleted novel "The O'Ruddy" is, we understand, being finished by Mr. A. E. W. Mason, and will be dramatized and produced by Mr. David Belasco.

In reviewing "At Pretoria" by Mr. Julian Ralph last week we inadvertently called the book "Towards Pretoria." This is the title of the author's previous book which forms the first part of his record of the war, published by Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson.

Mr. B. T. Batsford announces a second issue of Mr. Edwin O. Sachs' exhaustive work, "Modern Opera Houses and Theatres," with a special note dealing with the latest developments in theatre architecture.

Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. will shortly publish "The Reign of Victoria—A Retrospect," by Prof. F. York Powell.

Mr. Heinemann is starting an English series of American fiction under the title of "The Dollar Library," one volume to appear each month. The first volumes will be "The Girl at the Half-Way House," by E. Hough; "Parlous Times," by D. D. Wells; "Lords of the North," by A. C. Laut; "The Chronic Loafer," by Nelson Lloyd; "Her Mountain Lover," by Hamlin Garland.

"The Literary Year-Book" for 1901 will be published by Mr. Allen towards the end of this month. Mr. Allen also announces in his new list an illustrated guide to "The Churches of Chislehurst," by E. A. Webb; and "Oxford University Sermons," arranged for the Church's Year, edited by Principal Bebb.

A new monthly, Modern Advertising, is an offshoot of the Poster. Its contents are largely paragraphs—sometimes of a rather trenchant character. The advertisements obtained without paying cash over a counter are genially derided.

A book to be published early in the spring by Messrs. Sands is a collection of "Songs of the Sword and the Soldier," edited by Mr. Alexander Eager, beginning with Drayton's ballad of Agincourt, but including modern poets, and reprinting some of the best of the songs inspired by the present campaign. All nations are represented, the songs in many cases having been translated by the editor.

The next instalment of the "Complete Library," published by Messrs. Gowans and Gray, of Glasgow, is to be the complete works of Charles Lamb, to appear in nine monthly volumes, beginning on May 1 next. The edition is edited by Mr. Thomas Hutchinson, the editor of "The Oxford Wordsworth."

Messrs. Kegan Paul are now arranging a series of histories of Roman Catholic Schools. The first will be a history of "Stonyhurst," by the Rev. George Gruggen and the Rev. Joseph Keating, both of whom are attached to the Great Lancashire College which celebrated its centenary in 1894. Messrs. Kegan Paul also announce "The Church in Greater Britain"—the Donnellan Lectures delivered before the University of Dublin—by the Rev. G. Robert Wynne, Archdeacon of Aghadoe, Killarney. Dr. Wynne tells the story of the work of the Church of England not only in the colonies but in the United States. The same publishers have a book in hand by the Rev. D. Nickerson, entitled "The Origin of Thought," a simply written introduction to philosophy.

The "Manual of South African History," which Messrs. Kegan Paul are publishing, is by the Hon. Alexander Wilmot, member of the Legislative Council of the Cape Colony, and forms a defence of the present policy of the British Government based upon the facts of history. Another topical book coming from Messrs. Kegan Paul is to be a treatise on "Arsenic," bearing on the beer question, by Professor J. A. Wanklyn, whose treatise on "Water Analysis"—written with E. T. Chapman—is now in its eighth edition.

The new list of books coming from the Clarendon Press includes about a dozen fresh announcements. Dr. Stockoe is following up his excellent "Old Testament History for Schools" with a "New Testament History for Schools," Part I. of which is now announced. A second edition is in hand of "A Manual of Greek Historical Inscriptions," by E. L. Hicks and G. F. Hill, originally published in 1882 as the work of Mr. Hicks alone. Other books are "Texts on Mount Athos," by the Rev. K. Lake, "Eusebii Chronicorum Liber," edited, with facsimiles, by J. K. Fotheringham, M.A., "Old Testament Lessons," by V. Z. Rule; "Aetna," edited, with translation, by Prof. Robinson Ellis, who delivered a lecture on the new fragments of Juvenal at Corpus Christi College last Tuesday, which the Oxford University Press is now publishing; "Elizabethan Critical Essays (1570-1603)," edited by G. Gregory Smith; "The Seventeenth Century," by Sir Hubert Parry; "The Relations of History and Geography," by H. B. George; "The Ethics of Spinoza," by H. H. Joachim; "Micro-Anatomy," by Gustav Mann, B.Sc.; and the new edition of the complete works of Bishop Berkeley, in four volumes, re-cast by Professor Campbell Fraser from his three-volume edition published about thirty years ago, and now out of print.

In their "Guild Library" Messrs. Black will shortly publish a volume on "Scottish Cathedrals and Abbeys," by the Rev. D. Butler, M.A., of Abernethy, with an introduction by Principal Story; and a volume in their "Guild Text-Books," entitled "Studies in the Acts of the Apostles," by the Rev. William Robertson, of Coltness. They will also have two new guide-books ready in a few weeks—"Jerusalem," by Mr. E. A. Reynolds-Ball, F.R.G.S., and "Switzerland," by the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge, formerly editor of the Alpine Journal, with a cycling supplement by Mr. C. L. Freeston.

Mr. Alfred Sidgwick has followed up his book on "The Process of Argument" with a work on "The Use of Words in Reasoning" which Messrs. Black will publish during the Spring. Mr. Edwin Abbott's guide through Greek to Hebrew Scriptures entitled "Clue," which Messrs. Black published recently, will be followed by a volume entitled "The Corrections of Mark," in which the same author gives a list of all the deviations from Mark adopted jointly by Matthew and Luke in the Synoptic Tradition. An important booklet to be issued by the same publishers is a translation of Professor Adolf Harnack's historical article on "The Apostles' Creed" contributed to Herzog's "Real-Encyclopædie." It has been translated by Mr. Stewart Means and edited by Mr. Thomas Bailey Saunders. Mr. Mortimer Memphis' "War Impressions," with his ninety-seven illustrations in colour, will also be ready shortly.

The volume on Huldreich Zwingli, by Dr. Samuel Macaulay Jackson—who is editing the series of Heroes of the Reformation to which it belongs—will be published by Messrs. Putnam towards the end of this month. It includes a survey of Switzerland before the Reformation by Prof. John Martin Vincent of Johns Hopkins University, and a supplementary chapter on Zwingli's theology by Prof. Frank Hugh Foster, University of California. Messrs. Putnam will also publish shortly Mr. F. Preston Stearns' study of the lives and works of Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, and Il Veronese, under the title of "Four Great Venetians."

Books to look out for at once.

- HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY—
 "History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate." Vol. 3. 1654-56. By Dr. S. R. Gardiner. Longmans. 21s.
- ART AND LITERATURE—
 "A List of the Works contributed to Public Exhibitions by J. M. W. Turner, R.A." By C. F. Bell. Bell. 21s. net.
 [With an account of the artist's works, &c.]
 "Stevenson (Robert Louis). A Life Study in Criticism." By H. B. Baildon. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
- POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES—
 "Poems." By A. Blair Shaw. Lane. 5s. net.
 "Fireside Poems." By J. Stratton. E. Stock. 3s. 6d.
 "Rudolph Schrobble. A Tragedy." By E. G. E. Stock. 2s. 6d.
 "The Heart of the Ancient Woods." By C. G. D. Roberts. Gay and Bird. 6s.
- THEOLOGY—
 "The Temptations of Our Lord Jesus Christ." By L. R. Rawnaley. E. Stock. 2s. 6d.
 "Meditations on Psalms Penitential." Sands. 2s. 6d. net.
 [By the author of "Meditations on the Psalms of the Little Office."]
 "City Temple Sermons." Vol. 4. By Dr. Joseph Parker. Hodder and Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.
- CLASSICAL AND EDUCATIONAL—
 "Athens and Sparta, and the Struggle with Persia." By E. G. Wilkinson, M.A., Manchester Grammar School. Black. 2s. 6d.
 ["Historical Greek Reader." Illustrated.]
- FICTION—
 "Anne Mainwaring." By Lady Ridley. Longmans. 6s.
 "The Blue Diamond." By L. T. Meade. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
 "Max Thornton." By Ernest Glanville. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
 "The Redemption of David Corson." By C. F. Goss. Methuen. 6s.
 "A State Secret, and other Stories." By B. M. Croker. Methuen. 3s. 6d.
 "The Survivor." By E. P. Oppenheim. Ward and Lock. 6s.
 "Trewern: A Welsh Tale of the Thirties." By R. M. Thomas. Unwin. 6s.
 "The Golden Tooth." By J. M. Cobban. Digby and Long. 6s.
 "The Day of Small Things." By Isabel Fry. Unicorn Press. 5s. net.
 "The Treasure of Captain Scarlett." By Adeline Sergeant. Hutchinson. 6s.
 "The Master Passion." By B. Hatton. Pearson. 6s.
 "The New Master." By A. Galsworthy. Pearson. 3s. 6d.
- SCIENCE—
 "Researches in the Past and Present History of the Earth's Atmosphere." By T. L. Phipson. Griffin. 2s. 6d.
 "Manual of Elementary Science." By Professor R. A. Gregory and A. T. Simmons. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
 "The Principles of Magnetism and Electricity." By P. L. Gray, B.Sc. Methuen. 3s. 6d.
 [An elementary text-book].

- LAW—
 "A Digest of the Law relating to Marine Insurance." By M. D. Chalmers and D. Owen. W. Clowes. 10s.
 "An Epitome of Personal Property Law." By W. H. H. Kelke. Sweet and Maxwell. 6s.
- MISCELLANEOUS—
 "Lest We Forget." A Keepsake from the Nineteenth Century. By W. T. Stead. H. Marshall. 2s. 6d.
 "The American Slave Trade." By J. R. Spears. Bickers. 7s. 6d.
 "Bermundsey, its Historic Memories, &c." E. Stock. 12s. 6d. net.
 "Christian Egypt: Past, Present, and Future." By M. Fowler. Church Newspaper Co. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

- BIOGRAPHY.
 "Algernon Charles Swinburne (English Writers of To-day.) By Theodore Wratistlaw. 7½×5½in., 212 pp. Greening. 3s. 6d.
 "Our Naval Heroes." Ed. by G. E. Marindin. 9×6½in., 385 pp. Murray. 16s.
 "The Life of Edward White Benson." By A. C. Benson. New Ed. 8½×5½in., 601 pp. Macmillan. 8s. 6d. n.
- EDUCATIONAL.
 "The Satires of Persius." Trans. by Rev. S. Hemphill. D.D. 7½×5½in., 47 pp. Dublin: Hodges. London: Bell.
 "A Short Manual of Comparative Philology." 2nd Ed. By P. Giles. 7½×5½in., 619 pp. Macmillan. 14s.
 "Chemistry (Self-Educator Series.) By J. Knight. 7½×5½in., 162 pp. Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.
 "Notes sur l'Education Publique." By Pierre de Coubertin. 7½×4½in., 320 pp. Hachette. Fr.3.50.
- FICTION.
 "The Tragedy of a Pedigree." By Hugo Ames. 7½×5½in., 330 pp. Greening. 6s.
 "A Path of Thorns." By E. A. Vizetelly. 7½×5½in., 448 pp. Chatto. 6s.
 "According to Plato." By Frankfort Moore. 7½×5½in., 352 pp. Hutchinson. 6s.
 "The Man Who Forgot." By J. Mackie. 7½×5½in., 298 pp. Jarrold. 6s.
 "The Tapu of Banderah." By Louis Becke and W. Jeffery. 8×5½in., 315 pp. Pearson. 6s.
 "The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler." By R. Marsh. 8×5½in., 304 pp. Pearson. 6s.
 "Duke Rodney's Secret." By Perrington Frim. 7½×5½in., 295 pp. Jarrold. 6s.
 "Treadles and Us and Others." By R. Andom. 7½×5½in., 303 pp. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.
 "Le Feu." By Gabrielle d'Annunzio. Traduit de l'Italien par G. Herelle. 7½×4½in., 443 pp. Paris. Calmann Lévy. Fr.3.50.
 "Midship." By Pierre Custot. 7½×4½in., 299 pp. Paris. Ollendorff. Fr.3.50.
 "L'Enthousiasme." By Maurice Leblanc. 7½×4½in., 298 pp. Paris. Ollendorff. Fr.3.50.
 "Péché Caché." By Paul Perret. 7½×4½in., 295 pp. Paris. Ollendorff. Fr.3.50.
 "L'Heureux Ménage." By Marcel Prevost. 7½×4½in., 280 pp. Paris. Lemerre. Fr.3.50.
 "Monsieur Bergeret à Paris." By Anatole France. 7½×4½in., 404 pp. Paris. Calmann Lévy. Fr.3.50.
- FOLKLORE.
 "Occasional Essays on Native South Indian Life." By S. P. Rice. 9×6½in., 223 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d.
- HISTORY.
 "Victoria, 1837-1901. Events of the Reign." By F. Ryland. 7½×5½in., 184 pp. Allen. 1s.
 "Fouché. 1759-1820." By Louis Madelin. Deux Volumes. 9½×6½in., 529+568 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr.16.
 "Histoire de la Troisième République." La Présidence de Carnot. Vol. IV. By M. E. Zevort. 9×5½in., 306 pp. Paris. Alcan. Fr.7.
- LITERARY.
 "Testament Poétique." By Sully Prudhomme. 7½×4½in., 306 pp. Paris. Lemerre. Fr.3.50.
- MILITARY.
 "Ten Months in the Field with the Boers." By An Ex-Lieutenant of Gen. de Villebois-Mareuil. 7½×5½in., 248 pp. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.
 "Notes on Reconnoitring in South Africa. Boer War, 1899-1900." 5½×4½in., 35 pp. Longmans. 1s. n.
- MISCELLANEOUS.
 "Bridge Abridged; or, Practical Bridge." By W. Dalton. 6½×4½in., 139 pp. De La Rue.
 "Cordingley's Guide to the Stock Exchange." 6½×4½in., 130 pp. E. Wilson. 2s. n.
 "Llandaff Church Plate." By G. E. Halliday, F.R.I.B.A. 10×6½in., 106 pp. Bemrose. 12s. 6d. n.
 "Whitaker's Peerage for 1901." 7½×5½in., 576 pp. Whitaker. 2s. 6d.
- MUSIC.
 "The Pianist's ABC Primer and Guide." By W. H. Webb. 8½×5½in., 307 pp. Forsyth.
- NATURAL HISTORY.
 "Animals of Africa. (The Library for Young Naturalists.) By H. A. Bryden. 7½×6½in., 240 pp. Sands. 6s.
- PAMPHLETS.
 "Gibraltar. A National Danger." By T. G. Bowles, M.P. Sampson Low. 1s.
- PHILOSOPHY.
 "Etudes et Réflexions d'un Pessimiste." By Challemlacour. 7½×4½in., 325 pp. Paris. Fasquelle. Fr.3.50.
 "Ainsi Parlait Zarathoustra." By Frédéric Nietzsche. Traduit par Henri Albert. 7½×4½in., 487 pp. Paris. Société du Mercure de France. Fr.3.50.
 "Le Gai Savoir." By Frédéric Nietzsche. Traduit par Henri Albert. 7½×4½in., 413 pp. Paris. Société du Mercure de France. Fr.3.50.
- POETRY.
 "Welsh Poets of To-day and Yesterday." Trans. by E. O. Jones. 7½×5½in., 48 pp. Llandilo. Ellis.
 "At the Gates of Song." By Lloyd Mifflin. 8½×6½in., 150 pp. Frowde. 6s.
- REPRINTS.
 "Walton's 'Lives' and The Complete Angler. (Library of English Classics.) 8×6½in., 497 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. n.
 "The Gypsies of Spain." By George Borrow. 8×5½in., 433 pp. Murray. 6s.
 "The Complete Works of John Keats." Vol. III. Ed. by H. B. Forman. 7×4½in., 291 pp. Glasgow. Gowers.
 "The Pioneers." By Fenimore Cooper. 7½×5½in., 454 pp. Macmillan. 2s. 6d.
 "Pride of Jennico." By Agnes and E. Castle. 7½×5½in., 341 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
- THEOLOGY.
 "The Historical New Testament." A New Translation. Ed. by J. Moffatt, B.D. 9×5½in., 726 pp. T. & T. Clark. 16s.
 "Ecumenical Missionary Conference, New York, 1900." 2 vols. 9½×6½in., 558+484 pp. R.T.S. 6s. n.
- TOPOGRAPHY.
 "Highways and Byways in East Anglia." By W. A. Dutt. 8×6½in., 413 pp. Macmillan. 6s.
 "Falaire. The Town of the Conqueror." By Anna B. Dodd. 7½×5½in., 290 pp. Unwin. 7s. 6d.
- TRAVEL.
 "Mount Omi and Beyond." By A. J. Little, F.R.G.S. 9×6½in., 272 pp. Heinemann. 10s. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXXIX.
By Rev. J. JESPERSEN, Denmark.
BLACK. 8 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.
White to play and mate in three moves.

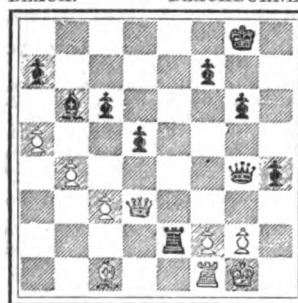

and want to get it well advertised. The promoters also wish to make known one of the numerous table-game inventions called salta, which has been puffed up by the aid of anonymous paragraphs which accommodating chess editors are good enough to use.

The entries are as follows. As drawn games are to be replayed—a vexatious French innovation—the real scores will be difficult to settle accurately until the end:—

Won			Won			Won
S. Alapin	3		G. Marco	2		T. von Scheve	3
J. H. Blackburne	3		F. J. Marshall	1	½	C. Schlechter	1	½
E. Didler	0		J. Mason	2		M. I. Tschigorin	2½
J. Gunsberg	2		J. Mieses	2½		S. Winawer	0
D. Janowski	4		A. Reggio	2

Endings in the Monte Carlo tournament:—

BLACK. BLACKBURNE.

WHITE. MASON.
Black to play.

In above position Black played the pretty and unexpected move B-K6 which appears to win. If BxR the reply of White is of course P-R6, and mate soon follows. Mason played QxR and fought it out with R and B against queen, but eventually had to give in.

BLACK. JANOWSKI.

WHITE. MASON.
Black to play.

Here Black captured the pawn, which seems fatal. Thus 1. BxP; 2. Q-R4; Q-K4; 3. Kt-B3, and must win by Q-R8 ch or QxB P ch, followed by QxB, &c. All this is of considerable interest.

GAME No. LXIII.—A curious contest at Monte Carlo:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
F. J. Marshall.	M. I. Tschigorin.	F. J. Marshall.	M. I. Tschigorin.
1. P-Q4	P-Q4	14. Kt×P	Kt-B3
2. Q-Kt-B3	P-K3	15. Kt-B5	Kt-Qsq
3. P-K3	P-Kt5	16. Kt-B3	B-B3
4. B-Q2	P×P	17. K-R-Bsq	P-QKt3
5. Q-Kt4	Q×P	18. Kt×P	Kt×Kt
6. Castles	P-KB4	19. QR-Ksq	Kt-K5
7. B-KKt5	Q×P	20. B-B5	Kt(K3)-B4
8. Q-R3	B-K2	21. P-Kt4	P-Kt3
9. K-Kt sq	B-Q2	22. B×Kt	Kt×B
10. P-KKt4	Kt-QB3	23. Kt-Kt5	QR-KBsq
11. P×P	Q×B P	24. R×R	R×R
12. B×B	Q×Q	25. Kt×Kt	B×Kt
13. B×Q	K×B	26. R×B ch	Drawn (a)

(a) Drawn after a long and hard fight, as was the other game played to settle the tie. The opening is extraordinary, but Marshall is fond of surprises. Attention may be directed to the question whether 20. B-B5 was best, but, indeed, the whole game will bear analysis and will delight every player.

GAME No. LXIV.—Played between the Polish experts:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
D. Janowski.	S. Winawer.	D. Janowski.	S. Winawer.
1. P-K4	P-K4	14. P-Kt3	R-Kt2
2. Kt-KB3	Kt-QB3	15. B-Kt2	P-B4
3. B-Kt5	Kt-B3	16. Q-K2	R-Ksq
4. Castles	P-Q3	17. Kt-Qsq	B-KBsq
5. P-Q4	P×P	18. Kt-R5	Kt×Kt
6. Kt×P	B-Q2	19. Q×Kt	P-B3
7. Kt-QB3	B-K2	20. B-B3	Q-K2
8. K-Kt-K2	P-QR3	21. R-R3	P-R3
9. B-Q3	Kt-K4	22. R-Kt3	P-Kt4
10. P-B4	Kt×h	23. P×P.e.p.	B-Kt2
11. P×Kt	Castles	24. Kt-K3	B-QBsq
12. Kt-Kt3	P-QKt4	25. Kt-Q5	Resigns (a)
13. P-B5	B-B3

(a) Of course White has the superior game in any case; but the alternative K-Rsq seems imperative. The effect of Kt-Q5 or B5, which could not be prevented, is very striking.

BY SIR HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B.

NOW READY.

A Century of Scottish History

FROM THE DAYS BEFORE THE '45 TO THOSE WITHIN LIVING MEMORY.

By SIR HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B.,

M.A. (Oxon.), Hon. LL.D. (Glasgow).

2 Vols. Demy 8vo. 30s. net.

STANDARD.—"Sir Henry Craik has made one of the most important contributions to the History of Scottish affairs. . . . The author, as his work at the Education Office has shown, is a keen and well-equipped critic of men and movements. . . . We are presented with a chronological narrative of all the chief incidents—political, ecclesiastical, and legislative, no less than literary, social, and commercial—which have shaped the national annals in the period under review."

THE TIMES.—"Sir Henry Craik's work is marked by a wide research, judicial thought, and much philosophical insight. . . . Sir Henry Craik is always fair and dispassionate. . . . He has wisely confined himself to a period—the most important and interesting in Scottish history—so within his limits he can be comprehensive and exhaustive."

SCOTSMAN.—"Sir Henry Craik has made a special study of the progress of Scotland as an individual nationality since it became constitutionally an incorporate part of a wider nationality. The result is a book which gives an intelligent insight into the currents of Scottish life and progress, and is full of valuable information which has hitherto been obtainable only by a wide course of reading. . . . He has produced an instructive and stimulating book—all the more stimulating, perhaps, because some of its views and opinions, and its occasionally forcible expressions of opinion, may provoke dissent."

William Blackwood & Sons, Edinburgh and London.

Mudie's Library.

FOR THE CIRCULATION AND SALE OF ALL THE BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, SPANISH, AND RUSSIAN BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs Supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST

(100 PAGES)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION.

Also NEW and SURPLUS COPIES of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;

241, BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.;

48, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., London; and at Barton-arcade, Manchester.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 175. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1901.

CONTENTS.

NOTES OF THE DAY	131, 132,	PAGE 133
PERSONAL VIEWS—"The Hooligan in Literature," by Clarence Rook	133
STUDIES IN RECENT FICTION. III.—The Foreigner.....	134
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley.....	135
REVIEWS—
The Successors of Drake	136
William Shakespeare: Poet, Dramatist, and Man	138
Sermons on Faith and Doctrine.....	138
Encyclopædia Biblica	139
The Historical New Testament	140
Recent Verse—
The Prayer of St. Scholastica, and Other Poems—At the Gates of Song—Songs of the Unseen Hope—Attempts in Verse—The Professor, and Other Poems—The Underdog, and Other Verses —Titania—Songs from the Book of Jaffir—Songs and Lyrics, &c.	140, 141,	142
The Painters of Florence	143
Modern Abyssinia—Highways and Byways in East Anglia— Monsieur Bergeret à Paris—Talks with Mr. Gladstone—Events of the Reign—Gibraltar: A National Danger—Notes on Recon- noitring in South Africa—Woman—The Care of the Home	143
The Sacred Fount—The Tragedy of a Pedigree—According to Plato —The Believing Bishop—Aliens Afloat—Pride of England—My First Voyage: My First Lie—The Three Friends—The Strength of Straw—Son of Judith—The Small Part Lady—Number One and Number Two	144, 145,	146
LIBRARY NOTES	146
OBITUARY—Don Ramon de Campoamor—M. Louis Ménard—M. Armand Silvestre	146
CORRESPONDENCE—Napoleon and Mr. Elphinstone (Prof. R. P. Karkaria)—The Split Infinitive	147, 148
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for ...	148, 149
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	150

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Bluebooks are usually classed with the books that are no books. Yet there are some of them that the ordinary book buyer would be glad to have and keep if only they could be published in a form that did not so obviously suggest to him the waste-paper basket. "South African Despatches, Vol. I." is a more entertaining and a more instructive volume than most of the narratives of the special correspondents. An edition produced in the ordinary six-shilling or seven-and-sixpenny format would certainly be well subscribed and obtain a wide sale; and as large sales mean large profits the proposal ought to commend itself to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Duke of Wellington's despatches can be procured in a form suitable for the library shelves, and so can the staff history of the Franco-Prussian War. Lord Roberts' despatches would, at the present moment, be more widely appreciated than either of these works.

* * * *

The same thing might be done with Consular Reports. It is a matter of constant complaint that they are not read by those whom they concern. One reason is that their appearance is not properly advertised; another that they look like tracts. Well-edited selections from these reports, put on the market in the ordinary way, would probably do more than pay their expenses, and open the eyes of our merchants to a good many things that they ought to know.

* * * *

Are we to have a Charles Kingsley the Second in literature? It is stated that the biography of the late Miss Mary Kingsley Vol. VIII. No. 8.

is to be written by her brother, Mr. Charles Kingsley, with the help of Mr. R. B. N. Walker, the West African traveller and trader. The Kingsleys make a striking example of hereditary transmission of literary ability—Charles, Henry, and George Kingsley in one generation and Mary Kingsley and Mrs. Harrison in the next. The Arnolds can boast transmission of literary talent through three generations. The Tennysons and Rossettis were both poetical families, but the gift had no chance of descending or has not descended; and the same may be said of the Brontës. Mrs. Richmond Ritchie has inherited a graceful literary talent from her father; and if Zachary Macaulay may be called a literary man, Sir George Trevelyan represents the third generation of another able breed.

* * * *

The dinner to Dr. Furnivall, last Monday, which closed the commemoration of the seventy-fifth birthday of this indefatigable scholar and valuable authority on Early English literature, was a great success. Mr. Bernard Shaw, Professor Skeat, Dr. Bradley, Mr. H. B. Wheatley, and Professor W. P. Ker all "enthused" in characteristic style over the work of the great English scholar, and Dr. Furnivall himself was modest and humorous, especially in the emphasis with which, turning from the work which has won him European fame, he upheld the merits of sculls as against oars.

* * * *

Professor Skeat in some clever verses, after Chaucer, inserted as a fly-leaf in the "Miscellany," which we reviewed the other day, sang Dr. Furnivall's prowess on the river. And here is his reference to the great Dictionary.

Of glossaryes took he hede and cure;
And when he spyed had, by aventure,
A word that semed him or strange or rare,
To henten it anon he nolde spare,
But wolde it on a shrede of paper wryte,
And in a cheste he dide his shredes whyte,
And preyed every man to doon the same;
Swich maner study was to him but game.
And on this wyse many a yeer he wroughte,
Ay storing every shreed that men him broughte,
Til, attē laste, from the noble pressē
Of Clarendoun, at Oxenforde, I gessē,
Cam stalking forth the Grette Dictionarie
That no man wel may pinche at ne contrarie.
But for to tellen alle his queintē gerēs,
They wolden occupye wel seven yerēs;
Therefore I passe as lightly as I may;
Ne speke I of his hatte or his array,
Ne how his berd by every wind was shakē
When as, for hete, his hat he wolde of takē.
Soning in Erly English was his spechè,
"And gladly wolde he lerne, and gladly techē."

* * * *

Clough has certainly suffered in reputation within the last few years. Mr. Palgrave found room for four of his poems in the "Second Golden Treasury" (1897). Mr. Quiller Couch has admitted only one into his "Oxford Book of English Verse." But what is to be said when a literary journal thinks that a bookseller has a grievance against his printer for giving the first edition title of the Long Vacation Pastoral as the "Bothie of Toper-na-Fuosich ? " Our contemporary ingeniously observes that " the misprints are symptomatic of the neglect into which Clough's poetry has fallen." The printer was of course quite accurate. According to Principal Shairp, Clough took the name of the Bothie from a heather-thatched hut by the side of Loch Ericht. It was altered in later editions for obvious and sufficient reasons to " The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich."

One literary centenary has passed quietly this week, for Thursday was the hundredth anniversary of the birthday of John Henry Newman. It may serve, at any rate, to recall what he said as to the future of English letters, on which many scribes have been speculating lately. Classical authors, he thought, were not only national, but belonged to a particular age of a nation's life. He should not wonder if, as regards ourselves, that age were passing away. Our classical writers had already extended through a longer period than those of Greece or of Rome, and Newman did not think we ought to be disappointed if our own classical period were close upon its termination. Now this was written half a century ago.

One million and twenty-seven thousand copies divided among nine novels gives a little over 110,000 a piece. That is the result of some figures which Messrs. Macmillan send us, and they show among other things that it is a better thing to be an American novelist than an English. Here are the figures:—" Richard Carvel," 365,000; " The Choir Invisible," 213,000; " The Increasing Purpose," 110,000; " In the Palace of the King," 80,000; " Via Crucis," 75,000; " The Forest Lovers," 70,000; " The Pride of Jennico," 47,000; " Young April," 44,000; and " Richard Yea-and-Nay," 23,000.

It is, however, a little rash of our American cousins to talk of outselling us in our own market, like the writer in " The World's Work " whom we quoted recently. There is nothing, of course, to prevent them from establishing direct relations with the British public at once if they choose—two of their leading publishers, as a matter of fact, have had their own London houses for years—but the British public has peculiar prejudices, and its prejudice against American books—fiction more particularly—would handicap the American publishers over here. That, at least, is the opinion held by the London book trade. Many novels, it is explained, come from across the Atlantic with records of immense sales in the United States, and yet fall flat when placed on the English market. True, there have been exceptions, but even in these cases the circulation in this country has been much smaller than that of many of our own authors, and almost trifling when compared with their enormous sales in America. Various things help to make a book successful, apart from its intrinsic worth. The personal element—the associations of a book by Mr. John Morley, for example—would count for little in the case of American writers in England, however popular they might be in their own country. Besides (as a publisher put it to us) the English book market is overcrowded as it is, and competition could scarcely be keener. The existing arrangements as regards American books seem to work smoothly, and the half-dozen successes of the last year or so have not created any demand that could be considered as a boom in American fiction.

A correspondent writes:—"Nobody seems to remember that it was not Tony Lumpkin, but the Fourth Fellow in the tavern colloquy, who delivered himself of the sonorous observation, referred to last week in your columns by Mr. Walkley:—" The genteel thing is the genteel thing at any time. If so be that a gentleman bees in a concatenation accordingly." Sir Walter Scott, I believe, always attributed the remark to Tony, and his slip has been repeated by writers of all kinds ever since. So recently as last week a distinguished literary journalist fell into the curiously persistent mistake.

To the struggling authors and journalists who daily frequent the Reading-room of the British Museum fog is a serious interruption. On foggy occasions the Museum authorities cannot supply books from the presses because, owing to the absence of artificial light, they cannot be identified, and so the anxious " reader " must patiently wait (perhaps for a week) until daylight comes round again. This savours, indeed, of the " dark ages " and seems to take us back at a bound to those days a hundred years ago of which, by quaint daily extracts from its issues of 1801, The Times is now happily reminding us. There is, of course, the danger of fire. But it is difficult to believe that science could not provide precautions which would enable the Museum to realize the facilities afforded by the invention of the electric light.

The centenary of Victor Hugo is to be celebrated next year; but meanwhile, on February 26, a little preliminary celebration is to be held in the inauguration of the group executed by the sculptor Barrias. Victor Hugo's family is at present not numerous. His eldest daughter, Mlle. Adèle Hugo, is now nearly 77 years of age. She had been engaged to be married to an English officer at Jersey who died in India. On learning of her lover's death her mind became affected, and she is still ignorant of her father's death. The two other heirs of the poet are his grandson and granddaughter—M. Georges Hugo and Mme. Jean Charcot, who married the son of the well-known neurologist. The two literary executors of Victor Hugo were M. Auguste Vacquerie, who died in 1895, and M. Paul Meurice, who is still living. M. Meurice has formed a museum of Hugo relics containing many curious drawings and manuscripts. Next year, no doubt, the public will be admitted to see them.

A SONG.

In the fairyland of sleep,
Where the crooning streams
Shine in many a wavy sweep
Round the Hill of Dreams,
Comes the world to wander, when Night unlocks the gate to men.

They that sorrow, they that go
Softly in their mirth,
As the light is wearing low
Weary of the earth,
And, like children hand in hand,
Enter into fairyland.

All the phantoms of the day
Vanish with the sun,
Swift as smoke that melts away
When the flame is done;
In their stead in gay attire,
Shine the shapes of heart's desire.

Banished and forlorn, I dwell
By the outer towers,
Listening to the passing bell
Of the dying hours,
All the night long while I keep Vigil by the gates of sleep.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

Louis Noir, who lately died, was not only the brother of the Victor Noir whom Pierre Bonaparte shot, but also a feuilletoniste of some renown; and his death may suggest some remarks on the feuilleton. Strictly speaking, of course, the name is applicable to any novel appearing serially in a daily newspaper, as Zola's novels do in the Aurore; but it is also, and more often, used opprobriously to describe serial stories of a particular kind. The real feuilleton is the novel that is written expressly for the newspaper—is deliberately written down, in fact, to the level of the most stupid person who is likely to read the newspaper, with a plot deliberately designed to tickle the fancy and flatter the prejudices of the herd. It was in France that this kind of serial was invented; and in France alone among the countries of the world it brings wealth beyond the dreams of avarice to the men who know how to write it. Of course it was not invented all at once by a single man; it was only gradually perfected as the result of many men's experiments and observations. In France, as elsewhere, the original idea was that the proper people to write serial stories were men of letters, and that literary merit was a qualification to be desired; but the practical genius of the French people prevented this idea from holding the field for very long. It was soon discovered that, in a general way, the least literary writers were the most popular. Du Boisgobey's claims to be called a man of letters were doubtful, but there was no doubt that his serials influenced circulations. He was followed by men who had no claims whatever to be considered men of letters, but who understood, even better than he did, what their public was and what it wanted. Men like Xavier de Montespín, Jules Mary, and Émile Richebourg realized that the bulk of the subscribers to a paper like the Petit Journal were market-women, concierges, shop-girls, milliners, very small tradespeople, et hoc genus omne, and they realized that such readers had no use for literature, but wanted to be told about missing wills, and long lost uncles, and foundlings who turned out to be heirs to vast estates. They manufactured stories of this kind, studying their market as patiently as any German manufacturer, and being careful to make most of their rich characters vicious and most of their poor characters virtuous. Their reward was great. Émile Richebourg, the most successful of them, used to receive £4,000 for a serial. He could place as many of them as he cared to write, was generally engaged in writing several simultaneously, and is believed to have made an average income of £20,000 a year. And, being the idol of the people, he was worth it. The editor of the Petit Journal could not do without him. When he tried to do so, rejecting a story of Richebourg's to make room for Jules Verne's "Michel Strogoff," the circulation dropped 80,000 in a single week, and Richebourg had to be brought back.

Whether this kind of feuilleton will ever take equally firm root on English soil it is impossible to say. It may be that a fortune awaits the gifted writer who will introduce it. But we doubt it. Our studies in this branch of reading matter have not been very extensive or profound; but, so far as they have gone, they have led us to the conclusion that the feuilleton in England is developing on somewhat different lines. The detective story, of course, we are likely to have always with us; but, apart from that, the English taste in illiterature seems rather to favour stories which treat subjects and, more particularly, work out problems. Supposing that the Continent declared war against England and America, what would England and America do? Supposing that an American millionaire took it into his head that he would like to be Emperor of France, how could he achieve his ambition? Supposing that the Chinese were well armed and aggressive, what would be the consequences to the remainder of the world? Supposing a rich man were robbed of all he possessed on landing in a strange country, what would be his experiences while attempting to establish his identity and replenish his supplies? These are a few of the conundrums on which our feuilletonists have lately been exercising their ingenuity. Their treatment of the themes has, very properly, no more to do with literature than, according to Mr. Birrell, the general public has. But, at least, they have ideas, they try to be original, and they give their readers something to think about. Their particular trivialities strike us as superior to the tiresome meanderings of the Frenchmen among long-lost uncles and missing wills. We only wish that the writers made as little claim as the French feuilletonists do to be classed among men of letters; but that is a point in which our neighbours at present have the advantage of us.

Personal Views.

THE HOOLIGAN IN LITERATURE.

It has been suggested—and the suggestion has been pointedly passed on to me by the editor of this journal—that the Hooligan is not a real being at all, but only a literary creation, a character invented by hungry writers in quest of a meal and a roof. That all this fuss about street ruffianism is based on fiction and not on fact. That, in short, we should not hear so much about Hooliganism if people did not talk so much about it. The suggestion has a grain of truth in it, a grain of truth to a bushel of nonsense. The grain of truth is the fact that Hooliganism, Hoodlumism, Larrikinism, and disorder in general has been found an excellent sketching ground by the literary artist. The bushel of nonsense contains the assumption that disorder does not exist at all; and that is quite enough to fill the measure.

We know, of course, that Nature always works with one eye on art, and is an unblushing copyist. Everybody is aware that the stature of the contemporary English girl is directly due to the late Mr. du Maurier's pictures. Du Maurier drew tall girls to replace the drooping maidens of the fifties. And forthwith the eighties added a cubit to feminine stature. This was the most glorious instance of the triumph of art. Of the steps in the process I can give no account, though the leading case of "Jacob v. Laban" may suggest an absurd explanation. Literature too, as well as art, has often given Nature a lead. Think of the Byronic young man, his bitterness, his necktie, his general air of being a devil of a fellow who found everything—even sin—hateful. Would he ever have adorned the world of the early nineteenth century if Lord Byron had not made melancholy picturesque? There is the femme incomprise again, another purely literary creation; indeed, one might go on indefinitely with the list of characters which have been worked up with pen or pencil, padded out to human proportions and sent out into the world—not to be distinguished from the real article. The reason is, of course, that very few of us have any character to speak of. Few of us can write an original sentence in practical life, and are compelled to go searching for appropriate inverted commas between which we may live comfortably. I am sure that the services of art and literature as labour-saving appliances in the conduct of life have never been properly acknowledged, and the adequate acknowledgment would take me too far afield. But I am equally sure that literature cannot claim the credit of the creation of the Hooligan.

The Byronic young man was Byronic because he had read Byron. And our present daughters of the gods attained their present stature because they—or at least their mammas—had week by week been stimulated by Mr. du Maurier's drawings. But the Lambeth boy who goes forth with his gang to smite him of Drury-lane is out of touch with current literature. He is vivid, strenuous, fearless, and a terrible nuisance to the peaceful citizens who cross his route; but he has no idea how picturesque and amusing he can be when carefully decanted into literature. He is not a subscriber to Mudie's or Smith's, and never dreams of buying a six-shilling book, even at the customary discount. Not one in a thousand of these young breakers of laws and heads who emerge nightly from mean streets has even heard the name of Mr. Arthur Morrison, or Mr. Pett Ridge, or any one of the writers who have tried to catch their picturesque side and startle respectability into interest and action. Literature certainly has not created the Hooligan, for it has never yet come within a mile of him. And if it be imagined that the lawlessness of Hoxton, of Netting-hill, of Bethnal-green, of Lambeth-walk, the street fights, the highway robberies, the bashing of lieges have no real existence, but are invented by penny-a-liners in hope of a meal and turned into books by writers in hope of a carriage and pair, I will refer you to the police-courts. With all its tremendous power literature cannot lay a man out with a cracked skull. And day by day there is the youthful prisoner in the dock, with the victim—his head carefully bandaged—in the witness-box to bear testimony to the painful reality of the Hooligan.

The Hooligan is real enough ; and the debt is on the side of literature. It is the element of lawlessness which fascinates the man who sits in an armchair and writes, and the Hooligan is the nearest and most obtrusive example of the Disorderly Man. That class of man has always appealed to the man of letters. Virtue and respectability are comfortable to live with in the flesh, but the imagination goes out in sympathy to the rebellious. The Hooligan is the modern representative of his Majesty's opposition to the settled order of things, which is fairly comfortable but not very inspiring. Did not Stevenson lie abed perforce and write of buccaneers and other disturbers of repose ? He had no desire to break the law himself, but he had the instinctive sympathy of the artist with the breaker of laws. Mr. Charles Whibley has no quarrel with the police ; but he writes of bad men with an enthusiasm shared by at least one man who strives under compulsion to be good. Defoe loved the thief—artistically—as you may learn from Mr. Whitten's excellent monograph of Daniel Defoe. "Colonel Jack" is not much read now. But in "Colonel Jack" there is a beautiful description of a purse-snatching in Smithfield, the run through Fenchurch-street, to London-wall, by Bishopsgate-street to Moorfields, given with the evident delight of a writer who sees crime as a picture. In short, everybody loves ill-doing in theory, even though they avoid it in practice. Else whence the popularity of Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin, whose exploits, though completely discredited, are still believed ? Perhaps the summit of popularity is reached where a man becomes the subject of a pantomime—since the eternity behind us has produced but a dozen or so of such triumphs. And is not Dick Whittington much more popular as a rebellious apprentice on Highgate-hill or as an unsanctioned adventurer with a cat than as Sir Richard Whittington trying prisoners—that, of course, is the popular notion—at the Guildhall Police-court ?

So much in apology for the writer, who shares with the reader a delight in the ill-doing of others, a delight which is purely artistic and has endured since Pisistratus collected into a volume for the pleasure of the Athenians the scattered poems on the immortal Jameson raid upon Troy. But for the Hooligan himself, the unconscious origin of this outcry, there is something to be said. For some months people have been shouting for repression, for the gaol, for the lash. The remedy, fairly simple, fairly cheap, consecrated by centuries of custom, appeals to those who always greet the obvious and the known. For myself—and as this is avowedly a personal view I may drag in my own feelings without offence—I am grateful to that spirit of disorder which from a reasonably safe distance is so picturesque. I share, of course, the universal gratitude towards all, from Homer to Stevenson, who have been inspired by the kickers-up of dust. But I feel also a special gratitude to the kickers-up of the London dust of to-day who, duly pulped, have made material for literary food. The Hooligan—the real Hooligan who is the terror of the streets—is not wholly bad, and we should do better, I think, to develop the element of good than to crush the offender outright. He has courage—the boy who goes out to risk his own life in a street row, together with the lives of others, has at least that virtue ; he has splendid vitality, for he is poor, ill-fed, and often hard-worked, yet he goes, in his hours of ease, bashing for pleasure. Courage, vitality, and intolerance of policemen : There is the material, and something could be done with it. One Hooligan at least, typical of his kind, the boy whom I called "Young Alf," was caught by the recruiting-sergeant, went to South Africa, and by his commanding officer, who knew nothing of his record of crime, was said to have "died a good soldier," and by this honourable death I think "Young Alf" has pointed the way out.

CLARENCE ROOK.

STUDIES IN RECENT FICTION.

III.—THE FOREIGNER.

It may be rare—it certainly would be disconcerting—to see ourselves as others see us. To see others as they see themselves seems in the case of the foreigner to be made impossible by the presence of a dividing sea. But the barrier is only morally impassable. We are the most travelled nation that exists. But we take with us on our voyage not only our country, but our unchangeable idea of the inhabitants of other countries ; and no amount of intercourse with them will persuade us that those who deviate from our cherished notions are anything but curious anomalies. Hence, of all the conventions dear to minor novelists the convention of the "foreigner" has the toughest constitution. He lives on with health unimpaired even in the pages of those novelists who are slaves to unconventionality.

The case of the American woman is perhaps the most flagrant. We have most of us met her, in society and out of it. We have read of her in books written by her own countrymen. We know very well that, except for a finer knowledge of the great art of wearing clothes, and for a not invariable difference in intonation and pronunciation, the cultured woman of America is hardly distinguishable from her English sister, and that she is so various as to be not one but all womankind's epitome. And yet we know at once what to expect from the novelist when a girl or matron is labelled "American." If she is to be of the attractive type, she is pretty, showy, and frank, with a straightforwardness and a sincerity possessed by no prudent pretty woman on this earth. Her father will have made his money in pork. His name will be slightly facetious—"Ephraim W. Griggs," for example—and his daughter will never weary of "calculating," "guessing," and "reckoning" that he can "lick creation." Often, as in Mrs. Croker's "Infatuation," she will atone for some of her extravagancies by having "a good heart." If she is to be the rejected foil to the poor but beautiful and modest English heroine, she will carry vulgarity a good deal further, breakfasting in diamonds and a teagown, and jingling the dollars with her every step. Sometimes she is allowed to be an ordinary attractive girl, and her relatives only are pilloried. See the mother of the young American beauty in "Rita's" last story, "Vanity." Mr. Howells' dignified Bostonians and Mr. James' subtle and cosmopolitan great ladies would lift delicately disdainful brows at the thought that this lady was, to the vast British public that enjoys "Rita," typically American. The novelist of experience, however, has begun, though rarely, to realize that the conventional Yankee girl is becoming a little tedious—a result to which Mr. Charles Dana Gibson has perhaps contributed. Mr. Frankfort Moore's Coralie—the girl with social ideals—was a refreshing change, but Mrs. Humphry Ward did still better, and struck a quite new note with her Lucy Foster.

But let us turn to the German. The German of fiction is benevolent, stout, simple-hearted, spectacled, and devoted to beer. His naïveté, philoprogenitiveness, and general moral simplicity spoilt my enjoyment of my first Continental tour.

I expected to be addressed as "Mein vriendt," and to see large blue eyes behind spectacles become diffused with tears as "Gretchen" was mentioned. As a matter of fact, some rather sharp practice on the part of a singularly slim and swarthy hotel-keeper of polished manners was my first experience of the Fatherland. He might have passed for another of the stock types—the typical Frenchman. Mr. du Maurier (who ought to have known all about it) was responsible for the typical Frenchman, for his outward presentment at any rate. Punch, from mere force of habit, clung to the traditional tightly-buttoned-up, black-coated Monsieur, forgetting that the English tailor is to Paris what the French modiste is to London. The pages of "Trilby" leave the kindly caricature a little more in the background and approach the real Frenchman. But Mr. Seton Merriman, in "The Isle of Unrest," is the first English novelist I can remember who has really disabused himself of national prejudice and drawn Frenchmen as human beings, neglecting the labelling superficialities of shrugs and compliments and hair à la brosse. His unscrupulous but dignified Colonel and his sympathetic hero are simply gentlemen. There is no touch of the delicious "these poor foreigners, after all, are God's creatures" about Mr. Seton Merriman. The French maid of the novelist is seldom to be found in real life. I doubt whether any novelist has drawn her except as the maid of light comedy. Her name to begin with is always Minette, or Clochette, or some such familiar abbreviative. Now the worthy, rather stolid type of young woman who comes to England to get a working knowledge of the language would be no more likely to announce herself to her mistress by any such pet name than the English maid would be to give herself out as "Pussy" or "Dolly." That is the first delusion. The second is that the French maid is always coquettish and deft, neat, cheerful, and pretty, with a roguish sparkle in her black eyes, a trim figure, and a cherry-coloured bow in her hair. Alas! it is all one to the novelist whether she hails from Paris or the remotest recesses of France; not so to the employer, whose airy visions run the risk of being dispelled by the arrival of a conscientious, ponderous, bashful, and sometimes inconveniently truthful and inconceivably clumsy specimen of young womanhood. Yet Minette is to be found passim. There are no exceptions at all. At any rate, I have met none.

The Italian is left more or less severely alone in fiction, though not by Mr. Marion Crawford. Mrs. Humphry Ward has touched him in "Eleanor," but only in the background. The idea of an Italian held by the British public is (very naturally) almost inseparable from an organ. The Hatton-garden police reports add a hasty temper and a habit of stabbing in the back. For the purposes of romance, this develops into a vendetta, which disposes of the villain at his most villainous moment. The Russian lady never varies in spite of Tolstoi, Turgueneff, and Dostoieffsky. She is a fur-clad, jewelled siren, driving wondrous horses, and informed with a delicate and witching naughtiness. Her victims believe her enamoured of themselves, but it is all Nihilism, after all. She has a little bomb to place. Or she is on the track of some one who has the pay of the Secret Service of Russia. But she is always beautiful, sumptuous, and impassioned, and her name is the Princess Olga. The idea of a Russian lady who sits placidly at home, knits, reads Dickens or J. K. Jerome, and holds mothers' meetings would probably come with as great a shock to the readers of Col. Savage and his kind as it did to a friend who told me how shocked she was to find her first Russian acquaintance "as nice—and as dowdy—as if she belonged to an English county family!"

After all we must not forget that the foreigner repays us in kind. The Englishman and his wife in foreign fiction are usually just as ludicrous. The more obscure French caricaturists still believe in the Englishwoman's ringlets, prominent teeth, and enormous feet; while le bore and rosbif are still believed to be the tenderest chords you can touch in the organism of an Englishman. In the main there is truth on both sides. But the novelist should avoid a truism; he should not fatigue us by playing always one tune and shut his eyes to the thousand and one variations.

A. H.

THE DRAMA.

"PERIL"—"PEG WOFFINGTON"—"A CIGARETTE MAKER'S ROMANCE."

Any one who wishes to mark the profound change which has come about in theatrical taste within the last half century cannot do better than pay a visit just now to the Garrick and the Prince of Wales's. The main feeling, I am sure, excited by Peril at the one theatre and Peg Woffington at the other is one of bewilderment. M. Sardou's Nos Intimes, from which Peril was adapted by Messrs. Clement Scott and B. C. Stephenson, dates from 1861; Peg Woffington, which is a slightly revised version of Masks and Faces by Charles Reade and Tom Taylor, from 1852. It is clear that, since then, something important has happened in the playhouse, something so important that these works, entirely delightful to the last generation, appear to the present as things unaccountably strange, almost uncanny. What has happened? To answer that question fully would be to tell a long story. Briefly, Dumas fils has happened, and Ibsen has happened, and M. Antoine's Théâtre Libre. The whole naturalistic movement has happened, and is, indeed, itself now obsolescent. But the artificial play which it superseded is as dead as a doornail, so that it is only with an effort we can persuade ourselves it was ever alive. Looking at these fifty-year-old plays we whisper to ourselves, with Faustus over the apparition of Helen, though with an ironic surprise not his, Was this the face?—

Was this the face that launched a thousand ships
And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?

I speak, remember, of the present generation. It is possible that elderly playgoers may find our bewilderment itself bewildering. What! they may say, is there not a pretty tale of an actress's virtue and charity in Peg Woffington? Is there not in Peril a moving story of a woman saved from seduction? Are not all sorts of bustling events happening in both plays? Are not the players perpetually doing something exciting or pathetic or amusing? Certainly, and both are genuine plays, if a play is a heap of little scraps of life mechanically thrown together. But nowadays we expect a play to be an organism, something that grows under our eyes. We check it by its resemblance to life. Half a century ago playgoers seemed to turn their back on life in order to dwell in a sham world, a fool's paradise. I daresay they had a very good time. We must not jump to the conclusion that we are wiser or better off than they were. But it is certain that we take a different view of theatrical amusement.

For one thing, we do not care to have our emotions trifled with by mere theatrical prestidigitation. Look at the second act of Peril. A young fellow has been making love to his host's wife. Unexpectedly left alone with her at midnight he chases her round the sofa, madly presses his lips to hers and so forth (I prefer this vague description of an extremely brutal scene), when, by a trick, she sends him out on the balcony, and then bars the shutters on him. At that moment her husband enters, and our feelings are at extreme tension. You could not have a "stronger" situation. All the inmates of the house rush in, and one of them, a doctor and friend of the family, guesses that the lover is still outside on the balcony, whither the husband is about to pass. Thereupon the doctor seizes a medicine phial and explains to the assembly that he has a peculiar way of extracting the stopper; further, that he calls all his phials by pet-names, and that this one he calls "Cuckoo" (which is the nickname he has already given to the lover—fond of intruding in other people's nids conjugaux). The doctor taps the stopper and cries "Jump, cuckoo!" Out pops the stopper, and, at the signal, down jumps the lover from the balcony. An ingenious idea? Perhaps; but a puerile joke to people whose emotions have been stretched on the rack. Again, in the subsequent act, we are shown the wife and lover terrified by the apparent suspicions of the husband. The young man has sprained his hand in jumping; the husband gives it a violent squeeze and makes him use it, in torture, to write his name and address. By and by the husband takes a gun and rushes out, a shot is heard, and the wife falls in agony at the thought that he has committed suicide. Not a bit of it! He has only shot a hare which was ravaging his flower-beds. He was never suspicious at all. His sole object in getting the lover to sign his name was in order that he might show the handwriting to a friend who wanted a private secretary! The whole act is designed to cheat the emotions.

This is one side of Peril, the dramatic side. The other, the farcical side, exhibits a set of the host's friends (his intimes), who are monsters of selfishness and ingratitude. The two sides of the play do not join—except in the arbitrary detail that the false friends do their best to fan the husband's suspicions of his wife. Tested by reference to life the whole thing is absurd. But it is quite possible to get good acting in absurd plays, and you get it here. Miss Violet Vanbrugh brings as much passion into her part of the wife as it will hold, and (when you consider that it is all a case of false alarm) more; Mr. Leonard Boyne is excellent as the doctor; and Mr. Fred Kerr's study of a selfish old curmudgeon is none the less clever and diverting because the character is absolutely impossible.

It is, no doubt, to Miss Marie Tempest's success as Nell Gwyn that we owe her appearance as Peg Woffington. Mimicry, dancing, and a perpetual flow of spirits are all the qualities that are required for the part, and this actress can supply them. She is well supported by Mr. Frank Cooper as Triplet and by Miss Suzanne Sheldon as Mrs. Vane. But there is no vitality, not even superficial cohesion, in the piece; its sketches of Quin and Colley Cibber and Peg Woffington are absurdly unlike the originals; the present revival, I suspect, will have settled its fate for all time.

As for A Cigarette Maker's Romance, a stage version by Mr. Charles Hannan of Mr. Marion Crawford's novel, produced by Mr. Martin Harvey at the Court, one can only say that it is a rank sentimentalism played by a sentimentalist for the benefit of the (quite harmless) people who revel in sentiment. A young cigarette maker passes for a lunatic because he declares himself to be a count and is always preparing for the day when his noble friends shall come to claim him. In the end they do come. But, as M. Sarcy used to say, "point de lutte, point de drame"; there is no will-conflict in the play, only sentiment, only the pathos of a half-cracked young man looking for what his comrades suppose to be imaginary friends. Mr. Harvey, an intelligent, graceful, romantic, effeminate, affected actor, seems irresistibly drawn towards pathos of this bleating sort. Actors tend to fall into a groove; but this is not a good one, for it illustrates Sainte-Beuve's remark that "l'écueil particulier du genre romanesque c'est le faux"; and I can only hope that Mr. Harvey will escape from it before it is too late.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

RALEIGH AND THE EXPANSION OF ENGLAND.

THE SUCCESSORS OF DRAKE. By JULIAN S. CORBETT.
(Longmans. 21s.)

Mr. Corbett has rather a poor opinion of the English reading public. He quotes from Sir John Seeley's "Growth of British Polity" a long passage summing up the naval history of England between 1588 and Elizabeth's death as a period of triumph, security, and random buccaneering. Mr. Corbett believes that this passage represents "the prevalent view." If so, we can only say that a generation which derived its ideas of history from Hume was better instructed than one which derives its ideas from Seeley. We believe that three-fourths of those who have read Seeley's statement attentively would agree that it grossly misrepresents the period. As Mr. Corbett truly observes, "That period saw the birth of the Spanish navy, saw such comprehensive and well-matured attempts as the campaigns of 1596 and 1597, saw a new Armada off Ushant, saw Spinola at Sluys, saw Spanish naval stations established from end to end of the Channel, saw the invasion of Ireland, and the English cruising squadrons again and again driven off their ground by superior force."

But Mr. Corbett, we think, deals somewhat harshly with "our first authority in naval history" in another matter. He will not allow for a moment that the defeat of the Spanish fleet and the destruction of the rest of the shipping in Cadiz harbour in 1596 was the Trafalgar of the Elizabethan war. It is a loose parallel certainly, but Mr. Corbett minimizes the Cadiz exploit unduly. "In the following years," says Mr. Corbett, "Spain was able to despatch two Armadas against England, and a third would have sailed but for the action of the Dutch; nor to the war's end could the English Navy ever get command of the Spanish trade routes. So far from being a crowning success, it was rather an irretrievable miscarriage that condemned the war to an inefficient conclusion." Mr. Corbett must surely have written the whole sentence in his haste. An action which surprised and destroyed a considerable fleet in harbour, inflicted on the enemy immense material damage and an amount of what Mr. Kruger calls "moral and intellectual damage," from which Spain never fully recovered, cannot be described as an irretrievable miscarriage. When he says that it condemned the war to an inefficient conclusion Mr. Corbett apparently means that, in Monson's words, "the riches of Cadiz kept them that had got much from attempting more," and that this victory prevented the victorious fleet, or some portion of it, from making for the Azores and capturing the homeward-bound Spanish carracks. Even this could scarcely have brought the war to an "efficient conclusion." Moreover, Mr. Corbett is not consistent. If, after Cadiz, it was really impossible to undertake the expedition to the Azores, then Raleigh was right in opposing it; and he does not deserve to be charged with "a lack of stanchness at sea and too little faith in what ships could endure"—in other words, with cowardice. The bias against Raleigh here exhibited runs through Mr. Corbett's volume. In deciding the question who should rank as Drake's legitimate successor—as the embodiment of the war spirit in England—the choice necessarily lay between Raleigh and Essex. Mr. Corbett casts his vote without hesitation for Essex; and this he might well have done without doing less than justice to the far greater Englishman whom Essex detested as a rival, and would fain have put out of his way. Taking as his text the advice of the various commanders on the occasion of Philip's threatened invasion in 1596, Mr. Corbett strikes a parallel between Drake and Raleigh, which begins fairly enough, but falls off in impartiality as he proceeds:—

The feature of Raleigh's character, which has dazzled posterity into giving him a much higher place as an admiral than he ever deserved, was his far-sightedness. His enunciation of the doctrine of the command of the sea was clear, sound, and modern. Drake, with all his deep conviction and painful effort to persuade his superiors, had never stated it with half such lucidity or completeness. The difference between the two men is that Drake acted on it and Raleigh did not. Drake, inarticulate, drastic, and convinced, only knew he could have no ease till he was at the throat of the enemy's main fleet. Raleigh, the scholar and logician, was content to know that theoretically the Queen and the States had the preponderance at sea, and that by the rules of the art Spain could not invade them. Of all Englishmen who have achieved a great reputation as a man of action he had most deeply the taint of the man of letters, and to this he owes much of the reputation that men of letters have made him. What Raleigh's counter-scheme was we cannot tell for certain. In any case it was not a project for destroying the Adelantado's fleet at its base.

Mr. Corbett, of course, cannot mean that Raleigh's advice in November, 1596, ought to have been substantially the same as that urged by Drake in March, 1588. Every seaman must have known that, despite Philip's eagerness for an immediate invasion, the Adelantado, at that time of year, was not likely to bring his ships within striking distance of the English coast in any very formidable condition. Raleigh knew that the blow, if it were ever delivered, must be postponed, and his advice was to prepare the largest possible fleet for immediate mobilization when the proper time came. Better counsel Drake himself could not have given; and as Mr. Corbett himself is of opinion that Raleigh's counter-project was something in the nature of a West Indian raid in Drake's own manner, the contrast between the two commanders which Mr. Corbett seeks to establish appears to us to have little or no foundation in fact.

Nor is it true that literary men have conspired to vamp up for Raleigh a fictitious reputation because he was himself a man of letters. Great as is the power of literature, such a feat is beyond it. It would be nearer the truth to say that literary men have striven, and not unsuccessfully—not to vindicate Raleigh in the circumstances of his fall from favour, for in that respect he needed no vindication—but to redress the unjust balance in which his merits and services were thenceforward openly weighed by servile contemporaries. Mr. Corbett coldly tells us that, after all is said, the contemporaries who vilipended him were best able to judge of his merits and demerits. Who, we reply, were better able to judge than Charles Lord Howard and Sir Robert Cecil, who sympathized warmly with him from the moment of his disgrace, whose loves, as he put it, sought him out in the darkest shadow of adversity, when he was forsaken of all but of malice and revenge, and whose assistance supported him in continuing to serve his country as a private citizen when he was denied a place in the service of his Sovereign? Mr. Stebbing, in his excellent "Life of Raleigh," contends that it was the Guiana voyage which at length rehabilitated him. In the light of the facts which Mr. Corbett has marshalled in the present volume, we should rather say that he was restored to his functions in Council and in action because England in her new peril could not do without him.

We have little but praise for the way in which Mr. Corbett has executed the main part of his task. He has diligently studied every available source of information, printed or unprinted, including the still uncalendared papers at Hatfield; and considered as a chronicle of the stirring events which make up the closing phase of the great Elizabethan war his volume leaves little to be desired. The sequence of cause and effect is skilfully traced, and the following may serve as a specimen of the way in which details of high interest are interwoven with the narrative. The authority, which is quoted from the Spanish "Documentos Ineditos," is the "Declaracion" of a Franciscan friar, who was captured together with a gentleman of Biscay in a Flemish flyboat at the mouth of the Tagus, on the way to Cadiz. When the prisoners were brought before Essex, they found him dressed in white satin, lying on a brocaded couch, and surrounded by the captains of his galleons.

Learning that, as the prisoners were from the Canaries, they could tell him little which he did not know already, he fell to boasting of what he was going to do. He meant, he said, to burn and destroy all the places he could, ay, and, if he was able, to strike the crown from Philip's head, because he had burnt three villages in England, and had taken Calais, and in payment for this he meant to take Cadiz and all the adjacent ports. Then, as the spirit of the old Protestant rovers warmed in him, he began to revile the friar. It was the clergy and friars, he vowed, that were at the bottom of the war, because they would not let Philip make peace. The friar protested they were Christians, and, therefore, would be at peace with all men. But the satin-clad Protestant called him a dog, and vowed he was the better Christian of the two. All Spaniards, he said, worshipped gods of wood and paint, but God could not be in Heaven and on earth as well. Englishmen served and worshipped him in Heaven, and Spaniards on earth. Then he roundly reviled the mass, apologized to the Biscayan, who, he said, was a gentleman and a man of his word, and so dismissed them.

Essex was, no doubt, bitterly disappointed at being prevented from holding Cadiz permanently, and, as Mr. Corbett leans to the opinion that this would have been the right course, the decision not to do so, taken in deference to the opinion of Howard and every naval member of the Council of War, is probably a contributory element in the "inefficient conclusion" which he laments. Mr. Corbett is evidently influenced by the traditional policy of Drake. But Drake had been for holding Lisbon, not Cadiz; and Lisbon was expressly forbidden by the fleet's instructions. The occupation of Cadiz was, no doubt, feasible. But to have carried out in all its fulness the policy foreshadowed by it involved efforts to which the combined forces of England and Holland were scarcely equal, and which certainly did not enter into the Queen's calculations. Elizabeth was no Napoleon. Heartily disliking the war, she desired nothing more than to reign peacefully over her beloved subjects, and would at any time have welcomed a peace with Philip which assured liberty of government and conscience to her Dutch allies. Peace on such terms Philip would never have voluntarily granted. Could it have been extorted from him even by a Power securely possessed of the chief port in his dominions, and using that post of vantage to cut him off from his American possessions, and reduce him, in Raleigh's words, to a mere "king of figs and oranges"? We doubt it.

At the risk of appearing to criticize in a captious spirit a work which evinces rare erudition and a thorough critical knowledge of its main subject, the history of the English Navy and naval policy, we shall take exception to one more of Mr. Corbett's well-turned paragraphs. The defensive aspect of the great Elizabethan war, he observes, is not the only one.

There is also the view of the men who were its moving spirits. For them it meant something more. The offensive movements into which they never ceased their efforts to persuade or trick the Government were not designed as mere defensive measures. It was so they justified them to the scribes, but in their hearts they meant more. For them it was not enough to preserve what England had. Their hot spirit was set on winning for her something from her enemy's dominions. That they ever dreamed that England might become what Spain had tried to be cannot be maintained. Not even Raleigh could see so far ahead. They only felt within them the instinct for expansion which was the great outcome of the Elizabethan regeneration, and to that end they pushed turbulently forward in thwarted endeavour. It was here lay the irreconcilable difference between the men of war and the scribes, between Drake and his successors and the mistress they tried to serve too well. Never once, except in the desire to recover the old English possession of Calais, did Elizabeth swerve from her attitude against expansion. Her most solemn and convincing declarations of policy disclaim the wish to acquire fresh territory, and her actions endorsed her professions. The idea of the expansion of England was alive, and Elizabeth was the first "Little Englander."

We are not sure that the distinction with which this passage begins, whatever authority may be cited in support of it, is maintainable. It is true that the idea of England's claiming a share in the inheritance of the New World dates from before Elizabeth's accession, and that Continental opinion credited her with a design to realize it long before her breach with Philip. It is none the less true that the first project of the kind was laid on her council table at the very moment when her resolution to support Philip's revolted subjects was first taken, and that it was proposed as a measure of defence against the attack which that resolution was sure to provoke, by the very man who a few years after led the first expedition to Newfoundland. When Elizabeth sanctioned that expedition and gave Gilbert as a token of her favour "an anchor guided by a lady," she had certainly not taken up an attitude against expansion. Nor had she done so when she renewed in Raleigh's favour the patent granted to his half-brother, or when she personally conferred the name of Virginia on the territory annexed in her name by Raleigh's captains. We doubt whether Elizabeth had become a "Little Englander" even in 1595, eleven years later, when two of her "men of war," Dudley and Raleigh, within a few weeks of each other, but quite unknown to each other, received in her name the submission of the native chiefs of Trinidad. Nor can we agree with Mr. Corbett that Raleigh, for one, never dreamed that England might become what Spain had aspired to be. He firmly believed that Spain, despite her frantic efforts to prove the contrary, had hopelessly broken down, and that England was destined to take her place. His Virginian enterprise was inspired by the expectation of finding another Mexico beyond the Appalachian mountains. His later design on Guiana had a much bolder scope. "We have it, either in his own words or by fair inference from them, that his aim was to conquer the supposed empire on the lower Orinoco by posing as the deliverer of the Indians from their Spanish oppressors, and to advance from this point to the conquest of New Granada, and ultimately of Venezuela on the one hand and Peru on the other. Though the subject is in some of its aspects susceptible of a broader treatment than Mr. Corbett bestows on it, we thank him cordially for an intensely interesting volume, in most respects a fine historical study, and in all respects a worthy pendant to "Drake and the Tudor Navy." A word of praise must be added for the illustrations. The noble portrait of Raleigh from the panel in the National Portrait Gallery so closely corresponds with the Duke of Rutland's miniature reproduced in Mr. Stebbing's "Life of Raleigh," taken at a later period, as to leave no doubt of its truthfulness. The portraits of Essex, Cumberland, Buckhurst, Charles Howard, and Mountjoy, taken from the oil paintings in the same collection, seem equally good, and there are many useful charts and maps.

AN AMERICAN LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE: POET, DRAMATIST, AND MAN. By HAMILTON WRIGHT MABIE. (The Macmillan Company. 21s.)

The tide of Shakespearean criticism flows at present strongly in the direction of biography, and this volume by an American writer is the latest sign of the current. There are, broadly speaking, two ways of dealing with the dramatist's life. The first is to narrate all that is known about it from external evidence, with little reference to the plays. Of this method Mr. Sidney Lee's biography is the most elaborate product. The other is to reconstruct his personality from a combination of the known facts of his career with inferences suggested by his dramatic work. This method has been used by Prof. Dowden, Dr. Brandes, and others, and it is to this class of biographers that—as the title of his book suggests—Mr. Mabie belongs. Within strictly defined limits, his volume has considerable merits. It is well arranged and well proportioned, and the author shows skill and judgment in selecting those aspects of the plays which throw light on the dramatist's life, thought, and art. His style is luminous, and has a dignified, rhythmical movement, though certain words like "poise" occur with somewhat irritating frequency. He is at his best in discussing some of the wider aspects of his subject, as in the chapter on "The ethical significance of the tragedies." Thus the following passage contains an illuminating generalization, never, as far as we are aware, more tersely and convincingly expressed:—

Shakespeare's ethical view of life was rooted in realities and had the large vigorous vitality of an elemental order, spacious enough to admit of the full, free, and normal development of the human spirit on all sides. . . . Into the region of pure spiritual impulse and ultimate spiritual relationship Shakespeare did not penetrate; in that fact lies his limitation. If to his other gifts had been added the spiritual insight of Dante, he would have been not only the foremost but the ultimate interpreter of the life of the race.

Much insight and mastery of apt phrase are shown in some of the short appreciations of Shakespearean characters. Thus of Falstaff it is truly said:—

It would be as absurd to apply ethical standards to him as to Silenus or Bacchus; he is a creature of the elemental forces; a personification of the vitality which is in bread and wine; a satyr become human, but moving buoyantly and joyfully in an immoral world.

Did space allow, other examples of Mr. Mabie's forcible character-sketches might be quoted. They appeal to us more than the elaborate descriptions of Warwickshire scenery which fill many of the earlier pages. No doubt a loving study of Shakespeare's environment in youth helps us to interpret his spirit, and for Americans this form of study has always had peculiar attractions, but its results, when put on paper, are perilously suggestive of the glorified guide-book.

We take it that Mr. Mabie has spent more time in exploring the neighbourhood of Stratford than the outlying regions of Shakespearean criticism. The authorities whom he mentions by name in his preface are contemporary English or American scholars. There is, indeed, a tribute to "the poet's devout students in Germany, to whom his fame owes much," but we find few, if any, traces of first-hand study of them, though one or two familiar passages from Goethe and Heine are quoted. As, however, the volume does not claim to be based on deep research Mr. Mabie's deficiencies on this side might be overlooked. But where he errs grievously and inexcusably is in the frequent inaccuracy of his references to the literature contemporary with Shakespeare's works. No one can hope to interpret the dramatist adequately without a closer familiarity with Elizabethan literature as a whole than Mr. Mabie has acquired. Thus he repeats the superficial statement that Love's Labour's Lost "betrays the influence" of Lyly's Euphues. Now it has often been shown that the play has nothing to do with the distinctive peculiarities of the Euphuistic style, of which Mr. Mabie has evidently a very hazy conception. The statement that "the poets of his own time—Drayton, Brooke, Weever—were under the spell of his genius" is mere rhetoric; Drayton's praise of Shakespeare in his poetical epistle to Reynolds is curiously cool, and his sonnets are more likely to have influenced those of his great contemporary than vice versa. Mr. Mabie's knowledge, indeed, of Elizabethan sonnet literature is very superficial. He seems to think that all Shakespeare's predecessors in this branch of poetic art used the same sonnet-structure as himself, not realizing that Wyatt, for instance, adopted the Petrarchian model save for the introduction of a final couplet. Nor is he better versed in Elizabethan prose. He speaks of Greene's "unmistakable reference" to a lost play on Hamlet, being evidently unaware that this all-important allusion occurs not in Greene's Menaphon but in Nash's prefatory epistle to that romance.

These and similar blunders render Mr. Mabie's work of comparatively little value to Shakespearean scholars. We have laid stress on them because the book, in its handsome array, is likely to be widely read. But the attractions of a sumptuous format, with one hundred illustrations, which make an extremely brave show, cannot be allowed to cover serious deficiencies in the necessary equipment of a Shakespearean biographer.

THEOLOGY.

SERMONS ON FAITH AND DOCTRINE. By the late BENJAMIN JOWETT, M.A., Master of Balliol College. Edited by the Very Rev. the Hon. W. H. FREMANTLE, Dean of Ripon. (Murray. 7s. 6d.)

Elderly clergymen may still be found who speak of the writers of "Essays and Reviews" as the septem contra Christum. The gibe, amazing as it is, had its vogue among a certain class of orthodox champions a generation ago; at the present day its memory serves to remind us of what original thinkers had to go through in the palmy days of religious polemics. The Broad Church movement of the middle Victorian period is fast becoming a matter of history ; only within the last few weeks three of its well-known disciples, Dr. Momerie, Mr. Haweis, and Mr. Brooke Lambert, have passed away. But of the greater heroes of "Essays and Reviews" the Archbishop of Canterbury remains, a pillar of the faith, conspicuous not only for his fairness and tolerance, but also for his simple old-fashioned piety. Now Jowett had not that almost bovine temperament which enables a few men to go on, unmoved to the right or the left, by hostile criticism. He was affected, as Dean Fremantle admits, by his environment ; and he said in his latter years that tolerant modern Oxford could not realise the miserable conditions of his youth when every tea-party was ranged in one religious camp or the other. And the effect of his environment was that he shrank into himself, that he ceased to give of his best to theological literature, leaving to many the impression that he had lost his religious faith. No impression could be less true ; but the religion of Jowett has had to be vindicated posthumously. In addition to the two volumes of his Life and Letters and the additional volume of Letters, there have been published since his death the Notes and Dissertations on the Epistles to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans, and three separate collections of Sermons, of which the volume before us is the last and most interesting.

What is the religious teacher that is there revealed ? A man easy enough to understand, indeed so simple and straightforward that it is difficult to see how he could ever have been misunderstood. His heresy, his crime in the eyes of his generation, was that he would not stand up to repeat the shibboleths of the generation that had gone before. No doubt some of those shibboleths or symbols represented truths which are being now recovered, although some also are as dead as the dust of Caesar. But Jowett's way was just to utter what he had found out for himself to the true, and no more. Nothing could be simpler, nothing one would think could be more harmless. For he was not a negative or destructive teacher ; he stood amid the ruins of a theology that had been destroyed by other hands than his ; and he commenced the process of re-building, a process that was partly arrested by the attacks of those who were too blind to see the ruins. It is difficult for us now to remember what Oxford was like in the sixties and even later when Christianity was openly regarded as dead, and an undergraduate of Corpus Christi College who retained his faith was regarded as an interesting curiosity under the name of "the Corpus Christian." It was a Nemesis of Faith indeed for those who had pitted the current orthodoxy against the revelations of science. In the first sermon, on "Darwinism and Faith in God," Jowett meets the difficulty, accepting the fresh knowledge because "all knowledge is good, and all serious inquiry and discussion is good" ; but pointing out the limits of the new theory, as of all theories, and the danger of too wide generalizations, of one part of knowledge becoming disproportioned to the rest ; and looking forward to the time "when religion may be enlightened, extended, purified, and philosophy or science inspired and elevated, and both allied together in the service of God and man." Again, in a sermon on "Prayer and Life," after remarking that this is not the first, and will not be the last, age in which the Christian faith has seemed to be encircled with peculiar dangers, he goes on to say :—

Do we imagine that God has been governing the world for eighteen centuries since the giving of Christianity, communing with and inspiring the soul of man, and that during all that time He has given us no increased knowledge of the principles of His government, no wider conception of His purposes towards mankind ? Have not history and physical science told us a great deal about Him, which could never have been known to former ages ? And is God to be regarded as separable from nature, or the knowledge of Him from the knowledge of His works ? Are there not rather clear and manifest instances in which the knowledge of nature has added to our knowledge of God ?

The man who spoke like this was infinitely removed from Agnosticism ; he was a champion and a prophetic champion of Christianity.

In a time of great stress he found the reason for the faith that was in him in those sciences (of which physical science is but one) to which alone man can go for proof of any doctrine. Had he been content to say, this is true because Moses or Isaiah or St. Paul said so, he would have been hailed as a pillar of orthodoxy ; but he was not so content ; and it is due to him and men like him that a new orthodoxy, saner and surer, has arisen from the ashes of the old. His pupils, confessed or unconfessed, are prominent in every school of religion ; and every intelligent preacher now defends the faith in the way that he defended it, and not in the way of his opponents. Even now another problem, as yet only half realized, that of the Oriental religions, is rising before us ; and it is certain that it will in the main be met as he meets it here in a sermon on the subject. Yet his method is after all only that of St. Peter and St. John—"Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but that in every nation he that feareth God and doeth righteousness is accepted of Him," and "That was the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." History may say that it was Jowett and not Burgon who defended the Bible in the nineteenth century.

He did not assert every doctrine that is to be found in the Thirty-Nine Articles, but this volume shows that he asserted a great deal, and that he was content for the rest to wait, confident in the light he had found. "Life," he says, "is a shallow thing without religion" ; and to him religion meant the justice and love and nearness of God, the reality of prayer, the faith in immortality. He was a believer in Christ, and though he never systematized his belief, that was more the world's fault than his. And because he took nothing on trust, held nothing from prejudice, enforced nothing upon others, but welcomed all opinions and was all his life a listener, this record of what he did believe, this explanation of why he believed it will be doubly valuable ; and many will turn to such a sermon as that on immortality because they are sure of finding there arguments that are eternal and universal in their application and uninfluenced by changing theories upon the value of ancient documents or the machinery of nature.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA. Edited by T. K. CHEYNE and T. SUTHERLAND BLACK. Vol. II., E—K. (Black. 21s.).

Scholars will heartily welcome the second instalment of this important encyclopædia, which represents the work of those who may be called "stalwarts" in Biblical criticism. What chiefly astonishes one is the industry of Dr. Cheyne. Of the articles in this volume many of the most important are by him, while almost every page shows tokens of his editorial supervision. He is personally responsible for a host of minor articles, and also in a great degree for those sections which give its peculiar character to the encyclopædia—e.g., the articles on the patriarchs "Isaac," "Jacob," and "Joseph" ; on "Isaiah" the prophet and the book ; on "Jeroboam," "Jonah," "Job" (Book of), "Hezekiah," "Judah," "Jericho," &c. He also writes on New Testament subjects, such as "Faith," "Galilee," the "Sea of Galilee," "John the Baptist." Of other contributions the most noteworthy is the elaborate article on the "Gospels," jointly written by Dr. Abbott and Professor Schmiedel, of Zurich. Professor Guthe, of Leipzig, writes on "Israel" ; Professor Wellhausen on the "Hexateuch" ; Professor W. Max Müller, of Philadelphia, on "Egypt." Some articles are signed by the late Professor Robertson Smith, the original projector of the work.

Those who have used the first volume of this magnificent encyclopædia know what to look for in the present instalment. A significant remark by Dr. Cheyne defines the relation of the encyclopædia to Dr. Hastings' well-known dictionary, published by Messrs. T. and T. Clark. Dr. Cheyne is sketching the literature bearing on the writings of Isaiah, and says characteristically :—

Among dictionary articles G. A. Smith's may be specially mentioned (Hastings' DB). This writer's earlier volumes on Isaiah, stimulating as they are, are open to very much adverse criticism. (English critics have lain too much under the spell of Dillmann.) This scholar is now giving way to the force of argument. . . . His article, however is . . . one of the most hopeful signs in English Bible-study, which at present in the O. T. department is too predominantly "moderate."

Dr. Cheyne evidently looks for considerable progress in O. T. criticism. "Hexateuch criticism," he says elsewhere, "is passing into a new phase. This phase is largely due to archaeology and the comparative study of social customs, but in part also to the further developments of Hebrew philology and textual criticism." One is inclined, however, to ask, when we reach a really constructive stage in the study of Hebrew history and religion? For we are assured that "a really satisfactory history of the religion of Israel still has to be written, and when we have reached the fresh starting point for which we are looking this much-desired book will be written."

On New Testament subjects the most important article is that on "Gospels," which occupies nearly 140 columns. Dr. Abbott contributes the "descriptive and analytical" portion; Dr. Schmiedel discusses "tentative solutions" of the synoptical problem. From the nature of the case comparatively few positive conclusions are reached. In section 139 of Dr. Schmiedel's article he selects five passages which might "be called the foundation pillars for a truly scientific life of Jesus." The article on "Jesus" by the late Professor Bruce, of Glasgow, cannot challenge comparison with Dr. Sanday's treatise in Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible," Vol. II.; but so far as it goes it is cautious and reverent. As regards the fourth Gospel, Professor Schmiedel says boldly:—

There is a positive relief from an intolerable burden as soon as the student has made up his mind to give up any such theory as that of the "genuineness" of the Gospel, as also of its authenticity in the sense of its being the work of an eye-witness who meant to record actual history. Whoever shrinks from the surrender can, in spite of all the veneration for the book which constrains him to take this course, have little joy in his choice.

If occasionally we detect a note of undue confidence, it must be admitted that the general tone of the encyclopædia is worthy of a large and nobly-planned enterprise. Like its predecessor, this volume gives the results of laborious research, unfettered by any controversial purpose; it reflects, on the whole, the spirit of a criticism which (as the editors say in the preface to Vol. I.) "identifies the cause of religion with that of historical truth."

THE HISTORICAL NEW TESTAMENT. By JAMES MOFFATT, B.D. (T. and T. Clark. 16s.)

Mr. Moffatt here attempts to arrange the New Testament writings in the order of their composition. His results are no doubt, to a certain extent, provisional, but we have been much impressed by the learning and impartiality with which he discusses the various theories respecting date and origin, and he seems by long practice to have developed a sound critical instinct in dealing with disputed points of literary history. In the "Prolegomena" he states, perhaps at unnecessary length, the principles of the historical method as applied to the N. T. literature. He shows that sound conclusions must be based on a real knowledge of contemporary literature. The following remark seems to us to be much to the point:—

A history of the N. T. would be simply unintelligible if it were severed from any conception of the tendencies and habits existing in that Christian society of which the N. T. literature is at once an outcome and a reflection. To become legible these books need the context of the religious situation. The significance and connexion of the writings cannot be fully grasped until these are approached with some adequate idea of the whole Christian movement during the first and second centuries.

The literary criticism of the New, as of the Old, Testament is becoming more and more dependent on the results of historical and archaeological research. Nothing in Mr. Moffatt's learned volume is more valuable than the carefully-compiled series of historical tables, exhibiting in intelligible form the conditions under which Christian literature gradually arose. They illustrate in a compendious way the close interdependence of two departments of research—N. T. introduction and the history of early Christianity. Mr. Moffatt's acceptance of modern critical results is cautious but thorough. He rejects the position of those "who, conceding the rights of criticism within the province of the O. T., decline to admit the legitimacy of similar historical research in the N. T. literature, upon the ground that the latter collection possesses certain qualities of finality and authority which exempt it from being judged by the canons of ordinary treatment, or that it was 'produced under very different historical conditions.'" In illustration of his conclusions we may mention that Mr. Moffatt regards Rom. xvi. as a note addressed to the Ephesian Church; that he follows Hausrath in regarding 2 Cor., x., i.—xiii., 10 as the "intermediate letter" to the Corinthians which preceded the despatch of the second Epistle; that he places the Pastoral Epistles between 100-125 A.D., and St. James' Epistle about 130 A.D. On the fourth Gospel he says:—

The terms "genuine" and "Johannine" are out of place in strictly scientific work upon the fourth Gospel. It is genuine upon the score not of authorship but of contents—thanks to the fidelity and insight with which it serves to express certain elements of Christianity as the personal spirit and mind of Jesus. Similarly it is Johannine . . . in the sense that any historical element throughout its pages may be traced back directly or indirectly to that apostle and his school.

We have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Moffatt's book is one of special importance and interest. It represents a large and growing mass of scholarly opinion. It has been compiled with immense care and labour, and embodies the results of very wide reading and conscientious reflection.

MORE VERSE.

The publication of THE PRAYER OF ST. SCHOLASTICA AND OTHER POEMS, by Lady Lindsay (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d. n.)—a volume not bulky, containing no big thing, but many pleasant and beautiful ones—was certainly not made necessary by any tardiness upon the part of qualified critics to accept Lady Lindsay as a poet of accomplishment and range, for "The King's Vigil" and "The Flower Seller" had well enough established that; and, not fifteen months ago, to these was added a work de longue haleine, an effort sustained and serious and successful. When, therefore, it is objected—as it has been, we observe, in one quarter—that Lady Lindsay in her new volume "strikes no new note," the answer is, the "new note" was not necessary; the old was already good enough. Moreover, there is far from being here any real repetition. We have the inspiration, and the labour that gives it form; we do not ask to have the eccentric or the startling; the writer is too grave an artist to obtrude on us the merely obviously novel. Range is the note of this volume. Few women, even in a generation in which writing women abound, can conceive so widely of life and of the variety of its interests; few are in intellectual and emotional sympathy with so many phases of existence, thought, and feeling. And, again, there is the poet's music—the artist's capacity for good technique. The story of the deep affection of Scholastica for her twin-brother, Benedict, is told with ordered simplicity and reticence. "Ora et Labora" is a fine thought, put excellently; and the small poem on the fifty-second page, has, with its naturally exalted tone, a notable sweep of vision. That the whole volume should be as good as that was a consummation not to be expected—a consummation that has not been attained. Place is given here and there to the imperfect, or, at least, to what is not memorable. But the presence of that which is below the best is condoned by the goodness of the best itself—by such subtle work, for instance, as the profoundly veracious fancy that bears the name of "Preference." On the whole, the serious mind and varied art of the writer find, in the volume before us, constantly acceptable expression.

There is both fine thought and fine expression in Mr. Lloyd Mifflin's AT THE GATES OF SONG (Frowde, 6s.). They consist, with one exception, of Wordsworthian sonnets, and undoubtedly show a remarkable evenness of merit. In some cases, as in "The Silence after Orpheus' Death" and a few of the pastorals, Mr. Mifflin reveals a fine poetic imagination.

Mrs. Massey's short fly-leaf sentences modestly and accurately indicate the feeling animating her latest book of verses, SONGS OF THE UNSEEN HOPE (Skeffington and Son, 3s.)—viz., that "the closer pressure of the difficulties and mysteries of this life leads us to listen with deeper longing to the answers of faith" and that "the turmoil of war impresses on us more intensely the need and the possibility of the hidden life of peace." She is a good metrist; her melodies fit her themes; and she has the reticence which is so necessary to the expression of strong emotion. Occasionally she does not sufficiently drive her thought home to the core of her verse, but the thought is generally easy to appreciate. We select these stanzas from the poem called "As Life goes on":—

As life goes on the faces that are dearest
Look from the dimness of a world untried;
Hopes that were once our strongest and our clearest,
Are rooted up to plant the other side
As life goes on.

As life goes on clear dew and morning whiteness
Are gathered upward till all paths are dry;
Glory of service, and the strength of rightness,
Must cheer our toil while the red sun is high
And life goes on.

Props that upheld us bear our weight no longer,
Perplexed with loss weak footsteps onward go,
Some staves being tried and used are yet the stronger,
What was "I hope," is changed into "I know"
As life goes on.

All paths lead on where the great waves are sounding,
Where solemn lights and far off glories be;
There, one by one, stalk sails with breezes rounding,
Our boats are putting out across the sea
And life goes on.

A first glance at Mr. C. H. Hoole's ATTEMPTS IN VERSE (Rivingtons, 4s. 6d.) hardly does him justice, for the introduction to the blank verse poem of "Cæcilius" affords examples of certain blemishes which lie scattered at far rarer intervals through the remainder of the volume. The writer must secure the pause which breaks monotony, and the want of this is sometimes accentuated by what may be called the lack of the instinct of punctuation. It is tantalizing, too, to have to search for a nominative lying hidden in another sentence, and it spoils the reader's enjoyment if he doubts for a moment as to whether he is reading the perfect indicative of a verb or its past participle. Moreover, very short interspersed passages of direct speech in a narrative want more careful handling than the author of "Cæcilius" has always given them. With these reservations, however, the poem is interesting, while the passages descriptive of early Christian interiors, and of Christian life generally in the Roman Empire under Trajan, give it distinction. Mr. Hoole, an alumnus of Christ Church, is at his best in his descriptions of old time cities and their surroundings, in which scholarship and a sympathetic imagination play equal parts. In many of his sonnets this descriptive faculty is apparent. They have no great concentration of thought, but it is open to doubt whether anything is gained by the preservation of the sonnet form. At any rate, one or two of those which are most irregular are the most successful. Where there is a central thought it is sometimes either not carried quite far enough or else a little too elusive—a remark which applies to many of the more thoughtful passages in the book. This, which follows a pendant with spring for its subject, is fairly representative:—

But in the autumn all is changed; the wind
Shrieks through the valley, and the brown leaves fly
In shoals before it; the stream hurries by,
Flecked with great raindrops, like some frightened hind
Seeking to gain his home when storms draw nigh;
The fields are dank with mire, 'tis the same stream,
And the same trees, only a hand has come
To change the music from its summer theme,
To the loud notes of winter's fife and drum.
How like to peace and war; we cannot dwell
For ever listening to the summer breeze;
Yet, who would choose in winter's citadel
To pass his life, when calm and lasting peace
Are offered, and a scene of rest and ease?

Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson, the author of THE PROFESSOR AND OTHER POEMS (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.), is such a scholarly poet and such a master of the technique of his art that he really deserves to be inspired directly by the muses and not through the medium of Tennyson and Matthew Arnold. His work, however, is an echo—though an echo that one is pleased to welcome—and not a new voice with a new message. One can sometimes discover his indebtedness even in individual lines. For instance:—

Horace, the ailing lord,
Of plaster palaces and hollow groves,
Absorbed in half-a-hundred tiny arts,
Master of none;

is an echo of Arnold's "France famed in all great arts in none supreme"; and if Tennyson had never written of "bowery hollows crowned with summer seas," we may be sure that Mr. Benson would never have written of:—

Woody islands crowned with byre and barn.

Yet there are happy lines and happy passages, more particularly in the long poem in which the poet Gray is supposed to soliloquize at the point of death. We like the beginning of his farewell:—

Oh Earth; farewell, my Earth, whom I have loved
More like a patient lover than a child, and there are fine descriptive touches in the closing paragraph:—

But I, beyond the fen, the holy towers,
Beyond the sluggish sea that laps the ooze
With melancholy murmur, hear a cry
That calls me, and is answered by the lapse
Of pulses throbbing faint, intimate pangs
Abhorred; as old dismantled priories,
That seem to doze across the summer fields,
Yet slip, dismembered by the intruding frost,
That cracks their hoary bones, and as they muse,
With sudden start and shock portend decay.

It may be that these lines would not have been written if it had not been for the model furnished by the closing lines of "Sohrab and Rustum." We are glad that they were written, all the same.

THE UNDERDOG AND OTHER VERSES (Kegan Paul, 1s. 6d.) is a collection of clever verses by the Rev. C. J. Boden, which have already appeared in various newspapers. It is refreshing to find so much unpretentious humour in one small volume, and we recommend the book to the frivolous. A writer should not be judged by his parodies, but the following lines "To my Nephew" may be quoted:—

You say, but with no depth of thought,
Lighthearted, you whose eager eyes
Believe in artificial flies,
You tell me trout are easy caught.

I know not; one, indeed, I knew,
Of fishermen perhaps the worst—
Your uncle—who from last to first
Could never throw his tackle true.

Perplexed by lines and hooks and reels,
At last his patience all gave out.
There's not a single honest trout,
Believe me; inside half the creels.

The Rev. A. S. Cripps' TITANIA (Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d.) is a collection of scholarly songs and poems, mostly short, which are marked by a good deal of genuine poetic fancy. They are superior to the general run of modern verse. Mr. Cripps, of course, owes something to the older men. It is only as though a new air were played on an old violin. Almost any of his songs might be quoted with approbation, but perhaps the following lines are among the best :—

You that fare to Oxford, tell me what you find ;
 " Greyest courts and flow'riest gardens, streams that silver wind,
 Sweetbriar hedge of yesterdays,—To-day's Rose sleeps behind ! "

You that go from Oxford, tell me what goes too,
 " All the woman's soul of her a wandering son to woo ;
 Not until you go from her will she come to you."

Folded is her body in a faerie rest,
 Whilst her dreams for banished men go seeking east and west ;
 Till their dreams come back at call to find their mother's breast !

The anonymous author of SONGS FROM THE BOOK OF JAFFIR (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.) has the gift of song-writing in full measure, and we have nothing but praise for him. These Persian songs, adapted rather than translated, have been done into English with an unusual combination of polish and vigour. As the author evidently knows what he is about, we hope he will not rest content with the present very thin little volume. The following lines may not be his best, but are a fair example of his style :—

I know of a land that knows a lord
 That's neither brave nor true ;
 But I know of a sword, a sword, a sword
 Can cut a chain in two.
 Its edge is sharp and its blade is broad ;
 I know of a sword, a sword, a sword
 Can cut a chain in two.

I know of a land that's sunk in shame
 And hearts that faint and tire,
 And I know of a name, a name, a name
 Can set the land on fire.
 Its sound is a brand, its letters flame ;
 I know of a name, a name, a name
 Will set the land on fire.

I know of hearts that loathe the wrong,
 That still are leal and true ;
 And I know of a song, a song, a song
 Can break a fetter through.
 Oh, you who long, and long, and long,
 I'll give you a song, a song, a song
 Will break your fetters through.

If we may hazard a guess we should say that the poems in Mr. C. W. Wynne's little collection of SONGS AND LYRICS (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d. n.) were written prior to the more ambitious poem, " Ad Astra," which he published last summer. They are the kind of verses which we should have expected to find pre-luding what seems to us a far maturer poem. So that (assuming the correctness of the impression) it is pleasanter to congratulate Mr. Wynne upon his increased achievement than to be wondering whether this little volume will increase his reputation. In " Ad Astra " he seldom takes those metrical and syntactical liberties which in the " Songs and Lyrics " do not appear to be justified by any atoning virtue in melody or expression, just as he has dispensed with much of the excessive sentimentality which flavours the " Songs and Lyrics." Still these little poems have fervour and sincerity. We like best perhaps " To Winifred " and " Ianthe," in spite of the fact that its first line—" Ianthe ! could thy name express "—rouses unfulfilled hopes of an echo from the seventeenth century.

War Verse.

As we all know, our wars in South Africa and the Sudan have produced a heavy, but unequal crop of patriotic verses. Some of these have had the ring of true poetry about them ; others as decidedly have not ; the majority have been creditable but uninspired attempts to express the general feeling. We can only say of two unpretending little books before us, WEAVING IN WAR-TIME, by Carrie Thackwell (Houlston and Sons, 2s.), and POEMS, by F. Montagu Lloyd (Elliot Stock), that they partake of the characteristics of the majority.

Mr. A. Vine Hall is well known in South Africa, and his new volume, MY BOER HOST, published at Bulawayo and in London (Sampson Low, 2s. 6d.), will add to his reputation. His verses run well, and show a power of graphic and humorous description. The book is more concerned with the past and future of South Africa than with the present war, of which Mr. Hall relates only one little episode. A longer and better poem is devoted to Thomas Pringle, farmer, journalist, philanthropist, and poet in Cape Colony in the remote days when Lord Charles Somerset was its Governor, more than 70 years ago. We are glad to find that poetry is one of the products of Rhodesia.

SONGS OF THE WAR, by A. St. John Adcock (Brimley Johnson, 1s. n.), is not so much poetry as rhyming journalism. Most of it has that banjo jingle which Mr. Kipling made popular. It is never very good, but it is sometimes rather good. The following lines may be taken as showing Mr. Adcock at his best :—

Now, when the Gov'ment packs us up an' ships us off to fight,
 A transport very often ain't a transport of delight ;
 The Admiralty doesn't check by any sort of tact
 The simple sort of 'abits the contractor can contract.

Says they, " This 'umble tradesman in 'is 'armless kind o' way,
 'E runs a little business, an' 'e wants to make it pay ;
 'Is meat supply is rather 'igh
 For common, timid men to buy,
 But nothin' daunts our 'eroes—it will do for Tommy A."

Among two or three small volumes of nature-poetry, perhaps WEeping WILLOWS, by Oakes Burleigh (Thomas Thorp, Reading), contains the most consistently readable verse. We especially like a short piece beginning " I thought I knew my fields and hedges well." RUS DIVINUM, by Auguste Smada, B.A.—Captain W. A. Adams (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)—is earnest and cultivated, and full of a genuine love for nature ; while the latest of Mr. Marcus Rickards' many books of verse, GLEAMS THROUGH THE GLOOM (Baker, Clifton), contains some more of the bird songs for which he is wont to show such a pretty fancy.

WINGS, by Ethel Ashton (Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d.), contains short poems possessing a certain serious grace that is well suited to their subjects, and written in a pure and intelligible style without any eccentricity of language.

Lastly, there is Miss Alice Milligan's paper-covered LAST FEAST OF THE FIANNA (Nutt, 6d. n.), a little play—written, she tells us, for translation into Gaelic—rather vague and fragmentary, but not without picturesqueness.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Abyssinia Again.

Mr. Herbert Vivian's " Abyssinia " is quickly followed by Mr. Augustus B. Wylde's MODERN ABYSSINIA (Methuen, 15s. n.)—a more thorough though a less literary work, and a repository of information on every branch of the subject. The history of Abyssinia is related at considerable length ; there is a chapter of geographical and topographical notes ; a full account is given of the disastrous Italian campaign of 1896, and of the battle of Adowa, in which General Baratieri came to grief. He " was tied to the telegraph station and sacrificed his military duty, and most likely his better judgment, for what might be called an electioneering cry to please his superiors in Italy." A long journey taken by the author is described. So is the manner of life of the inhabitants, and the outfit requisite for sportsmen. The appendix prints various diplomatic instruments, and Mr. Wylde's own views of the political situation are given in the introduction. As Vice-Consul for the Red Sea he has had a good opportunity for forming views and he sees uncertainties and dangers ahead. Abyssinia has a tendency to break up, and on the death of Menelek, England and France may be found, openly or covertly, running rival candidates :—

An unfriendly Abyssinia, or in the hands of France, would always be a serious menace to the telegraphs and railway that is to be made from Egypt to the Cape, and I do not see how England or Italy, unless they come to some friendly understanding with Abyssinia, can ever be safe in their lands bordering this country. The future of Abyssinia is shrouded in mystery, and it is to be hoped that the influence of those who wish to see her true welfare will be so strong that a peaceful settlement of the question will be arrived at in the most speedy manner possible. Will the three European Powers who are interested come to a friendly understanding is the great question. I am afraid they will not, as France, with the Abyssinian stick in her hand, has an instrument that she can beat both Italy and England with, and can make it very unpleasant for both of them in Africa.

A valuable book, though clumsily and even ungrammatically written.

In East Anglia.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN EAST ANGLIA, by W. A. Dutt, with illustrations by Joseph Pennell (Macmillan, 6s.), is the sixth volume of a series which has won, by its literary and artistic merit, a unique place in topographical literature. The new one is as good as any. Like the others, it is not a guide book, and does not go exhaustively into history and antiquities, so that to chronicle omissions were futile. Indeed, if we only require some mention or other of all chief points of interest, we have no omissions to note, save the rather large one implied in the fact that "East Anglia" does not here include, save in a very minor degree, the county of Essex. Mr. Dutt is a skilful descriptive writer, and he depicts delightfully the life, scenery, and atmosphere of a county full of literary associations, with its memories of Hereward, the Pastons, the Walpoles, Sir Thomas Browne, Robert Bloomfield, Defoe, Cowper, Crabbe, old Crome, Constable, Borrow, Dickens, and Edward Fitzgerald. Mr. Pennell's little landscapes are in many cases better than any he has done for the series—and if, for those who know, a few of them "might be anywhere," those who do not know will at least find in them pretty embellishments of the text.

Anatole France's Last Book.

MONSIEUR BERGERET À PARIS, the new volume in M. Anatole France's series, "Histoire Contemporaine," is gaining the success of "L'Orme du Mail," the "Mannequin d'Osier," and the "Anneau d'Améthyste." Never was there such a happy blend of picturesque erudition, of measured sarcasm in the observation of manners. Alongside of that fantasy of invention, which has given real distinction to such types as M. Bergeret himself, Mme. de Bonmont, and the rest, are studies of the "Affaire," the rise of "Nationalism," political parties, the rôle of Socialism, all touched so humorously, yet so justly, that the book will undoubtedly serve as a document for history. Such a book as this is the quintessence of French mental and moral culture.

Gladstone and Boswell.

To Mr. Lionel Tollemache's agreeable volume of TALKS WITH MR. GLADSTONE (Arnold, 6s.), the author now adds in an appendix "Another Talk with Mr. Gladstone," reprinted from an article which he contributed to our series of essays, entitled "Among my Books." It differs from the other "talks" in that Mr. Tollemache no longer plays the part of Boswell himself, the essay being founded on a letter from "an accomplished divine who lives in France," and knew Mr. Gladstone at Biarritz. In the preface attention is drawn to a slip in one of the "talks" where Mr. Gladstone assigns the appointment of the Devon Commission on Irish affairs to Palmerston instead of Peel. In a note Mr. Tollemache tells us that a correspondent suggests Mr. Gladstone's deafness as the cause of the mistake. The author finds it hard to imagine that he himself had misheard his oracle.

Extra precautions were taken on that occasion. At the dinner-table, in defiance of usage and for the convenience of hearing and being heard, the great man was sandwiched between Mrs. Tollemache and me; both she and I paid great attention to his remarks; and my report of them, which was drawn up at the earliest opportunity, was carefully revised by her.

An amusing picture of the Boswellizer at work! To place your "Johnson" between yourself and your wife is an extension of the art not we think contemplated by Boswell himself.

EVENTS OF THE REIGN (George Allen, 1s.), a classified catalogue of occurrences of all kinds ranging from the fall of Cabinets to the production of Gaiety burlesques, compiled by Mr. Frederick Ryland, has reached a second edition.

Mr. Thomas Gibson Bowles' pamphlet GIBRALTAR: A NATIONAL DANGER (Sampson Low, 1s.) will certainly need serious consideration. His point is that certain harbour works now being constructed on the western side of Gibraltar are, owing to the increased range of modern guns, exposed to the danger of a converging bombardment from one-third of a circle of Spanish territory. How serious a matter this might be if France, for instance, were allied with Spain against us, is clear. Mr. Bowles makes rather a strong case for a commission of inquiry.

NOTES ON RECONNOITRING IN SOUTH AFRICA (Longmans, 1s. n.) has already been printed in the Cape Times and in Longman's Magazine. It is a series of brief jottings on the natural features of the country in which our troops are campaigning, and explains "sluits" and "dongas" and the like.

WOMAN: A SCIENTIFIC STUDY AND DEFENCE, by the Rev. T. A. Seed (Greening, 2s. 6d.), is adapted from the French of M. Alfred Fouillée. It is too profound for the general reader, but too slight for the student. The statements solemnly made in sonorous language are not a little apt, on analysis, to resolve themselves into platitudes.

THE CARE OF THE HOME, by Lucy H. Yates (Religious Tract Society, 1s.), is a useful little book for inexperienced housewives, though somewhat superficial. It seems odd that there are people who require to be told that "the best way of keeping down bills is to have weekly accounts and settle them regularly," or that a woman should not throw her dresses over the chair-back. But many girls may do worse than buy the book.

ART.

THE PAINTERS OF FLORENCE. By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (MRS. ADY). With Illustrations. (Murray. 6s.)

This, Mrs. Ady's latest volume, is a useful compilation. Treating its subject—at once a very wide and a very old one—on a scale not too large for convenience and not too small for reasonable detail, this intelligent historian of Art has furnished us with a record which certainly does not lack accuracy, and which may, probably, be excused if it lacks inspiration. There are two kinds of good Art-writing, each in its own way serviceable. There is the kind that conveys the personal impression, that reveals to us that which appears to be the soul of the particular artist—his psychological story, educes, it may be, from his work—the adventures of his spirit and the progress of his craft, as he went his way through the world. To this kind must belong the best æsthetic Criticism—the criticism of the born writer. But with Art-writing of that order the presentation of great masses of facts is incompatible. Yet facts, even masses of them, are useful and instructive, even though we may not echo the wooden Utilitarian satirized by Dickens: "Facts alone are needed in life: stick to facts, sir!" Here then comes in the room and opportunity for the second order of writing. It is not the result of a personal impulse, and is scarcely likely to command in a high degree the graces of personal expression. But it can be faithful and unprejudiced, correct and explanatory. And this is the order of Art-writing to which this book belongs.

Having said as much, and signified, at the least by implication, that as a practitioner of this manner of writing Mrs. Ady stands high—an intelligent, a judicial, even a sympathetic, student, who knows the matter she would present—it will not be expected that we shall discuss in any detail the opinions she puts forth. They are her own, but they may not differ widely from those of other sensible people. And her journey is over a well-worn track. Beginning with well-nigh the earliest of the Florentine Primitives, she ends with a chronicle of Michael Angelo's accomplished triumph; and as, unlike some writers of her order, she is not so academic as to discount the value of a personal history, we find her interesting and judicious in her selection of the things which shall be told. Nobody admires Michael Angelo the less—there is nobody, indeed, who may not feel actually more interested in him—for knowing what was his devotion to Victoria Colonna, and what his attachment to an old servant who, dying before the master, took, so Michael Angelo says—so old and lonely—the better part of Michael Angelo himself away with him. Mrs. Cartwright's treatment of the Primitives is sound—is, at all events, based on knowledge; but our curiosity is more aroused when she gets so far on as to be recording the story and achievement of Andrea del Sarto's master, Piero di Cosimo. Piero di Cosimo must be accounted something of a genius; in later life he was, indeed, an exceedingly eccentric person. Not unhonoured or unbefriended, he chose at last to live a life of moroseness and isolation. In plain English, the worthy man must have been, last of all, a little crazy.

We have praised a good deal in Mrs. Ady's volume. Taken for what it no doubt professes to be—not in any sense as a substitute, but rather as the supplement or complement, of the work of the poetic interpreter—it is a worthy performance. The intelligent man of the world, the cultivated young woman, who goes to Florence will find it not the least serviceable of companions. And, incidentally, it may introduce one to the company of those who on their own special subjects have more to say. One thing we take exception to in its Preface—if, indeed, we understand Mrs. Ady correctly. She appears to attach more importance than we do to what is called the "scientific" criticism of the last few years—indulged in, much of it, by foreign writers because their minds permitted little criticism of a higher and deeper kind. The last word upon any artistic matter belongs not to the wielder of the merely "scientific" weapon, busy with "attributions," but to the poetic writer, to the true kindred spirit, to whom the gifts of divination have been vouchsafed.

FICTION.

Mr. Henry James.

It will be a curious problem in literary history to find the definitely American quality that accounts for that peculiar American school of writers which consists of two persons, Mr. Howells and Mr. James—with their leisurely self-consciousness, their insistence on leaving nothing to the reader, their intense absorption in microscopic mental states, and the deliberate banishment from their style of spontaneous literary charm. At the moment we are only concerned with the latest and far the most "Henry Jamesian" book of Mr. Henry James—THE SACRED FOUNT (Methuen, 6s.). Whatever its merits or defects, it reminds us that Mr. James puts into his apparent subtleties more mind than Mr. Howells. The latter will content himself by putting on record, at considerable length and somewhat in the style of Hallam's "Constitutional History," the commonplace utterances at a commonplace breakfast-table. Mr. James will give us the conversation a little more tersely and brightly, and fill up the remaining space with exegetical matter. His manner in "The Sacred Fount" reminds one of those commentaries on the Classics which present us with two lines of text and a wilderness of comment underneath them. A remark apparently harmless enough is no sooner uttered than we abandon the speaker and his surroundings and devote a page—that is about the average—to an elaborate analysis of all its probable, possible, and improbable meanings and the origin and effect of each one of them. For this procedure the subject—there is no story—of this book offers immense scope. The narrator devotes himself—during a week-end visit at a country house—to finding out the exact mental relation between his fellow-guests and more particularly to the question which lady has effected an apparent metamorphosis in one Gilbert Long, who from stupid has become clever—the theory being that he must, vampirelike, have sucked the brain-life of some one else, or, to take Mr. James's metaphor, have drained the "sacred fount" of another's mind. Whether this spiritual "loot" has been achieved or not remains doubtful; what is certain is that the observer, to whom the question has become an overwhelming and morbid obsession, had much better have been playing billiards or golf. He is, in fact, a little conscious of this himself; and Mr. James, with a fine irony, recognizes that his readers will find their mouthpiece at last in the lady who at the end thus characterizes the whole proceeding—perhaps we may add the whole book:—"I mean you're carried away—you're abused by a fine fancy; so that with your art of putting things, one doesn't know where one is—nor, if you'll allow me to say so, do I quite think you always do. Of course, I don't deny you're awfully clever. But you build up houses of cards." Or as another lady puts it a little more bluntly:—"Give up, for a quiet life, the attempt to be a providence. You can't be a providence and not be a bore." Mr. James' cleverness, and still more his obscurity, will doubtless find plenty of admirers for "The Sacred Fount," but it has too many of his inartistic qualities for us to rank it with some others of his books. And to show what is accepted in these days from an eminent prose-writer in the matter of style we cannot refrain from quoting a few elegant extracts:—

She was the absolute wreck of her storm, accordingly, but to which the pale ghost of a special sensibility still clung.

My difficulty in profiting by the relief he had so unconsciously afforded me resided, of course, in my not feeling free to show for quite as impressed as he was.

Whatever her successive partners of a moment might have noticed, they wouldn't have discovered in her reason for dropping them quickly a principle of fear that they might notice her failure articulately to keep up.

I a little wanted her to be where she had distinctly ended by betraying to me that her proper inspiration had placed her.

Have you really such a fund of indulgence for Gilbert Long as we most of us, I gather—though perhaps in our blindness—seem to see it stick out again that he supposes?

Talk.

When Major Pond breakfasted with Mr. Gladstone he told so many good stories of Western frontier life that the Premier asked him to come again, and he would have a shorthand writer behind a screen to take his stories down. The process universally applied might sometimes have amusing results, but it would not help the modern school of novelists who sacrifice story-telling to talk. Their talkers are not drawn from the life. Miss Fowler marshals her characters on her conversational parade ground, and for a time one watches the evolutions without being bored. Mr. Hugo Ames in THE TRAGEDY OF A PEDIGREE (Greening, 6s.) and Mr. Frankfort Moore in ACCORDING TO PLATO (Hutchinson, 6s.) sacrifice too much to the display. Mr. Ames has one or two very well-drawn characters, but only the merest torso of a plot. Welwyn, an academic recluse, who becomes also the heir of a great estate, has married secretly and unhappily. He subsequently has love passages with an attractive widow, Lady Callaby, whose husband appears to have been known indiscriminately as Alfred Lord Callaby, Lord Alfred Callaby, and Sir Alfred Callaby. On the last page of the book Lady Welwyn is introduced to Lady Callaby. We have, in fact, been put off by talk until the book becomes interesting, and then we are told not to ask any more questions. Mr. Frankfort Moore's book is not much more satisfactory. In the last quarter of it there is a good story well told in Mr. Moore's best manner; all the rest is patchwork—clever pieces of satire which have nothing to do with the matter in hand, and which should have been written for a comic weekly—one of them is, in fact, simply reprinted "without acknowledgment" from an old magazine article of Mr. Moore's. We are afraid a good many readers will not survive the first chapter, consisting of a dialogue of the kind in which one has to count back the remarks to see who is speaking, and which one has to read for some time before discovering whether one of the speakers is male or female. That Mr. Moore is often amusing goes without saying, but as a novel the book bears no comparison whatever with its predecessor, "The Conscience of Coralie." It seems to be hastily thought out, just as it has been hastily revised. We have "literally" for "literary," "Bryon" for "Byron." Mr. Ames' torrent of conversation is less frivolous, and is often clever; but what these writers do not realize is that their own witticisms and apophthegms ladled out indiscriminately through the mouths of their characters do not help a novel. Conversation, if it is to do more than simply help the plot along, should have its own subtle history, its impalpable dramatic points, its elusive suggestions of character. If it has not these qualities the reader will skip the pages of talk to see what happens; and we suspect that that is what will be done by many readers of "The Tragedy of a Pedigree" and "According to Plato."

For Churchmen.

The Sermon on the Mount has become a very favourite text for writers of fiction, and it has been found, if one may say so without irreverence, to ensure an enormous circulation for their books. Two very popular novelists, following on Mr. Sheldon of Topeka, have tried to work out the Christ-life in the modern world. For sense and sanity and sincerity we should not hesitate to say that Mr. Haverall Bates' THE BELIEVING BISHOP (Allen, 6s.) beats them all. His Bishop, who gives up for his ideal everything which men consider worth having, is neither prig nor poseur; his worldly people are not caricatures; his presentation of other points of view—the scientific, the ecclesiastical, the fashionable—is well thought out; it is not without humour and is even sometimes allowed to be convincing. The book has nothing melodramatic about it, and the suggestiveness of its teaching—it may be taken as a kind of comment on "The Fatal Opulence of Bishops" which we noticed on February 9—is enhanced by the fact that the Bishop is frankly shown, save for his example, to have been practically a failure. Into the problems thus raised we cannot enter here, but the book deserves praise if only for the contrast it presents to other books of its class.

For the Admiralty.

Mr. H. E. Acraman Coate, whose "Realities of Sea Life" gave an entertaining and unvarnished account of a young sailor's life, now adds to that narration ALIENS AFLOAT (Elliot Stock, 6s.). We do not find ourselves able to speak highly of it as a piece of fiction. The plot is anæmic and not one of the figures bears the impress of reality. Here and there the descriptive passages betray imagination, but the value of the book lies in its true rendering of the position of affairs on board British sailing ships. The Magic was manned by a crew two-thirds of whom were foreigners, and Mr. Coate manages to drive home the necessary moral that while this portion of our mercantile marine is given over so largely to foreign seamen—if that is the word for men who are frequently novices in navigation as in a ship's routine—it will be an awkward position if war should break out between Great Britain and some European Power. Foreign crews would in many instances be able to seize British ships—what would in other circumstances be an act of mutiny becoming under such conditions a deed of heroism.

Opera Bouffe.

The spirit of comic opera hovers about Marcus Reed's "PRIDE OF ENGLAND" (Constable, 6s.), and the last forty pages, with their lowering cloud of tragedy and final catastrophe, seem a little ill-assorted. One is hardly prepared for a real poisoning and a real stilettoing after more than two hundred pages of consistently light-hearted banter. It appears as though the poisoning ought to prove all a mistake, due to the Prefect of Police having placed a seidlitz powder in the wrong glass, the murder an unhappy dream, the offspring of a lobster supper. The story contains no such comfortable explanations. Yet an imaginary heroine alluded to as "too good for heaven," a baronet who "delivered his studied compliment as he would hand over a heavy parcel," and an excellent low comedy father who sniffs about with a lamp smelling for fire the last thing at night (being as a consequence arrested in his own house for burglary by a new and zealous policeman), are ample atonement. Throughout the greater portion of this story of themorganatic marriage of a German prince with an English middle-class girl, the author has his tongue in his cheek and makes admirable play with the foibles of Court personages, whose kinship with common humanity has ever been a favourite theme with the comic opera librettist.

Daudet.

When Alphonse Daudet was in London he was an invalid and could go out very little. To beguile the lonely hours in Brown's Hotel, he told a story of his childhood to Mr. Robert H. Sherard, with the intention that Mr. Sherard should write it out. It now appears as MY FIRST VOYAGE: MY FIRST LIE (Digby, Long, 3s. 6d.), a little volume of 176 short pages. Perhaps the title is misleading, since the lie recorded seems the lie of an experienced rather than of an experimental liar; but this is hypercriticism. The story is that Daudet and his cousin were sent from Nismes to Lyon on a Rhone steamer, in 1854, and amused themselves by giving out that they were naval cadets from Varna. It is the merest trifle, but a trifle of great charm, and it shows Mr. Sherard in the light of a faithful, a sympathetic, and a skilled reporter. We use the word reporter advisedly, since the work has, as it should have, all the characteristics of Daudet's work. Humour abounds, and the story ends with one of those irrelevant but triumphant touches of pathos in which Daudet excelled all the writers of his generation, not in his own country only. The qualities of "Tartarin" and the qualities of "Jack" are alike to be found in it. Admirers of Daudet—their name is legion—cannot afford to neglect this posthumous work. It must be added, however, that the reader of the proofs has much to answer for. He has let Numa Roumestan go as Numa Roumestare, and hardly any of his accents are in the right place.

Rugby.

In THE THREE FRIENDS, a Story of Rugby in the Forties (Henry Frowde, 3s.), Mr. A. G. Butler describes the everyday life of the great school under the régime of Tait. Mr. Butler does not challenge comparison with Tom Brown. The mad-cap freaks and exuberance of Tom Brown and his admirers give place to the athletic triumphs and intellectual aspirations of older boys. Mr. Butler resists few opportunities of pointing the moral, but without always adorning the tale. As a literary artifice the introduction of Matthew Arnold and A. H. Clough discussing Tennyson's early poems is harmless enough, but we should have liked more such incidents as the Race for the Bags. The three friends are drawn with unfailing sureness of touch and insight into boy character, but the story is, we fear, above the heads of the youngsters of to-day. As a faithful picture of public school life in the middle of last century the story deserves to be read by others besides Rugbeians.

THE STRENGTH OF STRAW, by Esmè Stuart (John Long, 6s.), is a collection of short stories of varying merit. The most successful are the pathetic ones. "Tamzin's Choice" and "A Tale of Swanage" both show dramatic power, and are simply and directly told. In "A Bachelor's Love" and "A Deserted Hotel" we have the supernatural, but it does not thrill or impress. "The Night Boat from Boulogne" is an ingenious detective story. Miss Stuart is least effective when humour is required, and some of her shorter sketches might have been omitted with advantage.

The scene of Mr. Joseph Keating's SON OF JUDITH (George Allen, 6s.) is laid in the Welsh mining valleys, and the picture of a collier's every-day life is evidently based on knowledge. A woman's vengeance on her betrayer furnishes the theme of the story. It is worked out skilfully, but the sombreness of the narrative is wholly unrelieved, and the author's humorous sallies only intensify the prevailing gloom.

Mr. George R. Sims is one of those fortunate authors who have a clientèle assured to them. In THE SMALL PART LADY (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.) he offers a skilfully-varied menu. There is farcical humour and real pathos in its thirteen tales, and if you tire of one you will probably find yourself diverted, if not satisfied, by the next. For ourselves, we found "A Dead Man's Papers" as readable as any. But Mr. Sims has his particular audience, whom he has done his best to please. He will win his reward from them, and perhaps from one or two new readers.

In the gentle art of expanding her material Miss F. M. Peard may take a high place. NUMBER ONE AND NUMBER TWO (Macmillan, 6s.) is, perhaps, as thin a novel as any we have come across lately. Dialogue reigns supreme; so much talk has seldom padded out a volume of this size before; and the conversation, we admit, is handled deftly, as by an experienced hand. For the rest, Number Two is set to hunt for Number One, and there are one or two odd numbers besides, for it must be admitted that Bride Kennedy was a most up-to-date young woman; but she eventually decides against the rake and in favour of the eminently conscientious major, which cannot but be satisfactory to all well-regulated minds. There is cleverness in the book—but it is the cleverness of the seasoned novelist who has learned to make bricks with the least possible admixture of straw. The irreverent might call such work "pot boiling."

LIBRARY NOTES.

Among the honours conferred upon the King's accession we are glad to notice the recognition of the two Royal Librarians. Mr. Maurice Holzmann, Librarian to his Majesty and Secretary to the Duchy of Cornwall, has received the Knighthood of the Royal Victorian Order, and Mr. R. R. Holmes, Librarian at Windsor, has been advanced to a Companionship of the same Order. It is pleasing to note that Earl Roberts takes an interest in library work, and has consented to become a vice-president of the Bethnal-green Free Library.

It is quite likely that many librarians know little or nothing of the Peel Memorial Fund. It was raised in penny subscriptions by working men of the kingdom as a memorial of their gratitude to Sir Robert Peel for his abolition of the bread tax, and the money is used for supplying books, maps, &c., to public libraries, mechanics' institutions, and reading rooms. The trustees of the fund have decided to make another distribution from their resources next April, and librarians should make application for a grant before February 28 to the clerk to the trustees at University College, from whom they may obtain particulars.

The project for building a central municipal library in Dublin is taking shape. The idea is to build on the corporation ground in Lord Edward-street, between the City-hall and Christ-church Cathedral, a large library at a cost of £28,000. Such a really central reference library is much needed. The building will also house the magnificent collection of books which belonged to the late Sir John Gilbert, F.S.A., and which is at present inaccessible to students. This almost unique collection was bought by the corporation en bloc from Lady Gilbert in order to prevent its being scattered, and has been lying for the past year or two derelict for want of house room. At present there are three small municipal lending libraries, widely used by the citizens, and local libraries are mooted. In a general sense Dublin is admirably provided with libraries, those of Trinity College, the Royal Irish Academy, and the King's Inns being worthy of any great city, while the National Library, the most popular of all, is steadily increasing in public efficiency. But, municipally, Dublin is very badly off in this respect.

An irreparable loss has fallen upon the Royal Academy of Science at St. Petersburg in the destruction by fire of a large portion of the library. Many priceless works on Russian history and several collections of unique MSS. on anthropology and zoology have perished. The library was insured, we are told, but the statement serves only to remind us of Mummus and his soldiers at Corinth. We often forget how much knowledge lies stored up in similar libraries which may be entirely lost to the world by any such accident as that at St. Petersburg.

Among Mr. Andrew Carnegie's recent benefactions to library work are £40,000 for a public library to Syracuse, N.Y., and minor sums of £5,000 to the Upper Iowa University, £3,000 to Goshen, and £10,000 to Aurora, in the State of Illinois. Mr. Passmore Edwards, following the American lead, has offered £3,000 for a library in Camberwell, a district which is already indebted to him for two libraries and an art gallery.

Twice defeated, the advocates of a public library for Steeple Claydon, Bucks, have succeeded, at the third attempt, in securing the adoption of the Acts. We noted lately the opening of the East Claydon Library, and now we find the movement spreading to neighbouring towns. Steeple Claydon cannot, however, as the Morning Leader says, claim the distinction of being the first parish to adopt the Acts in the reign of Edward VII. The City Council of Westminster, a few days before, had resolved to put the Acts in force in the district of St. James', Westminster, and for certain parishes in the Strand.

The Birmingham free libraries are to receive a collection of 3,000 books bequeathed by Mr. H. P. Badley, of Belbroughton, and valued at not less than £1,500. It comprises many scarce and costly works of travel, among them being original editions of Roberts, Legard, and other Orientalists.

Under the auspices of the Library Association, classes for library assistants and others are being held on Wednesday afternoons at the Central School of Arts and Crafts in Regent-street. Mr. John Southward gives ten lectures on Historical Printing, and Mr. J. H. Quinn, Librarian of Chelsea, addresses the students on Cataloguing Rules.

Applications are invited by the Metropolitan Borough of Woolwich for the post of Chief Librarian. It is proposed to establish three or four separate libraries in the borough.

OBITUARY.

Spain has suffered a great loss by the death of the poet DON RAMON DE CAMPOAMOR in his eighty-fourth year. He was brought up in early youth amidst the "Sierras" of Asturias, a province generally spoken of as "the Highlands of Spain," and their influence is felt in his verse. It was the pure breath of his native mountains that fortified him when he settled at Madrid. Philosopher and statesman though he was, it is in his poetry, in his "Doloras," and his little poems (pequenos poemas) that his biography is written. He took part in no less than three literary revolutionary movements, but his individuality knew no change. In his "Doloras" there is an undercurrent of philosophy, the philosophy of one who knows the world and has explored the depths of the human heart. The profound is curiously mingled with the superficial, the sentimental with the brusque. It was written at various epochs of the poet's life, and there is nothing quite like it in Spanish nor in any other literature. Campoamor laughs at humanity, but the laugh is never bitter like that of Don Juan. His first poems were published in 1840. In 1853 he published an Epic poem "Colon," and he was also the author of books on metaphysics and philosophy. Campoamor acquired fame as a politician and had been a Minister of the Crown. He was married to an Irish lady, a Miss O'Gorman, and his domestic life was peculiarly happy.

An amiable Hellenist of that unpedantic sort which, in spite of the famous and eccentric late Monsieur Rossignol, usually flourishes in France, has just died in the person of M. LOUIS MÉNARD, the friend of Renan, Leconte de Lisle, Littré, Maury, and Flaubert. Among his numerous works are two masterpieces "Le Légende de Saint Hilarion" and the "Diable au Café." He was also the author of an excellent "Histoire des Grées." Louis Ménard died, as he had lived, in obscurity. He never sought honours and even disdained to seek readers; he wrote for his own pleasure. But in spite of this indifference, he had a large circle of readers and admirers.

The news has just come of the death of M. ARMAND SILVESTRE, whose career might be cited to illustrate the saying that journalism is the grave of genius. There probably never was a writer who poured out short stories more abundantly for the Parisian dailies. The epithet "Rabelaisian" was applicable to most of them. They were witty, but written for the smoking room rather than the boudoir. Any one who has read them knows the exact meaning of the word "gauloiserie." The author was a copious and beautiful poet, but found that short stories paid him better. His influence on French literature was bad; but his work was at least brilliant. That of his imitators, whose writings have lately been exciting the horror of French moralists, has not, as a rule, even that redeeming quality.

Correspondence.

NAPOLEON AND MR. ELPHINSTONE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Lord Rosebery in his recent excellent work on Napoleon at St. Helena refers to "a Mr. Elphinstone" who sent some presents to the exiled Emperor which gave rise to considerable disputes with Sir Hudson Lowe. In some Anglo-Indian military circles out here there has long been a tradition that this Elphinstone was the famous Mountstuart Elphinstone, who was Governor of Bombay from 1819-1827, and who twice refused the Governor-Generalship of India and a peerage. Trusting this tradition some have actually blamed the noble author for being ignorant of the fame of this great Anglo-Indian statesman and administrator—and for speaking of him as if he were an obscure person.

I have gone into this tradition and find that it is absolutely without foundation. The Elphinstone referred to by Lord Rosebery was not the famous Mountstuart, but his cousin John, who is not known to fame at all. He was the head of the East India Company's Factory at Canton in China, and his career was quite obscure. Hence, Lord Rosebery is justified in speaking of him as "a Mr. Elphinstone."

The circumstances under which Mr. Elphinstone sent the presents to Napoleon are touching and somewhat remarkable, and, as Lord Rosebery just slightly alludes to them and passes by, I should like to devote a few lines of your valuable space to describe them, especially as in most books no reference whatever is made to them, and, as I have said above, people make a mistake about the central person. The following is Lord Rosebery's allusion :—

A Mr. Elphinstone, who was grateful for attentions paid to a wounded brother at Waterloo, sent him some chessmen from China. Lowe made difficulties about forwarding these because they bore N. and a crown. (p. 79.)

Count Montholon, the chivalrous and faithful companion of Napoleon during his exile, gives the full explanation of Mr. Elphinstone's cause of gratitude. "The Hon. Mr. Elphinstone, with a view of discharging a debt of gratitude to the Emperor, sent to St. Helena several small cases, containing a set of chessmen in ivory of marvellously beautiful workmanship, a box of dice, another of counters, and two magnificent baskets of large dimensions all exquisitely carved. Each of these objects was ornamented with the imperial crown—eagles and letter N. We have already said that it was an act of grateful homage on the part of Mr. Elphinstone, which arose from the following circumstances. On the evening before the battle of Waterloo, Captain Elphinstone, brother of the gentleman in question, had been grievously wounded and was lying stretched on the field in a hopeless condition. The Emperor happened to pass near him, observed his situation, and sent the surgeon in attendance on his person to make the necessary application to staunch his wounds from which the blood was copiously flowing. His natural goodness towards the wounded prompted him also to give him some wine from his silver flask which one of the chausseurs of the guard always carried on service near his person in case of a halt or bivouac. This providential assistance saved Captain Elphinstone's life. These presents gave rise to very lively discussions between Sir Hudson Lowe and the Grand Marshal, whilst more than a month elapsed between their arrival at St. Helena and their being delivered to the Emperor." ("History of the Captivity of Napoleon at St. Helena," Vol. II., pp. 480-81, ed. 1846.) It may be mentioned that Sir Hudson Lowe's version of this petty squabble—in which he was almost entirely in the wrong as in most others—may be read in Forsyth's work in defence of that wrong-headed Governor. Forsyth describes Mr. Elphinstone as "late President of the East India Company's establishment in China." ("Captivity of Napoleon" from Lowe's papers, &c., Vol. II., 153-156.)

It is interesting to note that the Captain Elphinstone whose life Napoleon saved personally on the field of Waterloo survived to meet a very inglorious fate in the mountains of Afghanistan twenty-seven years later. He was the luckless General Keith-Elphinstone who fell an easy prey to the treachery of the wily chief Akbar Khan during the first Afghan war, and died with his hapless army of over 6,000 an inglorious death in the passes near Jugdallak in April, 1842. Mountstuart Elphinstone was the cousin of both these brothers. (cf. Burke's Peerage, 1900, p. 548, and Colebrooke's "Life of M. Elphinstone," Vol. II., 374.)

It is to be hoped that nobody will now mix up these Elphinstones or accuse Lord Rosebery of being ignorant of great Anglo-Indian statesmen. Yours, &c.,

R. P. KARKARIA.

Tardeo, Bombay, February 2, 1901.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In a recent note you plead in behalf of the defendant in this protracted suit as follows :—"Yet a split infinitive may sometimes positively help the language by conveying a meaning which cannot be conveyed in any other way. 'I ask you to kindly clear out' does not mean quite the same as 'I ask you kindly to clear out.'"

Might not counsel for the plaintiff fairly contend that the latter of the two expressions, although it appeals to the eye with less force by reason of the ambiguous position of the adverb, would, if competently spoken, convey the ironic suavity of the former with equal or even greater effect?

Might he not also demur to the assumption of any analogy between the gerund and the infinitive? In a gerundial phrase, he might argue, such as "of exactly describing," of is a preposition not only de jure, but de facto; it should be parsed as a preposition, and it might be replaced by other prepositions, such as in, by, or for; and the separation of the preposition from the gerund by an adverb is no more to be condemned, either in English or in Latin, than its separation from the noun by an adjective. But in an infinitive, such as "to describe," to, although claiming prepositional descent, has lost all the status of a preposition; it would not be parsed as a preposition, and it could not be replaced by other prepositions; it has, in fact, degenerated into a mere prefix, or sign of the infinitive, as the older grammars have it, and is therefore inseparable from the infinitive.

Lastly, I imagine, he would submit that there is no trace of the split infinitive in the phrase "to have entirely subdued," inasmuch as the virtue and compactness of the infinitive, which lie wholly in the auxiliary, are no more affected by the severance of the participle than the virtue of the indicative by the same severance in the English "I was quickly recognized," or the still wider severance in the Latin "sum cito a vobis cognitus."

But, after all, the only criterion of correctness in the long run is usage. Nearly fifty years ago I remember hearing a schoolfellow well scolded in class for speaking of a "lot of Jews." The other day I heard the same phrase used in the pulpit by a well-known preacher, and was perhaps the only one of his hearers to whom it sounded amiss. So will it fare, no doubt, with the split infinitive. If it is felt by the literary Demos to supply a want, however much Quintilian may gasp and stare, it will have "come to stay."

February 15.

E. D. L.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I point out to your correspondent "M." that there is certainly a possible distinction between sentences like the first two of the three sentences he quotes: "I ask you kindly to clear out that drawer" and "I ask you to kindly clear out that drawer." In the one case the kindness is in the asking, in the second case in the clearing out. "To have entirely subdued" is certainly a usage generally accepted. "Lord Kitchener says that our movement east is reported to have 'thoroughly upset all the enemy's calculations'" is a sentence in The Times of Monday, the 11th, very similar to the example you gave. It is in accordance with the rule given by the grammars that the usual position of the adverb is between the auxiliary and the past participle. Any grammatical principle which forbids "to have exactly described" must also forbid "to be exactly described," and the latter it would be surely rash to condemn. This seems to me to lend support to the suggestion that the question is not one of grammar but of style.

Yours faithfully, GRAMMARIAN.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. George M. Smith has already stated in The Times of Wednesday that the supplement to the "Dictionary of National Biography" will bring "the limit of our record of national biography to the close of her late Majesty's long and beneficent reign," and will include the life of the late Bishop of London as well as that of Queen Victoria. It will fill three volumes and Mr. Smith hopes that it will be published "in the course of the next few months."

Some curiosity will doubtless be aroused as to the biographer of her late Majesty, and we are glad to be able to state that her life will be written for the Dictionary by Mr. Sidney Lee. It would be difficult to have made a better choice.

Messrs. Macmillan announce an "Anthology of Latin Poetry," by Professor Robert Tyrrell, whose "Latin Poetry" (1893) was also published by them. Next week they will issue a volume of sermons by Canon Armitage Robinson—under the general title of "Unity in Christ." Another volume of sermons—preached in Westminster Abbey by the Headmaster of Westminster, Dr. Rutherford—will follow early in March, when the revised edition of Francis Procter's well-known "History of the Book of Common Prayer," re-written by Mr. Walter H. Frere, will also appear. The next volume in Macmillan's Library of English Classics will be De Quincey's "Confessions of an English Opium Eater"—along with the essays on "Murder Considered as one of the Fine Arts," "The English Mail Coach," and "The Spanish Military Nun"—edited by Mr. Alfred Pollard. The text of the "Opium Eater" reproduces the expanded form revised by De Quincey for the first collected edition of his works, and contains passages not to be found in Dr. Garnett's 1885 reprint. This will be published early in March, when another interesting reprint will appear in a new and revised edition of the late Professor Henry Sidgwick's "The Methods of Ethics." Next Friday Messrs. Macmillan will publish an elaborately illustrated volume on Byzantine architecture in Greece by Messrs. Robert Weir Schultz and Sidney Howard Barnsley, lately members of the British School at Athens. "The Monastery of Saint Luke of Stiris, in Phocis, and the Dependent Monastery of Saint Nicholas-in-the-Fields, near Skripou in Boeotia." On the same day will appear the first volume of the "Dictionary of Architecture and Building," edited by Russel Sturgis, to which some eighty American and European authorities are contributing.

Lady Hodgson, whose "The Siege of Kumassi" Messrs. Pearson will publish next week, was in Kumassi with her husband, the Governor of the Gold Coast, during the siege last summer, and accompanied the force which broke out of the beleaguered town. The terrible march lasted nearly three weeks, and the losses included three officers killed and wounded, and eighty men killed and missing. "War's Brighter Side," by Julian Ralph, which Messrs. Pearson will also publish shortly, gives the history and contents of the celebrated newspaper published in Bloemfontein at the special request of Lord Roberts during his occupation of the town. Mr. Kipling's contributions are now published in this country for the first time. Among other contributors were Dr. Conan Doyle and Lord Stanley. A little later will come a half-crown "Life of Lord Kitchener," by Herbert G. Groser, who has written a popular "Life of Lord Roberts."

In April the same publishers will issue the first volume of "The Great Peoples Series," edited by Professor York Powell. It will be by Major Martin Hume, and deal with "The Spanish People." Next month they will probably publish a volume entitled "Cyprus to Zanzibar by the Egyptian Delta: The Adventures of a Journalist in the Isle of Love, the Home of Miracles, and the Land of Cloves," by Mr. Edward Vizetelly. A volume of essays by Mr. Frank Bullen—reprinted from the Spectator and other journals—will be ready about the same time. Mr. Bullen calls his new collection "A Sack of Shakings." In fiction Messrs. Pearson are publishing immediately "Twixt Devil and Deep Sea," by Mr. C. N. Williamson—who has another novel coming out with Messrs. Routledge. For next month they promise a new volume of short stories by Bret Harte entitled "Under the Redwoods"; "Willowdene Will," by Halliwell Sutcliffe; and for April "Cinders," by Helen Mathers; "Don or Devil," by William Westall; "A Patched-up Affair," by Florence Warden; and "The Eternal Choice," by E. H. Cooper.

Two new books relating to the war in South Africa are included in Messrs. Smith, Elder's list—Mr. George H. Makins' "Surgical Experiences in South Africa, 1899-1900," mainly a study of the effects of injuries produced by bullets of small calibre; and "Yeomanry Cavalry, or Mounted Infantry," by Lieut.-Col. Launcelet Rolleston. Messrs. Smith, Elder also announce "The Siege of the Peking Legations," by the Rev. Roland Allen, who was acting as Bishop of North China at the time of the Boxer outbreak last year; "British Power and Thought: A Historical Inquiry," by the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning; "Small Farming," by Professor James Long; and a new volume of "The Historical Series for Bible Students"—"Christianity in the Apostolic Age," by Prof. George T. Purves—which will be followed by other volumes dealing with "Contemporary Old Testament History" and "Outlines for the Study of Biblical History and Literature." A useful new edition announced by the same publishers is of the "Handbook of the Administrations of Great Britain during the Nineteenth Century, 1801-1900," by Francis Culling Carr-Gomm. Mr. S. R. Crockett's new novel "The Silver Skull" is nearly ready.

Omar Khayyám is not to be neglected this spring. Besides a new edition of FitzGerald's translation in the Flowers of Parnassus Series, illustrated by Mr. Herbert Cole, Mr. Lane will publish a prose translation by Baron Corvo and Mr. E. Slaughter of the French version of the Rubáiyát by Nicolas (Paris, 1867). The French text will be included. Early next month Mr. Lane will publish a volume by the new editor of the Daily News—a book of verse, with Cambridge interludes, entitled "Anni Fugaces"; and about the same time will appear a volume by Mr. Herbert Paul—now associated with Mr. Lehmann on the Daily News—entitled "Men and Letters." "Poets of the younger generation," by Mr. William Archer, is a guinea book which Mr. Lane will publish shortly, with portraits from wood engravings by Robert Brydon. Other books from Mr. Lane are "King Monmouth," by Allen Fea—uniform with "The Flight of the King"; "Stray Leaves from a Border Garden," by Mary Pamela Milne Holme; "A Garden in the Suburbs," by Mrs. Leslie Williams; "The Aristocrats"—a novel written in the form of letters by a well-known but anonymous authoress; a new novel by Mr. W. J. Locke, entitled "The Usurper"; a book of poems by Lady Margaret Sackville; and a volume by Mr. Stephen Gwynn, entitled "The Queen's Chronicle, and other Verses."

Fiction figures largely in Messrs. Cassell's spring list. Another volume of short stories by Mr. Quiller-Couch is announced under the title of "Wreckwood," and a collection of tales called "Afield and Afloat," by Mr. Frank R. Stockton. Mr. John Bloundelle-Burton is represented by a characteristic romance entitled "A Vanished Rival," and the adventures of John Gifford (the original of Bunyan's "Evangelist") in his cavalier days, before he became minister of a congregation at Maidstone, form the subject of a new novel by Dora M. Jones entitled "A Soldier of the King."

Lord Percy's new book "Highlands of Asiatic Turkey," being the result of his second journey in those parts, will be published by Mr. Edward Arnold at the beginning of March. A souvenir of the war of 1800-1901 will be issued next week by Mr. Edward Arnold under the suggestive title of the "Khaki Alphabet," illustrated by Mr. Tom Browne, the letterpress by Mr. I. D. Powles.

The late Canon C. W. Bardsley, besides the works on nomenclature published during his lifetime, compiled a "Dictionary of English and Welsh Surnames," which his widow has now prepared for the press. It will be published in the spring by Mr. Frowde, with a preface by Dr. Bardsley, Bishop of Carlisle. Yet another commentary on the New Testament is to come from Dr. F. N. Peloubet and be published by Mr. Frowde. The title "The Teachers' Commentary on the New Testament" indicates its purpose. Dr. Peloubet has drawn his materials from every source—from scholarship, literature, history, geography, travel, pictures, and the original Greek. The text is that of the combined Authorized and Revised Version, and the references are those lately prepared under the auspices of the University Presses.

The forthcoming number of the Annual of the British School at Athens, shortly to be published for the committee by Messrs. Macmillan will contain Mr. Arthur Evans' preliminary account of his brilliant discoveries at the Palace at Knossos in Crete and a paper by Mr. Hogarth describing his excavation of the Dictæan Cave (both illustrated), with papers by Mr. F. B. Welch on "The Influence of the Aegean Civilization on South Palestine" and by Mr. J. C. Lawson on "A Beast Dance in Scyros."

Fiction is the sole feature of Mr. John Long's new list—see under "Books to look out for at once." Other novels in preparation include "A Woman-Derelict," by May Crommelin; "Mrs. Musgrave and her Husband," by Richard Marsh; "Paul le Maistre," the story of a Jerseyman and his experiences in London, by Frederic Carrel—himself a native of Jersey; "Once too Often," by Florence Warden; "The Three Days' Terror," by J. S. Fletcher; "Nobler than Revenge," by Esmé Stuart; "Plato's Handmaiden," by Lucas Cleeve; "Women Must Weep," by Sarah Tytler; "The Mission of Margaret," by Adeline Sergeant; and new volumes by Mrs. Lovett Cameron and Mrs. Coulson Kernahan, William S. Walker, Victoria Cross, and G. B. Burgin.

English authors will be pleased to learn that, in consequence of a report of the United States Commissioner of Labour, there is a chance of reform in the United States Copyright laws in their favour. The existing law allows any American publisher to appropriate any English book of which a copy has not been set up and printed in America at the time when it is published in England. The intention of this provision is to protect American printers from foreign competition; but its disappearance would do the printers very little harm for two reasons:—1. The printing of books is only a small fraction of the total printing done in America. 2. Most of the books that circulate in both countries would continue to be set in both countries because of the devotion of the American public to the American mode of spelling. It is satisfactory to find that, in this matter, the American Publishers' is strongly in favour of justice to England.

Mrs. Max Müller has undertaken to write a life of her husband, Professor Max Müller, and would be much indebted to any of Professor Max Müller's correspondents if they would lend her any letters they may have in their possession. They should be sent to Mrs. Max Müller, at 7, Norham-gardens, Oxford, and they will be returned when done with. Messrs. Longmans, Green, and Co. will be the publishers of the Life.

It is ten years since Ibsen's "Prose Dramas" appeared in the collected edition, in five volumes—"The League of Youth," "Pillars of Society," "A Doll's House," "Ghosts," and "An Enemy of the People." They are now to be published by Mr. Walter Scott in a new and revised edition, in two forms (at half-a-crown in cloth and eighteen-pence in paper cover).

Mrs. Frankau, the writer of "Eighteenth Century Colour Prints," is following up that work with a biography of John Raphael Smith, the mezzotint engraver and miniature portrait painter, who died in 1812. Mrs. Frankau will be grateful for any documents or information having reference to the life of Smith or his associates. Smith was the boon companion of George Morland, William Hilton, R.A., and Peter de Wint were among his pupils. We are asked to state that communications may be addressed to Mrs. Frankau, care of Messrs. Macmillan and Co., St. Martin's-street, W.C.

Mr. Henry Lucy's "Parliamentary Diary," to be published by Mr. Arrowsmith on Monday week, is prefaced by the following note:—"To the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain, M.P., who made possible the Unionist Parliament 1895-1900, this record of some phases of its history is inscribed." The book will be illustrated by Mr. E. T. Reed of Punch.

The next volume in the Scott Library will be "Scotts Essayists: From Stirling to Stevenson," edited, with an introduction, by Oliphant Smeaton.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. will shortly publish a book entitled "The Life of the Sea-Shore: An Introduction to Marine Zoology," by M. I. Newbigin, illustrated by a long series of original illustrations from actual objects.

Messrs. Greening request us to state that Mr. Theodore Wratislaw's book on Mr. Swinburne's poetry was not, as has been stated, written with the poet's "full knowledge and consent," and, further, that the book is in no way intended as a biography but as a study of the poet's work.

Books to look out for at once.

LITERATURE—

"Stray Papers," By W. M. Thackeray. Ed. by L. Melville. Hutchinson. 6s. [With some of Thackeray's drawings.]

"Ephemera Critica." By John Churton Collins. Constable. 7s. 6d. [A comprehensive survey of the vices and defects, as well as of the merits, characteristic of current Belles Lettres.]

"The 'Good Man' of the Eighteenth Century." By the Rev. Charles Whittuck. Allen. [Studies in eighteenth century literature.]

BIOGRAPHY AND AUTOBIOGRAPHY—

"Huldreich Zwingli." By Dr. Samuel Macaulay Jackson. Putnam. 6s. "Heroes of the Reformation" Series. Illustrated.

"Shifting Scenes; Memories of Many Men in Many Lands." By Sir Edward Malet. Murray. 10s. 6d. net. [Written in the form of an imaginary interview.]

THEOLOGY—

"Thoughts about God, the Church, the World, and the Human Soul, abridged from the New Diary of Father John (Sergieff)." Murray. 2s. 6d. net.

[Translated by Colonel E. E. Goulaeff.]

"Evolution of the English Bible." By H. W. Hoare. Murray. 10s. 6d. n. "In Terra Pax: Primary Sayings of our Lord during the Great Forty Days in their Relation to the Church." By the Rev. Morris Fuller Longmans. 6s. net.

"The Apostles' Creed." By Prof. Harnack. Translated by Stewart Means and edited by Thomas B. Saunders. Black. 1s. 6d.

"What is Christianity?" By Professor Harnack. Translated by T. Bailey Saunders. Williams and Norgate. [Theological Translation Library.]

FICTION—

"The Royal Sisters." A Romance. By Frank Mathew. John Long. 6s. "Mary Bray, x, Her Mark." By Jenner Tayler. John Long. 6s.

"Scoundrels and Co." By Coulson Kernahan. Ward and Lock. 3s. 6d.

"The Mayor of Littlejoy." By F. C. Smale. Ward and Lock. 6s.

"The Emu's Head." By Carlton Dawe. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

"A Lesson for Life." By Clarence Rook (author of "Hooligan Nights"). Ward, Lock. 1s.

"Two Sides of a Question." By May Sinclair. Constable. 1s.

"A Honeymoon in Space." By G. Griffith. Pearson. 6s.

"Twixt Devil and Deep Sea." By Mrs. C. N. Williamson. Pearson. 6s.

"A Bid for a Coronet." By Mrs. C. N. Williamson. Routledge. 6s.

"The Life Romantic." By R. Le Gallienne. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

"A Bicycle of Cathay." By F. R. Stockton. Harper. 6s.

"The Lesser Evil." By Iza Duffus Hardy. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

"In His Own Image." By Frederick Baron Corvo. Lane. 6s.

THE ARMY—

"Regimental Records of the British Army." By J. S. Farmer. Richards. 10s. 6d. net.

"The Rifle Brigade." By Walter Wood. Richards. 3s. 6d.

WAR AND TRAVEL—

"The Siege of Kumassi." By Lady Hodgson. Pearson. 21s.

"Through Siberia." By J. Stadling. Constable. 18s.

"First on the Antarctic Continent." By C. E. Borchgrevink. Newnes. 10s. 6d. net.

SCIENCE—

"Practical Organic Chemistry for Advanced Students." By J. B. Cohen. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

"The New Hygiene." By J. W. Wilson. Putnam. 2s. 6d.

"Practical Electric Testing." By G. D. A. Parr. Longmans. 8s. 6d.

"Libyan Notes." By D. Randall-Maciver, M.A., and Anthony Wilkin, B.A. Macmillan. 20s. net. [The result of an expedition to Algeria undertaken in 1900 to establish, if possible, a connexion between the Berber tribes and Egypt.]

MISCELLANEOUS—

"Georgie." By E. E. Kiser. Unwin. 3s. 6d.

[Philosophy of the Dooley description. Illustrated.]

"The Orchestra and Orchestral Music." By W. J. Henderson. J. Murray. 5s. net.

"Manufacture of Mineral and Lake Pigments." By J. Bersch. Scott and Greenwood. 12s. 6d. net.

"The Medical Examiner of Life Insurance." By C. L. Greene. Redman. 17s. net.

"New Century Hymns for the Christian Year." By F. W. O. Ward. "Home Words." 5s.

- NEW EDITIONS—
 "The Love of an Uncrowned Queen." By W. H. Wilkins. 3rd and cheap ed. Hutchinson. 10s. 6d.
 "The Cuckoo in the West." By Mrs. Oliphant. Hutchinson. 6d.
 "Earthwork out of Tuscany." By Maurice Hewlett. Macmillan. 5s.
 [Third edition, revised; new volume in the "Eversley Series."]
 "West African Studies." By Mary H. Kingsley. Macmillan. 7s. 6d.
 [With additional chapters.]
 "The Scenery of Scotland viewed in connexion with its Physical Geology." By Sir Archibald Geikie. Third ed. Macmillan.
 "Rob Roy." By Sir Walter Scott. (Border Edition.) Edited by Andrew Lang. Macmillan. 6s.
 "The League of Youth," "Pillars of Society," and "A Doll's House." By Henrik Ibsen. Scott. 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. each.
 [First three vols. of a new and revised edition of Ibsen's Prose Dramas. Edited by William Archer.]
 "Charles Darwin and the Theory of Natural Selection." By E. B. Poulton, F.R.S. Cassell. 2s. 6d.
 [Cheap ed. in monthly vols. of the "Century Science Series."]
 "Adam Bede." By George Eliot. Lane. 1s. 6d. net and 2s. net.
 [Vol. I. of Mr. Lane's "New Pocket Library."]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

- ART.
 "The Story of Art in the British Isles." By J. E. Phythian. 6x4in., 216 pp. Newnes. 1s.
 "The Exhibited Works of J. M. W. Turner, R.A. With Notes." By C. F. Bell. 10x6in., 184 pp. Boll. 21s. n.
- DRAMA.
 "Rudolph Schrollé. A Tragedy." By E. G. 7x5in., 99 pp. Stock. 2s. 6d.
- EDUCATIONAL.
 "Demosthenes on the Crown." By W. W. Goodwin. 9x6in., 348 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 12s. 6d.
 "Advanced Exercises in Practical Physics." By A. Schuster, Ph.D., and C. H. Lees, D.Sc. 9x6in., 308 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 8s.
- FICTION.
 "His Lordship's Whim." By G. C. Whadcoat. 7x5in., 383 pp. E. Wilson. 6s.
 "Anne Melanawaring." By Lady Ridley. 7x5in., 333 pp. Longmans. 6s.
 "The Monster, and other Stories." By Stephen Crane. 7x5in., 232 pp. Harper. 5s.
 "The Sacred Fount." By Henry James. 7x5in., 316 pp. Methuen. 6s.
 "Max Thornton." By E. Glanville. 8x5in., 317 pp. Chatto. 6s.
 "The Master Sinner." By A. Well-Known Author. 7x5in., 182 pp. J. Long. 3s. 6d.
 "The Golden Wang-Ho." By Fergus Hume. 7x5in., 307 pp. J. Long. 6s.
 "Trewern. A Tale of the Thirteenth." By R. M. Thomas. 7x5in., 260 pp. Unwin. 6s.
 "Le Fantôme." By Paul Bourget. 7x4in., 345 pp. Paris. Plon. Fr. 3.50.
- HISTORY.
 "History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate, 1649-1680. Vol. III." By S. R. Gardiner. 9x5in., 513 pp. Longmans. 21s.
- LITERARY.
 "Two Lectures Introductory to the Study of Poetry." By the Rev. H. C. Beeching. 7x5in., 57 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 1s.
- MISCELLANEOUS.
 "The Queen's Best Monument." A Memorial Reprint from "The Spectator." 10x9in., 79 pp. "The Spectator." 6d.
 "The American Negro. A Critical and Practical Discussion." By W. H. Thomas. 8x5in., 440 pp. The Macmillan Co. 7s. 6d. n.
 "French Life in Town and Country." By Hannah Lynch. 7x4in., 361 pp. Nownes. 3s. 6d.
 "The Newspaper Directory for 1901." 11x8in., 216 pp. Mitchell. 2s.
 "Répertoire d'Épigraphie Sémitique." Publié par la Commission du Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum. Tome I. 9x5in., 48 pp. Paris. C. Klincksieck.
 Price of complete vol. Fr. 15.
 "Le Livre des Mille Nuits et Une Nuit. Traduction Littérale et Complète du texte Arabe par le Docteur J. C. Mardrus. Tome VII." 9x4in., 276 pp. Paris. Éditions de la Revue Blanche. Fr. 7.
- Concerning Children. By Charlotte P. Guman. 7x5in., 306 pp. Putnam. 6s.
- NAVAL.
 "The British Fleet. Is it Sufficient and Efficient?" By A. S. Hurd. 7x5in., 124 pp. Blackwood. 1s.
- PHILOSOPHY.
 "The Neo-Platonists. A Study in the History of Hellenism." By T. Whittaker. 9x6in., 234 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 7s. 6d.
 "Ethics, Descriptive and Explanatory." By S. E. Mezes. 9x6in., 435 pp. The Macmillan Co. 10s. 6d. n.
- POETRY.
 "Fireside Poems." By the Rev. J. Stratton. 7x4in., 118 pp. Stock. 3s. 6d.
- POLITICAL.
 "Proportional Representation applied to Party Government." By T. R. and H. P. C. Ashworth. 7x5in., 223 pp. Sonnenschein. 6s. n.
 "Vengeance as a Policy in Afrikanerland." By F. J. Dormer. 9x6in., 244 pp. Nisbet. 6s.
 "Problèmes Politiques du Temps Présent." By Emile Faguet. 7x4in., 329 pp. Paris. Colin. Fr. 3.50.
- REPRINTS.
 "Pride and Prejudice." By Jane Austen. (The Little Library, 2 vols.) 6x4in., 224+251 pp. Methuen. 3s. n.
 "Talks with Mr. Gladstone." 2nd Ed. Rev. By the Hon. L. A. Tolmache. 8x5in., 186 pp. Arnold. 6s.
 "Poems." By Dante Gabriel Rossetti. (Siddal Ed.) 6x4in., 140 pp. Ellis & Elvey.
 "King Henry IV. (The Chawick Shakespeare.) Vols. I. & II. 6x4in., 134+147 pp. Bell. 1s. 6d. n. each.
 "A Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection." By William Law. Ed. by L. H. M. Soulsby. 5x3in., 200 pp. Longmans. 2s. n.
- THEOLOGY.
 "Counsels for Churchpeople." From the Writings of the Rt. Hon. and Rt. Rev. Mandell Creighton, D.D. Ed. by J. H. Burns, B.D. 6x4in., 202 pp. Stock. 5s.
- TOPOGRAPHY.
 "Tolmouch: Its History and its Surroundings." By Beatrice F. Creswell. 8x6in., 126 pp. Homeland Association. 5s. n.
 "St. John's College. (Cam. Un. Coll. Histories.) By J. E. Mullinger. 7x5in., 333 pp. Robinson. 5s. n.
 "Rambles round the Edge Hills, &c." By the Rev. G. Miller. 8x5in., 232 pp. Stock. 6s.
 "The Oak Hamlet. Being an account of the History and Associations of the Village of Ockham, Surrey." By H. St. John Hick Bashall. 9x5in., 54 pp. Stock. 5s. n.
 "Bermondsey. Its Historic Memoirs and Associations." By E. T. Clarke. 9x6in., 279 pp. Stock. 12s. 6d. n.
- TRAVEL.
 "Modern Abyssinia." By A. B. Wylie. 9x5in., 506 pp. Methuen. 15s. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXXX.
 By ALAIN C. WHITE, New York.
 BLACK. 7 pieces.

WHITE. 7 pieces.
 White to play and mate in two move.

PROBLEM No. CXXXI.
 By R. SAHLBERG, Stockholm.
 BLACK. 10 pieces.

WHITE. 11 pieces.
 White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 132. by L. Bachmann, Augsburg. White (2 pieces) —K at Q 4; R at K R 2. Black (3 pieces)—K at Q Kt 8; pawns at Q R 7, Q Kt 2. White to play and win.

PROBLEM No. 133. by Dr. Galitzky. White (3 pieces)—K at K R 4; Kt at K Kt 5; pawn at K R 6. Black (3 pieces)—K at K B 5; pawns at K B 4, Q R 7. White to play and win.

THE MONTE CARLO TOURNAMENT.—It is beginning to be apparent who will be the leaders at the close. On Tuesday these were Janowski, 7; Tschigorin, 6½; Alapin, 6; Von Scheve, 5½; Schlechter, 6½; Gunsberg, 5½; Blackburne, 5½. The peculiar arrangement as to drawn games makes all such figures approximate only. One or two games by Mieses compete for the brilliancy prizes. This player has done good work recently. Several players have lost games by exceeding the time limit. Thus Gunsberg by fine play won Tschigorin's queen, and then lost by time.

GAME No. LXV.—Whilst the masters are busy at Monte Carlo very large correspondence matches are being played in England and America, and splendid games result. The following interesting game from an American exchange was played between Mr. F. A. Hill, of St. Paul, Minn., and Mr. J. Tunstall. The notes should be carefully studied. They are by Mr. A. E. Swaffield, of Brooklyn:—

SCOTCH OPENING.

WHITE. Hill.	BLACK. Tunstall.	WHITE. Hill.	BLACK. Tunstall.
1. P-K 4	P-K 4	20. P×Pep.	P×P
2. Kt-Q B 3	Kt-Q B 3	21. P-K 5	Q-Kt 4
3. P-Q 4	P×P	22. P×P	Q-R sq (b)
4. Kt×P	B-B 4	23. P×P	Q-Q B 4
5. B-K 3	Q-K 2	24. R-Q B 4	Kt×R 3(c)
6. Kt-Q B 3	B×Kt	25. R×R ch	Kt×R
7. B×B	Kt-B 3	26. Q-B 4	Q×Kt P(d)
8. B×Kt	Q×B	27. Q-R P ch	K-Kt sq
9. Kt-Q 5	Q-R sq	28. B-B 4	Q-K 2
10. P-Q 3	Kt-K 2	29. B-B 4 ch	Kt-K 3
11. Kt-K 3	P-Q 3	30. Q-Kt 5	K-R 2
12. Castles	Castles	31. B×Kt	K-B 3
13. P-K B 4	K-R sq	32. Q-Q 8	Q-K 4
14. P-B 5	Kt-Kt sq	33. R-B 3	B-B sq
15. R-B 4	Kt-R 3	34. P-B 4	P-Q Kt 3
16. Q-K sq	B-Q 2	35. Q-Q 4	Q-K 3
17. P-K Kt 4	P-R R 3	36. Q-Q 4	Q-K 4(e)
18. Q-Q 2	Kt-R 2	37. Q-Q 2	R-Q
19. Q-R K B sq	P-K Kt 4(a)	38. R-B 8	Resigns

(a) Black's defence has been excellent, but we doubt the wisdom of this move, preferring P-K B 3. If 19. —, Q-K 2; 20. P-B 6, P×P; 21. Q-R 4, might be the continuation.

(b) Black disregards the loss of the pawn, so intent is he on his combination, only to find in White's twenty-fourth move that the pawn is to be the main factor in his defeat.

(c) 24. —, Q×Kt ch; 25. Q×Q, R×Q; 26. R×R ch, Kt×R; 27. P-B 8 (Q), B×Q; 28. R×B and White has a winning ending.

(d) K-Kt 2 makes a very strong defence, but it should lose. 27. Q-Q 4 ch, Q×Q; 28. R×Q, R-B sq. (best); 29. Kt-Q 5, Kt-K 3; 30. R-Q B 4, K-B 2 (if —, B-B 3; 31. R×B and B-B 6) makes a hard game to win. White's best is probably R-Q 4, which makes a most interesting position.

If now 27. —, Q×Kt P; 28. B-B 4 wins. If 27. —, Q-B 3; 28. Q×Q ch, K×Q; 29. B-Kt 5, K-K 2; 30. R-K 4 ch, Kt-K 3; 31. Kt-Q 5 ch, K-Q 3; 32. B×B wins. 27. —, P-Kt 4 seems best, the game continuing: 28. Q-Q 5, Q×Q (if Q×Kt P; 29. R-K 4 wins, as White plays Kt-B in reply to Q-B 3 ch and K-B 2 (if Q-R 8 ch); 29. R×Q, R-B (if K-B 2; 30. B-Kt 6 ch); 30. Kt-Q 5, K-B 2 (if B×P; 31. R-Q 4, K-B 2 (forced); B-B 4 wins); 31. B-Kt 6 ch, Kt-B (if K-Kt 2; 32. B-B 5); 32. R×B ch, K-K 3; 33. R-Kt 7, Kt-B 5, &c.; 34. Kt-B 6 ch and wins. 28. —, P-B 4; 27. Q-Q 4 ch, Q×Q; 28. R×Q, R-B sq; 29. Kt-Q 5, Kt-K 3; 30. R-K 4, K-Kt 2 (if Kt×P; 31. Kt-B 6, followed by R-K 7, wins); 31. B-B 4, and must win, for Black cannot move either of his Q-side pawns, while White advances his. Of course, if K-B sq, White wins at once by Kt-B 3.

(e) K-R 3 might have prolonged the game, but that is all. White's play is continuously good throughout.

WHITE. Mr. HILL.
 White to play his 22nd move.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 178. SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	151, 152, 153
PERSONAL VIEWS—"Slang and its Uses," by Charles Whibley	153
SACRED FLOWERS	155
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	155
REVIEWS—
American Literature—
A Literary History of America—Bret Harte—The Treasury of American Sacred Song	156, 157, 158
The Siege of Kumassi	158
The Far East—
The Problem of Asia—The Englishman in China during the Victorian Era—China: Her History, Diplomacy, and Commerce—Mount Omi and Beyond—The Awakening of the East	158, 159, 160, 161
Japanese Plays and Playfellows—Counsels for Church People—English Catalogue, 1900—Mudie's English Catalogue—V.R.L. Her Life and Empire—Stories of the Queen—A Manual of Medicine—Mémorial of James Macartney—Mosquitoes and Malaria—On Sanitary and Other Matters—Bridge Whist—Bridge Abridged—Bookkeeping—Ibsen—Drifting, &c.	162, 163, 164
Educational Books	164
The Monster—Whilomville Stories—Quality Corner—Peccavi—The Master Sinner—Trinity Bells—Hate, the Destroyer—A Cuirassier of Arran's	165, 166
ART NOTES	165
AMONG THE MAGAZINES	166
CORRESPONDENCE—The Problem Novel—The Split Infinitive—Decadent Metres—Victor Hugo (M. Alf. Hamonet)	167, 168
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for ...	168, 169
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	170

NOTES OF THE DAY.

"Scenes from Clerical Life" is already out of copyright, "Adam Bede" is out of copyright this year, and "The Mill on the Floss" and "Silas Marner" will be public property next year and the year after. Impelled, perhaps, by the coming competition, Messrs. Blackwood promise a new George Eliot, of which the first volume will be "Adam Bede," which has also just been republished by Mr. Lane.

George Eliot wears well. After the almost pontifical position she attained during her later life some reaction was inevitable. Edward Fitzgerald could not abide her, just as Mr. Badman could not abide the Lord's Day. (Would it have made "old Fitz" laugh or weep to know that in certain progressive school-rooms texts from the Bible were at one time superseded by texts from George Eliot and Omar set side by side?) Then she had bad times when the rattle of the musketry of Mr. Henley and his young men rang through the kopjes of Fleet-street. Yet she survives. A wise world, it is evident, will not willingly let die Mrs. Poyser, or Tom and Maggie, or mine host of the Rainbow. So Messrs. Blackwood do prudently to forestall competition.

What is to be done with all the six-shilling novels? is a question asked by the Publishers' Circular. They are published by thousands, and we have it on the authority of several firms that less than ten per cent. of the manuscripts submitted ever get published. Clearly if the multitude now engaged in writing fiction would consent to serve their country in a more profitable fashion, the problem of national defence without conscription would be solved. The Publishers' Circular, indeed, has a proposal for utilizing the superfluity of novels already produced for purposes of Imperial protection. We know from stories without number from the battlefield that there is nothing like a book for stopping a bullet—could we not (our contemporary suggests) pad our soldier in South Africa with "remainders" in fiction? Five six-shilling volumes would make a complete breastplate of impenetrable armour.

VOL. VIII. No. 9.

An amusing attempt at paternal government is being made in the Legislature of New York State by a member who proposes that all books, newspapers, and other serial literature should be printed in large type. One result would be that a sixteen page newspaper would have to spread its matter over twenty pages. Speaking of American newspapers, by the way, we may note that Mr. Bryan does not seem very successful with his new paper, the Commoner. The New York Times suggests that it would be more aptly called the "Commonest."

Mr. Cobden-Sanderson's tract "The Ideal Book," which has followed the Agricola of Tacitus from the Doves Press—and which, like the Agricola, has been already sold out—is a plea for beauty in book production. Mr. Cobden-Sanderson starts from the assertion that "Handwriting and hand decoration of letter and page are at the root of beauty in books, and every printer, and indeed every one having to do with the making of books, should ground himself in the practice of the Art of Beautiful Writing." This sums up a feeling that has often been hesitatingly expressed, namely, that we shall not get more beautiful printing until we get a general improvement in handwriting. If a man scribbles off a letter, and with little care for the formation of words and letters, he is not likely to distinguish between ugly and beautiful type, or to demand more beauty in the printed page. We are glad to note that Mr. Cobden-Sanderson admits the whole duty of typography to be "to communicate to the imagination, without loss by the way, the thought or image intended to be communicated by the author." This is a duty typographers have sometimes neglected. Indeed, the general impression concerning any out-of-the-way type is that its object must be to prevent the author's ideas from being grasped without a struggle.

The suggestion that the "psychological moment" has arrived for some "agent" to publish those love-letters of Sir John Falstaff is made by the Literary World. "I warrant," said Mrs. Page, "he hath a thousand of these letters writ with blank spaces for different names. . . He will print them out of doubt." The suggestion is apt, but the "Editor" of the letters, if there is to be one, will not be the first literary adventurer to meddle with the fat knight's correspondence. In a letter to Coleridge Lamb warmly recommends some recently published "Original Letters of Falstaff," genially suggesting that Coleridge might get the book puffed. The author, one James White, was, in fact, an old Christ's Hospital boy and a schoolfellow of Elia. The letters, Lamb said, were far superior to Dr. Kendrick's "Falstaff's Wedding." On the whole, perhaps, it would be better to leave Sir John at peace "in Arthur's bosom."

The Stage Society generally manage to get their productions well acted. Andromache was an exception. The acting of the play lacked distinction, and some of it was extremely bad. Luckily the piece itself was interesting enough to make most of the audience forget imperfections in its presentation. Mr. Gilbert Murray's play, which we praised when it was published last May, takes a simple legend of the Greek heroic age (an example which, it is said, Mr. Stephen Phillips is about to follow in the case of "The Odyssey") and dramatizes it in the modern manner. It is almost entirely Greek in sentiment—so Greek that it perhaps astonished some members of the Stage Society, whose managers, however, must be congratulated once more on their choice. We hope Mr. Murray will be encouraged to further dramatic experiments.

* * * *

As You Like It at the Comedy Theatre suits the Benson Company well—better than Coriolanus, which is a difficult play to act in any circumstances. The charm of this delightfully pastoral comedy is well brought out by a really good all-round representation. After Richard II. and Hamlet Mr. Benson's season at the Comedy Theatre comes to a close. From London he goes to Stratford-on-Avon for the annual festival. There he will play for two weeks, the second of which will be devoted to a cycle of historical plays, including King John, Richard II., Henry IV. (Part II.), Henry V., Henry VI. (Part II.), and Richard III. This is an interesting method of arrangement; perhaps some day we may have the whole series of history dramas acted as a cycle in London.

* * * *

That Sudermann's Schmetterlingsschlacht, performed at the German Theatre, is good comedy every one will admit. The widow in straitened circumstances whose one aim in life is, by fair means or foul, to provide her three pretty daughters with well-to-do husbands, an aim in which she is fully supported by two of them, is correct matter for comedy. Rosi, the youngest daughter, however, believes in love and romance and is devoted to her sisters. They, and especially the elder, do not scruple to make a tool of her and to work upon her generous instincts and her ignorance of the world's conventions. On this the drama chiefly hinges, and it is here that for once Sudermann fails in truth both to art and life. There is something revolting in the spectacle of a young, innocent girl who is made a dupe, and of the depravity of a man and woman who, to further their own immoral ends, can daze and obfuscate her with champagne. We have to take the possibility of such innocence for granted, although it makes a large demand on our credulity. But the exploitation of the ingénue which is so much in vogue just now does little credit either to the art of the dramatist and the novelist or to their observation of life. The heroine of the "Visits of Elizabeth," the heroine of The Awakening, belong to the same class as Sudermann's Rosi. When we are not pained and humiliated by the treatment the ingénue receives, we are amazed at her folly and ignorance.

* * * *

When Schmetterlingsschlacht was first produced at Berlin in 1894 it had no success, because people read into it an onslaught on capital. How such a construction could be placed on it it is difficult to see; and the dramatist himself declared that the play was nothing more than a piece of genre painting without any sort of tendency. But Sudermann's point of view regarding women who have to earn their livelihood has a good deal of truth in it, and a serious problem underlies the comic presentment. In his milieu, in his picture of the race for wealth, of the love of shows rather than realities, he shows keen insight. The play was admirably acted.

* * * *

We wonder whether the Salvation Army means to try in England the dramatic experiment which it is beginning in Chicago. The New Homestead, by Major Winckell, is to be its first production, and the same author is responsible for two plays with the alluring titles of Jondh and the Whale and The Prize-Fight of Life, in ten "rounds." There is not much difference, after all, between an audience of to-day and the audiences of the old Mystery Plays.

* * * *

The "Commonwealth Number" of the Brisbane Courier which greets the new century is a good sample of the enterprise of colonial journalism (24 pages for a penny). It contains a retrospect of Australian progress in politics, commerce, science, religion, and letters during the past century with portraits of the late Queen and of the Governors and Premiers of the States of the new Commonwealth. Mr. J. Brunton Stephens contributes "Fulfillment"—a graceful Ode dedicated by permission to her late Majesty. There are the two last stanzas:—

O People of the onward will,
Unit of Union greater still
Than that to-day hath made you great;
Your true Fulfilment waiteth there,
Embraced within the larger fate
Of Empire ye are born to share—
No vassal progeny of subject brood,
No satellite shed from Britain's plenitude,
But orb'd with her in one wide sphere of good.

O Lady, in whose Sovereign name
The crowning word of Union came
That sheds upon thine honoured age
The glory of a rising light,
Across our record's earliest page
Its earliest word, thy name we write—
Symbol, Embodiment, and Guarantee
Of all that makes us and maintains us free,
Woman and Queen, God's grace abide with thee.

There is also an article on Australian literature by Mr. G. Essex-Evans. Gordon and Kendall with Mr. Stephens himself are, of course, reckoned as the triad of Australia's foremost poets. Other names as Paterson, Lawson, Daly, and O'Hara receive due recognition. In prose the advance has been less conspicuous, but the writer is able to mention favourably the work of McDonald, and, of course, the novels of Marcus Clarke and Rolf Boldrewood. Mr. Evans laments that "the interest taken by Australians in their literature may be gauged by the number of magazines that have failed." But he justly claims that Australia has no cause to be ashamed of her progress, considering that only seventy-five years have elapsed since her first book was published.

Mr. Evans himself contributes an admirable "masque" entitled "Australia Federata." Britannia is represented as sitting enthroned, surrounded by her colonies and waiting for the advent of the Dawn-Maiden of the new Century. Each colony addresses her in a stanza of rejoicing, of which we give two specimens:—

Canada.—O Great Sea-Mother, from my prairies vast,
From lonely forests ermined with the snow,
I come to do her honour, who, though last,
Shall mightiest grow.

India.—I, who have read the wisdom of the Seers,
Where Himalayan ridges pierce the blue
From plains and cities of two thousand years
Bring greeting true.

Then Australia, the Dawn-Maiden, enters, attended by her States, each of whom offers her from her products some royal gift, before she kneels to receive from Britannia a crown. Finally, from the centre of the stage, the new-crowned Maid addresses three stanzas to her attendants, of which the last runs:—

The Dawn is overpast. We stand upon
The threshold of the morning and the year;
Down the white century, where no feet have gone
The path lies clear.

The scroll is blank before us. Let us write
Our words thereon in deeds of living fame,
Australia—Freedom—in the whole world's sight
Shall mean the same.

Messrs. Methuen state that, as many of the purchasers of the first and second editions of the Stevenson Letters have expressed a wish to possess a copy of the three letters added in the third and cheaper edition, they will be happy to present copies of the three letters to those who bought copies of the first and second editions, if application is made through the bookseller from whom the volumes were purchased.

* * * *

Many people do not seem yet to have quite realized that there are two Robert Bridges in the world, and that the writer of a poem in the January Scribner is not the well-known English poet, but the assistant editor of that magazine, known to the American public as a verse writer under the name of "Droch."

We had occasion to refer, last week, to the advantages, considerable though insufficient, which English authors derive from the Copyright Treaty with the United

Through Copyright to Literature.

States. In the same number we quoted figures showing the immense sales attained by the works of certain rising young American novelists. At the first blush the two things do not look as if they had anything to do with each other. As a matter of fact they have a great deal. To England the great benefit of the Treaty has been to increase the revenues of English authors. Looking at the matter from the American point of view one can raise that statement to the *n*th power and say that the Treaty was necessary in order to enable American authors to earn a living. They, far more than their English rivals, were the sufferers from the prevailing piracy. The English authors, at the worst, had to endure the theft of a portion (very often only a small portion) of their gains. They had their own public in their own country, and their profits there remained intact. The American author's grievance lay in the competition, in his own market, of the pirated reprint. That market was flooded with reprints which could be sold at ridiculously low prices because none of the profits on the sale had to go to the authors. It was like allowing a rebate on imported literature, and the result was disastrous to almost all the native writers. There were one or two, like E. P. Roe, and Elizabeth Wetherell, and Harriet Beecher Stowe, and Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, whose popular qualities appealed to the American reader, and there were a few others who, like Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Mr. Bret Harte, and Mr. Henry James, made reputations. These did well enough, if not always so well as they deserved. But still it was harder for a man of letters to come into his kingdom in the United States than in any other civilized country. The papers, at one time, were full of their complainings. And then came the Treaty and the transformation. The new order of things has only lasted a very few years; but already the results of it are conspicuous. Literary reputations have been made in the United States with a rapidity previously unknown—the reputations, for instance, of Miss Mary E. Wilkins, of Mrs. Atherton, of Mr. Winston Churchill, of Mr. Hamlin Garland, of Mr. Paul Leicester Ford, and of many others. Nor is it right or reasonable to speak of the change as if its importance were merely commercial; the commercial and artistic sides of literature cannot be separated so easily. The real significance of the change lies in this—that when the American law failed to protect literary property, native American literature languished; and that, as soon as an irreducible minimum of protection is accorded, a national American literature at once begins to spring up under its fostering influence. Honesty, in short, has been rewarded, and a danger has been averted. Let us hope that the moral may be taken to heart in other countries—such countries as Holland and Norway, for example—in which it is still permissible for the property of foreign authors to be stolen for the benefit of native publishers. Otherwise not only will the authors of these countries be impoverished, but their national literatures will lose what distinction they can at present boast.

Personal Views.

SLANG AND ITS USES.

The curious dialects of class, cult, or sport which we call Slang are universal; in all times and in all places men have expressed their intimacy by the interchange of separate words and secret signs. You may see the beginning of Slang at its most odious in the catchwords wherewith some foolish clique embellishes its empty talk; you may see it at its best when it is employed by a clan to befog the common enemy or to mark the aristocracy of a class. A new game, a new fashion, a new industry are each sufficient to create a new lingo, and at each new invention a language increases its power of metaphor.

But while the habit of Slang is universal, it has been practised nowhere with greater assiduity and success than in England. Its virtue and its vice distinguish our language above all others; they give an energy to our familiar speech, a colour to our literature. The canting tongue, the peculiar Slang of thieves and vagabonds has for several centuries preserved a uniform character. Whence came this strange gibberish, which its professors called indifferently Thieves' Latin, Pedlars' French, or St. Giles' Greek? Was it a compost of English and the forgotten tongues of the East? Nobody knows, and nothing is certain save that in Shakespeare's time it was already familiar. Harrison, in his "Description of England," fixes its date and attributes it to a sole inventor. The thieves and beggars, says he, "in counterfeiting the Egyptian rogues, have devised a language among themselves, which they name Canting, but others Pedlars' French, a speech compact thirty years since of English and a great number of odd words of their own devising, without all order or reason; and yet such it is, as none but themselves are able to understand. The first deviser thereof was hanged by the neck, as a just reward, no doubt, for his deserts, and a common end to all of that profession." I doubt whether our Pedlars' French was ever devised by a single brain; I am certain that, if it were, its author deserved a better fate than to die of hempen-fever. But whoever devised it, it was Thomas Harman who first gave it a place in literature, and his "Caveat for Common Cursetors, vulgarly called Vagabones, set forth for the Utilitie and Proffyt of his Naturall Countrye," was in a second edition in 1568. Throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries treatises upon rogues and roguery followed one another in rapid succession, all based upon Harman's masterpiece; and the lingo was enshrined in countless glossaries, whose separate value would be greater had they been independently composed. Yet there exist the materials for an interesting study, and some day perhaps a sounder philologist than Borrow will investigate the flash as it was pattered by Hardy Vaux, Bamfylde Moore Carew, and many another vagabond.

"Thieves' Latin," then, is at once the most ancient and the most curious of all the dialects which compose what is called Slang. But, despite its age, it is not without rivals. The commoner vices have their expressive vocabulary. There is scarce a public school that is not fenced about by the privilege of an exclusive and obscure tongue; while many a word has come from the provinces into the larger freedom of our town speech, where it looks as ill at ease as an ill-dressed peasant in a smart crowd. So the accretion is increasing and inexhaustible. The English language wins as many new subjects as the British Empire, and, when it is spoken at any rate, deems nothing unworthy a tolerant interest. In our language, indeed, as in our colonial policy, we display a clear contrast to the French, whose exclusive spirit shudders alike at strange words and coloured skins. Compare Racine and Shakespeare and you may note the whole difference. The one is elegantly precise in diction as in feeling; the other exhausts the language, as he tears the human heart to shreds. So Richelieu's Academy ordains uniformity, while English taste—Academies we know not—permits the existence of all words, which have won the struggle.

And Slang has a deeper interest than mere curiosity. It is, so to say, the natural speech of mankind. The further we get from civilization and the restraints imposed by it, the more eloquent and quick-witted grows the lingo of street and hedgerow. The harsh simplicity of what Grose calls the vulgar tongue is more rapidly expressive than the trim refinement of written English. Yet if the life of Slang-words is adventurous while it lasts, they run the risk of untimely death. It is printer's ink alone which confers immortality, and oral tradition is only trustworthy among savages. What, then, becomes of the ever-living and ever-dying words which are heard rather than read? Some are shepherded in dictionaries—shepherded with a furtive air, as much as to say "Now you are in the fold, stay there, and don't come out again." Some fail of shelter altogether, and live a precarious life in the mouths of men—volitant per ora virum. The old dictionaries opened the gate widest, and such lexicographers as Florio and Cotgrave have preserved for us many specimens, which without their aid would long ago have become extinct. Johnson and his followers exercised a strict censorship, as though words, too, had morals, and might not be recognized without a certificate of character. On the other hand, dictionaries were devised which, like prisons, workhouses, and rope-walks, should admit nothing better than loafers and footpads. Of these Grose's "Classical Dictionary" is the most familiar, while the revived interest in the language of the streets is best displayed in the learned lexicon of Messrs. Henley and Farmer.

But Slang is not always cabined and confined in dictionaries. It has its uses in literature, and the greatest masters have been most highly distinguished by a worthy appreciation of its possibilities. That it is universal no critic would assert; it best suits a literature that is very young or very old. In other words, it is at once primitive and decadent. Ingenuity might perhaps detect its presence in Homer, but the classics of the serenest epoch knew it not, and it is not until we leave the golden age far behind that we find it in Latin. Petronius and Apuleius both understood how to decorate their style with words which were better known to the vulgar than to the cultured ear, and wrote after a manner which was novel and distinct. But the tradition of the classics still bound the Greeks and Romans with a happy chain, and a natural reverence discouraged experiment. Chaucer felt no such restraint, since in his day the line drawn between the literary and the familiar language was less precise; and if Villon wrote jargon as his mother tongue, he knew also the pure French of his century. But it was Rabelais who proved himself the first and greatest master of Slang, and he loved it, as he loved frolic, because it was new, and the world was new, and wisdom, being new, stretched out its limbs like a careless giant. What Rabelais did for France, whose wit was still Gallic in his day, our Elizabethans did for England. They sought new words, as they sought new continents; their enterprise was as keen in the domain of literature as in the golden realm of adventure. They found their words not in books, but in the world; nothing was above or below their vocabulary, if only it were strange and nimble-witted. So Shakespeare wrote Slang with the moderation of a great artist; so Ben Jonson delighted in St. Giles's Greek with an exuberance which was less of art than of life; and the prose writers of the time rivalled the dramatists in the use of a coloured speech. But as the seventeenth century waned, Slang turned to a vulgar flippancy. The pupils of Dryden debased their style with their manners, and if you would tell the true Slang from the false, compare Motteux with Urquhart, who was a real Elizabethan in all save the date of his birth.

So the change came; it was the business of the eighteenth century to attenuate the language, to exclude from English all that was common with a more than French zeal. The disciples of Boileau achieved their end with perfect thoroughness, and made reaction inevitable. During the present century Slang has regained its ancient ascendancy, until in one shape or another it threatens to overwhelm our literature. Many years since, Bulwer had a fancy for the smasher and swell-mobsman, Dickens more appositely mastered the lingo of the high-road, and Dickens' followers have done little credit to his discretion. George Eliot thought the jargon of modern science apt for romance, and there is no technical vocabulary—the ugliest form of Slang—that has not since her time befogged our literature. The steam-engine, the dissecting-room, the stable, the East-end—all these have their votaries, and, worst of all, we are assailed in three-quarters of the novels now published by such specimens of medieval Slang as "by my halidom," "odds bodikins," and the rest, which begin as local colour and end as gibberish. But the misunderstanding of Slang does not condemn it. Its value depends upon its use more closely than the value of any other artifice. Skill justifies courage, and skill may elevate slang to a fine point of style. A strange word, which escapes or shocks the vulgar, may link the intelligence of writer and reader. What, then, is the proper use of Slang? First, it must be rarely and sparingly employed. As a crowd is better represented on the stage by two or three supers than by fifty, so Slang is most effective, when it lights up a sentence with an unexpected flash, or gives a sudden hint of outspokenness. But as our managers are wont to limit their crowds merely by the length of their pocket and the size of their stage, so many of our writers are only checked by ignorance from composing their books wholly in the jargon of the workshop or the street. They forget that suggestion is better than realism, and in the belief that every word their notebook holds has a value, they empty them all out on to the printed page. When Dickens gave a separate character to the speech of Sam Weller, he indicated that character by the lightest touch. The writers of what we may call the "gorblymy" school are not content unless their whole books are composed in what they believe is the cockney dialect. Only Mr. Arthur Morrison has proved himself artist enough to resist the temptation of "realism"; he alone of them all is never mastered by his lingo.

But the use of Slang must not merely be restrained; it must also be suitable. That which is appropriate to comedy or farce is ridiculous in a serious disquisition, and, while the Slang of farce may be as trivial as it pleases, the Slang of comedy must not fall below its occasion. The artist may find room for all the outcasts, and introduce them with such skill; as never to make his reader conscious of bad company. Wherefore it is not the exclusion of Slang that we should demand; it is its moderate and sensible use. For there is no jargon which may not suggest a dozen new metaphors, which may not, under the hand of an master, give a fresh humour to style, a new colour to language.

CHARLES WHIBLEY.

SACRED FLOWERS.

We should like to see other books doing for the rest of the Christian year what is done for the Christmas season in "The Flora of the Sacred Nativity," by Alfred E. P. Raymund Dowling (Kegan Paul, 7s. 6d. n.). The subject is one of great interest for all who love flowers, while for the craftsmen and architects who are concerned with Church building and decoration it is one of much practical utility. The present miserable condition of the Church crafts, the lifeless stupidity of most Church decoration, are due mainly to a want of imagination. Applied art is very much concerned with flowers, and to most craftsmen flowers have lost their meaning; consequently they are content to reproduce mechanically two or three ideas, till every one is heartily sick of grapes, and corn, and lilies, and Passion-flowers. Mr. Dowling presents them with some five hundred plants in connexion with the one subject of the Nativity alone; and, what is of more importance, he helps them and the public generally to look upon all flowers in that reverent imaginative spirit which was once the common heritage of rich and poor alike.

Flowers were indeed a constant source of recollection, a "wayside sacrament," to use Kingsley's phrase, of spiritual things. Even from pagan times how much our sordid age has to learn of that mystical regard for the profound unseen which underlay the love of natural things in ancient Greece and Italy! And this was increased by a thousand delicate fancies, a thousand beautiful names, in Christian times; so that nature was indeed an open book "that heavenly lore imparts" to the peasant as well as to the monkish student, the artist, and the poet. Keble's hymn to this effect is very popular nowadays, but it has no more reality in the mouths of its singers than a great many other hymns. Our idea of flowers, Mr. Dowling says, is now only decorative. But in this he overpraises us; the decorative idea of flowers is a new gospel that has yet to spread among the public at large. Most gardeners seem still to regard each flower as a potential monstrosity. And how many of the principal flower-growers regard them as a means of displaying their vulgar wealth, and possibly of perpetuating their impossible names! True, there is a science of botany as there is a science of anatomy; and it has its admirable uses. But the one does not imply a love of flowers any more than does the other a love of dry bones. And yet flowers should be loved; and the botanist, we fear, does less than he might do to cultivate such a love. We are writing now not from the point of view of the scientific botanist but of the flower-lover, and we are conscious of a want of sympathy between the two. A comparison between the botanist's illustrations and those of any old herbal shows what he thinks a flower is like. Most people are frightened off the study of plants by his methods.

But we can leave the botanist to Mr. Dowling, who hates him sincerely and has many things to say about him in his fifty-page introductory essay on "The Flora Sacra." The poetry of flowers, he points out, gained enormously from the beautiful names which our forefathers gave them, with that genius for lovely nomenclature of which we are all reminded in these days of royal pageantry. But our modern scientists are making the study of botany—nay, even the simplest knowledge of garden and hot-house plants—impossible by their barbarous jargon, which cannot be either spelt or pronounced by ordinary cultivated people and which resists every attempt of the poet to add new flowers to his nosegay. What are we to say, for instance, of such names as Schivereckia, Pleurothallis kefersteiniana, or Conopsis utricularioides? They might be fit to describe diseases, but for flowers! Again we are reminded of a hymn, of that which tells us that every prospect pleases and only man is vile. Still it seems to be only the pedantic and not the natural man who thus loves to shut up the meaning of flowers; and perhaps the natural and regenerate man will conquer, and we shall not cease to be reminded of the unity of all things by such names as Narcissus, Solomon's Seal, Rosemary, Herb Christopher, or Star of Bethlehem, which recall the Christian inspiration or carry us back even beyond the Sacred Nativity. Mr. Dowling has something also to say about the "philosophy of herbs"; about the life which sleeps in inorganic matter, dreams in the plant, wakes in the animal, speaks in man, and was gradually unfolded to the world in the Word made matter, and the Word made letter, and finally embodied in the Word made flesh.

Mr. Dowling's work of research into the symbolical flowers and the meanings and stories connected with them has been made the more difficult by the loose writing of most of his predecessors. A worthy Dr. Forster who lived about 1820 has entrapped many an unwary book-maker by his odd practice of inventing all sorts of charming scraps of mediæval verse and folklore, making them up out of his own queer head, and then attributing them to books with long names that were purely imaginary. Conscientious scholars wasted months in hunting through libraries for books that did not exist; the other sort of writers (who are not unknown even in the twentieth century) just transferred Dr. Forster's fancies without attempting to verify them, with the result that a number of flowers are quite falsely supposed to be appropriated to certain days and saints by the Church. Dr. Forster, who thus became a sort of floral pope, does not seem to have been a humorist, and he was much too good a man to have been a conscious fraud. Perhaps he was a little mad. At any rate, Mr. Dowling has now completed his exposure.

This awful warning makes us wish that Mr. Dowling himself had given us his authorities; a book like this would be far more useful if it possessed abundant notes. Also, perhaps, if other volumes follow, we may hope for a little more about the flora and a little less general conversation about Church lore. The chapter on Advent contains much interesting matter (though we do not understand why he persists in adding the title "Immaculate" to the feast which our forefathers were content to call Conceptio Beate Mariæ), but there is no mention of any flower in it from beginning to end. Mr. Dowling is occasionally affected in his way of writing. We do not like "men of the moyen âge" on p. 46, nor are we reconciled when it reappears at the end of the book without the accent.

THE DRAMA.

"PROVINCIALISM" AND "SNOBBERY" IN PLAYWRIGHTS.

The combined stupidity and malignity of what once called itself Anti-Ibsenite criticism is now a thing of the past, and the attention which Mr. William Archer devotes to it in a paper contributed to the International Monthly on "The Real Ibsen" is very largely a case of killing the slain. We now know pretty well how to "place" Ibsen, thanks chiefly to Mr. Archer himself, and few people would have the hardihood to disagree with the main points in his latest defence of the old cause. But, as I say, I fancy that defence exhibits some superfluity of zeal, and, as zeal in excess is apt to do, it has betrayed him here and there into a certain faultiness of logic. I refer to his attempts at refuting the charge of "provincialism" or "parochialism" often brought against his hero. This charge, he contends, rests among other things upon the "illusion of centrality." "We cannot disabuse our minds of the idea that our own particular parish is the hub of the universe, and that habits which are not our own, manners which differ from ours, even names with which we are not familiar, are essentially inferior, contemptible, ludicrous. . . . There are a good many things in Ibsen's plays—traits of Norwegian manners and so forth—which quite naturally raise a smile in England or America, just as French manners raise a smile in Germany, German manners in France, English manners in America, and American manners in England. The sense of the ludicrous is unavoidable, and is harmless so long as it is not accompanied by a sense of superiority—so long as we remember in smiling that our neighbours have an equal right to smile at us. But this is just what English critics do not remember. They postulate some sort of supernal validity for the conventions to which they happen to be accustomed, and hold it inherently ridiculous on Ibsen's part to portray a society in which these conventions do not obtain." Now, in this argument, I submit, there lurks an insidious fallacy. It is true that we laugh at what is strange to us in the manners of other nations—"un-English" things, as we call them. We laugh at the stage Frenchman's (obsolete) convention about "ma mère," just as the Frenchman laughs at our (obsolescent) pruderies, our "Aoh! schocking!" as he epitomizes them. We laugh, however, here, as he laughs, without a sense of superiority. If we had the sense of superiority we should indeed be suffering from "the illusion of centrality." But these cases, and the laughter excited by them, are really irrelevant to the question Mr. Archer is discussing. For they are not cases of "provincialism" or "parochialism." Take the case of the stage Frenchman—or actor of Latin race—not when exclaiming "Ma mère!" but when representing a man of fashion in an exceedingly ill-fitting dress-coat and white tie. Those who remember the guests in the first act of The Second Mrs. Tanqueray as presented by Signora Duse's company, and compare them in recollection with the same people in the St. James' version, will know exactly what I mean. We smile, and our smile is now undoubtedly blended with a certain feeling of superiority. The inferiority of the Italian to the English actor in the art of externally counterfeiting a "smart" English gentleman is easily explained. He has not the social status of his English confrère and, further, Italian tailoring is inferior to the tailoring of Savile Row. But the sense of superiority in our smile is not explained by the strangeness of the Italian "get-up," but by its close resemblance to something very familiar to us at home, the Englishman who is not accustomed to evening dress. We say that such an Englishman is, so far as the little trifle of dress clothes goes, "provincial." And we smile at the "provincialism" of the Italian actor's costume. Our laughter at "provincialisms," then, proceeds not at all, as Mr. Archer assumes, from an irrational sense of superiority to manners different from our own, but from a (possibly unphilosophic but) very natural sense of superiority to manners which are the very counterparts of our own—in socially undeveloped and unsophisticated circles. Manners of this latter sort are occasionally depicted by Ibsen; for example, there is "Ibsen's habitual employment of champagne as a sort of symbol of rollicking festivity, if not of unbridled luxury," alluded to by Mr. Archer. Well, Ibsen is there taking the point of view adopted by, say, the people in Peckham, described (whether truthfully or not is not the question) by Mr. George Gissing. In that respect, then, we justifiably consider Ibsen as "provincial." There is a reason for it, of course, and Mr. Archer supplies it for us in declaring Norwegian society to be a society of narrow means and bourgeois habits. Norway in fact is, so to speak, a larger Peckham. But that statement only explains Ibsen's "provincialism"; it does not, as Mr. Archer seems to think, explain it away.

Apparently conscious of the weakness of his case, he proceeds to abuse the plaintiff's attorney. He raises the familiar cry of "snob!" "It has yet to be proved," he says, "that the capacity of human beings for sin and suffering, for exultation and agony, varies in direct proportion to their yearly income; and until this is proved the insistence on Ibsen's 'provincialism' or 'suburbanism' is a piece of irrelevant snobbery." A man's yearly income may not affect his capacity for sin and suffering; but, as I will try to show later, in so far as it determines the society in which he moves, it does affect his capacity for figuring appropriately in plays of a certain kind—of the kind, for instance, which is popular in this country. "We are accustomed in the theatre," says Mr. Archer truly enough, "to the society of marquises and millionaires; or, if we admit middle-class life at all, it is always of that order which apes, in its external appointments, the habits of the class above it." He has compiled a small peerage and baronetage out of the chief plays of our leading dramatists. "I find that they introduce us to two princesses, four dukes, three duchesses, five marquises, one marchioness, eleven earls, seven countesses, five viscounts, and sundries (such as baronets, ladies of undefined rank, and honourables) to the number of about ninety-five. There is nothing 'provincial,' nothing 'suburban' about this, is there? How odd it is, then, that the 'parochial' Ibsen should be world-famous, while Mr. Pinero and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones are barely struggling into notice outside the English-speaking countries!" Odd it would certainly be, if any one had suggested that the eminence of a dramatist depends solely on his freedom from "provincialism." But who has made any such suggestion? Mr. Archer triumphantly refutes what has never been advanced.

But I pass over that to his general charge of "snobbery" against the English dramatist. There is perhaps just a grain of truth in it; I make the admission because, like other Englishmen, I am snobbishly afraid of being thought imperfectly sensitive to snobbery. The dramatist, catering for the national taste, naturally does not overlook the national love of a lord. But his preference for the peerage has, I submit, a much more respectable basis than that; it has, in fact, a sound artistic justification. In the first place, plays which deal with fashionable society present us with pictures of an elegant or sumptuous luxury, a brilliance and vivid colouring of external life, which we do not necessarily covet, but which it is an innocent pleasure to observe as a spectacle. They afford us, in this respect, the gratification sought by Peggy the housemaid when she stands in the crowd outside Buckingham Palace to see the "fine folks" going to a Drawing Room. Such plays, too, show us the greatest number of pretty women in gorgeous gowns—always a pleasing sight to the normal eye. Of course philosophers (like Mr. Archer) know that "All is Vanity"; but the playhouse is not the home of philosophy. Further—and this is the artistic justification I spoke of—fashionable society offers the widest choice of those peculiar humours, manners, and minutely graduated demi-semi-emotions out of which comedy gets its account. Just as Racine, say, chose kings and queens for his dramatis personæ, because these great personages, being above law, reveal the elementary passions in freest play, so the modern writer of comedy instinctively chooses the "smart" set, which is a law unto itself, which has leisure to make elaborate love, money for elopements or second establishments, and other materials for the sentimental stage. Let me quote a comprehensive description of this set by a very "mundane" French novelist, M. Henri Rabusson:—

Le monde n'a sa raison d'être que dans le luxe et par le luxe; c'est une association pour le plaisir, ou ce n'est rien. Et il en a toujours été ainsi, quoi qu'on dise. L'amour, l'intelligence, le talent, l'esprit même, tout cela non seulement peut se passer du monde, mais a toujours vécu hors de lui, loin de lui, sauf par accident. Ce qu'il lui faut, c'est un dévergondage élégant d'esprit et de mœurs, n'excédant pas les limites de la tenue; il n'aime pas le vice parce que le vice est salissant; mais sa morale, toute en surface, repose sur des principes pour rire, qui seraient de pures niaiseries, n'était la nécessité de maintenir un certain décorum dans toute assemblée nombreuse, où la licence dégenère forcément en grossièreté. . .

There you have the best possible choice of materials for comedy and "elegant" drama. And there, I submit, Mr. Archer will find a more philosophical, as well as a more charitable, explanation for the English dramatist's peerage than mere "snobbery."

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF AMERICA. By BARRETT WENDELL, Professor of English at Harvard College. (Unwin. 16s.)

A vast misunderstanding has divided English-speaking peoples of the Mother Island and of the New World beyond the Atlantic as to the question of American literature. The tendency of Americans to suppose that their unexampled expansion, economic and social, ought to be paralleled by a corresponding development not less triumphantly American, in literature and art, has been too often met by a similar error on the part of Englishmen who have clamoured for a literature from America, redolent of its great inland seas, and its special social life. Hence Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Walt Whitman, or this or that craftsman of the short-story among contemporary Western American writers has been hailed in England, and sometimes in the United States, as the kind of impulsive and experimental artist which the world was looking for as the only legitimate American product.

On the other hand, average Americans, given, like the Southerners of France, or the Greeks of Homer, to exaggeration, have affirmed the existence of an American literature as notable as that of England; and the average Englishman in turn has stolidly ignored the existence of anything worthy of the name of English letters in a land supposed to be absorbed in purely material occupations. Professor John Nichol, of Glasgow, writing nearly twenty years ago, said, "If the literature of the North has been hitherto inferior to that of most European countries, the Southern States have produced scarcely any literature at all." This was not the view of the Southern States themselves, for in 1869 appeared a book entitled "Living Writers of the South," containing notices of 241 authors. Such a discrepancy of opinion attests the richness of the opportunity which the distinguished Professor of English, at Harvard, has seized in producing a critical "Literary History of America."

The book is really critical. It has already had the good fortune to arouse, chiefly in Boston, a veritable blizzard of abuse. To find anything like the reproaches heaped upon a writer for his honest work we must go back to the appearance of Matthew Arnold's most judicious utterances about the characteristics of the British middle-class. Cooper, earlier in the century, for utterances less judicious, had flung at his head a number of epithets which Mr. Barrett Wendell complacently reproduces:—"Liar," "full jackass," "grub," "reptile," &c. Evidently Mr. Wendell is in the tradition, and to be this is to be a "success." But those who have followed his work for the last twenty years have long known that he was in the tradition for better reasons still. The author of "Stelligeri," and of that admirable book on Shakespeare, is probably the man best qualified in the United States to write a history of English literature in America; not merely because of his erudition—in which, no doubt, he has any number of rivals—but because of the breadth of his experience, owing to the happy accidents of his social connexions in the two great centres of American life, Boston and New York; and also because of the unusual probity which enables him to comprehend more than one kind of intellectual activity.

It is true that Professor Wendell writes in the style—a little flamboyant and sometimes "smart"—which is common to American critics, and which does not always commend itself to Englishmen. It is true also that his love for generalization leads him occasionally to be lax in verifying details for himself. But his work has been accomplished with a singular steadiness and sincerity. Nothing could be clearer than his method. He does not pretend, like Taine, to explain everything by the theory of the milieu, yet he is as lucid and convincing as if he had adopted some such labour-saving device. His plan of comparing English letters in the Mother Island with English letters in the American colonies before and after the Revolution, period by period, while marking, by a sure analysis, the manner in which the two peoples diverged, is one which arrives at the most luminous results, and dispenses the author from drawing conclusions or, as the French say, dotting the i's of gratuitous generalizations. For him, American literature was English literature developing, or marking time, in new conditions. But it was this process of marking time which gives to American literature its most characteristic note. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries while American literature was what Mr. Wendell calls a story of national inexperience, whereas that of the Mother Country, with Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Swift, Addison, Pope, Johnson, and Burns, was a period of national experience, yet America was keeping alive the fire of that Elizabethan alertness of mind which diminished rapidly in the native literature of England. So that if, to match the names that we have given, America can offer none more eminent than those of Cotton Mather, Edwards, Franklin, the writers of the "Federalist," or that Freneau, whose "Indian Burial Ground" was violated by Campbell, it was, nevertheless, cultivating that American temper which blossomed forth, not merely in the Renaissance of New England, but in the general artistic sensibility of Americans, as shown in the supreness of their taste as imitators and plagiarists, and in their fine endowment as constructors of the short-story.

What, then, have we during the nineteenth century to represent English literature in America? There is Brockden Brown, who shows that in America literature begins just where the literature of a normally developed language is apt to leave off—namely, with laboured prose fiction. We have the charming refinement of "the permanent literary figure" Irving. But, Mr. Wendell takes pains to remind us that all this prose was contemporaneous with the period in England which began with the "Lyrical Ballads" and ended with the death of Scott. Yet America, too, had its poetry—the somewhat Lamartinean Bryant, whose plaints went unheeded in England; and Poe, characteristically American, in his freedom from conventional taint, histrionic like Beaudelaire, but still a product of that world of inexperience so unlike that other world which bred the writers contemporary with him in the Mother Country. If we turn to Mr. Wendell's Book V., in which we have the most satisfactory diagnosis of the social atmosphere of New England that has ever been formulated, we find a detachment positively heroic. Whom have we here to fill the long spaces, so crowded in England, of the Victorian era? That remarkable city of Boston—an acropolis from which the academic gardens of Harvard are visible, and whence on a further horizon, in a blue haze of transcendentalism, one may evoke the serene shades of Emerson, Alcott, and the Brook Farm idealists, while Margaret Fuller represents the only incarnation of an Aspasia which the stern morality of New England seems to have merited—Boston produced Emerson, Hawthorne, Holmes, Longfellow, Whittier, Thoreau, and Lowell. The last of these writers seems to be treated with scant justice by Mr. Wendell. Perhaps he felt keenly the danger of exaggerating the importance of a writer whom he personally knew so well. Moreover, with Hawthorne, Longfellow, and Emerson, and more even than they, Mr. Lowell had his meed of recognition from his English kinsfolk. But these reasons, which are not good ones, only tend to show the rigour of Mr. Wendell's attitude, and partially to explain, without justifying, the irritation of certain sciolistic and susceptible readers in America.

Mr. Wendell believes Americans to be more alive to artistic duty than Englishmen have often been. America's first literary utterances, even in its inexperience, were marked by no wildness or vagary, but showed an almost timid loyalty to the traditions of excellence. In the presence of the great struggle of the twentieth century between democracy and excellence, Mr. Wendell suggests that the simple, hopeful literature of nascent New England may have a mission for the world. This remark is curious. It would at all events have been approved by Emerson.

BRET HARTE, by T. Edgar Pemberton (Greening, 3s. 6d.), consists for the most part of extracts from the works of the great Californian novelist and from eulogies passed upon those works by various critics. The result is perhaps better than it would have been if it had occurred to Mr. Pemberton to make his book, as the schoolboy made his boat, out of his own head, for Mr. Pemberton's qualifications for literary criticism are not conspicuously apparent. His line is rather to write with the awestruck reverence of the interviewer admitted to the perfumed chambers of the great. The book would be a fairly profitable quarry for a paragraphist who wanted "personal matter" to accompany Mr. Bret Harte's portrait in an illustrated paper on his birthday; but it has no other raison d'être that we can discover.

THE TREASURY OF AMERICAN SACRED SONG, edited by W. Garrett Horder (Frowde, 3s. 6d.), is an anthology which has reached a second edition. It proves among other things that the Americans are singularly at ease in Zion. One does not readily imagine an English poet writing of the Lord's Supper in this rollicking rhythm :—

What song sang the twelve with the Saviour
When finish'd the Sacrament wine ?
Were they bow'd and subdued in behaviour,
Or bold, as made bold with a sign ?

Were the hairy breasts strong and defiant ?
Were the naked arms brawny and strong ?
Were the bearded lips lifted reliant
Thrust forth and full sturdy with song ?

Sat Saint John, with his silken and raven
Rich hair on his shoulders, and eyes
Lifting up to the faces unshaven
Like a sensitive child in surprise ?

Yet this is how Mr. Joaquin Miller writes upon the subject. It is also interesting to compare with Tennyson's famous "Crossing the Bar" a rendering of the same theme by Mr. Bret Harte :—

As I stand by the cross on the lone mountain's crest,
Looking over the ultimate sea ;
In the gloom of the mountain a ship lies at rest,
And one sails away from the lea :
One spreads its white wings on a far-reaching tract,
With pennant and sheet flowing free ;
One hides in the shadow with sails laid aback—
The ship that is waiting for me !

But lo ! in the distance the clouds break away,
The Gate's glowing portals I see ;
And I hear from the outgoing ship in the bay
The song of the sailors in glee.
So I think of the luminous footprints that bore
The comfort o'er dark Galilee,
And wait for the signal to go to the shore
To the ship that is waiting for me.

The idea of the poem is almost identical with that of Tennyson's, though it is unlikely that Tennyson took it from this source. The music is the strange haunting music of Edgar Allan Poe.

THE SIEGE OF KUMASSI.

THE SIEGE OF KUMASSI, by Lady Hodgson (Pearson, 21s.), was bound to be interesting even if it were badly written. As a matter of fact, Lady Hodgson begins by writing indifferently, but when she has got away from preliminary gossip of no importance about hammocks and fetishes and palm wine her subject inspires her, and she becomes graphic as well as fluent. Her accounts of actual military operations are largely taken from Reuter's despatches ; but her description of the privations and experiences of the garrison who escaped is her own, and is vivid without being too painfully realistic for general reading. The stores on which the garrison had to live were mostly four years old, "and to complete the picture of our daily ration, which consisted of one pound of tinned meat and one biscuit, this must be remembered, because the meat ration, upon the tin being opened, was often found to be enriched by a coating of green mould, and the biscuit had, not unfrequently, to be carefully guarded lest it should be walked off with by the ubiquitous weevil." And this was only the beginning—only, so to say, the humorous side of the starvation. A more tragic picture follows :—

Leaves from the trees, grass, anything that was thought eatable, was eagerly sought for and converted into food ; all around us people were dying. I often had the pain of seeing a man sitting in the road suddenly fall forward dead. Most terrible of all was to see those who from starvation had gone mad. The shrieks and yells of some of them were heart-rending ; others would quietly sit down, perhaps picking and tearing their clothes to pieces, with a vacant smile upon their faces in which each bone could almost be defined.

A soup kitchen was started to feed some hundred and fifty children every morning. The soup—indeed it was only an apology for soup—was made from the crumbs of biscuits left in the tins and any scraps that could be spared from the various tables. Long before the time to serve out this daily ration the poor wee things would take their places by the roadside and clamour for it, holding out their tins with great impatience. As much as ten shillings was offered for a rat, but rats, lizards, parrots, dogs, and pets of all kinds had long since disappeared.

The story of the long march through the bush is told with equal power and vividness ; and then follow some lighter chapters, in which Lady Hodgson gossips about various aspects of West African life—the goldfields, the servants, the civilization of the natives, &c. Some letters written by native servants are printed and seem to show that Coast English may run Babu English hard for unintended humour. This application for employment is worth quoting :—

Sir,—I beg that you will be so good enough to strive manly to get me another employment for substituting of my present position. Don't be considered that my handwriting of which I having it now is very bad, but I know many a man whose hand using like my yet they were employed, but I mean not say that I was not employed at all, I mean my position will not let me improving at whatever when I come to office I sitting down like wood doing nothing till the office close. And if there is a knif it will not be taking to cut anything it gets to damage. I learn experience that everyman wishes to receive eyes open, etc., and I wish too to get my eyes open, so I therefore lay hold of you with my supernatural power like Jacob the father of Israelites when he laid hold of the angel, said he except thou wilt bless me before I let you, and may I trouble you the same manner to help me.

The whole story is one full of interest to Englishmen, and Lady Hodgson may be congratulated on the skill with which she has told it.

THE FAR EAST.

THE PROBLEM OF ASIA AND ITS EFFECT UPON INTERNATIONAL POLICIES. By Captain A. T. MAHAN, U.S.N. (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d.).

The pernicious sequelæ of a "hit" in literature are proverbial, and we fear that Captain Mahan is no exception to the law of degeneration. The success of his "Sea Power" books has apparently convinced him that whatever he writes must be acceptable, and the result is a cacoethes scribendi. This is the second half-a-guinea book (of less than 250 pages, however) that he has put forth during this winter, and should anything further happen in any part of the globe which seemed in any manner to connect itself with sea power, we should not be surprised to receive another volume, equally sparse, from the same practised pen. This is a pity, because we have been in the habit of looking for mature judgments from Captain Mahan, and all his ingenious explanations about "long views" and "short views" will not reconcile us to the obviously ephemeral and conditional character of much of his recent work. At the same time, a good deal of the present volume deals with forces and conditions which are more or less permanent, and also, we cannot help saying, exceedingly obvious. We suppose that it is owing to the fact that Captain Mahan writes primarily for people of a crudely logical turn of mind, who object to the omission of those premisses which we usually take for granted, that leads him to utter so many truisms in a tone of deep solemnity. Who, for example, needs to be told, as if it were some great discovery, that "the onward movement of the world is largely determined, both in rate and in direction, by geographical and physical conditions" ? And, if we must have so portentous a pronouncement, would it not be better to define precisely what movement is referred to, and in what manner geographical conditions differ from physical ? We are then told that the mass of details in current events is apt to "conceal the determinative conditions. Such conditions, however, there always are"—this with an air of final court of appeal; as if it were conceivable that any course of events should exist without "determinative conditions." "The first law of states, as of men, is self-preservation." "Growth is a property of healthful life." "Lines of communication by sea, whatever their starting-point and their course, extend as far as ships can float and navigate." "The greater ease, and therefore the greater copiousness, of the stream of traffic result in a corresponding increase in the wealth—the gain—which is the concrete expression of the mutual benefit." "Divergence of interests generates contention, even among those of the same household." These great truths, enounced in Captain Mahan's most impressive manner, remind us painfully of the once celebrated "Proverbial Philosophy," and though we are far from describing the talented naval student as a Marine Tupper, it is only fair to warn him that a habit of sententious commonplace will not always be accepted as evidence of a genius for philosophic history.

The present volume, however, came out in sections in Harper's Magazine and the North American Review, and the author probably understood the taste of his predominant audience. We have no dislike to the reprinting of consecutive magazine articles, properly fitted together; Mr. Morley's "Cromwell" came out in the same way; but there is in the present instance a special tone and a temporary air which harmonize ill with a pretention to profound political truth. Even when Mr. Mahan is not writing platitudes, he has a slow way of spinning out a tedious sentence which is fatiguing:

Granting outside interference [in China] at all—which not only is most likely, but has actually begun—the successful issue would be found in a condition of political equilibrium between the external Powers, whereby the equality of opposing forces, resting each on stable foundations, should prevent the undue preponderance of any one State, or of any one force resulting from a combination of States, and which at the same time should promote, at the utmost rate consistent with healthy growth, the material and spiritual development of the populations affected.

Mr. Mahan appears to be addressing the babe in arms; he explains everything from the very beginning, argues in formal syllogisms, repeats his premisses again and again, and after all arrives at few, if any, conclusions that the despised man in the street has not jumped at, in his unconsidering way, ages ago. To be told that there is a belt of Asia, lying between the 30th and 40th parallels of north latitude, and extending from Turkey in Asia to the valley of the Yang-tze-kiang, which is in "a position of political instability," and is threatened by a land-power from the North and a sea-power from the south, by Russia and by England, does not carry us very far towards a solution of the Eastern Question whether in Turkey, Persia, or China; and to say that "the whole question of control of commerce with the Far East by political intrusion—viewed apart from the question of competition by purely commercial methods—really turns, in the actual conditions of the civilized world, upon the competing forces of land and of sea power" is surely, in view of these "actual conditions," a little too obvious to need insistence. But Mr. Mahan has acquired a habit of grinding out the tunes of his sea-power organ in a certain monotonous sequence, and at a studiously melancholy rate; he loves to listen to the sonorous echoes of ancient commonplaces, and he refuses to introduce a fresh note until the last has been repeatedly dinned into the deafest ear of the meanest intelligence.

Divested of much superfluous verbiage, the book is discovered to be an argument for concerted action on the part of the United States with Great Britain and Germany on the lines of their common interests in Asia. The essential community of interest of the three Teutonic "sea-powers" (using the term in reference to the fact that they are only able to act upon Asia by means of the sea) is emphasized from various points of view, and the author is convinced that they must act together against the "land-power" of Russia if they are to preserve their commercial advantages in the East. A good deal that he says on this point is very well said, but it can hardly be termed novel or profound. On the new foreign policy of the United States he has much to advance, but, as far as we can understand his cautious periods, the main fact seems to be that there are good things up for auction in Asia, and the United States are not disposed to be left out of the bidding. On the other hand, he thinks the United States might very well unload some of her responsibilities:—

Briefly, this remark is intended to raise the question, in view of the tremendous advance in importance of the Pacific and Asia, whether the extension of the Monroe Doctrine, to the extent of supporting the independence of the States of extreme South America against all European interference, is a position now either wise or tenable? Great Britain suffers many strains by the dispersion of her Empire, but it is at least her Empire—bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh. But what part have we, naturally or politically, in the foreign communities—foreign in blood and in tradition—south of the valley of the Amazon? That they do not love us is notorious; probably, indeed, they love us less because of our supposed purpose of interposition, which they would doubtless welcome in a strait, but which in ordinary times causes them chiefly mortification and apprehension. Within range of the Isthmus, certainly, our clear interest forbids toleration of any acquisition, through possession or through influence by a great foreign State—more so now than ever before; but for the American communities beyond that range our professed political concern is to us a waste of strength, as it is to them distasteful.

Mr. Mahan would welcome a sphere of influence in the Amazon valley, and we are not sure that he has not his eye upon the British islands of the Caribbean sea. But surely in his depreciation of all openings for political and commercial extension in the southern hemisphere he is taking a very "short view?" Asia is doubtless the "world problem" of the present day; but who knows when the world may turn its mind upon the great resources of South America? And as for South Africa, it does not look as if England, at least, regarded its loss or possession with the calm indifference of our American critic. On the Transvaal war, however, Mr. Mahan has always been sound. In the final chapter of this book—which despite its mannerism and over-elaboration of elementary propositions is undoubtedly interesting and suggestive—he writes unhesitatingly:—

A Government is not worthy to live that, having shown to all its subjects the impartiality and liberality which Great Britain has to British and Dutch alike throughout South Africa, should supinely acquiesce in the conditions of the Transvaal. . . . It would have been Imperial suicide to have allowed the well-known, though undervalued, military preparations of the Transvaal to pass unnoticed, defiant opposition to continue, and race disaffection to come to a head until the favourable moment for revolt should be found in a day of Imperial embarrassment. To every subject of the Empire the Government owed it to settle at once the question and to establish its own paramountcy on bases that cannot be shaken lightly.

England has a just and intelligent advocate in Captain Mahan, who sees clearly even when he writes with the utmost complexity.

THE ENGLISHMAN IN CHINA DURING THE VICTORIAN ERA, AS ILLUSTRATED IN THE CAREER OF SIR RUTHERFORD ALCOCK. By ALEXANDER MICHIE. 2 vols. Illustrated. (Blackwood. 38s. n.)

Mr. Alexander Michie has taken the career of the late Sir Rutherford Alcock as a text whereon to hang an elaborate and singularly able retrospect of English relations with China during the nineteenth century. Scarcely a quarter of these two massive volumes can be said to deal with Alcock's biography. Indeed, Sir Rutherford seems to have left scarcely any materials.

"My life," he said, "is in my work; by that I am content to be remembered." Hence, beyond some portions of an early journal, there is nothing from his own hand except extracts from reports and despatches, and the lack of letters and of all details of private life may disappoint those readers who are more interested in the personality of the man than in the work of the diplomatist. What is written of his career, however, is interesting and discriminating. His spirited conduct in the affair of the outrage at Tsingpu is rightly held up to admiration as a red-letter day in the somewhat dingy and flyblown calendar of our official relations with China; and his vigorous and dignified maintenance of foreigners' rights in the stormy days preceding the birth of new Japan is described in some stirring chapters. The reserved and austere character of the Minister, which engendered respect rather than popularity among the sanguine young communities of Anglo-China and Japan, did not lend itself to expansive biographical treatment; and one feels that in these volumes Sir Rutherford Alcock's public services find an adequate and appreciative, yet by no means exaggerated, memorial. After all, the life of a diplomatist, at a post where history is in making, lies almost wholly in his public duties. One cannot describe it without also relating the history of the State to which he was accredited, without a full comprehension of which most of his actions would be enigmas.

Mr. Michie realizes this, and in any case his life of Alcock would have required large introductions and digressions on Chinese and Japanese history to make the diplomacy intelligible. But his book has another purpose besides biography. He is himself an old resident in China, and has been a witness of many of the chief events in the chequered annals of British relations with the Far East. He wishes to set before the public the result of his long experience and close observation, and few men have enjoyed larger opportunities or used them better for this purpose. Mr. Michie is a shrewd and keen observer. He holds very strong views, as those who have read his earlier publications, or noticed from time to time the energetic letters appearing over his signature in The Times, are well aware. He represents the forward policy of the great merchant communities of China, and is as much an advocate of the "mailed fist" as the Kaiser himself. His ideal of statesmanship in the English Foreign Office in relation to the East is Lord Palmerston, as indeed it is of every competent student of Chinese history during the past century. Precisely the same view was expressed in the "Life of Sir Harry Parkes," whom Mr. Michie cites as the most admirable product of the China Consular Service. Indeed, it has often been remarked that had Sir Harry Parkes lived, or had he been succeeded by Ministers of anything like his own determined character and knowledge of the Chinese character, the present dangerous crisis in China could never have occurred. Mr. Michie traces the various causes of our diplomatic impotence at Peking down to the present time, and while he obviously distrusts the catholic elasticity of the Government's appointments, whereby men who have had no training in China have been set at the head of British interests there with disastrous results, he throws the chief blame for the series of diplomatic blunders upon the Foreign Office, where he considers there has been no competent successor to Palmerston and his fidus Achates Hammond. The story of Lord Clarendon's hoodwinking by Burlingame, the "Yankee-Chinese" envoy, and the extraordinary way in which the Foreign Office, having no Intelligence Department in China, is said to have depended for its information on the Inspector-General of the Maritime Customs, a loyal servant of the Emperor, lose nothing when told in Mr. Michie's very vigorous style. At the same time it may be doubted whether all Foreign Secretaries were really quite such fools as they are here depicted. Lord Clarendon was often afraid of taking serious responsibility, and he displayed a ruinously vacillating policy at the time of the Crimean War, but even he must surely have perceived that Sir Robert Hart's first duty was to the Chinese Government, who paid him, and that his advice must always be corrected by this equation. We do not believe that Sir R. Hart was allowed to override the Legation except when the Legation condemned itself by feebleness. In our opinion the radical vice of our diplomatic relations with China lay in the initial weakness of the position taken up by Sir Frederic Bruce. The "Bruce tradition," as Mr. Michie calls it, was only too faithfully carried on by Sir Thomas Wade, in whom the curious spectacle was seen of a man of great ability, vast Chinese learning, and intimate knowledge of the people, who nevertheless allowed the British Legation to "lose face," perhaps irreparably. Wade's delightful personal charm, and his chivalrous honourable nature, almost disarm criticism, and one is not displeased to find causes nearer home—in the Foreign Office and its permanent staff and in the incurable indifference of the British Government to all Eastern policies—for the loss of prestige at Peking. But Mr. Michie has reason on his side when he urges that "a scholar and a gentleman" is not necessarily a statesman. Sir Thomas Wade's mind, he thinks,

Was cast in another and finer mould than befits the political arena; and, unnatural as the inference may seem, it is open to question whether his extensive knowledge of China was the best qualification for dealing at first-hand with current affairs, even in that country. Profound researches into Chinese literature and philosophy tend to overshadow and induce a distaste for the jarring questions of the day. Seen through the luminous haze of its classic history, China presents to the contemplative mind an object of romance unlike any other existing State, for the thread of its continuity since the time before Abraham is unbroken. Grandeur than hewn stone or graven bronze, the monuments of China are written books, and a living race, the heirs of all her ages, to be conversed with and interrogated. The burden of such vast homogeneous antiquity may well oppress the mere man of politics; he needs a certain alloy of Philistinism and a limitation of view to enable him to concentrate his attention on the exigencies of the passing hour.

This is all perfectly true, granting the "exigencies"; and Mr. Michie goes on to draw an amusingly ironical picture of the "illuminating discussions" between the European linguists of the sixties and the first Manchu members of the Foreign Board:—

In these interesting symposia Mr. Wade naturally played the prominent part. On the enchanted ground of Chinese history and literature, also, the interlocutors made endless excursions together; and Chinese philosophy being directed to conduct rather than speculation, it was possible to deduce from the teaching of the sages authority for the adoption of almost any useful measure. Between the modern innovator, therefore, though in foreign garb, and the ancient moralists there was no such intellectual disagreement as sympathetic explanations could not resolve.

Mr. Michie, it is seen, writes frankly as the Philistine; his is the commercial view of Chinese politics, and he has no room in his philosophy for more than an indulgent smile for such literary and historical discussion as interested Wade or Professor Giles or Sir Walter Hillier. Nevertheless, it is possible to see another side to the Chinese question, not wholly commercial. One has the same alternative in Turkey—the other "sick man" of the East. In both there is an old traditional civilization which its possessors do not wish to change, but which is perpetually subject to the assaults of traders, promoters, concessionists, missionaries, and other intruders. If China was happy in her own manner of misgovernment, if her people preferred to submit to extortions and occasioned brutality, rather than adopt the advice and the inventions of "foreign devils," if they were prepared to live on their own land and do without foreign imports, save such as could be smuggled quietly under the approving eyes of the mandarins, what international right had any other country to interfere and impose a different system? We are too fond of assuming that a form of civilization that suits us must therefore suit every other country. Hence Lord Dufferin's "constitution" for Egypt, and Midhat Pasha's parliament at Constantinople. Had there been no trade question, we may be sure all this ardour for improving China and making her recognize our "rights" would have been confined to the missionaries and the lawyers. We never heard of any similar zeal for the opening up of Central Arabia or the revision of treaties with Nejd. But once trade got in, of course "rights" followed, and hence came all the experiments, failures, wars, and retreats which are chronicled in Mr. Michie's trenchant chapters. There is no going back now, and in order to go forward one cannot do better than hearken to his sound and experienced advice. Yet there may be permitted to "the contemplative mind" some trace of regret for the disturbance of the most ancient and reasoned civilization in the world, some touch of sympathy for the wanton ruin of the relics of immemorial art and science in the capital of the Son of Heaven, now devastated by the Philistines. Commerce, of course, will conquer in the end, and everybody will be much the better for it, no doubt, in pocket and stomach. There are other things—but they do not count in politics.

Mr. E. H. Parker on the Chinese Question.

Mr. E. H. Parker, the author of CHINA, HER HISTORY, DIPLOMACY AND COMMERCE (Murray, 8s. n.), has been Consul at Kiung Chow, and adviser on Chinese affairs to the Burma Government, and is now Reader in Chinese at University College, Liverpool. That is to say, he is a writer with a first-hand knowledge of his subject—a fact which we think we should have inferred from internal evidence, if it had not been implied by the statements on the title page. At all events, Mr. Parker writes with a level-headed aloofness that inspires confidence, and worshipping no fetishes, whether commercial or religious, convinces us that he is describing things as they really are. A certain portion of his work is only Blue-book and history made interesting; to have made such things interesting is in itself no small achievement. But the more valuable chapters are those which unfold the personal character of Chinamen and their attitude towards missionaries. "Natural religion," Mr. Parker maintains, the Chinese have already got. In the main, they recognize the same moral obligations that we do. As for dogmatic religion, he does not believe any power will succeed in drumming anything of the sort into the Chinese mind, "which is much too clear to take on trust any mere insistence upon alleged facts which cannot be proved by plain evidence." Moreover, the missionaries are not clever enough to make headway with them:—

The average Chinese, though behindhand in science, is, in many matters, the intellectual superior of the average European—more especially is he the superior of the untrained Protestant missionary of the colporteur class, who has only a "call to Christ" to justify his turning teacher of the world. Hence comes the trouble.

It should be added that if Mr. Parker has no particular respect for missionaries, he has no particular affection for Chinamen. His tone is rather that of a man who dislikes them, but will not allow other people who do not know them as well as he does to be unjust to them. Their ideas of morality, cleanliness, and honesty are not ours; but they are more moral and clean and honest than is generally allowed. And they are handy. The average Chinaman can do everything except:—

Shave himself; do up his own hair; cure his own maladies; keep off vermin; fight with his fists; manage a steamer; keep military or naval discipline; handle trust-money honestly; tell a plain, unvarnished story; be punctual; show nerve in times of sudden danger; eat cheese; or tolerate a female "master."

Mr. Parker does not speculate as to the future, but his account of present-day China is the best we have seen.

Mr. Archibald Little's Opinions.

MOUNT OMI AND BEYOND (Heinemann, 10s. n.) is a diary of a journey on the Tibetan border by Mr. Archibald John Little, the well-known pioneer of commerce in the Orient. The mountain which gives its name to the book is a sacred mountain, with Buddhist temples on the top, 10,500ft. high. A still more exalted eminence scaled by Mr. Little is Saiking Shan, 11,100 feet high; but his account of the ascent scarcely makes out a case for classing him with mountaineers. He went up part of the way by means of ladders, and reflected that a terrible fate would be his if he let go. A more appropriate observation would have been that no harm could come to him so long as he held on. But let that pass. The book is only incidentally a climbing book. Most of it is about the discomforts of Chinese inns and the prospects of Chinese trade. From the preface we gather that Mr. Little is one of the few Englishmen who have a definite policy for China. He holds the truly mercantile view that everything will be all right if only the country is opened up to trade:—

Our future here depends, it seems to me, upon the action of the Allies in the North. If they are satisfied with the capture of Peking, and are bamboozled into a new treaty yielding on paper everything demanded, it will be 1860 over again, with the addition that the Chinese are now roused, and it will only be a question of waiting until they are better and more universally armed to make another and possibly successful attempt to throw off the foreign yoke under which they now labour—officials and people alike.

But if the Allies, with Britain and Japan in the van, persevere until they have caught the Empress and Prince Tuan and the rest, and bring them to trial, and set Kwanghsu or a "progressive" nominee on the throne—consistently opposing partition meanwhile—then we may hope for the real opening of the country with resulting prosperity and peace.

This is a suspiciously simple solution of a problem which puzzles even Sir Robert Hart. It ignores the question "What will the Chinese be doing in the meantime?" And, as was to be expected, we have not read very far before coming upon a sentence which throws considerable doubt upon the utility of the plan. Observing a case of Chinese cheap labour at some brine wells, Mr. Little naively remarks:—

Truly, when the Chinese do introduce Western knowledge and machinery into their arts, the control of the industrial world will be in their hands.

We are left wondering whether Mr. Little really thinks it worth while to hold the gorgeous East in fee, at great trouble and expense, in order that the gorgeous East may oust us from the neutral market. Our wonder, however, does not prevent us from finding the book readable or from admiring the photographs taken by the author's wife.

A Frenchman's View.

THE AWAKENING OF THE EAST, by Pierre Leroy-Beaulieu, translated by Richard Davey, with a preface by Henry Norman (Heinemann 6s.), may be called a manual of the Far Eastern Question. It has the incalculable merit of French lucidity—that clearness of arrangement and style which is only the result of the clearness of thought characteristic of the best French writers. But it has a further merit, extremely rare in French writers on political questions—it is marked by a tone of aloofness, impartiality, and one might almost say cosmopolitanism, which makes it a peculiarly safe and congenial guide to people of other races than the author's. He may give a good tempered prod at stupid England now and then, but it is all fair play, and he gives quite as sharp criticisms to the other Powers. Moreover, Mr. Henry Norman is at hand to correct in a footnote any unauthentic tale against his country. A guide to the great Asian problem, at once lucid and fairminded, is indeed a trouvaille, and we have no hesitation in recommending M. Leroy-Beaulieu's handy little volume to all who wish to grasp the essential factors in the question which eight Powers are trying to solve—or rather to postpone—around Peking. By the "awakening of the East" the author, of course, refers to the effects, begun, continued, and to come, of European influence on the Yellow peoples. The first in his order, though the latest in accomplishment, is the Siberian Railway. He deals, indeed, with Siberia as a whole, and his account of its development under Russian colonization will astonish many readers; but the projection of Siberia into China by means of the great railway is the latest salient fact which bears most pertinently on the Far Eastern Question. Next he discusses the awakening of Japan, the "child of the world's old age," now a child of some standing and sturdiness, and the only example on record of the successful adoption of Western systems by an Eastern State. The introduction of this very wide-awake nation into the field of Eastern politics is the subject of some extremely interesting chapters. M. Leroy-Beaulieu believes in Japan, and so far he is justified. There is no doubt that but for her very public-spirited action last year there would have been an unparalleled catastrophe at Peking; and England is only now realising the gravity of the error committed after the Sinico-Japanese war in allowing Russia to reap the fruits of Japan's exertions. Finally, he takes up the subject of that unchanged and apparently unchangeable old empire of China, and points out her incurable weaknesses, and the evident (but perhaps curable weaknesses) of the Western Powers who have so far failed to influence her. He is opposed to any sweeping changes or violent interference on the ground that though the Chinese may be bad soldiers they are first-class rebels, and it is not wise to stir a hornet's nest. This is, of course, a French view, because France has little to gain in any solution of the Peking imbroglio. The book is not all diplomacy and politics; it contains interesting chapters on the physical and commercial characteristics of the three countries described, and thus supplies the reader with a great deal of suggestive information in a very convenient form.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Japanese Drama.

JAPANESE PLAYS AND PLAYFELLOWS, by Osman Edwards (Heinemann, 10s.), must not be ranked with the "common form" globe-trotting books, and it is a good sign that though Mr. Edwards was not without a camera he gives us instead of photographs some beautiful reproductions of pictures by Japanese artists. He writes well and interestingly, and has penetrated further into the inner social life of Japan than most of the numerous exploiters of that country. Though there is much that will be new even to many English travellers in Japan in the chapters on "Taking the waters," "Afternoon calls," and in an interesting study (written in good taste) of one side of Japanese manners in "The Scarlet Lady," the most important part of the book is its chapter, with many quotations, on "Vulgar Songs," and its history and description of the Japanese drama, which throws much light on recent performances in England. In the traditional religious Nô Drama, now revived by patriotic archæologists, and in the national drama, the birth of which almost exactly synchronizes with the birth of a national drama in England, there is an abundance of suggestive parallels for the student of the stage, though the development of the drama in the West has been wholly different from its development in the East, where its main object is, as Mr. Edwards says, not illusion, but edification.

The Wisdom of Bishop Creighton.

It would be difficult to overestimate the value of a book like COUNSELS FOR CHURCH PEOPLE (Stock, 5s.). The same publishers have already issued two or three volumes containing selections from the writings of certain eminent contemporary Churchmen, edited by Dr. J. H. Burn, and the same compiler here gives us, in the form of extracts of moderate length, the reflections of the late Bishop Creighton on most of the questions doctrinal or social which are of interest to Church people. Their note is their direct appeal to the intelligent lay mind, which cannot appreciate the conventionalities of the preacher and his stringing together of texts. On such subjects as "Church and State," "Public Opinion," "National Progress," to say nothing of matters more definitely theological, Bishop Creighton is invariably clear, sensible, and suggestive, and his manner of treatment is admirably suited to the mental habits of the time.

Book Catalogues.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.'s ENGLISH CATALOGUE, 1900, has now appeared, and contains the excellent new feature of a list of American publishers, appended to the list of English publishers. We have often called attention to the merits of this publication; and we can only say that, speaking for ourselves, the more we use it the more serviceable we find it. As a complete list of publications of the year, arranged under the names of both author and title, and in such a manner as to fulfil to some extent the purpose of a Subject Index, it stands alone. As the publishers have recently pointed out in the Publishers' Circular, these English Catalogues supply the only means, apart from the voluminous catalogues of the British Museum, of obtaining in uniform volumes information about English books published during the last sixty-five years—the first catalogue having appeared in 1835. They are bound up in five volumes with four index volumes—the two first volumes, however, and the first index volume are now out of print and difficult to obtain. The others are to be had at a moderate price and certainly make an invaluable bibliographical record of English publications.

We may at the same time call attention to a book which now makes a definite and well-founded claim to be a subject-index of useful and popular books, viz., the 1901 edition of Messrs. Mudie's ENGLISH CATALOGUE (1s. 6d.). The principle of classification, introduced in 1900, is now extended, particularly in the departments of history, travel, and topography, with the result that the catalogue may now serve, to a certain extent, as a bibliography and subject-index to recent literature.

Queen Victoria.

Many lives of her late Majesty will assuredly be required; more than are required will as assuredly be forthcoming. V.R.I., HER LIFE AND EMPIRE, a finely illustrated Life by the Duke of Argyll (Harmsworth), has begun to appear in sixpenny numbers, and must be reserved for further consideration. Of the slighter biographies, which will also be the more numerous, none is likely to be more deservedly or more widely popular than STORIES OF THE QUEEN: AN ANECDOTAL HISTORY OF THE REIGN (Review of Reviews Office, 6d.). The purpose of the little book is to bring together from all available sources "those episodes, incidents, anecdotes, or sayings, which most vividly depict the Queen as she lived and moved amongst us in the sixty years of her reign." Contribution is levied upon many volumes of memoirs, and many old magazine articles. It is not an ambitious plan; but it has been carried out with consummate skill. We do not understand whether the work is actually done by Mr. Stead, or is only carried out under his direction. On either alternative congratulation and praise are due to him.

Medical.

The second volume of A MANUAL OF MEDICINE, edited by W. H. Allchin (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. n.), continues the description of General Diseases begun in the first volume. The articles on the various and somewhat disconnected diseases included in this book are contributed by thirteen writers, and are illustrated by pictures and diagrams that are good in quality, though few in number. This Manual does not, of course, compete with Professor Clifford Allbutt's great "System of Medicine" either in size or in completeness; on the other hand, it promises to be far more thorough than the text-books commonly read by medical students—such as Osler's or Taylor's—can ever hope to be. It appears to fill the gap between the "System" and the text-books very satisfactorily, and it is in this that its chief value lies. The Manual is well got up and of a very convenient size, and is to be completed in three more volumes.

The MEMOIR OF JAMES MACARTNEY, M.D., F.R.S., by Professor Macalister (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), gives a very interesting account of the making of the Irish Medical School. Macartney was Professor of Anatomy and Surgery at Trinity College, Dublin, from 1813 to 1837; he found both the teaching and the attendance at the classes at a deplorably low ebb when he first took up his professorship, but when he left, thanks to his twenty-five years of unremitting effort, the Dublin school was attracting pupils over the sea from both London and Edinburgh. But reformers rarely meet with due appreciation from their colleagues, particularly in University towns; and the story of Macartney's life is largely the story of the continuous series of petty annoyances that the University of Dublin contrived to inflict on "the greatest teacher, the best anatomist, the most philosophic surgeon that Ireland has ever produced." Professor Macalister has little to say about Macartney's domestic life and relations; the book is well written, and may be cordially recommended to all who are interested in the history of Irish medicine.

MOSQUITOS AND MALARIA, by Cuthbert Christy (Sampson Low, 6s. n.), sums up lucidly all the knowledge at present accumulated on this important subject. The case against the mosquito known euphemistically as "anopheles" or "unprofitable" seems pretty clear. So far as investigation has gone, it is found wherever there is malaria, and malaria prevails wherever it is found. Moreover, patients inoculated with its poison get malaria, and patients who use effective mosquito curtains when living in its haunts escape malaria. The evidence on which these statements rest is well presented by Mr. Christy, whose book also contains hints for the destruction of mosquitoes, and half-a-dozen plates showing various mosquitoes and their larvæ under the microscope.

From Mr. George S. Keith, the author of "Fads of an Old Physician," comes a collection of miscellaneous papers ON SANITARY AND OTHER MATTERS (Black, 2s. 6d.). The main contention of most of them is that we should be more healthy, and live longer, if we would eat less meat.

Bridge.

Although playing-cards may be the only books available in extreme old-age, it is a little difficult to establish a close connexion between them and literature. Still, as we have lately noticed a work on the Russian national game of Vint, we must a fortiori extend a welcome to two books on a game so popular in this country as Bridge. Mr. C. J. Melrose's elaborate book on BRIDGE WHIST (Upcott Gill, 3s. 6d.) is written extremely well, and discusses copiously the principles and play of the game. If we do not criticize this part of his book, it is for the author's own humorous and unanswerable reason that argument on such points opens the door to all sorts of frivolous objections, and that it is simpler to assume the authority of an oracle. We may say, however, that his dicta, unlike most oracles, are clear and intelligible. His more difficult task has been the construction of a code of rules. It is true, as the preface says, that a rather new game such as Bridge cannot very well possess a final and complete code, but the time has at any rate come for some approach to authoritative laws applicable to all possible cases. Mr. Melrose, accordingly, has collected all the disputed points he could, and has done his best to provide for them. Now and then anomalous results follow from even the best regulations. There is the penalty for a revoke, for instance, where Mr. Melrose makes a new proviso, regretting, however, that in certain cases the law will still be logically faulty; and he mentions another case which, as he shows, is susceptible of very subtle argument indeed. In short, the laws of Bridge cannot as yet be perfect, but this book represents an advance in that direction.

Mr. W. Dalton's book BRIDGE ABRIDGED (De La Rue) is to the new game pretty much what "Cavendish on Whist" was to the old one. He leaves legislation to the committees of the Turf and Portland Clubs, preferring to expound the principles and practice of the game, especially the latter, which he ranks higher than any knowledge of its theory. Here again we are not disposed to discuss the author's decisions, partly for the reason given above, and partly because, as he truly says, the game constantly throws a player upon his own resources. His own opinion is that experience, duly bought and paid for, and observation of the finest players are the best teachers after all. That is the case with all games, but a great deal may be learned, nevertheless, from a clear and sensible book such as this. In particular, we commend all that is said on the etiquette of the game, an important matter that is too often neglected. By the way, no one knows the exact origin of any of our games. Mr. Dalton has traced Bridge to the Autumn of 1894, when Lord Brougham introduced it at the Portland Club. Perhaps it would be possible, while the game is still young, to find, and to immortalize, its actual inventor.

Bookkeeping.

BOOKKEEPING FOR BUSINESS MEN, by J. Thornton and S. W. Thornton (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), is a new manual on a subject on which there are already many manuals. None the less it presents points of novelty. The author assumes himself the partner of his reader in a shop doing a general trade, and for one calendar month keeps the books of the firm of J. Thornton and Gentle Reader, throwing in footnotes explaining why such and such an item is posted to "trade expenses," or "wages account," or "suspense account," as the case may be. The method has the advantage of presenting difficulties pretty much in the manner in which they present themselves in real life, with the result that the solutions are easier to remember than they would be if they only figured in a table of rules. The book is a really valuable addition to the literature of the subject.

Another bookkeeping manual is PRACTICAL BOOKKEEPING (Allman, 2s.), by W. D. Odham, and W. E. Holland, the latter author being an instructor in the subject at the Borough of West Ham Municipal Technical Institute. The explanations are clear; the difficulties are approached in the right order; and there are plenty of exercises of the right sort. The present volume is elementary. A second is to follow, dealing with the "Tabular System" and the accounts of manufacturers, contractors, public companies, benevolent institutions, &c.

Another bookkeeping book, notable chiefly for the large number of exercises, is THE PRECEPTORS' BOOKKEEPING, by Thomas Chalice Jackson (University Tutorial Press, 1s. 6d.).

Mr. William Archer's first three instalments of his revised Ibsen translations THE LEAGUE OF YOUTH, PILLARS OF SOCIETY, and A DOLL'S HOUSE (Walter Scott, 2s. 6d. each) are very neat and well-printed volumes. On Mr. Archer's general preface we have already commented. Each of the plays now published has an interesting introduction dealing with its stage history; and the introductions gain a good deal from the fact that Mr. Archer, solely to show what he considers to be the ineptitude of taste on the part of English newspapers, quotes various "flowers of [adverse] criticism." They will probably help the student of Ibsen in forming his own opinion.

DRIFTING (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.), by an anonymous writer, is a short and pessimistic volume on our government and our trade. He emphasizes a great many of the evils—most of them perennial—of party government, and warns us once more of the increasing competition of German and American industries. But he is not so prodigal of remedies as of grievances. We gather that he is a friend to more paternal interference on the part of government, and an enemy to free trade; but beyond this he is not very explicit. One remedy which he does suggest, to check the ills of our present party system, viz., the establishment of yet another party—the "Patriotic"—does not seem helpful. What would prevent the patriotic contingent from being swayed by electioneering influences just as much as any other party?

Mr. H. C. Beeching publishes in one volume two suggestive essays on the STUDY OF POETRY (Cambridge University Press, 1s.) which we commented upon when they appeared in the Cornhill.

Mr. E. O. Jones is continuing in WELSH POETS OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY (Ellis, Llanidloes) his anthology of Welsh nineteenth-century verse, and includes in the present instalment a long translation from Islwyn, of whom we published an account on June 23, 1900. Mr. Jones asks for suggestions and assistance with regard to future volumes.

John Oliver Hobbes' epigrams lend themselves to the uses of the BIRTHDAY BOOK (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.), compiled from her works by Zoë Procter. Her tongue is a sharp one, and the young lady who possesses the book will get more fun out of it than the young gentleman who has to sign his name against such remarks as "He seems a babbler." This statement is not by the way very interesting out of its context, and such sayings as "Life is not what we find it, but what we make it" are too obvious echoes even for birthday books. There is no selection from "The Wisdom of the Wise."

FIFTY YEARS OF WORK IN CANADA, SCIENTIFIC AND EDUCATIONAL (Ballantyne, Hanson), consists mainly of the autobiographical notes of the late Sir William Dawson. The scientific work recorded, mainly geological, is not quite of the highest importance. Sir William Dawson had some difficulty in falling into line with the most advanced thinkers, and no very sound reason for not doing so. On the other hand, his services to education in Canada are great and unquestioned. As Principal of the McGill University, Montreal, he made a languishing institution flourish, and seems to have had no difficulties with the discipline—often a weak point in the Universities across the sea. His narrative is interesting and modest, though it is likely, perhaps, to find more readers in Canada than in England.

PAGES FROM THE JOURNAL OF A QUEENSLAND SQUATTER, by Oscar de Satgé (Hurst and Blackett, 10s. 6d. n.), is the story of the very uneventful life of a gentleman who emigrated to Australia in 1853, and achieved prosperity by assiduous attention to agricultural pursuits. There are one or two rather tame bushranger stories, and there is some account of Queensland politics, with long lists of political gentlemen who are no doubt eminent in Queensland; but the essence of the book is sheep farming, and it is among sheep farmers, actual or potential, that it must find its public. Potential sheep farmers in particular will find it useful, for, so far as we can judge, it gives the sort of hints that they require. The rest of us can look at the pictures. All of them are well printed, and some of them are rather interesting.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION APPLIED TO PARTY GOVERNMENT, by T. R. Ashworth and H. P. C. Ashworth (Sonnenschein, 6s. n.), treats electoral questions mainly from the point of view of Australian politics. But much light is thrown on the general question by the discussion in the light of theory and experience of the Hare system, the Lubbock system, the Hare-Clark system, and the Droop Gregory system. The subject is, of course, a complicated one, but those who follow it closely will be interested in a system of his own which is unfolded by the author.

Two little legal books come from Mr. Edingham Wilson. RAILWAY LAW FOR THE MAN IN THE TRAIN, by George E. T. Edalji (2s. n.), acquaints passengers with their rights and their prospects of obtaining redress when "put upon" or otherwise injured by the companies and their minions. THE LAW OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES, by James Walter Smith (2s. n.), is a work in its 26th thousand, brought fully up to date, and incorporating the most recent legislation on the subject.

The Agent-General for New South Wales presents us with FORTY YEARS OF PROGRESS IN NEW SOUTH WALES, THE TIMBER RESOURCES OF NEW SOUTH WALES, and some other official publications, all written by Mr. T. A. Coghlan. The bold and elegant appearance of the pamphlets contrasts strikingly with the woe-begone format in which, as we complained the other day, Consular reports and similar documents are presented in this country.

Educational.

THE MANUAL OF ELEMENTARY SCIENCE, by Mr. Gregory and Mr. Simmons (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), has been prepared to pass pupil teachers through the "Queen's Scholarship" examination in somewhat the same way that a new shell is generally evolved to penetrate the newest kind of armour-plate. It begins with Mechanics, which is the worst part of the book. It is too brief, and few students could understand it who had not had previous teaching in the subject. Each section (as throughout the book) commences with experiments and observations, and is followed by a text-book description of results, the chapters terminating with a summary and set of examples. The "Henristic Method" is surely overdone in such a case as "Put a stone in a teacup, then into a tumbler, and then into a basin; the shape of the stone remains the same wherever it is placed." The First Law of Motion, on the other hand, is referred to what "common experience tells every one." The treatment of "Work," "Mass," "Centre of Gravity," and other parts is loose and unscientific. The other subjects treated are "Fluid Pressure," "Terrestrial Magnetism," Heat, Light, Chemistry, and Astronomy. These are much better done, the last being the most novel feature. The illustrations here are interesting and often ingenious.

CHEMISTRY, by James Knight (Self-Educator Series, Hodder and Stoughton, 2s. 6d.), seeks to introduce the elements of the Chemistry of everyday life to those whose earlier education has not included Chemistry. The book is, therefore, more a series of essays than a course of Chemistry, and is arranged in the delightfully uneducative order of starting with a chapter on the Atomic Theory, and terminating with some excellent advice to those who desire to take to the subject more earnestly. We find interesting chapters on Coal Distillation, Iron and Steel, the Chemistry of Foods, and so forth. On the other hand, space is found for description of chemical composition and reactions, including illustrations of structural formulæ and quantitative calculations. The reader is encouraged to perform the experiments described in the text and a list of necessary apparatus is supplied. We can thoroughly recommend this book to readers of the class indicated above, and are satisfied that it will not only create an interest in Chemistry, but remove that dread of the unknown which many feel in the presence of a chemical formula.

Among the latest additions to the Temple Cyclopædic Primers (Dent, 1s.) are two volumes on MODERN CHEMISTRY, by Professor William Ramsay, of University College. The first is devoted to a statement of the fundamental laws and principles of chemical theory. It deals fully with recent developments of the electrolytic dissociation hypothesis and of the theory of isomerism and structural chemistry; in particular, it explains very lucidly the arrangements of the atoms in a molecule. The second volume opens with a brief discussion of the modes by which the elements are prepared, together with a few notes on their physical properties. The interactions of these elements occupy the remainder of the book, and the various classes of compounds, divided into six main groups, are systematically passed in review. The two volumes between them contain only about 330 pages, but into this small space Professor Ramsay has succeeded in compressing a very clear and readable outline of a huge subject. One fault, however, may be found, and that is the meagreness of the indexes; a few more pages might with advantage have been spared for them, especially considering that there is no synopsis of contents whatever, except such as is afforded by the headings that appear at the beginning of each chapter, but are nowhere collected together.

HANDBOOK TO THE PENTATEUCH, VOL. I., Gen.-Exodus xii., by H. C. Batterbury, B.A. (Rivington, 2s. 6d.), is intended for "students and those engaged in the religious instruction of the young, especially in elementary schools," and aims at "guiding the teacher in steering a clear course between the rock of modern destructive criticism on the one hand and that of indiscriminate literalism on the other." The Biblical text (with some considerable and desirable omissions) is given with notes, many of them useful. But the teacher will have to use great discretion with some of these comments. As the author lays it down as important not to "teach children what they are to unlearn," we must give one or two sample notes. From Gen. I., vv. 1-3, "we have learnt this, that each Person of the Holy Trinity took part in the creation of the world." Ex. vii., v. ii., "The Magicians did their wonders either through the agency of evil spirits or by skill," and (ibid. v. 22, Magicians also turn the water to blood). "This must have been on a very small scale." We have selected the first extract from among many as an example of putting a strained construction on simple words, and the last two as "suggesting difficulties" to children by unwise comments. Each section terminates with a skeleton lesson. In reading the book we cannot help feeling that there is an undercurrent of antagonism between the text, and the commentary, which now reads into a passage an apparently unnatural meaning, now acts as apology for the story, and then leaves the teacher without aid in avoiding the "rock of modern criticism."

DENT'S SCHOOL GRAMMAR OF MODERN FRENCH (3s. 6d. n.), by G. H. Clarke and C. J. Murray, is distinguished from the majority of grammars for school use by the fact that it is a grammar merely, and does not contain exercises; and the space thus gained is profitably used. Almost all the subtle points of syntax on which examiners trip up the unwary are brought to the notice of students, and the book may be warmly recommended for use in higher forms. For lower forms it is not apparently intended. M. Leygues' "tolérances" are given in an appendix, and are regarded by the authors as "a manifest step in the right direction." A new departure is made in devoting separate sections to the grammatical usages, now obsolete or obsolescent, of the seventeenth century.

THE LONDON MATRICULATION DIRECTORY, published by the University Tutorial Press (1s. n.), contains the papers set in January, 1901, together with solutions by tutors.

To his volumes already published of "Questions" on Shakespeare's Plays, Mr. John Lees now adds QUESTIONS ON KING HENRY V. (Allman, 2s. 6d.), interleaved. It includes papers actually set at the Cambridge "Locals." The questions are very exhaustive, and will be of great service to those who are working this play with their forms.

ART.

Mr. Mortimer Mempes has learnt the secret of our times; he is never behind the fair. He was an impressionist of Japanese ways when public taste set in the direction of Orientalism; he etched in the palmy days of painter-etchers, and he built an excellent specimen of "domestic Gothic" when Ernest George was the vogue. He once more shows his adaptability in the series of landscape and portrait studies made during his recent visit as a correspondent at the seat of war in Africa. He has sacrificed much, possibly too much, at the shrine of novelty, and, as an artist, South Africa has apparently left him as dissatisfied as it leaves most recent adventurers. The portraits of Earl Roberts, Cecil Rhodes, Sir Alfred Milner, General French, and Mr. Kipling have been drawn, it would appear, rather because they are just now in the public eye than for any other reason. They are painted for the most part with almost troublesome directness in a medium as hard and dry as the atmosphere of this inhospitable country. Few of them appear to be comfortable. It is otherwise with the landscapes with the blue of African hills against a hot, golden, palpitating sky, and there are some picturesque old houses and gardens of flowers which remind us of Mr. Mempes at his best. On the whole, however, the collection is more topical than artistic.

Very different is the exhibition of water-colours with which Messrs. Agnew seek to interest us just now. One of the screens devoted to Turner restores all our faith in the greatness of the master, which the exhibition of some of his less worthy work has somewhat shaken of late. Here is the "Dover," dated 1824, and consequently painted during his most mature period. It is less conventional in colour scheme than his earlier work, and is less full of effort than much of the work which he attempted ten or fifteen years later. "Ramsgate" and "Bath Abbey" the artist may vainly endeavour to emulate, and this exhibition is unusually fortunate in its Turners. The examples of David Cox are less satisfactory, but the "De Wint," "Haymaking in Lincolnshire," is one of the best examples of this artist. There is an admirable J. S. Cotman (No. 29) and drawings by Hine which seem once more to prove, as we have before pointed out, that very few English water-colour painters had his knowledge and superb ability. He painted the English Downs as no painters before or since have realized them.

The collection of water-colour drawings by Reginald Jones entitled "Summer Sun and Autumn Haze," now at the Continental Gallery, is not so evenly good as his last exhibition; but the larger drawings are good examples of the individuality of his method and his realization of the value of "breadth." An artist to whom breadth would add much interest is Miss Rosa Wallis, a sister of the energetic curator of the Birmingham Corporation Art Galleries, who promises to exhibit a collection of water-colour drawings at the Graves Galleries on March 11. Miss Wallis, who has painted on the Italian lakes, in Rome, and Venice, and in the smaller towns of Italy, has chosen most of her subjects in the Gardens of Italy in the early spring, during the gorgeous but treacherous summer, and in the autumn when the vineyards are laden with purple fruit.

It is understood that M. de Saulles will model the effigy of King Edward VII. for the new coinage. There will be some feeling of regret that the work has not been entrusted to Mr. Alfred Gilbert.

The receiving days for the Royal Academy summer exhibition are—for water-colours, miniatures, black and white and architectural drawings, Friday, March 29; for oil paintings, March 30 and April 1; and for sculpture, April 2. Forms and labels can be obtained from the Academy during the month of March on receipt of a stamped and directed envelope. There will be no Academy dinner this year.

Mr. J. Ernest Phythian's bold attempt to sketch THE STORY OF ART IN THE BRITISH ISLES (Newnes, 1s.) seems to us surprisingly successful. A great portion of it is devoted to architecture—and justly, for it is here, if anywhere, that British art has asserted its individuality, and it is a subject of the widest interest to all. But all the leading events in the history of painting in England are sketched with a detail and an interest one seldom sees in a small handbook.

FICTION.

Whilomville Stories and Others.

The late Mr. Stephen Crane's talents and literary adaptability were so great that it is no wonder that the magic and, from a writer's point of view, dangerous world of child-life should have attracted his attention. In some of the stories contained in THE MONSTER (Harpers, 5s.) and in the collection entitled WHILOMVILLE STORIES (Harpers, 5s.) Mr. Crane appears to us to essay a picture of child-life that, among many, Mr. Kenneth Grahame alone has fully succeeded in giving us. Of course any book by the writer of "Maggie" is full of acute insight. But the children of Whilomville refuse to live for us; their pranks and sorrows and passions leave us cold. The world of "The Golden Age" is open to the few, and Mr. Crane with all his gifts had not the key for its unlocking. There is humour in the doings of "The Angel-Child"; there is amusement in "Lynx Hunting"; there is keen insight and some pretty analysis in "Shame," but the spirit of youth, the grace of life's beginning, the exquisite pathos of, say, "The Roman Road," or the joyousness and mystery of Stevenson's "Lantern Bearers," these things are lacking. Mr. Swinburne once said that "the art of writing adequately and acceptably about children is among the rarest and most precious of all arts," and Mr. Stephen Crane could not command the gift at will. Yet there is much that calls for praise. His sketches of American parents, his portraits of coloured servants, his cunning in weaving the little stories are all remarkable. The illustrator of the "Whilomville Stories," Mr. Peter Newell, gives admirable drawings of just the children the author seems to have intended. The book as a whole is worthy of a place among the most successful of the failures to depict the world of child-life. In "The Monster and Other Stories" Mr. Crane carries his attempts in Whilomville studies a little further. The eponymous personage of the first story is not a child but a coloured servant who, out of love for his master's little boy, tries to save him from a fire and is terribly burnt in the attempt. He is preserved in life, but without brain or features, by the boy's father, a doctor of great skill; but his preservation leads to tragic issues. The story is told with the graphic touches which were Mr. Crane's great gift; but it is painful in the extreme, and all the more so on account of its vivid detail. It is written in the American language; for example, when some one tells a barber to cease talking and go on with his work Mr. Crane writes, "Instead, Reifsnnyder paused shaving entirely, and turned to front the speaker." But these things are on the surface; beneath, there are heart and strength and tragedy and a remarkable gift of observation. Some other stories in this volume deal with the histories of children, but so weird a piece of work as "The Blue Hotel" and so queer a one as "An Illusion in Red and White" are far more representative of the power and genius of the author of "The Red Badge of Courage" than, say, "His New Mittens" or the main portion of the "Whilomville Stories." These two books can hardly be said to add to the fame of Mr. Crane, but they contain work of interest and are worthy of his renown.

A Northern Garden.

"North was the Garden," quotes Mrs. C. L. Antrobus as the motto of her excellent story QUALITY CORNER (Chatto, 6s.) in which she captures much of the charm of that northern garden at Ringway, where the people are a sturdy race, not rural, but quiet, stolid, with slow fire in their veins. Ringway shows "a curious goblin beauty of sudden lights and transient showers, of blooms, of quick sparkling soft colouring, of deep green moss, and ashen-grey lichen and blue mist—a dusky Arcadia." Here, where the strong west wind blows up from the Irish Sea, there are many old-world influences at work. The people grow uneasy about ghosts and witches, and second sight, and they combine with this touch of mysticism a northern shrewdness that does not wholly please the stranger in Arcadia. Mrs. Antrobus has already won a considerable following by her story of Lancashire life,

"Wildersmoor," and her new story will grapple her readers to her with hooks of steel. For, from beginning to end, one traces with increasing appreciation the delicacy and firmness of her work, her wide sympathy and quick instinct, her acute observation and agreeable culture—one realizes with gratitude that a novelist of no small power is giving us of her best. We can recommend this book with an unusual certainty of pleasing our readers—and those of Mrs. Antrobus.

PECCA VI, by E. W. Hornung (Grant Richards, 6s.), is a striking and uncommon novel in its treatment of a situation not altogether new. From "The Scarlet Letter" to "The Silence of Dean Maitland" (to bracket great things with small), the clergyman whose life contains a guilty secret has been a favourite central figure for the novelist. The splendid sinner in "Peccavi" carries all sympathies with him, right through to the tragic end. His wrong-doing may have been immense, lacking as it did even the supreme excuse of love; but his reparation is so untiring, so brave and uncomplaining, that the reader feels, with the sympathetic Bishop of the story, that atonement has been magnificently made. We prefer this book to any of its author's previous work.

THE MASTER SINNER (John Long, 3s. 6d.) is not, as might be inferred from its dedication to "those inspired persons who quarrel amongst themselves whilst instructing the world by means of Religious novels," a satire on "The Master Christian." It is in fact a religious novel itself, though of rather an original kind. The ruler of hell—this is the teaching of "A well-known author," who is responsible for "The Master Sinner"—is a more merciful being than the ruler of heaven, and he admits into his "shining portals" all who have not committed certain "tabulated sins." Anthony Grigg, who learns all this by means of communications sent him by a deceased friend, finds at last that he has committed one of the tabulated sins, and is debarred from both heaven and hell. The story is narrated with some power and originality, but its teaching is hardly of the kind to appeal to the public interested in religious fiction.

TRINITY BELLS (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) chime sweetly in obedience to the touch of Mrs. Amelia E. Barr. Her theme is slight, but her treatment of it is dainty to a delightful degree, with a charming series of pictures of life in New York round about the year 1800. The reader will love the characters and really understand their surroundings, so deft is Mrs. Barr's workmanship; and, whether the reader be a good little girl—if such a person has survived into this new century—or a big bad man, the book will be laid aside with regret. The illustrations are excellent and admirably in keeping with the spirit of the story.

HATE, THE DESTROYER (Ward, Lock, 4s. 6d.), is, of course, blood-thirsty, and meant for those who love to sup on horrors. Its hero, Edward Calvert, together with the villain, Robert Tangye, discovers platinum mines in Central Asia. The villain smites the hero over the head, and returns to England to pose as the prosperous platinum king. But Calvert is by no means so dead as Tangye believed, and, armed with various aliases and diabolic cunning, he pursues the villain with a lust of vengeance that would satisfy the author of "L'Auberge Maudite." We can hardly rejoice in the story of this sin-stained avenger of his own wrongs, despite the relief afforded by flirtations between medical students and lodging-house young ladies.

Mr. Claude Bray's new novel, A CUIRASSIER OF ARRAN'S (Sands, 6s.), is a good enough example of the historical romance, recalling memories of many earlier adventures in the same field. It is concerned with the days of the second James, but Mr. Bray has nobly resisted the temptation of Monmouth's rising, and we are spared Sedgemoor. Mr. Scrope, the young officer in Arran's whose adventures form the groundwork of the story, has a perhaps unavoidable resemblance to the creations of Messrs. Stanley Weyman and Anthony Hope—but yet he has an individuality of his own. James himself is handled more tenderly than usual, and even Jeffreys seems to have something of the glamour bestowed upon him by Mr. H. B. Irving. Sunderland, on the other hand, is not spared. There is plenty of action in the story, which is brightly written throughout.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

The article in the Monthly Review which we like best is Mr. Arthur Symonds' "A Study at Toledo." Mr. Symonds writes this sort of travel article better than any one else—possibly better even than the late John Addington Symonds. Those, however, who prefer more actual articles will find plenty. Admiral Fremantle criticizes the articles of Lieutenant Bellairs on "The Training of Naval Officers." His view is that the cry against theoretical or academic training is not justified, and that "as a rule the best educated and most intelligent man will be the best officer." Writing of "Trade and the Siberian Railway," Mr. Alexander Kinloch maintains that "the impetus required by Siberia would carry her exactly in the direction most closely parallel to the course of British trade instincts and interests." "The Evolution of the Boer," by Poultney Bigelow, is a discursive historical paper, containing one notable statement throwing light upon the value and extent of Continental sympathy with the burghers. "A learned German official recently justified the exclusion of Boers from German West Africa on the ground that Germans should reserve that country for people who spoke German, that it would be a national disgrace if the next generation should speak Dutch!" "Two Poets of the New Century," by R. A. Streatfeild, is a survey of the work of Mr. Stephen Phillips and Mr. Binyon. Mr. Streatfeild suspects, though he is not sure, that Mr. Binyon "is destined to be the leader of a new movement in English poetry," and is quite sure that "he is a poet of the kind to which fame comes slowly but surely." Mr. Arthur J. Evans' article on "The Palace of Minos" is illustrated. The poem is by Mr. George Meredith, the first lines running:—

Or shall we run with Artemis,
Or yield the breast to Aphrodite?
Both are mighty;
Both give bliss;
Each can torture if derided;
Each claims worship undivided,
In her wake would have us wallow.

Cornhill is very readable. An account of hospital work in the great Civil War, by Mr. C. H. Firth, is timely and authoritative; so is Mr. Fuller Maitland's criticism of Sir Arthur Sullivan. A C.I.V.'s discovery of a bundle of Boer war bulletins is of the utmost interest, and shows that the Boers kept to the truth—perhaps more than we did. Modern life in suburban London and in a provincial town (Manchester) are dealt with in excellent style in second instalments respectively of "A Londoner's Log Book," and of the "Provincial Letters," which our entertaining friend Urbanus Sylvan is now writing. We are very glad of Mr. G. S. Street's apologia of Anthony Trollope—that true social historian. This Cornhill is, in fact, an exceptionally good number.

Another C.I.V. relates his experiences vividly in Macmillan's, which also has a very interesting story of a breakfast with Lord Lytton, who said, by the way, that he "loved Dickens." Sir Courtenay Boyle passes in review a good many new words, as to which every one is sure to differ. He "has sometimes thought" that the Royal Society might periodically issue sheets of allowable words. We are sorry he was not successful in getting the unit of supply of electrical energy adopted in Acts of Parliament called a "kelvin." There are other articles connected with Queen Victoria and the King.

One can realize the importance of "Bridge" without being a player when one finds it the subject of a discreet and sober article in Blackwood. The war is the subject of no less than three articles. The most notable of them—on "The War Despatches"—will not be agreeable reading for everybody. Sir Henry Craik's History of Scotland is reviewed, and there are some strongly Protestant remarks about the coronation oath. It is an oath, the writer thinks, which "we may read with pleasure." "Victoria R. et I." is an anonymous article evidently written with intimate personal knowledge. A story of her late Majesty's shyness may be quoted. A faithful and most devoted subject of the Queen relates the following incident:—

The first of her Majesty's appearances at any public function after the death of the Prince Consort was when she laid the foundation stone of St. Thomas's Hospital. Next day I had an interview with her at Windsor. She asked me whether she had shown any symptoms of agitation or nervousness. I answered, "None." Upon which the Queen said: "I am so glad. The truth is I was shaking down to the soles of my feet." At that time I had become so familiar with the expression of her Majesty's face that I could read in it at the Hospital the strong constraint she was using to maintain her self-command.

In Longman's Magazine Mr. C. L. H. Dempster gives, apropos of Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon," a graphic description of Bonaparte's landing in the south of France after escaping from Elba. The story is gathered, as Mr. Dempster phrases it, "from the lips of spectators or from their children." The encounter with the Prince of Monaco on the beach at Antibes is characteristic:—

The Emperor had caused all horses to be requisitioned for his guns, yet the Prince of Monaco's courier had already bespoken what was required to take his master on to Nice. The high contending powers met on the beach. "Ou allez-vous?" said Napoleon gruffly. "Chez moi," was the curt reply of the ruler of the smallest kingdom of the world. "Et moi aussi," said the Emperor.

Another witness told Mr. Dempster how a certain Corsican who owed Napoleon a grudge nearly saved the allies the trouble of Waterloo by shooting his enemy on the beach. Here is another reminiscence:—

When Napoleon reached Grasse he was placed on a sort of throne made of saddles and haversacks, and he breakfasted with gusto and gaiety. He stood up, stretched out his hands: "Le beau pays!" he exclaimed; and then went on to say that, even if Grenoble and Paris did not receive him well, he should be quite happy if permitted to spend his remaining years here, and "to die here," he added; "for there, to the right, lies Toulon, where my early laurels were reaped, and there lies Corsica, the country of my mother, the land where I first saw the light."

Mrs. Percy Frankland discusses the power of salt to fight against bacteria, and under "At the Sign of the Ship" Mr. Andrew Lang writes sympathetically of the late Mr. Myers.

Mrs. Emil Luden's interview with Mr. Kruger in the Pall Mall Magazine has been so extensively quoted that we need do no more than say that it is certainly worth reading. The same magazine has secured the article which Sir Robert Ball was bound to write on the subject of "Signalling to Mars," and also a story by Mr. Frederick Wedmore. There is also a brace of poems by the writer of "An Englishwoman's Love Letters." The last poems published under that signature were considered by some critics to point, by internal evidence, to the authorship of Mr. Henry Newbolt. The ones before us certainly do not. For readers who are indifferent alike to literature and to epoch making events there is an article on "Men's Dress," by Colonel Newnham Davis, who establishes the awe-inspiring conclusion that "your well-dressed man spends over £400 on his first purchases and requires an allowance of at least £120 a year to maintain his wardrobe in order." Sir Herbert Maxwell has a good and well-illustrated article on Queen Victoria, and the Duke of Argyll contributes some verses headed "2nd February, 1901." We miss Mr. Sambourne's capital design on the cover.

The Imperial and Colonial Magazine for February appeared towards the end of the month. It has an excellent programme of contributors—Mr. Henniker Heaton on Imperial Communications, Sir John Cockburn on the prospects of Australian Federation, Professor R. Dutt on Indian Famines, Mrs. Evelyn Cecil on her tour in Rhodesia, Lady Jeune on Queen Victoria, and so on. The articles are comparatively brief; but it is an attractive publication, with good "Current News and Notes."

The Argosy publishes a memorial number in which all the articles survey and summarize some aspect of "the reign of woman under Queen Victoria"—"The reign of fashion," "Nursing," &c., and there is a poem by Mr. Herbert Morrah. The pictures, both old and new, are interesting, well selected, and admirably reproduced, and the issue is a great artistic success.

A new sixpenny monthly published by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall and Co., and edited by Mrs. Stuart Erskine and R. J. Richardson—the Kensington—is an agreeable creation of large quarto size, and a print clear but not pompous. It touches all the arts, including drama, gives a side glance at literature, and has a page about "local matters in Kensington." It is well illustrated, and notices foreign art every month. Another good feature is announced, "There will be no interviews."

Correspondence.

THE PROBLEM NOVEL.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Allow me to enter a protest against this modern evolution as being hysterical, unreal, and calculated to corrupt. I thought that the coup de grace had been dealt to that type of anti-ethical dramatic narration in the severe handling which Mr. Grant Allen's "Woman Who Did" received from the critics; but, it seems, folly, like superstition, dies hard, and occasionally we have to witness the recrudescence of the same moral epidemic. The latest is perhaps less objectionable than poor Grant Allen's masterpiece (?); yet as regards false sentiment Mr. Compton Reade's "Aftertaste" runs him hard. The moral, if it be a moral, of the book would appear to be sound enough—viz., that it is perilous to a girl's peace of mind to marry for any other cause than sincere affection; but is it worth while from an ethical standpoint to trace step by step the corruption of a pure woman? I venture to think not. Mr. Compton Reade may plead, fairly, that he has gone out of his way to paint error in painful, and, indeed, repulsive, colours, while "the woman taken in adultery" pays an awful penalty for her sin; and I will do him the justice to say that he has not, as was the case in the "Woman Who Did," placed a premium on a violation of the ordinary rule which governs the relations of the sexes. But why sink to the level of French fiction? Why constitute adultery the climax, and repentance plus retribution the anticlimax? Alphonse Daudet lamented in his last days that the seventh commandment formed the sole basis of French dramatic narration. Have we descended to that bathos? I should hope not, for truly the aftertaste of conjugal infidelity must be bitter, and it is bad not to make the heroine the villain.

Yours faithfully,

A. W. EMLYN.

77, Park-road, West Dulwich, S.E.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your note on the split infinitive a week or two back you rightly remark that it is hard to demonstrate its incorrectness. You point out that, while the phrase "to have entirely subdued the Boers" is allowed, the phrase "to entirely subdue" raises the indignation of the stylist. In his letter to you last week "E. D. L." tries to account for this anomaly by asserting that there is no trace of the split infinitive in the phrase "to have entirely subdued." "The virtue," he says, "and compactness of the infinitive, which lie wholly in the auxiliary, are no more affected by the severance of the participle than the virtue of the indicative by the same severance in the English 'I was quickly recognized,' or the still wider severance in the Latin 'Sum cito vestris cognitus.'"

The soundness of this statement seems to me to depend on the question whether the virtue and compactness of the infinitive, as "E. D. L." somewhat vaguely calls it, do really lie wholly in the auxiliary. If this is so, the important word "subdued" must be considered as not belonging to the infinitive. But in the phrase "to have entirely subdued" the word "subdued" is just as much a part of the infinitive or, to use "E. D. L.'s" phrase, contributes as much to the "virtue" of the infinitive as the word "subdue" in the phrase "to entirely subdue." As a matter of fact, in both cases, the infinitive is broken in upon by the word "entirely." Both phrases are therefore, as you imply, examples of the "split infinitive," and "E. D. L.'s" attempted explanation does not, as far as I can see, explain the anomaly that one of these phrases is allowed, while the other is not.

On another point "E. D. L.'s" letter seems to be open to criticism. In defence of the split infinitive you suggested that the phrase "I ask you kindly to clear out" is really ambiguous. "Grammarians" points out that the split infinitive might make it clear that the kindness is in the clearing out and not in the asking. "E. D. L." objects that the ambiguity of the first phrase "I ask you kindly to clear out" could be removed, "if competently spoken." Surely a phrase which is clear when written as well as when spoken is better than a phrase which is only clear when spoken. Surely, therefore, "I ask you to kindly clear out" is better than "I ask you kindly to clear out." Long live the split infinitive!

HAIR SPLITTER.

February 26, 1901.

DECADENT METRES.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Art is long, arguments are sometimes longer, and life is short; yet must I ask the favour of being once more, and the last time, allowed to pay my respects to Mr. Charles Camp Tarelli. I now recognize the fact that he and I are of distinctly opposite schools in this matter. He is apparently of that class which would think no more of a carpenter who made an excellent dining-table of 12ft. by 6ft. in a room but 1ft. larger each way, than they would of one who produced an article no better from a workshop twice its size. To my thinking it is a piece of marked injustice to allow one man double the licence used by another, then judge their work of equal merit. Mr. Tarelli and I are evidently dear antagonists who would fight week-in, week-out over our moot point, yet, I trust, never be the worse friends—nor perhaps be any the better off. He says that the terms used in classic prosody will not apply in English. Again we have here a matter of opinion over which it were as wise to fight as it would be to quarrel about the religion of the Martians—if Martians there be. Yet "A thousand rugged feet I stand above" is surely iambic pentameter. So, too, will the other three metres which I instanced apply to English prosody. Thus I bid him "Good-bye" on this subject, and thank you for the space so kindly allowed me.

I am, Sir, very truly yours.

J. E. PATTERSON.

VICTOR HUGO.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Speaking of Victor Hugo in your last issue, page 132, you say that his eldest daughter Adèle is now the only surviving of his children. This is a slight error. Adèle is the youngest. Her elder sister was Leopoldine who had married Charles Vacquerie (the brother of the well-known Auguste), and who died with her husband in so tragic a manner through a boat accident, soon after their marriage, during a sea promenade near Havre in 1843.

I am, Sir, yours truly.

February 26, 1901.

ALF. HAMONET.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Messrs. Methuen are starting their Spring season in earnest, and publishing a good many new books—which are included in our list of "Books to look out for at once"—before the end of next week. Captain Biss' history of "The Relief of Kumassi" differs from Lady Hodgson's book in that it is written by an officer who was with the relief force; and it tells not only of the siege, but of the advance and triumphant return of Sir James Willecocks. Sir T. Hungerford Holdich's volume on "The Indian Borderland" contains a personal record of the various expeditions of the last twenty years. There are many other announcements, including "The Real Chinese Question," by Chester Holcombe; "The Life of Mrs. Lynn Linton," by G. S. Layard; "The Last of the Great Scouts (Buffalo Bill)," by his sister, Mrs. Wetmore; "A History of the Jesuits in England," by E. L. Taunton; "Reminiscences of Brother Musicians," by Constance Bache; "The English Turf," by Charles Richardson, and "Lyra Apostolica" (in the Library of Devotion), with an introduction by Canon Scott Holland and notes by the Rev. H. C. Beeching. The next volumes in Methuen's Standard Library will be White's "Selborne," edited by Professor Louis Miall and the Rev. W. Warde Fowler; and Swift's

"Journal to Stella," edited by G. A. Aitken. "The Life of Savonarola," by E. L. Horsburgh, is to be the next volume in the Little Biographies Series; and "King Lear," edited by W. J. Craig, the next volume in the new edition of Shakespeare. The Little Library will include "Selections from Wordsworth," edited by Nowell C. Smith; "The Purgatorio of Dante," translated by H. F. Cary and edited by Paget Toynbee; "Selections from the Poems of William Blake," edited by T. Perugini; and "Lavengro," edited by F. Hindes Groome.

Messrs. Blackwood's spring list is strong in military books. Perhaps the most important is Colonel R. H. Vetch's "Life, Letters, and Diaries of Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham"—the Crimean hero and commander of the Suakin expedition, 1884, and friend of Gordon—who died in December, 1899. Colonel Vetch is himself an old officer of the Royal Engineers—he edited the R.E. Journal from 1877 to 1884 and the Professional Papers of the corps during the same period. The career of another distinguished R.E. officer is told in "The Life of Major-General Sir Murdoch Smith," by his son-in-law, William Kirk Dickson. Sir Robert Smith was an authority on Persian antiquities, and some of the acquisitions of his adventurous expeditions are at the British Museum and South Kensington. He was Director of the Edinburgh Museum of Science and Art, and died in July last. There are two volumes of biographies of Anglo-Indian officers in Messrs. Blackwood's list, one being "Sepoy Generals: Wellington to Roberts," by Mr. G. W. Forrest, C.I.E., of the India Office, and the other the life of Hodson, of Hodson's Horse, entitled "A Leader of Light Horse," written by Captain L. J. Trotter, the author of the "Life of John Nicholson." Another military biography in preparation is an illustrated memoir of Lieutenant Colonel Thomas A. Freeman. Messrs. Blackwood also announce a volume entitled "Essays: Descriptive and Biographical," by Grace, Lady Prestwich, widow of Professor Joseph Prestwich. A memoir of Lady Prestwich by her sister, Louisa E. Milne, is included. Another volume of essays by Dr. William Macintosh, entitled "Rabbi Jesus: Sage and Saviour," is adapted for Confirmation classes. Messrs. Blackwood's new library edition of George Eliot, to be published in monthly volumes, beginning in April, has as a special feature photogravure frontispieces by William Hatherall, Edgar Bundy, Byam Shaw, A. A. Van Anrooy, and Maurice Greiffenhagen. A "George Eliot Reader," by Elizabeth Lee, is also announced. Two volumes of "Selections from the Writings of Sir Charles Murray" are in preparation, edited by his wife, and new editions of his "Travels in North America" and his Egyptian tale, entitled "Hassan; or, The Child of the Pyramid." Then there are to be cheap reissues of the "Philosophical Classics for English Readers," edited by Professor William Knight, and Kinglake's "Crimea," both to begin this month. Among Messrs. Blackwood's novels are "Doorn Castle: A Romance," by Neil Munro; "The Warden of the Marches," by Sydney C. Grier; "Harlaw of Sandle," by John W. Graham; "Mountains of Necessity," by Hester White; "The Extermination of Love"—"a fragmentary study in erotics"—by E. Gerard (Mme. de Laszowska). Two cricketing books are Mr. W. J. Ford's "A History of Cambridge University Cricket Club" and a sixpenny edition of Prince Ranjitsinhji's "Jubilee Book of Cricket."

Mr. Grant Richards has issued one of the longest lists of the season. It includes two books by Mr. A. Stodart-Walker—one being "Robert Buchanan: The Poet of Modern Revolt," and the other an edition of "The Day Book of John Stuart Blackie." Mr. Aylmer Maude has another Tolstoy volume—a collection of essays under the title of "Tolstoy and his Problems"; Mr. W. J. Stillman two volumes of reminiscences, entitled "The Autobiography of a Journalist"; Baron Corvo, "Chronicles of the House of Borgia"; George Paston, "Little Memoirs of the Eighteenth Century"; Captain Alfred Hutton, "The Sword and the Centuries; or Old Sword Days and Old Sword Ways"; Mr. Arthur Lazenby Liberty, "Springtime in the Basque Mountains"; and Mr. Eustace H. Miles—escaping from his books on sport and training—"A History of Rome," arranged for the Universities or the higher forms of schools, and for the Civil Service examinations. "The Further Memoirs of Marie Bashkirtseff," and selections from Nietzsche's works entitled "Nietzsche as Critic, Philosopher, Poet, and Prophet"—compiled by Mr. Thomas Common—are other items in the list, in which, too, Grant Allen again figures, with "Country and Town in England: With a Chronicle of Churnside," containing an introduction by Professor York Powell. In fiction, Mr. Grant Richards is publishing "The Fall of the Curtain," by Mr. Harold Begbie—also down in the list as joint author with "F. C. G." of a companion volume to their "Political Struwwelpeter," entitled "Great Men"—"Rosa Amorosa: The Love Letter of a Woman," by George Egerton; "The Lord of the Sea," by M. P. Shiel; "In the Shadow of Guilt," by Marie Connor and Robert Leighton; and other novels—besides "A Practical Guide to the Art of Fiction" in the "How To" Series. In patriotic, sporting, and general literature the list includes "The Briton's First Duty: A Plea for Conscription," by George F. Shee; "Wrecking the Empire," by J. M. Robertson; "Patriotism and Ethics," by J. G. Godard; "The Psychology of Jingoism," by J. A. Hobson; "How Sailors Fight: An Account of the Organization of the British Fleet in Peace and War," by John Blake; "Sea and Coast Fishing," by F. G. Affalo; "From Gladiator to Persimmon: Turf Memoirs for Thirty Years," by Sydenham Dixon ("Vigilant" of the Sportsman); "The British Thoroughbred Horse: His History and Breeding, together with an Exposition of the Figure System," by W. Allison; and "Trusts and the State," by Henry Macrosty (Fabian Series, No. 1.).

At the end of March Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. will publish Max Pemberton's novel "Pro Patria." Within the next month or so they will publish a romance of the days of Queen Mary by Joseph Hocking, entitled "Lest We Forget"—in which, for the time being, he abandons controversial topics; "My Indian Queen," by Guy Boothby; "A Race with the Sun," by L. T. Meade; "Edward Blake: College Student," by Charles M. Sheldon—his first story since the "boom" in his Kansas sermon-tales; "Dinah Kellow," by Christopher Hare; "The World's Finger," by T. W. Hanshaw—his first book to be published in this country; and "A Bear Squeeze," by M. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C. To their new Minerva Library Messrs. Ward, Lock are adding "Sartor Resartus" and "Society in China," by R. K. Douglas; to their "Youth's Library" three books by R. M. Ballantyne—"The Coral Island," "Ungava," and "Martin Rattler"—which are just out of copyright, and are also to be issued by the same publishers in sixpenny and shilling form; and to their new series of sixpenny novels "The Crime and the Criminal," by Richard Marsh; "A Gentleman's Gentleman," by Max Pemberton; "Mr. Witt's Widow," by Anthony Hope; and "Pharos, the Egyptian," by Guy Boothby.

The most important item in Messrs. Nisbet's new list is Major Martin Hume's "Treason and Plot: Catholics and Protestants in the last years of Queen Elizabeth." It was only last week that we announced another work by Major Hume, a history of "The Spanish People," to be published by Messrs. Pearson next month as the first volume in their "Great Peoples Series." The latest book recounts, with the help of new material, the final struggle for Catholic supremacy in England. Another historical work announced by Messrs. Nisbet is entitled "Bolingbroke: A Study and a Vindication," by Walter Sichel, a work of original research in which Mr. Sichel replies to Mr. Leslie Stephen's criticism of Bolingbroke's philosophy. The list also includes "Italy To-Day: A Study of her Politics, her Position, her Society, and her Letters," by Bolton King—whose "History of Italian Unity" was also published by Messrs. Nisbet and still has a steady sale—and W. Okey; and "The Social Problem: Work and Life," by J. A. Hobson, whose volume on Ruskin as a social reformer was issued by the same firm. In theology there is to be a new volume in Nisbet's Church of England Handbooks—"The Position of the Evangelical School in the Nineteenth Century"—by Dr. Handley Moule, and a little book by the Rev. Andrew Murray entitled "Working for God," a sequel to "Waiting for God."

Mr. William Westall, besides his new novel, "Don or Devil," to be published by Messrs. Pearson next month, is bringing out another tale with Messrs. Chatto and Windus, entitled "Her Ladyship's Secret." Messrs. Chatto will also issue Mr. David Christie Murray's new novel, "The Church of Humanity," next Thursday, and for the 21st inst. they promise volumes three and four of "A History of the Four Georges and of William the Fourth," by Justin McCarthy and Justin Huntly McCarthy. Mr. Justin McCarthy is now writing a history of the reign of Queen Anne, so that, when this work is finished, he will have produced a history of England from the period at which Macaulay's work leaves off down to the closing years of the Victorian Era. His new novel, "Mononia: A Love Story of 'Forty-eight,'" will be published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus on April 3. About a fortnight later they will bring out

Mr. Ernest Vizetelly's translation of Zola's "Work." Their new list also announces another volume of South Sea stories by "Sundowner," entitled "Told by the Taffrail," and a new book by Max O'Rell—"Her Royal Highness Woman."

In Law, Messrs. Macmillan (most of whose announcements we gave last week) announce "Lectures Illustrating the Changes in the English Law during the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. Blake Odgers; and in Politics, a translation in two volumes of M. Ostrogorski's "Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties," by Frederick Clarke, formerly Taylorian Scholar in the University of Oxford—with an introduction by Mr. James Bryce. Other new volumes will be a collection of papers by the late Dr. John Richard Green entitled "Oxford in the Eighteenth Century" (the most of which appeared in "The Oxford Chronicle," and are now republished under Mr. Green's supervision), and "The Problem of Conduct," by Alfred E. Taylor, which won the Greek Moral Philosophy Prize for 1899, though it opposes Green's view that ethics rest upon a metaphysical basis.

Books to look out for at once.

- POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES—
 "Anni Fugaces: A Book of Verse, with Cambridge Interludes." By R. C. Lehmann. Lane. 3s. 6d. net.
 "Men and Letters." By Herbert Paul. Lane. 5s. net.
- THEOLOGY—
 "Unity in Christ, and Other Sermons." By Canon Armitage Robinson. Macmillan.
 "The Key of Knowledge: Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey." By Dr. W. G. Rutherford. Macmillan.
 "Philosophy of Religion in England and America." By Alfred Caldecott, D.D. Methuen. 10s. 6d.
 "The Soul's Pilgrimage." Devotional Readings from the Writings of George Body, D.D. By T. A. Burn. Methuen.
 "The Epistle of St. James." Ed. by H. W. Fulford. Methuen. 1s. 6d. net. ["The Churchman's Bible."]
- BIOGRAPHY—
 "Famous Englishmen." By J. Finemore. Black.
 "Alfred the Great." By W. H. Draper. E. Stock. 5s. [With an introduction by the Bishop of Hereford.]
 "Charles William Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick: a Study in the History of the Eighteenth Century." By Lord E. Fitzmaurice. Longmans.
- FICTION—
 "The Body of Death." By Adeline Sergeant. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
 "The Column: a Novel." By Charles Marriott. Lane. 6s.
 "What Men Call Love." By Lucas Cleeve. White. 6s.
 "The Midnight Passenger." By R. H. Savage. White. 6s.
 "The Girl at the Half-Way House." By E. Hough. Heinemann. 4s. [First volume in the new monthly series of American fiction, "The Dollar Library."]
 "Strange Happenings." By W. Clark Russell & Co. Methuen. 6s.
 "The Froshishers." By S. Baring-Gould. Methuen. 6s.
 "The Salvation Seekers." By Noel Ainslie. Methuen. 6s.
 "John Townley. A Tale for the Times." By R. Thynne. Drane. 6s.
 "The Shadow of Gilsland." By Morice Gerard. H. Marshall. 3s. 6d.
 "The Wings of the Morning." By Helen V. Savile. Sonnenschein. 3s. 6d.
 "The Church of Humanity." By D. C. Murray. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
 "The Banner of St. George." By M. Bramston. Duckworth. 3s. 6d. [A Tale of the Peasants' Revolt in Essex and Hertfordshire.]
- THE ARMY AND THE EMPIRE—
 "England's Danger: The Future of British Army Reform." By Theodor von Sonosky. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d.
 "Efficiency and Empire." By Arnold White. Methuen. 6s.
 "The Relief of Kumassi." By Captain H. C. J. Biss. Methuen. 6s.
 "The Indian Borderland: Being a Personal Record of Twenty Years." By Sir T. H. Holdich. 15s. net.
- TOPOGRAPHY AND ARCHITECTURE—
 "East London." By Sir Walter Besant. Chatto and Windus. 18s. [Uniform with "South London." Illustrated by Phil May, L. Raven Hill, and Joseph Pennell.]
 "The Monastery of Saint Luke of Stiris in Phocis and the Dependent Monastery of St. Nicolas in the Fields, near Skripou, in Boeotia." By R. W. Schultz and S. H. Barnsley. Macmillan. Three guineas net.
 "Dictionary of Architecture and Building." By Russell Sturgis. Macmillan. Vol. I., A-E. Illustrated.
 "Black Country Sketches." By Amy Lyons. Stock. 3s. 6d.
 "Shakespeare's Family." By Mrs. C. C. Stopes. Stock. 10s. 6d. net.
- SCIENCE AND EDUCATION—
 "Elements of Darwinism." By A. J. Ogilvy. Jarrold. 2s. 6d.
- GUIDE BOOKS—
 "Jerusalem: A Practical Guide to Jerusalem and its Environs." By E. A. Reynolds-Ball, F.R.G.S. Black. 2s. 6d.
 "The Churches of Chislehurst." By E. A. Webb. Allen. 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
- NEW EDITIONS—
 De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium Eater," with the essay on "Murder as a Fine Art"; "The English Mail Coach" and "The Spanish Military Nun." Ed. by A. W. Pollard. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net. ["Macmillan's 'Library of English Classics.'"]
 "The Methods of Ethics." Revised Edition. By the late Professor Henry Sidgwick. Macmillan.
 "Casa Guidi Windows." By Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Lane. 2s. net. ["Lover's Library."]

MISCELLANEOUS—

- "A Sack of Shakings." By F. T. Bullen. Pearson. 6s.
[Papers from the Spectator, &c.]
"Princes and Poisoners." By F. F. Brentano. Duckworth. 6s.
[Translated by George Maidment from Brentano's book of historic poisoning cases in "Le Drame des Poisons."]

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

- BIOGRAPHY.
Robert Louis Stevenson. By H. B. Baildon. 7½x5in., 244 pp. Chatto & Windus. 6s.
- CLASSICAL.
Myths of Greece Explained and Dated. By G. St. Clair. 2 vols. 8½x5½in., 797 pp. Williams & Norgate. 10s.
- DRAMA.
Japanese Plays and Play-fellows. By O. Edwards. 9x6in., 306 pp. Heinemann. 10s. n.
Not Set to Music Yet. By L. L. Haigh. 7½x5in., 58 pp. Liverpool. Booksellers Co. 1s. n.
- EDUCATIONAL.
Practical Organic Chemistry for Advanced Students. By J. B. C. Hen. 7x4½in., 284 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
Greek and Roman Mythology. By Prof. H. Stendring. Australasia, &c. By A. W. Jose. (Temple Primers.) 6x4in., 134+164 pp. Dent. 1s. n. each.
Cicero: Philippic II. (University Tutorial Series.) Ed. by A. H. Allcroft. 7x5in., 130 pp. Clive. 3s. 6d.
The Preceptor's Bookkeeping. By T. C. Jackson, LL.B. 7x5in., 173 pp. Clive. 1s. 6d.
Manual of Elementary Science. By R. A. Gregory and A. T. Simmons. 7x4½in., 429 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
- FICTION.
The New Master. By A. Gotsworthy. 7½x5in., 244 pp. Pearson. 3s. 6d.
The Master Passion. By Bessie Hatton. 7½x5in., 336 pp. Pearson. 6s.
The Day of Small Things. By Isabel Fry. 8x5½in., 228 pp. Unicorn Press. 5s. n.
The Black Tortoise. By F. Viller. 7½x5in., 282 pp. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.
The Blue Diamond. By L. T. Meade. 7½x5in., 347 pp. Chatto & Windus. 6s.
A Bicycle of Cathay. By F. R. Stockton. 7½x5in., 240 pp. Harper. 6s.
Tales of a Colporteur. By J. Macalister. 7½x5in., 144 pp. Stockwell. 2s. 6d.
Time's Fool. An English Idyll. 7½x5in., 278 pp. Edinburgh. Douglas. 6s.
Two Sides of a Question. By May Sinclair. 7½x5in., 332 pp. Constable. 6s.
That Sweet Enemy. By Katharine Tynan. 7½x5in., 326 pp. Constable. 6s.
The Sin of Jasper Standish. By "Rita." 7½x5in., 342 pp. Constable. 6s.
The Redemption of David Corson. By C. F. Goss. 7½x5in., 418 pp. Methuen. 6s.
In the Midst of Alarms. By Robert Barr. (The Novelist Series) 9x6in., 142 pp. Methuen. 6d.
A State Secret, and other Stories. By B. M. Croker. 7½x5in., 278 pp. Methuen. 3s. 6d.
A Narrow Way. By Mary Findlater. 7½x5in., 301 pp. Methuen. 6s.
The Royal Sisters. By J. Mathew. 7½x5in., 313 pp. J. Long. 6s.
Veronica Verdant. By Mina Sandeman. 7½x5in., 304 pp. J. Long. 6s.
Monique et Valentine. By Edmond Fazy. 7½x4½in., 310 pp. Paris. Ollendorff. Fr. 3.50.
La Cadette. By Marie Anne de Boet. Le Roi des Neiges. By Charles Foley. (Pour les Jeunes Filles.) Paris. Colin. Fr. 3.50. each.
- LAW.
The Law of Joint Stock Companies. By J. W. Smith, LL.D. 7x4½in., 237 pp. E. Wilson. 2s.
- LITERARY.
Scotts Essayists from Stirling to Stevenson. Ed. by O. Smeaton. 7x4½in., 292 pp. Walter Scott. 1s. 6d.
- MILITARY.
The Siege of Kumassi. By Lady Hodgson. 8½x5½in., 306 pp. Pearson. 21s.
Yeomanry, Cavalry, or Mounted Infantry? By L. Rolleston. 9x5½in., 35 pp. Smith, Elder. 1s. 6d.
The Regimental Records of the British Army. By J. S. Farmer. 8½x6½in., 238 pp. Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. n.
British Regiments in War and Peace. I. The Rifle Brigade. By W. Wood. 7½x5½in., 215 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.
- MISCELLANEOUS.
A Birthday Book. From the Writings of John Oliver Hobbes. Ed. by Zoe Procter. 7½x5½in., 256 pp. Lane. 3s. 6d. n.
- PHILOSOPHY.
Le Vocabulaire Philosophique. By Edmond Goblot. 7½x5in., 489 pp. Paris. Colin. Fr. 5.
- POETRY.
Vigil and Vision. By W. Phelps. The Bacchante, and other Poems. By W. Hogg. Rose Leaves from Philostratus, &c. By Percy Osborn. (The Unicorn Books of Verse, 6, 7, 8.) 6x5in. Unicorn Press. 2s. 6d. n. each.
Poems. By A. B. Thair. 7½x5in., 115 pp. Lane. 5s. n.
Town and Country Poems. By E. J. Legge. 7½x5½in., 102 pp. Nutt. 3s. 6d. n.
- POLITICAL.
Drifting. 7½x5in., 218 pp. Grant Richards. 2s. 6d.
The Expansion of Trade in China. By T. H. Whitehead. E. Wilson. 1s.
- REPRINTS.
Thomson's Poems. Ed. by W. Bayne. 5½x4½in., 286 pp. Walter Scott. 2s.
Pillars of Society. The League of Youth. A Doll's House. By Henrik Ibsen. Ed. by W. Archer. 7x5in. Walter Scott. 2s. 6d. each.
West African Studies. By Mary H. Kingsley. 8½x5½in., 507 pp. Macmillan. 7s. 6d.
The Yellow Danger. By M. P. Shiel. 8½x6in., 162 pp. Grant Richards. 6d.
Adam Bede. By George Eliot. (New Pocket Library.) 6x4in., 768 pp. Lane. 1s. 6d. n.
Emerson's Essays. 1st & 2nd Series. (Temple Classics.) 6x4in., 288+279 pp. Dent. 1s. 6d. n. each.
Pendennis. By W. M. Thackeray. (The Little Library.) 3 vols. 6x4in. Methuen. 4s. 6d. n.
- THEOLOGY.
Meditations on the Psalms Penitential. By the Author of "Meditations on the Psalms of the Little Office." 7½x5in., 153 pp. Sands. 2s. 6d. n.
Christian Egypt. Past, Present, and Future. By the Rev. M. Fowler. 8½x5½in., 319 pp. Church Newspaper Co. 6s.
Dissent in England. By H. H. Henson, B.D. 7½x5in., 119 pp. Rivington.
The Psalms of David. By W. B. Randolph. The Library of Devotion.) 6x4in., 313 pp. Methuen. 2s.
Richard Hooker on Confession and Absolution. Ed. by the Rev. J. Harding. 7½x5in., 141 pp. "Home Words" Pub. Co. 2s. 6d.
- TRAVEL.
First on the Antarctic Continent. By C. E. Borchgrevink, F.R.G.S. 8½x5½in., 333 pp. Newnes. 10s. 6d. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXXXIV.
By MAX FEIGL, Vienna.

BLACK. 11 Pieces.

WHITE. 10 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.PROBLEM No. CXXXV.
By K. ERLIN.

BLACK. 9 pieces.

WHITE. 7 pieces.
White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 136, by J. Perlis, Vienna. White (three pieces), K at K 5; B at Q sq; pawn at Q R 5. Black (five pieces) K at Q B 3; B at K R 2; pawns at Q 2, Q B 4, Q Kt 2. White to play and draw.

THE MONTE CARLO TOURNAMENT.—The following were leaders on Wednesday, before the final round:—Janowski, 9½; Schlechter and von Scheve, each 8½; Tschigorin, 9; Alapin, 7½; Blackburne and Gunsberg, each 6½; Mieses, 6.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem 122.—Wainwright (2) Q-B 6. No. 123.—Fritsch (3) Key Kt (R 7)—B 6. No. 124.—Black plays 1. R×Kt (best), and then if 2. P×R, Q-K B 2 and draws (stalemate or win is forced). No. 125.—Marik (2) R-Q 2. No. 126.—Stritecky (3) key Q-K Kt 8, followed by Kt-Kt 7 ch, or Kt-B 4 ch, or Kt-Kt 5 ch, &c. If 1. —, K-Q 3; 2. Q-Q 8 ch, &c. No. 127.—Kondelik (3), key 1. Q-K Kt 8, Q×Q; 2. K-B 7, &c. No. 128.—Kosek (3), 1. B-Q 4, P×P, 2. K-B 3, R-Kt 8; 3. Kt-B 2 ch, P×Kt; 4. K×P ch, R-Kt 7 ch; 5. B×R mate. No. 129.—Jespersen (3), 1. Q-K B 8, followed by 2. Q-B 5 ch, &c. If 1. —, B×Q; 2. Kt-B 3 ch, &c.

Correct Solvers are:—A. C. Waters (Bromley), Nos. 122, 124 to 129; J. D. Tucker (Leeds), 120 to 123, 125, 126, 129; W. M. Lane (Southampton), 122, 129; R. E. Frost (Vienna), 122, 127; W. J. L. M. (Hampstead), 122, 124, 129; Otto Würzburg (Grand Rapids), 114 to 121; S. L. Snellgrove, 120; Red Rook, 125, 130.

Notes by Solvers.—"No. 120 difficult, owing to the tempting try Q-K7."—J. D. Tucker. "In No. 122 there is a tremendous array of White force here, but no mystery whatever. The mate by moving K in answer to any move of a Black B or Kt (except B-K sq or B-Kt 3) is not merely obvious, but obtrusive."—A. C. W. [Problems are not constructed merely to present the one feature difficulty, which is very often only a minor point. Number of variations is a feature occasionally, and probably so here.—Chess Ed.] "No. 124 is not difficult as a problem (when it is known that Black can draw), but very charming as a specimen of actual play. Nos. 125 to 129 are all delightful specimens of the poetry of chess."—A. C. W.

GAME No. LXVI.—Sicilian Defence:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1. P-K 4	P-Q B 4	17. P×P	P×P
2. P-K 3	Kt-Q B 3	18. Kt-K 4	Kt×Kt
3. Kt-K B 3	P-K 3	19. B×Kt	P-B 4
4. P-Q 4	P×P	20. B×Kt	R×B
5. Kt×P	Kt-B 3	21. B×P	P-B 5
6. K Kt-Kt 5	B-Kt 5	22. P-B 3	P-Kt 5
7. P-Q R 3	B×Kt ch	23. Q-Q 2	Q-B 2
8. Kt×B	P-Q 4	24. P-K Kt 3	B-B 5
9. P×P	P×P	25. B×P	R×B
10. B-Q 3	Castles	26. P×R	Q-Q 2
11. Castles	B-Kt 5	27. R-K sq	P-Kt 5
12. P-B 3	P-K 3	28. P×P	R-Kt 3
13. B-K Kt 5	P-E R 3	29. P-B 5	R-E 2
14. B-R 4	P-K Kt 4	30. P-K Kt 4	Q-Q 3
15. B-B 2	R-Q B sq
16. P-B 4	P-Q 5

(a) Black seems to have erred in opening his K-side position with 14. P-K Kt 4. Of course, his ultimate defeat is largely a result of this risky move. Thus 30. P-K Kt 4 cannot well be replied to, for if rook moves, clearly Q-Kt 5 ch is fatal.

GAME No. LXVII. Played in Russia.

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
M. I. Tschigorin.	A. Gontscharov.	M. I. Tschigorin.	A. Gontscharov.
1. P-K 4	P-K 3	14. R-K 5	Q-K 2
2. P-Q 4	P-Q 4	15. Kt-Q 4	B-R 3
3. Kt-Q B 3	Kt-K B 3	16. Q-K 2	Q-Q 3
4. B-K Kt 5	P×P	17. Q-R-Q sq	R-Q 2
5. Kt×P	P-K 2	18. B-B 2	Q-B 2
6. Kt-K B 3	B-K 2	19. R-Q 3	Kt-Kt 5
7. B×Kt	Kt×B	20. B-K E 5	P-B 4
8. B-Q 3	P-Q B 4	21. Kt×K P	K R-K sq
9. Kt×P	B×Kt	22. Q-R-R 3	Kt-R 3
10. P×B	Q-R 5 ch	23. B×P	Kt×B
11. P-B 3	Q×P	24. B-P ch	K-Kt sq
12. Castles	Castles	25. Q-R 5	Kt-R 3
13. R-K sq	B-Q 2	26. R×Kt and wins.

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 177. SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	171, 172, 173
PERSONAL VIEWS—"The Age of Genius," by W. E. Garrett Fisher	174
APOCRYPHAL STORIES	174
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley.....	176
REVIEWS—
A Treasury of Irish Poetry in the English Tongue	177
Peerage and Family History	178
Shifting Scenes	179
The Sources and Literature of English History.....	179
Leading Documents of English History.....	179
Charles III. of Spain—Macaulay—Speeches of Oliver Cromwell—Egypt and the Hinterland—Christian Egypt—West African Studies—The Regimental Records of the British Army—Yeomanry Cavalry or Mounted Infantry?—The Rifle Brigade—Logs of the Great Sea Fights—The British Fleet: Is it Sufficient and Efficient?—In Nature's Workshop—Animals of Africa—Memoirs of Edward Hare—Occasional Essays on Native South Indian Life—St. Anthony of Padua—William Herschel and His Work—Commercial Federation and Colonial Trade Policy—In Tuscany—Vengeance as a Policy in Afrikanderland, &c. 180, 181, 182, 183, 184
The Life Romantic—A Missing Hero—The Royal Sisters—The Master Passion—The New Master—Driscoll, King of Scouts—A Boer of To-day—The Luck of Private Foster	184, 185
LIBRARY NOTES	185
AMONG THE MAGAZINES	185
OBITUARY—Mr. Frederick S. Ellis—Dr. W. Bright—Félix Gras	186
CORRESPONDENCE—"The Aftertaste" (Mr. Compton Read)—The SpMt Initiative.....	187, 188
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for ...	188, 189
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.....	190

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a Supplement containing a classified list of Publishers' Spring Announcements. The number will also contain an article on various books of memoirs which have just been published in Paris.

* * * *

It is more than six weeks since the nation went into mourning for Queen Victoria, and the rush of minor biographies has given place to more important announcements. We shall probably have to wait for particulars of an authoritative memoir; it was ten years after his death before the official biography of the Prince Consort appeared. Meantime, we are to have lives from Professor York Powell and the Duke of Argyll, besides Mr. Sidney Lee's for the "Dictionary of National Biography." Of The Times Life of Queen Victoria particulars will be given later. It will be an elaborately illustrated volume, and will be published by Messrs. Sampson Low. The cheaper edition of Mr. Holmes' biography, which Messrs. Longmans have ready, is, we understand, only waiting for King Edward's approval of the chapter bringing the record down to the end of the Queen's reign. A volume on "The Childhood of Queen Victoria," by Mrs. Gurney, is also announced by Messrs. Nisbet and Co. There was a fairly good market for the cheaper lives, although the supply soon overtook the demand. Nearly thirty of these volumes were issued in one week. The first part of Messrs. Cassell's serial "Life and Times of Queen Victoria" had to be reprinted five times, and they also exhausted several editions of Mrs. Oliphant's "Personal Sketch."

VOL. VIII. No. 10.

Mr. Stephen Phillips' Odyssey, to which we referred last week, will be produced by Mr. Beerbohm Tree at the end of next September. On the general subject of dramatizing Homer we make some remarks in another column. It is to be hoped that the poet will prevail upon Mr. Tree not to overlay his play with scenic furniture and unnecessary pageantry. Many people thought that the unnecessary comings and goings in Herod greatly lessened the effect of the drama. It is interesting to remember that the late Professor Warr founded a dramatic masque, which he called The Tale of Troy, upon certain episodes culled from the Iliad. Professor Warr's death, by the way, has put a stop, for the time being, to an attractive project in which he was interested. This was the proposed performance by the Benson Company of a cycle of Greek plays done into English, to have taken place during this year. We hope this very good idea will be carried into effect later on.

* * * *

"Obiter Dicta," from Mr. Birrell's Lecture on "Walter Bagehot" delivered at Leighton-house on Monday:—

He was like a man that made you free of his house, not like a tradesman handing you goods over the counter.

His writings were an armoury against fools and pompous persons.

A man may print his private thoughts, but he does not speak them.

There is more meat on Bagehot's bones than on those of any other writer, and a deft cook makes them into a hundred dishes.

He was one of those men whose remarks never seem to have been made before.

He did not exactly revere business, but he spoke of it and other mundane matters, like the House of Lords, with respect tempered with amusement.

* * * *

Mr. Andrew Lang has revived, in the March number of Longman's, the old query as to the authorship of the pentameter verse, Conscia lympha Deum vidit et erubuit.

The question is discussed by Malone in one of his notes on Boswell's "Johnson." In a conversation between the Doctor and Mr. Edwardes, the former reminded his friend of an incident when they were "drinking together at an alehouse near Pembroke-gate." "At that time you told me of the Eton boy who, when verses on our Saviour's turning water into wine were prescribed as an exercise, brought up a single line which was highly admired—

Vidit et erubuit lympha pudica Deum."

According to Malone, however, both Johnson's version and Mr. Lang's are at fault. The original appears in an epigram by Crashaw, published in his "Epigrammata Sacra" (Cambridge, 1634), and runs thus:—

Aquae in Vinum Versae.

Unde rubor vestris et non sua purpura lymphis?

Quae rosa mirantes tam nova mutat aquas?

Numen, convivae, praesens agnoscite numen,

Nympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit.

* * * *

The spring season promises to be full of Mary Stuart. Light will be thrown on the casket controversy in Mr. Lang's volume

"The Mystery of Mary Stuart," to be published by Messrs. Longmans, and a new work by Mr. Samuel Cowan, J.P., of the Perthshire Advertiser, entitled "Mary Queen of Scots, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters," to be published in two volumes by Messrs. Sampson Low. Several portraits of the Queen not hitherto published are included in these volumes. The illustrations in Mr. Lang's book will include photographs of the casket at Hamilton Place and facsimiles of handwriting bearing on the question of forgery. Another announcement relating to the Queen is the volume entitled "The Palaces, Prisons, and Resting Places of Mary Queen of Scots," by Mr. Michael M. Shoemaker, a limited edition of which will be published in London by Messrs. Virtue and Co., and another edition in Edinburgh by Mr. W. Brown. Mr. Shoemaker is an American whose object has been to illustrate a pilgrimage to every important place of residence or imprisonment of Mary Stuart, in France, Scotland, England. Mackie's similar work, published some fifty years ago, reproduced a few of the places in England, but none in France.

NAPOLÉON'S TOMB.

I leaned upon the circling balustrade,
Leaned and looked down on that ambitious stone
Within whose cold unmindful arms France laid
Her citizen who carved himself a throne;
And ceaseless, like a wounded creature's moan,
Rose the hushed voices of the crowd that swayed
With grating feet above that sheathed blade,
That vacant house of crumbling flesh and bone.

Then through the multitude that thronged the well
I passed, reflecting on great souls who toss
In childlike yearning after earthly dross;
And on mine eyes, like some lone sentinel,
Flashed the high altar, and the sunbeams fell
On the neglected Christ nailed drooping to His Cross.

HAROLD BEGBIE.

Mr. Herbert Vivian proposes to publish a "weekly" with the title of the Rambler, in continuation of Dr. Johnson's periodical—indeed, its first number will be number 209, if the hibernicism be permitted. It will be conducted on its old lines (though presumably the literary style will not be lavishly adhered to) and mainly old-world subjects will be chosen. Among the early contributors will be Mr. W. E. Henley.

The dispersal of a complete set of Vale Press publications on Saturday gives remarkable results. Excluding the Shakespeare plays and the Benvenuto Cellini, not yet completed, thirty-eight works have been issued from this press during the last seven years. The cost to original subscribers was £39 11s., yet the books at auction brought a total of no less than £112 9s. The most noteworthy appreciations include Mrs. Browning's "Sonnets from the Portuguese," 1897, from 6s. to £8; "Hero and Leander," 1894, from £1 15s. to £5 15s.; the "Queen of the Fishes," 1894, from 2gns. to £15 2s. 6d.; Ricketts' "Typographie," 1898, from 6s. to £2 10s.; the Lyrical Poems of Shelley, 1898, from 7s. to £3; and Keats' Poems, 1896, from £1 16s. to £6. The rise in Vale Press issues has been more rapid than that in Kelmscotts, but it is doubtful if it will be as well sustained. The Kelmscott Chaucer, sold last week for £80, has quadrupled its issue price.

Old fashioned book-collectors will be more interested in the fact that a Shakespeare Quarto realized almost twice as much as one has ever done before. A fine copy, with several of the forty leaves uncut, of Titus Andronicus, 1611, the second known edition, made the extraordinarily high price of £620. Leaving out of account the 1591 issue of "The Troublesome Raigne of King John," from which Shakespeare wrote his play about 1595, sold in the Spring of 1899 for £510, the previous record for a quarto, we fancy, was the £385 paid in 1890 for the fine Gaisford copy of The Merry Wives of Windsor, 1602. At George Daniel's sale, 1864, an example of The Merry Wives made 630 gns.; the Midsummer Night's Dream, 230 gns.; Much Ado About Nothing, 255 gns.; Richard II., 325 gns.; and Richard III., 335 gns.

The autobiography of a book is often more interesting than the book itself. Certainly it was its historical associations that fetched fifty-five shillings for the little dilapidated French Prayer-book sold at the same sale at Sotheby's last week. It was the pocket companion of an abbé who was confined in the Bastille during the Revolution for writing a pamphlet entitled "Sur l'avenir du Clergé." When the mob broke open the dungeons in 1789 the poor abbé was found in his cell, bed-ridden and paralysed. The book appears to have been brought away from the Bastille by a certain Charles Drouet, who gave it to M. Colmache. Carlyle himself was the next to own it, and it bears his autograph and 1850 as the date of receipt. In handling such a book as this one is tempted to wish for the power of clairvoyance, the second sight of an Adolphe Didier.

But to leave romance and come to heavy prices, among the more important items in Messrs. Sotheby's sale were some excellent copies of early English plays, besides the Titus Andronicus already mentioned, Pericles, third edition, 1619, went for £100; the Third Folio, a poor copy, £19 10s.; the Fourth Folio, a stained but otherwise good copy, £40; Philaster, first edition, £40 10s.; The Maid's Tragedy, first edition, £27; Epicæne, £10 5s. The prices paid for first editions of some modern English authors were fair—"The Ingoldsby Legends," £4 12s. 6d.; Blackmore, "Lorna Doone," £3 6s.; Lytton, "Sculpture," a presentation copy, £6; Byron, "Hours of Idleness," Newark, 1807, £3 10s.; Coleridge, "The Fall of Robespierre," £1 15s.; Congreve, "Incognita," £1 10s.; Beaconsfield, "The Revolutionary Epic," £9 9s.; Johnson, "Irene," £1 12s.; Lamb, "First Book of Poetry," £4 12s.; Meredith, "Richard Feverel," £2 3s. There was a long series of Stevensoniana, the following being the most noticeable:—"Intermittent Light for Lighthouses," £7 10s.; "Deacon Brodie," £10; "Beau Austin," £10 15s.; "Macaire," £4 15s.; "Father Damien" (1890), with two manuscript corrections, £27 5s.; "A Letter to Mr. Stevenson's Friends," £5; "The Graver and the Pen," £6 15s.; "Moral Emblems," £11 15s.; "The Pentland Rising," £6; "New Arabian Nights," £12 15s.; "An Object of Pity" and "Objects of Pity," £59. Kelmscott Press "Chaucer," £80; "The Golden Legend," £10 5s.; Shakespeare's "Poems, &c.," £14; "The Earthly Paradise," £23; "The Glittering Plain," (1891), £21; "The Order of Chivalry," vellum copy, £25; "Biblia Innocentium," £25 10s.; Vale Press, "Queen of the Fishes," £15 2s. 6d.; "Sonnets from the Portuguese," £8; "Keats," £6.

Among the other books were:—Conway, "Meditations and Prayers," 1571, £19; Corbet, "Certain Elegant Poems," 1647, £16; Edward Fitzgerald, "Polonius," £11 10s.; "Six Dramas of Calderon," £14; "The Mighty Magician," £30 10s.; Goldsmith, "The Deserted Village," first octavo edition, £25; Landor, "Gebir," £23; Herrick, "Hesperides," first edition, a stained copy, £56; Spenser, "The Faerie Queene," 1590, imperfect, £14 10s.; Robert Wier's print of the sermon by Erasmus on "The Marriage at Cana," probably a unique copy, £24; Fox, "Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum," 1559, £31; "Life and Acts of Sir William Wallace," Edinburgh, 1661, £19; Whetstone, "Sir James Dier," 1582, a fine copy of this very rare poetical volume, £25; a copy of Bradshaw's "Railway Guide," the original 1839 edition, £25; and Milton's Bible, containing the poet's autograph signature as well as that of his third wife, Elizabeth Minshull, £225; "The Pennsylvania Gazette," seven of the first eight numbers, 1768, £33 (Winslow); "Good News from New England," 1624, a soiled copy, £90; Denton, "A Brief Description of New York," 1670, date cut off, &c., £75; Columbus, "De Insulis Nuper in Mari Indico," 1497, £14 14s.; the "Enchiridion," printed by Kerver on vellum, 1528, with finely painted and illuminated miniatures and initials, £67; Molière, "L'Escole des Femmes," first edition, £7; "Le Sicilien," first edition, £7; "Le Festin de Pierre," first edition, £6; La Fontaine, "Contes et Nouvelles," Fermiers Généraux edition, an excellent copy, £27; "Fables Choiesies," 1755, four vols., a splendid copy, £128.

Our readers, having learnt that Omar Khayyam is being dramatized for Mr. Richard Mansfield, are doubtless steeled against surprise at the announcement, to which Back to the we alluded last week, that the Odyssey is being dramatized by Mr. Stephen Phillips for Mr. Beerbohm Tree. The difficulties are almost as great, though in a different way. It is, perhaps, apter to remember that Mr. Gilbert Murray has already set the example of returning for dramatic inspiration to Greece, the fountainhead of so many streams which flow into the broad current of modern culture. If the stage can recapture for us "the glory that was Greece," it will do much to retrieve its rather damaged credit. But the dramatization of old world legend is an exacting task in modern days. Greek fairy tale is certainly more cheerful and more varied than Celtic legend; but while the Dublin stage makes it its object to preserve the Celtic "glamour," we can hardly hope to catch across the footlights that true Homeric spirit, the essence of which lives only in the simple epic narrative. The Odyssey, as a whole, does not, of course, lend itself to the close-knit drama of our modern requirements. It belongs more to the picaresque type of story which revives in Don Quixote, Gil Blas—and, we may add, in Pickwick. Many of its incidents would remind the gallery too forcibly of the conjuror, or of the clown in the harlequinade. It is a string of stories round one character, which if related by the modern novelist would probably be reviewed side by side with Captain Kettle or Sherlock Holmes—two heroes who have much in common with Odysseus, the one in virtue of his wanderings, and the other in virtue of his cunning. But, told as Homer told it, the story is transformed into the highest poetry, and, to appreciate its beauty it is quite unnecessary to read into it, with medieval interpreters, a moral allegory, or, with some modern scholars, an astronomical fable. Into the web of Oriental romance and Greek myth of which it is composed Homer has imported an abundance of intense human interest. Johnson, in his sledgehammer way, condemned the Homeric drama. "We have been too early," he said, "acquainted with the poetical heroes to expect any pleasure from their revival; to show them as they have already been shown is to disgust by repetition; to give them new qualities or new adventures is to offend by violating received notions." This is very superficial, and would cut at the root of all the familiar plots on which dramas of the highest merit have been founded. The pathos and the humour of the Odyssey both find an echo in every age. Bentley said that the Iliad was written for men, the Odyssey for women—a tribute, at any rate, to its emotional quality. How truly human it is appears from its perennial popularity. Its episodes—Scylla and Charybdis, Circe, the Sirens, and the rest—are familiar even to the unlettered moralist for whom Homer is but a name. It is a favourite hunting-ground for the modern artist—Turner recurred to it over and over again; and pictorially it offers much attraction, perhaps too great attraction, to the stage manager. Almost every episode would make a foundation for a play. The age of the Stuarts produced two Homeric plays—Lord Lansdowne's "Heroic Love" and Rowe's "Ulysses," and both these writers in the spirit of their day foisted into Homer modern sentiment or intrigue. One can hardly doubt that the beautiful close, the recognition by Penelope, is what attracts the modern poetic dramatist. Yet, perhaps, after all, the final "curtain" should be one for which Homer does no more than give a hint. Dante records the death of Odysseus at sea. Tennyson leaves him still yearning for "some work of noble note," and determined

To sail beyond the sunset and the baths
Of all the western stars until I die.

Perhaps Odysseus should, in accordance with the legends of the middle ages, pass away from his recovered wife into the unknown, spurred once more by the old lust of travel to seek, like Arthur parting from Guinevere, "death, or I know not what mysterious doom."

Personal Views.

THE AGE OF GENIUS.

An ingenious writer in one of the magazines makes a learned inquiry as to the time of life at which the human mind works to the best advantage. He maintains that, so far as authors are concerned, this golden age is from forty to sixty. The matter may appear to have a merely academic importance, but it nevertheless deserves practical consideration by such as intend to "commence author." Every man has in him the material for one really good book, as Oliver Wendell Holmes was fond of maintaining, and, since most writers cannot boast more than this average endowment, it is clearly desirable that they should not waste it by attempting to write their magnum opus until they have reached the time of life at which they can handle it in the maturity of their powers. If they must write sooner, let them be content to boil a humble pot. There is a well-authenticated anecdote of a laborious author who proved, to his own satisfaction, that the full fruition of human brain-power was attained in the year which used to be known as the grand climacteric—sixty-three. So, although he published with considerable regularity throughout his life, he reserved his chief ideas for use at that age. Accordingly, he wrote his great book at the proper time, but to his horror it was received with a general chorus of contempt. The mystery was solved by the discovery that his certificate of birth had been, by a sad mistake, two years post-dated, so that he had really written his book at sixty-five, and could only expect that it should be damned by the critics. I seem to remember that he either killed himself or turned reviewer in his disgust with life. Of course it is not easy to cut things so fine as was here attempted, but it ought to be within the resources of science to tell us, on the average, what age is best adapted for literary labour. The Old Law of the Brahmins settles a similar question with fair exactness; according to it, the ideal man should be twenty years a youth, twenty years a fighter, and twenty years head of a household. Our own Government Services, with their slow promotion and compulsory retirement by age, have decided to their own satisfaction that a man's work is most valuable during a period roughly corresponding to that here suggested. No doubt in official life it is true that a man is best equipped for his work after he is forty—then he not only knows the worth of a lass, but is comfortably prepared to fall in with the routine and the tradition, of which youth is scornfully intolerant. At that time of life he has learnt, with Colin Campbell, to "damn all that eagerness," and with Talleyrand or Archbishop Manners Sutton to cry, "Point de zèle!" And the superior limit, no doubt, also has a basis in wide experience—though not only the officials to whom it applies, but the public, are sometimes of the opinion that "the law is a lass."

To apply any such rule of seniority to literature, however, is not quite so easy. The writer who maintains its existence has brought forward a number of ancient and modern instances in its support. Thus we are reminded that Scott was forty-four when he found his true vocation in life and published "Waverley." Milton settled down to write "Paradise Lost" when he was about fifty, and had nearly fulfilled the Brahminic law. Defoe was fifty-eight when he turned away from the dull round and common task of journalism to give the world its immortal epic of tools, "Robinson Crusoe." Swift produced "Gulliver's Travels" at fifty-nine. Darwin was fifty when he published

"The Origin of Species." George Eliot did not write "Middlemarch," which is generally considered her finest book, until she was fifty-two. Hood was forty-six when he wrote the two poems that have done most to keep his memory green—"The Bridge of Sighs" and "The Song of the Shirt." The writer in question gives a great many other instances, but it is hardly necessary to increase a list which every intelligent reader can extend to any desired length. But I fear that the theory based on them will scarcely hold water. As with so many other theories, which are specious and pretty without being sound, its proud deviser has omitted to take note of the contrary instances. This is so common a habit as to be regarded with sorrow rather than anger. Most of the people who believe in the fulfilment of dreams, or in popular weather-prophets, or in the crystal-gazers and fortune-tellers and palmists who are always with us (though not at all poor) make the same blunder; they remember all the successes and speedily forget the failures. Swift and Milton have been quoted in favour of this theory; but what about "Lycidas" and the "Tale of a Tub"? One has only to take down a book of literary history in order to sweep up instances by the dozen which make entirely in the other direction. No doubt, the holder of a brief for youth must bar all the famous writers who died before forty. If I remark that young Keats was a genius only comparable to young Raphael, as some other literary gentleman has said, I shall be told that if he had lived to be sixty he would have outdone all the poets who took so unfair an advantage of him by not being consumptive. Shelley and Byron are similarly ruled out of court. Perhaps one may suspect that, like the notorious Maud Muller, they might have disappointed expectation if they had lived on; how would Byron have managed to finish "Don Juan," for instance, or Shelley have equalled "The Cenci" and the "Ode to the West Wind"? But there is no proof of that. Other poets of the last century, however, seem to have done their best in youth. Tennyson, no doubt, is a matter of opinion. Edward FitzGerald always maintained that he never again touched the level of poetry that he reached in the volume of 1842, and a surprising number of good critics have "said ditto to Mr. Burke." Still, it is open to any one to argue that Tennyson's later manner—the manner of "The Revenge" and "To Virgil" and "Crossing the Bar"—was preferable to that of "The Gardener's Daughter" and "The Lotus-Eaters" and "Ulysses." But if we turn to Browning, there is no question at all. Only a very crabbed psychologist would have the face to prefer the poet of "Red-Cotton-Night-cap Country" and "The Inn Album" to the brilliant young singer of "The Lost Leader" and "The Laboratory," "Home Thoughts from Abroad" and "Paracelsus." Take Wordsworth again. We all agree with Matthew Arnold that "Wordsworth composed verses during a space of some sixty years; and it is no exaggeration to say that within one single decade of those years, between 1798 and 1808, almost all his really first-rate work was produced." In verse-writers, as well as in mere politicians and prosemen, we may often agree with Sainte-Beuve that there is a poet who dies young.

Recent novelists, again, make quite as much for youth as age. Dickens never wrote anything so good as "Pickwick." Thackeray flowered later, but it is not very rash to assert that he never surpassed "Barry Lyndon," which he wrote at thirty-one. Mr. George Meredith has worked long and busily, but I have yet to learn that he has beaten "Richard Feverel" and that immortal trifle of "Shagpat." Scientific writers, of course, like Darwin and Bacon, wear different shoes altogether; observation takes time. Mr. Arthur Balfour has pointed out that "philosophy," however, "is nearly as likely to be well done in early as in later life." Berkeley is an admirable case in point, and Mr. Balfour has developed this thesis in the introduction to his writings. History, again, can hardly be written to advantage by the very young; they lack that wide tolerance for which an omniscient cocksureness is but a poor substitute. But I really cannot feel bound to advise the imaginative writer to cork up his great ideas on the strength of this theory of the maturity of the author's powers. It is not every vintage that will bear keeping for twenty years, and the result is too often a watery and tasteless fluid, even if it be not positively sour. The counsel of perfection is rather to write freely at all ages, and publish as much as God pleases; the reading world can be trusted to decide whether it will keep. What would the critic do if he had not the right to discriminate between an author's earlier and later manners, to the disadvantage of whichever happened to be under consideration? Perhaps the cynic will say that this ancient controversy may be summed up in the familiar proverb, "Young men think old men fools, and old men know young men to be so."

W. E. GARRETT FISHER.

APOCRYPHAL STORIES.

It is a fact, worthy of a special jeremiad, and one which has received much illustration in connexion with recent events, that our best stories are apocryphal. For this state of things it is to be feared the historian, by bad example, is largely responsible; and here, no doubt, is one opportunity for "scientific history." It is significant that Bishop Creighton should have expressed a desire for a simple epitaph:—"He tried to write true history." A favourite topic with Palmerston was the delusiveness of historical fact, and Lord Beaconsfield used to talk about the "historical conscience" as if it were something altogether different from the ordinary one. Indeed, it has been argued that the test of the historian is not whether he tells the truth—apparently that were to argue superfluously—but whether he gets as near the truth as possible. Samuel Daniel, with commendable honesty, laid it down in his History that it was only the business of the writer to "get as neare Truth's likeness as hee possible can." One critic openly asserts that "Gibbon's style is not one in which you can tell the truth."

Is it because our history has been in the hands of writers "who, unlike Dr. Johnson, 'were determined that the Whig dogs should have the best of it'"; or because historians have felt the necessity of lightening their pictures; or is it because facts and stories get somehow into circulation and are accepted without due investigation by writers for the purpose of seasoning their narrative just as the novelist's printer put in the punctuation marks, with a pepper box? It is easy to see how this may happen. Hume tells very agreeably the story of Edgar's amours, and one is to suppose that the device by which Elfrida was substituted for her mistress, the detection of Athelwold's artifice, and the vengeance of the amorous king are incidents about which, as Macaulay says, there is no more doubt than "about the execution of Anne Boleyn or the slitting of Sir John Coventry's nose." But William of Malmesbury, who was contemporary with Stephen, and on whose authority it is given, distinctly gives notice, like Sir John Maundeville in the relation of his most astonishing "marrylls," that he cannot warrant the story, which really rests upon no better authority than ballads, notoriously an insecure foundation to build upon; and since Edgar was the friend of the monks, and the monks and minstrels were at deadly feud, we may well guess that the king would suffer unkindly at the hands of the balladists. Here we have as ancient fiction, the invention of some early minstrel whose dialect has long become obsolete, inserted as an unquestionable fact in our historical narrative.

But, to most of us, recent examples will come readily to the recollection. Since Plato set the fashion of recording the death-bed scenes of the great, some account of the last words of the famous has always been forthcoming. Recently an authoritative contradiction has had to be given of a pathetic story, circumstantially told, of the death-bed of our late Mother Queen. When Mr. Kipling lay at the point of death, with a world at his bedside, the American papers, with an enterprise peculiarly native, were full of witty sayings uttered by a man whose lungs were so congested that he could not even whisper. The future biographer, forgetting this latter fact, will possibly use the choicest of these fictitious anecdotes. The death-bed of Disraeli, in the house in Cannon-street, was wilfully misreported. The anecdotalist, building up the texture of the man from his epigrams, relates that the statesman's last remark was, "Is there anything in the Gazette?" What he actually said, as the languor of dissolution approached, was, "I am oppressed."

In the press of corroborative material, two other instances may be adduced as showing how easily traditions arise. Canon Scott Robertson, writing to a London newspaper and referring to the universal wearing of lilies of the valley at the ceremony of enthronement of Archbishop Temple, said, "There is a prevailing opinion that this is an old Canterbury 'use.' That is the way history is written. They were only used at Benson's enthronement because he was fond of them, and they are the fashion to-day." In the second instance, it was announced that the Pope had presented a golden hammer to Cardinal Oreglia di Santo, upon which a rather pretty fable was built. His Holiness's glaisanterie will be seen in the fact that he was ill at the time, and that in case of his death the Cardinal's office would have been to tap him on the forehead three times with the hammer in recognition of his decease. It is a pity so picturesque a story has to be dismissed. But as a matter of fact no such ceremony exists; the function known as the ceremony of recognition in the event of a Pope's death is quite different. What the Camerlingo does is to remove the white veil from the face of the dead Pontiff and to make in formal terms a solemn declaration of his death. The tradition of the hammer has, however, got into general belief, and refuses to be dislodged, just as Richard III. will go down to posterity in the guise of Shakespeare's crook-back'd Richard, with his Herodias-like passion for heads on chargers.

A luminous example of the way in which "delusions crystallize into items of traditional history" is given by Archibald Forbes in one of his excellent articles on the war of 1870. With a companion he occupied the beautifully-pannelled dining-room in the charming Chateau Bellevue on the night following the fateful 2nd September. Sitting at the great oaken table on which the articles of capitulation had been signed, Forbes, "sullen and hungry," was writing a despatch to the Daily News. His companion, disconsolately gnawing a ham-bone, "the miserable remnant of their store of provisions," threw it, with a muttered objurcation, on the table, upsetting the ink-bottle and spilling its contents. Revisiting the Chateau later, Forbes was shown a huge ink-stain on the great table, which, the guide solemnly informed him, was caused by the upsetting of the ink bottle at the signature of the capitulation of Sedan. General Wimpfen had overturned it in the agitation of his grief and shame! The guide added that great sums had been offered for this table with the "historic" inkstain, but that no money could induce the proprietor to part with it. Will this not remind us of another historic stain—that of Holyrood—

And yonder lies the scene of death,
Where Mary learn'd to weep?

In the "Chronicles of the Canongate" the author of "Waverley" playfully handles arguments with dear Mistress Baliol as to the authenticity of the memorial of Rizzio's slaughter. We, too, may be willing, with Mistress Baliol, to accept the common tradition and to hold the stain to be of no modern date, but actually the consequence of the terrible assassination; yet there is a haunting suspicion that it is the "result of a saucerful of beet-root vinegar upset by the janitor's baby centuries after Mary Stuart met her fate." There is a pathetic conclusion to Forbes' article which may excuse an interpolation:—"To me was assigned the bedroom which on the previous night the Emperor (Napoleon III.) had occupied. It was in the state in which he had left it. . . . The glass doors of a bookcase stood open, and on the commode at the bedside lay open, face downwards, a volume which had been taken from the case. The reader of the night before had made a selection in which there was something ominous—the book was Bulwer Lytton's 'The Last of the Barons.'"

But if, sympathizing with Sir Robert Walpole in his sweeping assertion as to the unreliability of historical narrative, we are moved by a common impulse towards historical biography, as being more likely to get properly at facts, is there any greater guarantee that we shall get them? A sufficient example of how biographical history is sometimes written is surely afforded in a characteristic anecdote told of Sydney Smith, who had, willy-nilly, to father almost as many jokes, good and bad, as Joe Miller himself—and it is tolerably well-known now that this respectable comedian was so particularly lugubrious as to be incapable of perpetrating the thinnest humour; at the meetings of the wits at the Black Jack in Clare Market he was always so markedly morose that a friend collected a number of funny things, in sheer irony ascribing them to Joe. Landseer once asked Sydney Smith to sit to him for his portrait. As quick as a flash came the witty reply, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" That is how the story is told. But Sydney Smith related it otherwise. He said he merely thanked the eminent animal painter in conventional terms, and when he got home thought what an excellent joke the Scriptural answer would have made. Alas! the things "we might have said" would fill a volume; "every ditch is full of after wit." A platitude at the moment, it has been well said, is (conversationally) worth a dozen repartees the next morning. Biographers often call upon us to admire not the actual sayings of their heroes, but what they should have said, just as James I. is given the personal credit of the detection of Fawkes' plot, the courtly fable ignoring Cecil and Suffolk. Why is it that the stories invented about divines are legion and—in their favour it must be said—invariably good? Probably because it is so easy to leap from the sublime to the ridiculous; because what is naturally solemn is the best fuse for an explosion of laughter; and because the pulpit is a storehouse of humour. Such was the fervent aspiration of Dean Burgon when preaching on the transcendent merits of the High Church theology:—"May I live the life of a Taylor and die the death of a Bull." Or the Presbyterian meenister's reproof of the unco' guid:—"Half of this congregation are going to hell. It is very hot in hell—fire and brimstone, which burns for ever and ever. Ye'll lift up your arms and say, as ye've said to me, 'Lord, Lord, we didna ken we was doing ony harm.' And the Lord will just look down on ye and say, 'Weel, ye ken it noo!'"

When looseness of statement is detected, or lack of foundation discovered for a picturesque incident, it is a commonplace to shrug the shoulders, and exclaim, "Ah! That's the way history is written." The fault is that the historian must be a book-maker as well as a mere chronicler; as Lord Clarendon more than hints in the preface to his "History of the Rebellion," those who write history must appear to know more than they really can know. Did not Montaigne realize this? He says "'Tis very easy to make it appear that great authors, when they treat of causes, do not merely mention those which they judge to be true causes, but those also which they think are not so, provided they have any beauty to recommend them." Voltaire was cute enough to guess at this truth—

On court, hélas! après la Vérité,
Ah! croyez-moi, l'Erreur a son mérite.

It has to be confessed that it is often difficult, perhaps impossible, to get at the truth. We have an exemplification of this in the anecdote told by Baroness Lehzen of her late Majesty, Queen Victoria. The Baroness relates her recollection of the charming incident which brought to the knowledge of the young Princess Victoria her close place in the succession, and ventures to repeat, in actual phraseology, the remarks made by the Princess, which, indeed, are very much what we should expect would have been said by so young a girl. The Queen, as we know, expressed doubts as to the form in which the knowledge of her probable succession came to her, and, positively, as to the remark she made to the Baroness. "I will be good," Baroness Lehzen quotes her Majesty as saying, with impulsive emphasis twice—words which the Queen had no recollection of using. And it has to be remembered that both the Queen and the Baroness were speaking from mere recollection of a very remote event. But, remembering Montaigne's assertion, can we doubt that the historian would prize so dainty a story? Indeed, one might go further—could it be expected that the historian would resist the temptation to utilize so pretty an embellishment to his sober text? The nearer we approach the record of the actual words of historic personages—or what purports to be their actual words—the greater the difficulty of securing that absolute accuracy which in historical chronicle is desirable, but not always obtainable.

There is the same difficulty in respect of phrases that have become historic; they pass, indeed, into currency, but the ascribed occasion of their origin is often apocryphal, and their ownership hotly contested. The question of disputed ownership opens up a large field. That celebrated saying "It is more than a crime—it is a blunder" is generally ascribed to Talleyrand, but Fouché says it was his, and, moreover, claimed that other people were appropriating the distinction which belonged only to him. How many claimants are there for the phrase now much in use, "Little Englanders," and how many tales circumstantially setting forth its birth? The definition of an archdeacon has passed into a classic. Here, again, there is a hot dispute as to authorship, the phrase being impartially attributed to Bishop Wilberforce and Dr. Blomfield, and less known clerics have also had the greatness thrust upon them. The story, we believe, belongs to Bishop Blomfield, and it is told with a convincing preciseness of detail. Lord Althorp, proposing a vote for the Archdeacon of Bengal, was met with the question from Mr. Hume: "What is an archdeacon?" which puzzled House and Chancellor alike. A subordinate occupant of the Treasury Bench was sent to the Bishops for a definition, and by pure chance first encountered Blomfield. "An archdeacon," replied the Bishop in his quick way, "an archdeacon is an ecclesiastical officer who performs archidiaconal functions," with which sonorous definition Lord Althorp and the House were perfectly satisfied, though we can hardly believe that Mr. Hume was. And, indeed, the Bishop afterwards denied the paternity of the jest, saying that if he did return such an answer it was suggested to him by an old chemist, John White, who used to recommend lavender-water to all his customers, and, when pressed for a reason, replied, "On account of its lavendric properties." Bishop Walsham How in his "Lighter Moments" tells the story of the Bishop who, when visiting a village for a confirmation, found some children in the road making a model in mud of the village church. He asked, "Where was the Bishop?"—and received the reply, "We haven't muck enough to make a Bishop." This experience has been credited to Bishop Fraser of Manchester, but its true origin seems doubtful. Perhaps it was a ben trovato of Bishop Walsham How's.

Certainly, as Montaigne says, "it is very easy to make it appear" that historians like stories, whether true or not, which have any beauty to recommend them; and after all there is much to be said for Chesterfield's apophthegm that all beauty is truth—but the true historian may find something wanting in his reasoning.

THE DRAMA.

"THE NOTORIOUS MRS. EBBSMITH."

A haunting recollection of my childhood is the vision of an engraving called "The Queen Presenting the Bible to the Maori Chiefs." Her Majesty wears (for I can still see the dreadful thing) all her orders and a crinoline of vast circumference. By her side, enormously wooden and in full Field-Marshal's uniform, stands the Prince Consort. The Maori chiefs, on bended knee, receive the Bible, heavy, gilt-edged, and massively clasped—a true Bible of the early 'sixties. One eye of each chief is fixed with reverent loyalty on the Great White Mother, the other gazes with fervent adoration upon the sacred volume, the symbol of a religion which they have just begun, or are just about to begin, to embrace. This picture expresses British fetish-worship in its most vulgar form, giving it the additional allurements of devotion to the Throne and the love of Court frippery. It is quite the most irreligious picture I have ever seen. Nor can I escape from it even now. If I take a short cut through some unfrequented by-way it is sure to catch my eye in the shop window of some shabby print-shop or marine store. Several London streets have been "stopped" for me by that picture, just as the streets round Dick Swiveller's lodgings were stopped for him by unliquidated accounts.

If this little fragment of autobiography should seem impertinent, let me say that, it is an indispensable explanation of the annoyance which I feel over the critical scene of The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith. You remember the scene in which the third act culminates? The Rev. Amos Winterfield has just offered Mrs. Ebbsmith a Bible. She waves him away, but he deposits it tenderly on the edge of her couch. Thereupon she flings it into the stove, and the Rev. Amos departs deeply shocked. The next moment, in a sudden revulsion of feeling, Mrs. Ebbsmith thrusts her arm into the burning coals and withdraws the Bible, scorched but still readable. And the curtain comes down amid a whirlwind of applause. But an old, strangely-familiar disgust assails me. Behind the stove and Mrs. Ebbsmith I can see the Royal crinoline and the Maori chiefs. For Mr. Pinero, it is but too evident, is here pandering to British fetish-worship. The episode provides a thrilling "situation," to be sure, but the thrill is illegitimate, and the situation misplaced. The Bible as a symbol of genuine religious "conversion" is wholly irrelevant to Mrs. Ebbsmith's upbringing, whole mode of life, and mood of the moment—still more the Bible as a fetish. Mrs. Ebbsmith, as a girl a female Bradlaugh or Colonel Ingersoll, as a woman an advocate of free (but strictly Platonic) love as part of the New Altruism, sees her past mocked and her ideals besmirched by the unworthy man whom she has chosen as her comrade in the experiment of trying the "higher life." The natural woman awakes in her, she finds that she cannot sever herself from the sensual and sentimental weakling with whom she has cast in her lot, and she decides to share with him the life of ordinary fleshly love—in short, to resume with him the part of the "harem woman" which she played with the late Mr. Ebbsmith. But her lover, Lucas Cleeve, has a wife, and that fact involves a further degradation for Mrs. Ebbsmith which she had not foreseen. It is proposed that she shall figure as the wife de facto in, say, St. John's-wood, while Mr. Cleeve ostensibly lives with the wife de jure in Mayfair. Lucas, the poor woman sees, hopes she will accept the disgraceful arrangement, though he is too shamefaced to press it. She is on the point of yielding when—enter the Rev. Amos with the Bible. The incident of the Bible burning is, I repeat, grotesquely irrelevant. Why is it there? It is there, no doubt, in the first place, because it is a dramatic scene, in the jargon of the theatre, an admirable "curtain." It is there, too, because the writing of The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith (produced 13th March, 1895, at the Garrick) followed close upon the performance in London of Ibsen's Hedda Gabler, wherein a striking (and perfectly congruous) incident was the committal of a manuscript to the flames by the heroine. Lastly, it is there because of the success assured to such an incident with British fetish-worshippers, who are as important an element in the playhouse as in the world outside. But the one and only reason which would have been an artistic justification for the incident—that it presented a natural phase in the development, either by progression or by reaction, of Mrs. Ebbsmith's character cannot with the slightest plausibility be alleged.

See how impossible it is to elude the obsession of the Maori Chiefs and the crinoline! Mid-Victorian art has much to answer for. Apart from this Bible burning and its sequel, the fourth act, which certainly cuts Lucas adrift from Mrs. Ebbsmith, but otherwise leaves things for her at rather a loose end—she departs to begin a new life on a Yorkshire moor, where she will either eat her heart out like Miss Vye on Egdon Heath or else, like Charlotte Brontë, marry a parson (very likely the Rev. Amos Winterfield)—apart in short from the dénouement this play of Mr. Pinero's is a masterly piece of work. The first act exhibits promptly and neatly the true inwardness of the Cleeve-Ebbsmith union, the second and third show us every stage of the desperate fight wherein the woman has to abandon ideals, character, down to her very last shred of self-respect, under the miserable weakness and egoism of her mate and the social forces represented by the "wicked uncle," the Duke of St. Olpherts. There is not a superfluous, not an inopportune, word in the dialogue; the characters of the man and woman are drawn with the greatest subtlety; even the Duke, a conventional figure, is a consistent and plausible piece of convention; and the "march" of the play satisfies the supreme test in that it provokes at every moment curiosity and interest as to what is going to happen next. In fine, the piece stands the test of revival and confirms the primacy of Mr. Pinero among our contemporary playwrights. To Mrs. Patrick Campbell's Agnes Ebbsmith one may apply the cant phrase of an evening journal about politics—"as in 1895, only better"; Mr. Courtenay Thorpe gives a thoughtful—too obviously thoughtful, rather over-anxious—performance of Lucas Cleeve; Mr. George Arliss is capital as the Duke; Miss Winifred Fraser and Mr. Berte Thomas, Miss Beryl Faber, and Mr. Gerald Du Maurier are all good in the subaltern parts.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

ANGLO-IRISH VERSE.

A TREASURY OF IRISH POETRY IN THE ENGLISH TONGUE. Edited by STOPFORD A. BROOKE and T. W. ROLLESTON. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.)

We have noticed a tendency among the critics of this book to treat Irish poetry with very supercilious patronage, as though it had no right to claim the high name of poetry at all. We have also read a considerable number of recent English effusions on the death of the Queen, besides the first two numbers of a new periodical exclusively devoted to the "publication of Original Poetry." One remembers a certain proverb about glass houses; and, on the whole, if our English poets cannot produce anything better than the lamentable stuff evoked by the most moving event in living memory, they might show a little modest charity to their Irish competitors. Indeed, one of the best compositions that has so far appeared in the Thrush is by an Irish writer, Mr. A. P. Graves; though not in his best manner, it has a technical merit in its characteristic assonances. Of course, Mr. Stopford Brooke, though for the nonce he poses as a rampant nationalist, a sort of O'Brienite Bard, is much too sound an English critic to admit into the Realm of Art, with largest capitals, anything that is not Poetry; and he repeatedly confesses "with some sorrow" that "the Irish poetry of the first sixty years of this [i.e., the nineteenth] century would not reach, except in a very few examples, the requirements of a high standard of excellence." "We do not claim for this poetry a lofty place." He would have preferred to include nothing but those few but relatively high examples; but Mr. Yeats had already done this—and done it with admirable taste—in his "Book of Irish Verse," and so it was resolved to make the present selection less of an anthology than an historical Treasury of what Irish poets have attempted. The result is that the real excellence of the best Irish poems is almost hidden in a mass of third-rate verse, and instead of an Anthology we have a Physic Garden, where extremely ugly herbs are allowed to overgrow the rare flowers in the interests of literary and political history.

As a book to carry about with one and enjoy again and again, Mr. Yeats' Anthology is far to be preferred, but we can appreciate the argument in favour of Mr. Brooke's and Mr. Rolleston's Physic Garden. Some such general collection, carefully arranged and chronologically classified, is desirable. It gives a remarkably complete view of Irish poetical endeavour, as a whole; and though to our mind it errs on the side of over-abundance, the volume is handy enough. A useful and interesting feature is the biographical notice prefixed to each writer. Some of these, such as Mr. Brooke's on Moore, Mr. Lionel Johnson's on Mangan, Mr. Graves' on Ferguson, and Mr. Rolleston's on Darley and on the "Poets of the Nations," are admirable examples of condensed criticism. Others, by the small group of new Irish poets, on each other, strike one as a little premature and too mutually-admiring, though few will read Mr. Yeats' essay on his friend "A. E." without sympathetic appreciation. To "enthuse" with Dr. Douglas Hyde over Dr. Sigerson, or with various other living writers over their particular friends, is a little difficult to the cold outsider; but it is all very pretty and fraternal, and why should one object? It is pleasant to find such a warmth of inter-appreciation in a group of poets whose nation and calling are not usually supposed to exclude the possibilities of green-eyed jealousy. And whatever one may think of the earlier poetry—apart from the great names of Ferguson, Mangan, and Davis—there is not the smallest doubt that the group which includes Mr. Yeats, A. E., Mr. Lionel Johnson, and Miss Nora Hopper is fuller of promise than anything we can at this moment show in England. We are sorry to draw the distinction, just as we are sorry to note how strongly Mr. Brooke draws it himself. Little did one think, when one "sat under him" at York-street or Bedford Chapel, that so truculent a rapparee lay under that ample surplice; and his brilliant Introduction is marred by this generally irrelevant patriotism. After all, many, perhaps most, of the best Irish poems are not political, though possibly without "England's cruel red" they might not have developed their "passionate" (how Mr. Brooke loves that word!) sadness. Nor do we see why he, as an old graduate of T. C. D., should have gone out of his way to sneer at "the neglect" of Irish poetry at Trinity College. Mr. Brooke should have glanced at the biographies in his own volume. Thirty-one of the poets he edits were Trinity men, and amongst them were Davis, Sir S. Ferguson, Tom Moore, Wolfe, Darley, Lever, Le Fanu, Callanan, Ingram, Graves, Dr. Hyde, and both the editors. Even Mangan owed to Trinity College a kind and anxious effort to save and support him. As for sympathy, a University which is not fastidious in its standard of poetry is not fit to be a University, and there is much—very much—in this volume which falls far below the most tolerant academic standard.

On the other hand there is a great deal that is exceedingly good—better, we think, than the editors dare to claim. Besides the really admirable work of scholarly Ferguson and high-hearted Davis (the latter surely inadequately represented; why not "My Land" and "The Geraldines," and "O! the Marriage," for example?) and the astonishing visions of Mangan, the Edgar Allan Poe of Ireland—the translations from the Irish are often not only interesting metrically and historically, but possess an individual poetic art in themselves—a rare thing in translations. Dr. Hyde's "My Love," and still more Mr. Rolleston's exquisite "Dead at Clonmacnois," both translations, are among the gems of the book. There are some beautiful extracts from Aubrey de Vere, founded on Irish legend but not specially Irish in treatment, and his delicate "Song" to Sorrow might have been written by Shelley. But why is Lady Duferin's famous "Irish Emigrant" doomed to a fatal misprint ("even" for "ever" in the fifth stanza) both here and in Mr. Yeats' book? We miss in the present selection Milliken's "Groves of Blarney," which is not very exalted poetry, but has its ingenuities of jingle which made Barham imitate it in his "Coronation." The early street ballads are represented by some striking examples, one of the best being the famous "Johnny, I hardly knew ye," but we could have welcomed more. The "Kottabistai" are certainly scantily represented. No more brilliant University magazine ever existed than Kottabos under the editorship of Professor Tyrrell; and its writers deserved a less perfunctory selection. But here again politics stood in the way. On the other hand we owe Mr. Rolleston gratitude not only for printing Wolfe's beautiful "Lines written to Music," which is far less known than it should be, but also for discovering and publishing for the first time a fine sonnet found in MS. in a volume of Wolfe's "Life and Remains," together with a curious unfinished poem on George III. Why Wolfe should be included as Irish, whilst Goldsmith is omitted as too Anglicized, is one of those anomalies inherent in a selection of so-called Irish poetry. It is only when Irishmen, or any other men, study the great poetry of the world, English or other, as Goldsmith did, and Mangan, and as Mr. W. B. Yeats does, that they learn to write poetry themselves.

Mr. Stopford Brooke sees this clearly enough, as so competent and learned a critic must, and we feel throughout his graceful and often brilliant preface that he is writing with reserves. The guarded references to the Irish language agitation are amusing, and it is plain that he could say a good deal more, if only he would. His criticisms on the rareness of religious poetry in Catholic Ireland, and the curious absence of the poetry of outward Nature, as well as on the dangers of the modern mystical spirit—it would be unfair to call it a vogue—are suggestive of much more than we should like to hear from so true a student of poetry. Nothing, however, could be better than his sympathetic analysis of the characteristic "notes" of Irish poetry, its beauty and its limitations. As he says, if the Irish poets could "write about universal human life as well as all the greater poets have done, and about Nature as she seems to the senses as well as to the soul, it were better." But this is touching on dangerous ground, and if we were to hint that even "the national and spiritual elements of the character of the Irish people" and "that appealing emotion"—how well said it is—"which lives like a soul in the natural scenery of Ireland" are not a wide enough world for a great poet, no doubt Queen Meave would "drive us from her presence" (as she appears to have driven Professor Dowden, p. xiv.) and "transport us on the viewless winds to England."

DEMOLISHED PEDIGREES.

IN PEERAGE AND FAMILY HISTORY (Constable, 12s. 6d. n.) Mr. J. Horace Round, who is one of the extremely restricted number of writers of real authority on genealogical matters, has written a volume of great interest. The principal themes with which he deals in these attractive pages are the extravagant pretensions of the Heralds' College and its advocates, and the strange confusions in the matter of peerages which have resulted from misunderstandings as to their proper devolution, the assumption of dignities that never existed, the continuance by craft and subtlety of others which were legally extinct, and the occasional stretching of the prerogative of the Crown itself. His assertions upon these matters, incredible as they will often seem to the reader unversed in the wiles of pedigree-makers, are vouched for by documents and references which admit of no question. As to the Heralds' College, we do not go so far as Mr. Round, who does not hesitate to suggest that the real offence of those who fall under the displeasure of Queen Victoria-street is that they have not paid fees to the Kings-of-Arms or their satellites. But undoubtedly it has only itself and the embarrassing zeal of its friends to thank for his very plain criticism. The College of Arms claims to be the Vatican of English heraldry—without its pale there is no armorial salvation, and it defines its position with great simplicity. "No coat-of-arms," it says, "is genuine unless its grant is registered in our archives." It then proceeds, more frequently, perhaps, by the pens of outsiders than by the voices of its own responsible officials, to declare that an heraldic coat not so registered is bogus and its user an impostor. It applies the same sweeping condemnation to the head of an old county family who is not en règle avec le gouvernement as to a retired shopkeeper who has had his "crest and county" found for him for three and sixpence. This position would be comprehensible did the facts bear it out, or even if the College had power to enforce its pretensions. But there are plenty of perfectly genuine coats-of-arms not recorded in their books, and their predecessors have over and over again compiled pedigrees that are demonstrably untrue and registered them as officially certified documents.

The history of some pedigrees here investigated will be a revelation to those who are fond of sneering at foreign titles. There is unquestionably sufficient proof that in some cases baronies have in the past been assumed or invented, wrested from their proper devolution, or kept going when they were legally dead, or at least in a condition of suspended animation. The decisions of the House of Lords have been contradictory and sometimes contrary to the evidence, so that no man may say what peerage-law really is; while the Crown itself has endeavoured, as in the Buckhurst case, to do that which even the Royal authority is powerless to do—jump a peerage about from one living person to another. So artistic is the finish with which Mr. Round demolishes certain noble pedigrees that he is sometimes able even to identify the genealogist who, two or three centuries ago, manufactured the descent going back to the Conquest or beyond, and to show how he cut a genuine ancestor into two, married him to his own mother, or made a great man and a valiant warrior of him while he was yet in the medieval equivalent for pinafores. The claim of the Earls of Denbigh to be Counts of Hapsburg and quasi-members of the Imperial House of Austria has been recorded by Gibbon in a memorable passage; Mr. Round asserts that it rests upon ancient but demonstrably forged documents; and he further accuses the Dukes of Norfolk themselves, the hereditary chiefs of the Heralds' College, of using arms to which they are not entitled. It would almost seem, indeed, that the only members of the House of Lords who have not committed crimes, genealogical or heraldic, are the nobles of recent creation.

Mr. Round's chapter upon "Henry VIII. and the Peers" suggests that the King carried his ecclesiastical reforms by a special creation of peers who swamped the clerical opposition in the Upper House. No more remarkable indication could be desired of the value of the genealogist in the elucidation of history. Historians of the Reformation have generally taken it for granted that up to the Dissolution of the monasteries the spiritual peers were in a majority. Mr. Round is able to show from an examination of the Lords' Journals and of Dugdale's lists that, whilst in 1523 the House of Lords contained 28 lay peers, in 1529 the number was 44; and by 1534 the total had risen to 54. The spiritual peers, at the earliest of the three dates, are reckoned variously at from 48 to 51, and their preponderance was still further reduced in the beginning of the Session of 1534 by three lay additions, bringing the temporal peers up to 57, while the spiritual ones simultaneously shrunk on the Journals of the House to 37. The Journals show that, on the first day of the Parliament which opened in 1539, there were 40 spiritual and 50 lay lords present. Into the question how far the course of events was actually influenced by this change in the proportion of lay to spiritual ones, Mr. Round does not, of course, enter; but the fact cannot be ignored by the historian.

It shows again how much remains to be done in turning to historical use those contemporary documents which have become available to the student only within the last generation. Further proofs of this will be found in Mr. Round's lengthy dissertation upon "Charles I. and Lord Glamorgan," which is a re-statement and summary of his whole controversy with Mr. Gardiner upon a subject that has baffled historians and antiquaries for two centuries. The chapters upon the origin of the Stewarts, the Russells, and the Spencers are all attractive as efforts, fortified by unimpeachable references, to substitute facts for fictions, while the article upon the Barony of Mowbray supplies some curious illustrations of the confusion of peerage law. Mr. Round's speculations upon "The Succession to the Crown" are of much interest. He likewise suggests that there is nothing, in law or precedent, to warrant the belief that, in the event of a Sovereign leaving only daughters, the Crown would necessarily pass to the eldest. The result of an elaborate argument seems to be that the Throne would fall into abeyance; but obviously in such a contingency mere technical legality would become of very little account.

A GENIAL DIPLOMATIST.

The autobiography of a diplomatist must always raise expectations which he is of course quite unable to satisfy. Nevertheless, among the host of "reminiscences" few are so interesting as his. He is sure to have had experiences worth telling; he is pretty sure not to be a snob; and he may be relied on for tact when he talks about other people living or dead. The Life of Sir John Drummond Hay was one of the best of such books. Sir Edward Malet's SHIFTING SCENES (Murray, 10s. 6d. n.), though much slighter, is quite as good. Washington and South America, China and Formosa, Berlin and Paris, Turkey and Egypt, shipwrecks and buffalo hunts, pass quickly across the sheet; and Sir Edward tells his story in the form of an interview with an imaginary and humorous impersonator of the Press who sits on his bed at midnight, and who, reversing the rôle of the Ancient Mariner, "knows the man" who must tell him the story of his life. It is a very happy idea, for Whiffles—that is the reporter's name—is always ready with just the remark which occurs to the reader, and thus Sir Edward manages both cleverly and pleasantly to disarm the critic. Thus we feel at one both with Whiffles and Sir Edward Malet after this summing up of a story which generally takes two or three chapters:

"I know all about your youth. It may be passed over for the present. You entered the service in 1854, and as you were born in 1837 you could only be sixteen years old then. Was not your appointment at that early age rather an abuse of patronage?"

"Possibly. My father was a friend of Lord Clarendon, who at that time was Minister for Foreign Affairs, and my nomination as attaché to the Legation at Frankfort, where my father held the post of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, was dated the 10th of October, which was my sixteenth birthday."

There is no chapter on ancestry and schooldays to be skipped. Sir Edward began at Peking, and he has sound advice for those who would enter the diplomatic service as to beginning in outlandish countries, so as to learn the breadth both of human nature and of the English Empire. Constantinople was a useful experience. Sir Edward's account of his dealings with the Turkish Ministers is very interesting, so is his assertion that if Sir Evelyn Baring had become, as he was within an ace of becoming, Minister of Finance at Constantinople, the whole future of the Empire might have been changed. Equally good is his account of the Khedive Tewfik and his calm reception and subdual of the company of soldiers who came to murder him. In Egypt he met Gordon, who once turned up at Sir Edward's dinner-table after refusing the invitation on the ground that he never went to dinner parties if he could possibly help it. His arrival made the number of guests thirteen. Sir Edward objects to thirteen at dinner, for the simple reason that more than twelve people cannot be served by a single service. But though not superstitious, Sir Edward had some faith in palmistry, though very little in palmists—despite the fact that he would not, so he thinks, have been promoted to the rank of an Ambassador had he not taken to heart the criticism of a palmist who told him that he wanted self-confidence. It was at the time of the Franco-German war that he came across Bismarck, to whom he was sent from Paris with a pacificatory despatch by the British Government—a dangerous mission which Sir Edward describes in detail. "How like you are to your mother," was Bismarck's friendly greeting. More equivocal was his parting remark. "I would lend you my horse, but flags of truce have been fired on. I hope you will get through safely, but I cannot risk my horse being shot." The whole account of the end of the war and of the perils, the humours, the pathos of Paris during the Commune which closes the book is perhaps the best thing in it. The British Embassy was not without its dangers, and two future Ambassadors at Berlin nearly closed their careers on May 22, 1871:—

My room was on the second floor looking on to the Champs Élysées. Frank Lascelles and I went to see what we could do in that direction, but I hesitated to open the shutter lest it should attract the fire. "Only just a peep," urged Frank, and he moved it ajar. Immediately a bullet came whizzing through, breaking the shutter and lodging in the wall of the room behind us. "That peep must do for to-day," I said. "Let us go downstairs."

This will make the reader realize that there are in the diplomatic life things more serious than the solution of that vexed and knotty problem, as to which "innumerable questions have arisen"—viz., when the Ambassador resides on the upper floors, how far down the stairs should he come to receive Princes below the rank of Sovereign? The book throughout is a masterpiece of genial autobiography.

SOME HISTORICAL BOOKS.

Source Books.

THE SOURCES AND LITERATURE OF ENGLISH HISTORY FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO ABOUT 1485, by Charles Gross, Ph.D. (Longmans, 18s. n.), and LEADING DOCUMENTS OF ENGLISH HISTORY, TOGETHER WITH ILLUSTRATIVE MATERIAL FROM CONTEMPORARY WRITERS, with a Bibliography of Sources, by Guy Carleton Lee, Ph.D. (Bell, 7s. 6d. n.), the one from Harvard, the other from Johns Hopkins University, illustrate the excellent work which is being done by American writers to popularize the sources of English history. Something like what Dr. Gross has now done has long been wanted. It is a remarkably minute and thorough bibliography of English history. "It contains a systematic survey of the printed materials relating to the political, constitutional, legal, social, and economic history of England, Wales, and Ireland." MSS. are dealt with only incidentally, and reference is only made to the admirable work of Sir Thomas Hardy and of Mr. Scargill Bird. But the book is far from being a mere bibliography; it is something of an estimate, too, though necessarily brief, of the sources so carefully assorted and calendared. Dr. Gross tells us that it is the outcome of an annual course on the sources and literature of English history delivered at Harvard in the nine years from 1900. Something like this, we believe, has been attempted at Oxford by the Regius Professor of Modern History, but far less systematically, and the course is not half finished. So that Dr. Gross occupies a field which as yet no one has attempted seriously to secure.

We find it difficult to speak warmly enough of the excellence of the work. There are, of course, omissions, but we have found the book more complete than we dared to hope before we subjected it to a careful testing. In local history it is remarkably so—an achievement of great and obvious difficulty. Not only have books been calendared, but many learned periodicals have been indexed, perhaps in the case of the English Historical Review rather jejune, but still with reference to nearly all really important articles. We may call attention to the special excellence of the section on the Anglo-Saxon laws—but only as an example of the whole treatment. The section on “the Vill and the Manor” is of interest, too, now that Professor Ashley has republished his articles on the subject—some of them trivial certainly, but the greater part worth consideration. In the introductory section on Historical Methods we should have liked to see a reference to Dr. G. W. Prothero’s inaugural lecture at Edinburgh. Another omission here and there might be noted. But on the whole the book is a remarkable achievement to which we can give unstinted admiration.

Dr. Lee’s book, though it has an excellent brief bibliography of sources, is for the most part a collection of extracts from the original sources of English history. It seems to us very well done—not, perhaps, quite so well as the similar volume issued in 1898 by another American Professor, Dr. Colby, of McGill University, but still with obvious merits. As it will probably run to a second edition we may note a few special points. The section on Anglo-Saxon laws might, we think, be supplemented, and is certainly in need of some explanatory foot-notes. William the Conqueror’s charter to London is wrongly translated. It should run, not “I grant you to be all law-worthy,” but “that ye two be law-worthy” (i.e., the bishop and the portreeve). Some illustrative extracts for the reign of Henry III. might be taken with advantage from Matthew Paris as well as from the laws of the time. In later times the use of the Somers Tracts is not always critical. Warren Hastings’s letter to John Shore should certainly not be printed without an acknowledgment of the great man’s complete exculpation in our own day. The book goes down even to the present Transvaal question, with extracts from the conventions of Pretoria and London.

A Good Prize Essay.

Charles III. of Spain has never had the reputation he deserved. Even in his own country people are only now awakening to his greatness, and in England his career has been strangely neglected. The monumental work of Señor Danvila y Collado will prevent the fame of the great reforming Bourbon again suffering eclipse in Spain. Mr. Addison’s modest but thorough little book, CHARLES III. OF SPAIN, the Stanhope Essay, 1900 (Blackwell, 2s. 6d. n.), will certainly attract attention in England to the history with which it is concerned. We have long ceased to sneer at prize essays, and this one is evidently the work of a cultivated writer, who has considerable knowledge of Spanish and French authorities, and is a capable historical critic. We should have liked a fuller treatment of Charles’ life and work in Naples, which was a real preparation for his Spanish Kingship. Naples was an absolute monarchy, but while to reign there was easy, to know how to govern was difficult; and Charles’ choice of Bernardo Tanucci for chief Minister was a turning point in his life. The influence of Tanucci throughout the whole of Charles’ later career can hardly be exaggerated. We wish Mr. Addison had given a fuller account of the King’s relations with Rome, for they would have illustrated the close association between King and Minister. Queen Amalia, a few months before her death, wrote to Tanucci on the general question, approving the aims of her husband, who was full of reverence for the Holy See, full of zeal and love for the Church, but determined to preserve the regalia and to correct abuses. Tanucci declared that the Romans would rather the people were ignorant, and that it was high time the clergy understood that the only result of popular ignorance was abuse of ecclesiastical power. The edict of 1762, declaring that all bulls should be subject to Royal sanction, delighted the Neapolitan Minister, and was a first step towards accomplishing the great design which Charles himself eagerly supported, of the banishment and eventually the suppression of the Jesuits. There are some points such as these which Mr. Joseph Addison, doubtless for reason of space, has too briefly treated. But his essay is excellent, and well worth study. He is especially interesting on the family compacts. We cannot conclude without noticing with pleasure that the name of Joseph Addison is again connected with the most beautiful of Oxford Colleges.

Macaulay.

The lecture on MACAULAY, which Professor Jebb gave last summer to the University Extension students at Cambridge, has recently been published (Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d.). The average student asks himself, as he reads Macaulay, whether the brilliant pictures which captivate his imagination are really compatible with an unclouded historical vision. This is the question which Professor Jebb sets himself to answer. He admits that Macaulay was not a scientific or philosophical historian, but he urges that he brought great gifts of another kind to his work, and, if partisanship is alleged against the History, contends that its general truth does not suffer in consequence. Macaulay’s acquittal of William III. in regard to the Glencoe massacre is always charged against him, and here Professor Jebb cannot defend him, for the facts are very strong against the King. But when we come to the other principal charge, that Macaulay’s sweeping assertion of the social inferiority of the clergy between 1660 and 1700 is altogether unwarranted, we are not sure that the defence is not abandoned somewhat too readily. Nor are we convinced that Macaulay would have relied, as the lecturer expects, only on the dramatists and satirists of the period to support him. Still, against these defects the author may fairly set Macaulay’s far more conspicuous merits, his diligence, his knowledge of details, his narrative power, and his artistic sense of material; qualities, especially the last two, which are not prodigally exhibited by all historians. The lecture is a popular and a just appreciation, both from a historical and from a literary point of view.

Mr. C. L. Stainer, in his SPEECHES OF OLIVER CROMWELL (Frowde, 6s.), performs a task to which one or other of Cromwell’s numerous biographers might perhaps more profitably have devoted themselves. A collection of these speeches starting from a period before the Civil War, and based on careful textual criticism is what we do not possess, and it is this which Mr. Stainer’s careful collation of the original sources now gives us. Unfortunately, it is impossible to get back to Cromwell’s actual words with certainty as our authorities are not first-hand reports, and are, moreover, probably too often translations from somewhat clumsy shorthand. But the book fills a gap in the complete “documentation” of the Protector.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Egypt.

EGYPT AND THE HINTERLAND, by Frederic Walter Fuller (Longmans, 10s. 6d. n.), is, in the main, written from bluebooks. From these unimpeachable sources it brings together much information, chiefly about the reforms instituted under English direction, in the departments of justice, finance, education, irrigation, &c. The ground has already been pretty well covered in Sir Alfred Milner’s “England in Egypt” and Mr. Silva White’s “Expansion of Egypt,” not to mention Mr. Basil Worsfold’s Temple Primer. Mr. Fuller is able to supplement these books in certain particulars, but he cannot, and apparently does not, claim to have superseded them. As an unpretentious work of reference his book may be found an acceptable substitute for other similar books. More than that one cannot say for it, except that it contains a remarkably good map. It certainly will not be found to furnish light reading for leisure hours, as did Steevens’ “Egypt in 1898”; and we cannot help remarking Mr. Fuller’s curious notion of literary antithesis: “It is true the Copts hang ostrich eggs in their churches, but they do not recognize polygamy.” It should be added, however, that Mr. Fuller displays a great knowledge of the Copts, and what he has written should be read by all who are curious about these peculiar Christians. But why does he treat Mahdism without reference—or with only a passing reference—to the Senussi?

For further information about the Copts, fuller but less interesting, we must turn to the Rev. Montague Fowler's CHRISTIAN EGYPT (Church Newspaper Company, 6s.). Mr. Fowler, as a traveller, a divine, and the son of Sir John Fowler who performed valuable engineering work in Egypt, is well qualified for the task of tracing Christianity from Alexandrian times through the early history of the Coptic Church to the present day, when Copts in their various subdivisions, together with Anglicans, and Presbyterians, represent the Christian faith. The book is not brilliant in its literary style, and attempts only a chronicle of the external history of religion in Egypt. For this purpose it will be found a useful compendium of information.

West Africa.

Far the most important additions which appear in the second edition of Miss Kingsley's WEST AFRICAN STUDIES (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.) are her learned and lucid Hibbert Lecture on "African Religion and Law," and her Imperial Institute Lecture on "Imperialism in West Africa." The lecture on "Imperialism" lends itself to quotation by both sides in the dispute and does not seem to us very forcible; the chapter on West African Property contains little new matter. Much interest of a different kind attaches to the account of Captain Thomas Phillips' voyage in the Hannibal in 1693-94, given in an appendix; and also to Mr. George Macmillan's well-written appreciation of Miss Kingsley which appears in an introductory notice.

Military.

THE REGIMENTAL RECORDS OF THE BRITISH ARMY, by John L. Farmer (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d. n.), is an historical résumé, chronologically arranged, of titles, campaigns, honours, uniforms, facings, badges, nick-names, &c. There it may be read that the Royal Fusiliers are also known as the "Elegant Extracts," the Norfolk Regiment as "the Holy Boys," the Somersetshire Light Infantry as "the Bleeders," the Fourteenth Hussars as "the Emperor's Chambermaids," and the Fifth Lancers as "the Daily Advertisers." It is sumptuously bound and printed, and will serve well those in quest of the information which it gives.

YEOMANRY CAVALRY OR MOUNTED INFANTRY? by Colonel Rolleston, of the South Notts Hussars Yeomanry Cavalry, second in command of the 3rd Imperial Yeomanry (Smith, Elder, 1s. 6d.), is a well-reasoned pamphlet protesting against the proposal to turn the Yeomanry into mounted infantry, favoured by Dr. Conan Doyle and others. An excellent instance of the need for the arme blanche is cited in the case of De Wet's escape by galloping through our lines at Springhaan's Nek. Our mounted infantry there "fired away at him merrily," but "hit practically no one." On the other hand, "if, instead of men armed after the heart of Dr. Conan Doyle, there had been waiting for him a dozen squadrons of mounted lancers—how then? How many would in that case have escaped?" The pamphlet is one of those that should be read.

Military histories continue to rain upon us. Now we have THE RIFLE BRIGADE (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), by Walter Wood. It tells the story of a gallant regiment which has twenty-nine battle honours, and has won distinction with Nelson at Copenhagen, with Wellington in the Peninsula and at Waterloo, and also in the Crimea, in India, and in South Africa. Not only were the rifles at Ladysmith; they also took part in a campaign against the Boers under Sir Harry Smith in 1848. The book is moderately well written.

Naval.

The Navy Records Society have issued Vol. II. of LOGS OF THE GREAT SEA FIGHTS (Longmans), covering the battles of the Nile, Copenhagen, and Trafalgar. The engagements have been the subject of exhaustive study, and it can hardly be said that the logs throw much fresh light upon them. On the vexed question of Collingwood's behaviour after Nelson's death at Trafalgar, the editor, Admiral T. Sturges Jackson, says:—

He hardly seems to have appreciated the principle of the orders which he so ably executed. . . . While every allowance must be made for the great difficulties of the situation, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that had Nelson lived he would not have permitted any of his hard won prizes to fall again into the hands of the enemy, though he might have been compelled to destroy them.

In addition to the logs the volume contains some interesting private letters not previously published. One of these, from Rear-Admiral Thomas Graves to his brother, supplies most of the evidence for the editor's view of Nelson's attitude towards Sir Hyde Parker.

The latest naval pamphlet is THE BRITISH FLEET: IS IT SUFFICIENT AND EFFICIENT? by Archibald S. Hurd (Blackwood, 1s.). The author answers both questions in the negative, and makes various suggestions, most of which are endorsed in an introductory chapter contributed by Admiral Fremantle. On Mr. Hurd's proposal that a certain number of warrant officers should be promoted to lieutenancies, the Admiral writes:—"This, I am convinced, could be done with advantage to the service, if the number were limited, say, to ten a year, and the men were carefully selected, while the effect on recruiting would be incalculable."

Natural History.

About nine out of ten intelligent observers of current literature welcomed the late Mr. Grant Allen as a popularizer of science rather than as a writer of fiction or an assailant of the conventional ideas of British religion and morality. The majority will receive confirmation of their verdict from each of the excellent essays which are now set forth under the title of IN NATURE'S WORKSHOP (Newnes, 3s. 6d.). For almost every page of this entertaining and informing book shows some happy example of the combination of humour and science. It is impossible to read far without seeing how genial and learned (in the best sense) was that son of Canada and Oxford whom too many "men in the street" thought of as only a tilter at venerable windmills. The first essay, "Sextons and Scavengers," is full of bright, natural writing, such as the following:—

. . . those [small animals] that die in the field or copse are either eaten at once by larger beasts, or else decently interred within a few hours by the sexton beetles and other established scavengers. . . . I need hardly say, however, that the burying beetles do not perform their strange funereal office out of pure benevolence, without hope of reward. Like human sextons and undertakers, they adopt their lugubrious calling for the sake of gain: they expect to be paid for their sanitary services. The payment is taken in two forms: one, immediate, as food for themselves; the other, deferred, as board and lodging for their children.

In "False Pretences," the whole description of the life and character of that insect which is usually known to grooms and footmen as "The Devil's Coach-horse" is exceedingly graphic. Mr. Enock's illustrations to this chapter are admirable, his insects here being as well drawn as are his flowers in the next essay, "Plants that go to sleep."

The chapter upon "Animal and Vegetable Hedgehogs" is beautifully illustrated, and goes straight to the heart of any one who has ever succeeded in introducing a hedgehog to an urban garden. In "The Day of the Canker-worm," Mr. Grant Allen gives special attention to what is called "the seventeen-year" cicada, that pest of Kentucky and other American States. Aided by Mr. Enock's illustrations, any intelligent lad can gain from the letterpress a singularly accurate conception of the wonderful ovipositor of these insects; a section of the cicada's saw is portrayed, and four stages of its nest and eggs, as found in a chestnut twig. "In Nature's Workshop" forms excellent light reading for all persons save men of science and insect-hating females. The book comes to us as a legacy not unworthy of the naturalist who wrote it. But it is strange that the volume should be issued without an index, and without any preface or note of a biographical and bibliographical nature.

To Messrs. Sands' "Library for Young Naturalists," which began with Mr. Afalo's "Types of British Animals," is now added Mr. H. A. Bryden's ANIMALS OF AFRICA (6s.). It is copiously and well illustrated, and written by a sportsman who has as much reason to know about African animals as anybody living. His style strikes an admirable mean between the too childish and the too scientific and is, indeed, exactly what the young naturalist wants.

India.

Surgeon Hare served through the first Afghan war and was present through the siege of Delhi during the Mutiny, and this, to say nothing of the second Burma war, provides reasonable material for a book such as the MEMOIRS OF EDWARD HARE, C.S.I., late Inspector-General of Hospitals, Bengal, by Major E. C. Hare (Grant Richards, 5s.). Hare's letters from Kabul form an interesting addition to the narratives already published, and his frankness engages the reader's confidence. He was at Jellalabad at the time of the disastrous retreat, and saw Dr. Brydon, the only man who escaped, brought into the fort, and helped to nurse him to recovery. He describes the siege of Jellalabad in some vivid letters to his parents. We do not know that there is anything especially new in the correspondence, but it gives a good picture of the times, and Major Hare has done well to publish it without reserve. Hare's greatest service to India was his discovery of the value of quinine as a specific for malarial fevers, instead of the old treatment by calomel and bleeding, which often injured the patient's constitution for life. He published a series of articles in the Medical Times of 1864, which were reprinted as a separate work, "The Treatment of Malarious Fevers and Dysentery," which produced a marked change in the methods of physicians in the East. He rose to be Deputy-Inspector-General of Hospitals in India, and on his retirement in 1866 was gazetted Honorary-Inspector-General and awarded the Companionship of the Star of India. He died in 1897 at the age of 84. The little book is pleasantly written, with all needful historical commentary, and is a model of editorial tact and judgment. The illustrations from original sketches or after Lieut. Rattray's published drawings, are charming, and there are some useful maps.

The centre of interest in India shifted long since from the Madras to the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies. Still, though Madras politics are humdrum, there is much there to occupy the attention of the student of ethnology and of the manners of primitive man. It is of these matters that Mr. Stanley P. Rice mainly writes in his OCCASIONAL ESSAYS ON NATIVE SOUTH INDIAN LIFE (Longmans, 10s. 6d.). His sphere of usefulness was, for a long time, among the Uriyas—a little known people, with various peculiar customs of their own, a little to the south of Orissa. The marriage and funeral rites of these people, their superstitious and religious observances, and their general habits (not in the main commendable) are described by Mr. Rice, from intimate personal knowledge, in an agreeable and cultivated style. His long paper on this subject, filling about half his volume, will be welcomed by those who are curious to penetrate beneath the surface of Indian life, as well as to those who take an interest in the traditions of partially civilized peoples. The other papers are slighter, but they, too, have their value.

St. Anthony of Padua.

Mrs. Arthur Bell's ST. ANTHONY OF PADUA (Sands and Co., 3s. 6d.) is a distinctly picturesque biography of the eminent Franciscan preacher, miracle-worker, and malleus hereticorum. He was a learned man, according to the standard of his times; attractive and eloquent; personally irreproachable; courageous. These facts at any rate emerge from the legends with which his history has been embroidered. But, as his history has to be disentangled from a great deal of fiction, it is necessary to take a more decided line in regard to his legendary miracles than Mrs. Bell has adopted. St. Anthony of Padua is credited with an indefinite number of miracles, performed both before his death and afterwards. Some of these the author quotes as legendary; others, to judge from the terms in which she refers to them, she seems to accept as historical facts. She gives no reason for this discriminating view of the matter, nor do we see how any such reason can be given or any criterion applied. One hardly knows what should be done in such a case as this. Take the miracles away, or remove them to an appendix, and nothing remains but a pious and strenuous preacher, whose story has lost half its charm. Include them as though they were true, and the result is not a biography, but an unscientific mixture of fact and fiction. The preface obliges us to treat the book as a biography, and consequently exposes it to this remark. We should have preferred to take it, less seriously, as a pleasantly-written account of what history and legend combined have to say of St. Anthony, without considering how much of it is true or untrue. It may be that he did not really reunite a severed leg, did not restore a shattered glass, did not attract a shoal of fish by his preaching. The circumstances may conceivably have been misreported. But the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, if not later ages, believed them, and Italian art repeatedly recorded these and other miracles of his in pictures and bas-reliefs. Some of these are agreeably reproduced in this volume. Mrs. Bell has a good chapter on St. Anthony's place in art, and, except for the difficulty we have already mentioned, has written a satisfactory book. The difficulty, however, is one which a biographer is bound to meet.

An Astronomical Epoch-maker.

Mr. James Sime's WILLIAM HERSCHEL AND HIS WORK (T. and T. Clark, 3s.) is the second volume of the "series" called "The World's Epoch-Makers," and is, on the whole, a favourable example of this class of biographical compilation. The writer is occasionally a little obscure, and has an awkward trick of running ahead of his dates and then turning back to them; but he knows his subject and is thoroughly in sympathy with Herschel and his clever, grumbling, managing sister Caroline. Mr. Sime has a good deal to say about the piquant detail of the musician-astronomer having deserted from the Hanoverian army, in which he was a bandsman, and suggests that this awkward circumstance may have had much to do with his tardy recognition in Royal quarters. But surely that recognition was not very tardy, after all; while the permission that was given him by George III., as King's Astronomer, to make telescopes for his own profit entitled him to accumulate fortune enough to endow the baronetcy which was conferred upon his hardly less distinguished son. Not the least striking part of Mr. Sime's story is the amazing physical strength, vitality, and activity of William and Caroline Herschel. They laboured from morning till night, and from night till morning again; yet the one lived to well over eighty, and the other to nearly a hundred. The discoverer of Uranus worked at a time when astronomy was at a turning-point, and, as Arago said, his life formed an epoch in an extensive branch of the science. His great telescope, not so wonderful now in the light of all that, thanks largely to him, has since been accomplished, was one of the marvels of his time, and it is rather painful to read of its compulsory breaking up from decay. Mr. Sime gives a pleasant and piquant account of Caroline Herschel, with her adoration for her famous brother, her impatience with people who praised him insufficiently, or in the wrong way, and her matured conviction, in extreme old age, that it was impossible for her to spend more than £100 a year "without making myself ridiculous."

Commercial Federation.

COMMERCIAL FEDERATION AND COLONIAL TRADE POLICY, by John Davidson, Professor of Political Economy in the University of New Brunswick (Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.), surveys these subjects from the standpoint of a philosopher who is also a practical man and a colonist of strong Imperialist inclinations. Actual commercial federation Mr. Davidson believes to be impracticable, since it would benefit the colonial producer at the cost of the British consumer, who would soon kick when prices rose. But he offers alternative suggestions for policies which, to a certain extent, would produce the same results. The Imperial Government "could assist in making colonial goods better known to the English consumer," could "make a point of buying its military and naval supplies as far as possible in the colonies," "might within limits guarantee colonial government debts," and "might even go further and make loans for the construction of great public works like the Canadian Pacific Railway." Incidentally Professor Davidson pays a colonial tribute to the work done by Mr. Kipling in welding the Empire and making its heirs conscious of the greatness of their heritage:—

We protested our loyalty too much, and yet regarded the Empire as England's, not as ours. Canada was a dependency. And, much as we disliked to admit the individual superiority of the men of the islands, we did bear ourselves as inferiors and allowed ourselves to be patronized. Kipling brought us to self-consciousness and to self-respect. He made us see that all talk about loyalty to the Empire was a mistaken use of terms, because it did not express the truth of the situation. He showed us that the Empire was ours, and that colonists had in it not the place of an hired servant, but that of a younger son who had not wasted his substance in riotous living in a far country. It is as the poet of the native-born that he has done most for the Empire. He has not only brought the colonies to a perfect passion of devotedness; he has also expressed the thoughts they themselves did not know they cherished. He has, in short, been to the Empire what Burns was to Scotland, the revealer of men to themselves.

In Tuscany.

Mr. Montgomery Carmichael, the author of IN TUSCANY, TUSCAN TOWNS, TUSCAN TYPES, AND THE TUSCAN TONGUE (Murray, 9s. n.), has lived during many years in Tuscany, and is thoroughly familiar both with the towns and villages of this pleasant land and with the ways of its kindly and simple folk. He is keenly alive to the excellences and imperfections of Tuscan servants and peasants, to their inborn grace of manner, their sunny courtesy, their honesty and affection, their dirt, slovenliness, and indifference to truth. Many are the amusing experiences which he has to relate, many the clever portraits which he draws of individual types—the begging friar, Fra Pacifico; the cook Elvirina, who tells so many barefaced lies and eventually proves herself a valuable housekeeper and skilled cordón bleu; and his faithful, but eccentric, servant Benedetto. Convents and religious orders have for him, he owns, an especial attraction, and one of the best chapters in the book describes a pilgrimage to the great Franciscan sanctuary, La Verna, in the lovely district of the Casentino, while another records a visit to the less known house of the Passionist Order on the heights of Monte Argentario, near Orbetello. Mr. Carmichael prides himself on omitting all reference to the famous cities of Florence and Siena, and gives us instead descriptions of much less-visited towns as Leghorn, Volterra, Lucca, and Portoferraio, the harbour of the island of Elba. But in speaking of the treasures in the Cathedral of Lucca, and telling us of the miraculous Volte Santo and of Matteo Civitali's sculpture, he might have mentioned the perfect tomb of Ilaria del Carretto which Mr. Ruskin has celebrated in matchless prose, and which must always have an especial attraction for English travellers. The last two and not the least interesting chapters of his book are devoted to the popular Tuscan game of pallone, and the famous State Lottery which produces a yearly revenue of at least £1,000,000 and exerts so baneful an influence on the Italian character. But since, as our author remarks, the Tuscans are born gamblers, this strange institution may act as a safety-valve and restrain them from worse excesses. Mr. Carmichael's book is charmingly illustrated with clever sketches of Tuscan types, reproductions of Civitali's Madonna and of the arms of cities and religious orders, as well as views of the seaboard at Leghorn, of the wooded slopes of Montecatini in the fair Val di Nievole, and of the rugged heights of La Verna.

Dutch and English.

Mr. Francis J. Dormer is an ex-editor of the Johannesburg Star. In VENGEANCE AS A POLICY IN AFRIKANDERLAND

(Nisbet, 6s.) he endeavours to allocate responsibilities for what has happened. Though the germs of trouble were always present in South Africa, the trouble, in Mr. Dormer's opinion, would never have come to a head had not virulent personal feelings been imported into political controversies. This, of course, is what Lord Kimberley meant when he said that, if the Foreign Office conducted its business in the same style as the Colonial Office, it would embroil England with every country in Europe in next to no time; but the Colonial Office is only one of the objects of Mr. Dormer's indictment. His general view of the situation is that Dutch and English were not born to love each other, but that they would have settled their differences instead of fighting over them, if their respective protagonists had not hounded them on to the combat. In short, the blood of our soldiers is now being spilt on the veldt because Mr. Kruger mistrusted Mr. Rhodes, and because Mr. Rhodes, having once been baffled by Mr. Kruger, wanted to "get even" with him; while Mr. Chamberlain also had grudges to pay off, in connexion with rebuffs encountered at the time of the raid, and Lord Salisbury remembered Majuba. The story of the war, in fact, according to Mr. Dormer, shows that democracies can furnish their own examples of Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi. Mr. Dormer, as an Afrikaner journalist, has no doubt a good title to be heard, and he states his case clearly as well as emphatically. He is not a pro-Boer; he is, in fact, particularly bitter against Mr. Kruger. But he holds that there will be no durable union between English and Dutch in South Africa unless Mr. Rhodes is suppressed:—

His temperament [says Mr. Dormer] is subject to this radical vice of phenomenal vindictiveness. . . . The Ethiop does not change his skin nor the leopard its spots. The Dutch are as conspicuously lacking in the quality of pliancy as Mr. Rhodes is in that of a wise forgetfulness, and we have only to contemplate the possibility of a prolonged struggle between natures so irreconcilably opposed to become seriously alarmed.

Alfred.

It is right and proper that the British public should make the Alfred millenary an occasion for refreshing their memories and supplementing their knowledge of the great King and his claims to renown; and it looks as though there would be no lack of books specially written to assist them in doing so. The subject is one which any writer may for ordinary purposes easily know as much about as any other writer if he will take the trouble; and it is only in the matter of "readableness" that their books ought to differ. This quality undeniably belongs to Mr. Warwick H. Draper's ALFRED THE GREAT (Elliot Stock, 5s.). It consists of a biographical sketch, followed by seven studies of different aspects of Alfred's life and works, and preceded by a preface from the pen of the Bishop of Hereford. Of the millenary books so far published this is the one to buy.

The manner of Mr. Lucy's Parliamentary Diaries is well known, and his DIARY OF THE UNIONIST PARLIAMENT, 1895-1900 (Arrowsmith), is as welcome as the others, with its happy blend of real history with good-natured personal gossip. Mr. E. T. Reed's pictures are convincing as portraits and they are funny, if not artistic. Mr. Lucy includes "Calendars" borrowed from THE POLITICIAN'S HANDBOOK, by H. Whates (Vacher, 6s. n.). This review and digest of the State papers of the year is a very useful annual publication, very well put together.

In SCOTS ESSAYISTS we have a selection of typical essays by typical Scottish authors, from Stirling and Drummond of Hawthornden to A. K. H. B. and Robert Louis Stevenson, edited with an introduction by Mr. Oliphant Smeaton (Walter Scott, 1s. 6d.).

WILLIAM HARLEY: A CITIZEN OF GLASGOW, by J. Galloway (Glasgow: Morison), is the biography of a man who "introduced turkey red checked gingham," whatever that may be, founded the Glasgow Sunday Schools, preached the Gospel, and went bankrupt.

A BOOK ABOUT LONGFELLOW, by J. N. M'Ilwraith (Nelson, 2s.), is an example of bookmaking of the better sort. There are plenty of pleasant anecdotes pleasantly narrated, though no new information, and the criticism, though not profound, is just and acceptable. The biographer quite recognizes Longfellow's limitations, though he naturally is more anxious to insist upon his merits.

We can warmly praise three "Manuals of Employment for Educated Women," edited by Christabel Osborne (Walter Scott, 1s. each), entitled SECONDARY TEACHING, ELEMENTARY TEACHING, and SICK NURSING. The writers know their business and engage in no loose and idle talk about the essential nobility of the calling of a music mistress or a monthly nurse; but they supply plenty of practical information about the women workers in the different departments of human endeavour, telling them what sort of lives they will have to live, what sort of emoluments they may reasonably expect, and how and at what cost they may be trained for their professions.

ADVICE TO 20TH CENTURY BUSINESS JUNIORS (Horace Marshall, 1s.) is apparently written for the benefit of clerks and shop assistants. It covers a great deal of ground. Not only are the obvious virtues of civility and punctuality inculcated, but the author counsels his readers not to have breakfast in bed, not to bolt their meals, and not to "scorch" when they ride the bicycle. One must not complain because the advice is sometimes obvious, for, if every moralist conceived it to be his duty to devise absolutely new and original maxims for the guidance of youth, the consequences might be perplexing and disastrous.

FICTION.

Mr. Le Gallienne.

In THE LIFE ROMANTIC (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.) Mr. Le Gallienne purges himself of most of his fripperies. He does not wholly give up tying pretty ribbons into loveknots; he is still a little inclined to attitudinize with a daintily bound volume of erotic poetry in his hand. But the story of his hero, to whom the combined malignity of his ancestors and his parents has given the name of Pagan Wasteneys, and of his hero's emancipation from the slavery of a love which could never mean for him the happiness of married life, is told in good taste, with a pleasant literary touch; and the method of the emancipation is well, even finely conceived. For Wasteneys's slavery is not that of any commonplace liaison; his imagination is mastered by the face of a woman, Meriel, whom a chance meeting had united to him in a purely spiritual Platonic passion, and whom he saw and corresponded with but rarely. This lady, we may say at once, is not the lady to whom Wasteneys is making love in the first chapter, having just made her acquaintance at a tea party, and who reveals her name to him as "Daffodil Mendoza":—

"Mrs. Daffodil Mendoza!"

"Yes,"—with a pretty sigh.

"I always think Mrs. such a charming addition to the prettiest name."

The lady, we may add, was a widow, though she did not tell him so. We can assure the reader that this is quite an unfair idea of the book. It is certainly all more or less unreal; love-making does not go on so briskly in this unromantic world as Mr. Le Gallienne would have us think; his icy and remote Meriel we do not believe in; and the whole thing relapses into pure extravaganza when Wasteneys seeks Meriel in Provence with a revolver in his pocket determined to gain freedom for them both from the uncompleted dream—by killing her. Wasteneys, too, is, we are afraid, a poor creature at best, who can say as he walks through the moonlight to his ancestral home "Yes! nature is moral; nature is terribly pure and sane. But how sweet to be pure and sane!" and who is much given to recording his moods in lyrics. He is, in fact, a sentimental amorist, but of a more attractive type than Mr. Le Gallienne's other sentimental amorists. In his mental history it is not only women, but nature, and a Nonconformist preacher, and a Roman priest, who play their parts; and the history is recounted with far more sincerity than Mr. Le Gallienne has lately shown. Moreover, there are many fresh, happy touches, many pictures full of colour or of drama, many suggestive reflections throughout the book. And when the "fictional output" shows so little in the way of literary charm, when the inventor of the cumbrous obscurities which we quoted last week is called a master of style, it is something to find an author who writes fiction in a manner which, at its best, is certainly easy, graceful, and imaginative.

Mrs. Alexander.

Mrs. Alexander in her new book A MISSING HERO (Chatto, 6s.) means to be thoroughly pleasant—pleasant personages people it, pleasant incidents occur, pleasant ways are found out of unpleasant situations; Geoffrey Lisle, after many adventures, settles into an active country gentleman eager to breed cattle and be crowned with love; Maurice Forrester, who would have liked to be wicked, wins success in other ways and escapes the punishment of his evil intentions; other characters play their parts and miss or win their desires, and, at the end, the reader has not been very greatly moved or entertained. The picture of South Africa, in the time when Mr. Kruger was young, is admirably drawn, and its life depicted with skill and fluency. But the story itself, leisurely and obvious, will give more pleasure to the young and hopeful than to the experienced and wise.

When youth has done its tedious vain expense
Of passions that for ever ebb and flow

it is late to pretend a very powerful interest in such a volume as "A Missing Hero." But it is, of course, the work of an accomplished writer who has long ago conquered her particular field of fiction.

Under the Tudors.

THE ROYAL SISTERS (John Long, 6s.) is an historical novel, dealing with the days of Mary, and purporting to be written by no less a hand than that of Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord High Admiral of England. Mr. Frank Mathew has handled it all with much ingenuity—the death of Edward, Northumberland's rebellion and Wyatt's, the coming of Philip of Spain and the rest—but perhaps there is a shade too much of the history book in some of the speeches of these gentry. There is a great deal of dialogue, and wherever it was possible to weave in the speaker's actual words, as reported by some industrious historian, Mr. Mathew has done so. But he has done his work very creditably. Arundel, Elizabeth, Pembroke, are all delineated with care, if not in strict accordance with tradition, and sometimes with real pathos. The book is worth reading, for those who admire the historical novel; but it is sometimes just a little dull.

Convent Life.

The novelist who succeeds in drawing a girl's character, in the time of her passage from the child to the woman, has gone some way towards making an interesting book. Miss Bessie Hatton has done this in THE MASTER PASSION (Pearson, 6s.), and has introduced besides a good deal of love-making and a careful description of education in a French convent, so that her readers should have no cause to grumble at any lack of variety. The result is a creditable novel, containing some well-drawn characters and much passionate emotion. Perhaps there is too much of the Convent of the Visitation, but the theme has not elsewhere been overdone, and it bears marks of having been drawn from the inside. The young women are very charming—the young men suffer from comparison with them; to be frank, they are not quite as manlike as one could wish.

The Usher—Old Style.

When a book bears a title such as THE NEW MASTER (Pearson, 3s. 6d.), and is furthermore adorned on the cover by the portrait of a fatuous-looking gentleman enduring a bombardment of dead cats and other missiles, you may rely upon finding in its pages a good deal of the forced humour that most writers think necessary in dealing with stories of assistant masters. Mr. Arnold Golsworthy can be clever enough on occasion; but here he has deliberately chosen the cheapest kind of fun procurable, and he drives home every point he makes with an unrelenting grin. The ancient jest of the bad disciplinarian beset by a crew of disrespectful youth is played out once more, and we are not spared a single booby-trap. Mr. Galsworthy is capable of better things.

The War.

What M. Zola did so splendidly for the Franco-Prussian war, Mr. A. G. Hales, the somewhat impulsive war correspondent of the Daily News, essays to do for a certain portion of the South African campaign. DRISCOLL, KING OF SCOUTS (Arrowsmith, 6s), tells the story of well-known persons, and often under their own names (sometimes incorrectly given, as "Sealy" for the Captain of the Hampshire Yeomanry). But the reader will have cause to ask continually—is this fact or imagination? Often one knows the incidents are already historical. Often one trusts that they are invented by the writer. The moral, of course, is that we are mostly fools in war—and therefore in peace—but that, on the other hand, to quote the author's own ebullient phraseology, "The old Lioness of Britain whelps heroes still." And of one of these Charles Leverish heroes, Captain Driscoll, the famous scout, he writes con amore. His hero-worship is of a most engaging kind, and he even appears to enjoy Driscoll's wit which takes the form of never calling people by their names; the war correspondents are "quill-dhriving lumps av sin," his Boer maiden lover "yon voldt-bred flower." Mr. Hales' style of nomenclature for his characters is not happy. It is the old trick of the playwrights worn to death by the farces of the last century. To call your foolish officers "Glasseye" and "Pompom," and your good lieutenants "Ardwork," shows an aridity of humour unworthy of the writer of many stirring and often tender passages and so many vivid bits of description. Mr. Hales has made his fame in other fields, and we do not know whether novel writing is the particular branch of literature he intends to follow. We cannot give "Driscoll, King of Scouts" high praise as a novel. The use of real personages is poor art, the use of clap-trap phrases is also poor art; the style is hurried and occasionally hysterical and usually without distinction. But if we may judge the book rather as a compliment to a gifted soldier and a criticism of a military system we can commend his endeavour and appreciate his accomplishment.

Mr. George Cossins must, we suspect, have been led more by a desire to be up-to-date than by his own judgment to write A BOER OF TO-DAY (George Allen, 6s.). It is a simply constructed and not badly written tale, but it is disappointing to those who found hopes on titles. Recent events have familiarized us all with Boer life, and Mr. Cossins adds nothing to our knowledge. The Boer of to-day goes to England, and, inevitably, falls in love with an English maiden, who, equally inevitably, cannot accept his suit in spite of his wealth. He returns to the Transvaal shortly before the war, and can only serve his fellows by playing the spy so unsuccessfully that he is shot while trying to escape. He makes amends by a kind of pseudo-heroism in saving the lives of some of his English friends. The last part of the book is the most readable.

THE LUCK OF PRIVATE FOSTER (Hodder, 6s.), by Mr. A. St. John Adcock, ought to be popular, for it tells in agreeable fashion an obvious, pleasant tale of an heroic young gentleman whose misfortunes at home, undeserved of course, drive him to the war. The adventures that befall him are not startlingly convincing, but are well enough for the casual reader; simplicity is the predominant note of the book—naïveté of idea, naïveté in the writing, simple, honest story-telling from start to finish.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The article on "Fiction and the Public" which Mr. Frederick Wedmore recently contributed to Literature has called forth the opinions of some representative booksellers. According to the Daily Mail, his view that the good old public of past days is swamped by superficial readers of modern successes cannot be borne out by actual figures of sales. New editions of Dickens, Scott, Brontë, and Thackeray are still steadily sold. Librarians in general will confirm this view. Even in London, where most of the new novels are published, the works most in request from public libraries are those of old established writers. In the country, where fewer new novels penetrate, the old writers are first by a good many issues.

The will of the late Mr. R. C. Christie proclaims that his death has merely heaped up the bounty which might have been spread over lengthened years. Owens College receives books, manuscripts, pictures, and, eventually, a sum of £10,000 for library purchases. To the Royal Holloway College is bequeathed £2,500 to found a scholarship in history and two annual prizes for French and Italian literature. To the Library Association Mr. Christie has left £2,000.

We have good evidence of the popularity of the Edinburgh Public Library. To find room for the increasing flood of readers and for 120,100 volumes the library is to be extended at a cost of £8,000. On the other hand, owing to want of support the Edinburgh Subscription Library has closed its doors after an existence of more than a century. Yet, better fitted as the public library is to minister to modern requirements, the older library did good work in adverse circumstances. It nursed the spark which now its successor blows into full flame.

The Cardiff Public Library has been considerably stirred by what amounts to an ultimatum from the Publishers' Association directed against a firm which offered a discount of 15 per cent. off net books. The president of the Association wrote expressing a hope that the committee of the library would have nothing to do with this firm, and intimated that the supply of net books would be stopped unless the tender was withdrawn. The committee, however, accepted the offer of the firm.

The library movement has spread to Grimsby, where Lord Yarborough opened a public library last month. The Acts were adopted in 1899, and the premises of the old Mechanics' Institute have been adapted to the purposes of the library. It opens with a good selection of books of which a large number have been presented. A new district library, containing 12,000 volumes, has been opened at Bristol. This is the fourth additional library provided in the city within the last seven years.

We have received a well got up little volume from the Wigan Public Library. It is mainly an account of the presentation of the freedom of the borough to Lord Crawford, who is chairman of the library committee. There is also a history of the institution and a list of some of its rarest and most important books. The reference library at Wigan is evidently remarkably rich and well chosen.

Mr. John Macfarlane, assistant in the Department of Printed Books in the British Museum, has been appointed Director of the Imperial Public Library, Calcutta, and has left England to take up the duties of his new position.

Mr. John Shepherd, Assistant Librarian of the Cardiff Public Libraries, has been selected as Librarian of the public library at Birkenhead.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

There are as many as three South African articles in the Contemporary. The most important of them, by a pseudonymous "Cape Town," apparently a man on the spot, is very pessimistic. The author would have a far better title than Sir Robert Reid to protest against the appellation of pro-Boer; but he considers that we have made a mess of things. "Lord Roberts has been a failure and Lord Kitchener has not been a success. Sir Gordon Sprigg, in spite of his good intentions, is a danger to the security, not only of the Colony, but also of the Empire." "The statesmanship of Paul," by Professor W. M. Ramsay, is not about Mr. Kruger, but about the Apostle of the Gentiles. "The case of the British Army Officer," by an Army Instructor, takes the reasonable line that, even in military circles, a fair day's work should be rewarded with a fair day's wage. "The training college problem" is discussed by Mr. J. H. Yoxall, M.P. It is really wonderful how many "problems" there are in these hard times. Mr. John Macdonell, C.B., hits out straight from the shoulder on the subject of "Looting in China"; and Mademoiselle Claire de Pratz encourages us to expect great things from subcutaneous injections of the glyccero-phosphates. They stimulate the system, we are assured, like cold baths and trips to the mountains or sea-side. But who is responsible for "Mdle." as the abbreviation of "Mademoiselle"?

As usual there is something good for everybody's taste in the Fortnightly. "Diplomaticus" contributes a study of the Queen's reign, insisting upon "the profound love and sympathy for Germany," by which her Majesty was always animated; and Miss Helen Zimmern a study of "Victor Emmanuel III., King of Italy," from whom she expects great things; "young, energetic, and far-seeing, serious, cultivated, he will know how, when the hour comes, to choose the road which suits the monarchy and the people, and without the Parliament, but with and for his people, for the good and the honour of the Fatherland." The necessary article on Verdi is by Mr. J. Cuthbert Hadden. Military matters are represented by a paper in which Mr. W. A. Baillie-Grohman insists on the importance of learning to shoot straight; and Irish affairs are attended to by Mr. T. W. Russell, who declares, with all the emphasis of "small caps," that "to settle the Irish Land Question is to BUY OUT THE FEE SIMPLE OF IRISH DISAFFECTION." There is also an article by Maeterlinck on the unexpected, and not very symbolistic, theme of bees, and one by Mr. G. Percival on "The Civil List and the Hereditary Revenues of the Crown"; while Mr. Wells engages in controversy with Colonel Balfour on the subject of cyclist drill.

Mr. W. G. Elliot in the National Review echoes the growing pessimism on the prospects of the stage as a profession, and shows that as a result partly of low salaries, partly of specialization of parts, actors or actresses of real merit and position can hardly make a decent livelihood. An article of interest in another branch of art is Mr. G. F. Bodley's plea for higher ideals in modern architecture, in which he discusses thirteen principles of good building which are curiously reminiscent of Ruskin. The note of war sounds in articles on the Future of the Yeomanry, on M. Bloch as a Prophet (by Colonel Maude), and on the South African Hospitals inquiry, in the latter of which the Bishop of St. Asaph undertakes to show that Mr. Burdett-Coutts was by no means so well justified in his criticism as people have lately begun to think. Sir R. Blennerhassett pleads ably for a good understanding between England and Russia.

In the Gentleman's Magazine are memorial lines on her late Majesty, signed E. M. Rutherford, which have a Tennysonian ring, and please us better than many of the elegies of more famous poets. Those who read the lines we quote will want to read the rest:—

When watching, at the sun-set hour, the clouds—
Which, in white majesty, do onward ride
Gold-lin'd, in fleecy and fantastic shapes
Out towards the West—then in a waking dream
We look, beyond the hills, to that far sea
Whose waters wash an island valley's shore,
Fairer than that she left. But not in pomp
We see her thither borne. No muffled peal
Or cannon's thunder greets her coming there,
Nor dirge of fun'ral march or hymnal strain,
But a great silent peace o'er which doth steal—
Borne on the perfumed air—a whisper'd breath
Of Welcome Home from voices known and lov'd.
Deep to the strand the full, calm ocean moves
Around the Isle; so that no grating keel
Sounds on the shingle; and the bark is moor'd
In stillness—and the shadows shroud the rest.

In the North American Review the place of honour is given to Mark Twain. Mr. W. D. Howells studies the great humourist's contributions to literature, remarking:—

One of the characteristics I observe in him is his single-minded use of words, which he employs as Grant did to express the plain, straight meaning their common acceptance has given them with no regard to their structural significance or their philological implications. He writes English as if it were a primitive and not a derivative language, without Gothic or Latin or Greek behind it, or German and French beside it. The result is the English in which the most vital works of English literature are cast, rather than the English of Milton, and Thackeray, and Mr. Henry James.

Most of us, perhaps, have already observed that Mr. Mark Twain writes otherwise than Mr. Henry James; and we have the opportunity of reviving our impressions by reading an article by him addressed "To the Person Sitting in Darkness." It is about America in the Philippines, English enterprise in South Africa, and German enterprise in China.

Next, to our heavy damage, the Kaiser went to playing the game without first mastering it. He lost a couple of missionaries in a riot in Shan-tung, and in his account he made an overcharge for them. China had to pay a hundred thousand dollars apiece for them, in money; twelve miles of territory, containing several millions of inhabitants and worth twenty million dollars; and to build a monument, and also a Christian church; whereas the people of China could have been depended upon to remember the missionaries without the help of these expensive memorials. This was all bad play. Bad, because it would not, and could not, and will not now or ever, deceive the Person Sitting in Darkness. He knows that it was an overcharge. He knows that a missionary is like any other man; he is worth merely what you can supply his place for, and no more. He is useful, but so is a doctor, so is a sheriff, so is an editor; but a just Emperor does not charge war prices for such.

Mr. Henry James certainly does not write like that. Other contributors to the number are Mr. Augustine Birrell, Sir Lepel Griffin, and Mr. Arthur Symonds.

The contributors to the second number of the Empire Review are not so uniformly famous as the contributors to the first number, though they include the Bishop of Peterborough, Lord Stratheona, and M. Yves Guyot, whose name is becoming very familiar to magazine readers. The articles are interesting, but in some cases too short to allow the writers to do full justice to their subjects. The best informed article in the number seems to be that by Sir Walter Miéville on "British Administration in Egypt."

Harper's Magazine leads off with one of Mr. Arthur Symonds' delightful travel articles—a sketch of Seville, wonderfully well illustrated by Mr. Lucius Hitchcock. A new serial by Miss Mary E. Wilkins also begins in this number, while the best known contributors of short stories are Mr. Bret Harte and Miss Edith Wharton. "Colonies and Nations," by Woodrow Wilson, is one of those carefully written contributions to American history which are standing attractions in American periodicals. The whole world seems to have been ransacked for illustrations for it.

The Badminton goes on with its subject pictures in colours: "The tiger roared and sprang," &c. There are articles on sport of one sort or another, in quarters of the world as remote from each other as Rhodesia and Iceland, Skye and the Pyrenees. The claims of Bridge to take the place of Whist are stated by Mr. Archibald Dunn, junior. "Whist makes the heaviest call on the card-memory, but Bridge requires from its exponents greater judgment both before and during the play of the hand."

The United Service Magazine has many things worth noting, and especially a long article on "Hysterical Warfare," by Dr. Miller Maguire. "Who drives fat oxen, &c.," and Dr. Maguire very properly discusses his subject in the language of hysteria. Colonel Maude's long series of notes on the evolution of cavalry has now got to Spichenen; and Judge O'Connor Morris, in his history of Frederick the Great, gets to Minden.

In the New Liberal Review Viscount Mountmorres writes of "Queen Victoria," Dr. Robertson Nicoll of "The Political Aspects of Church Union in Scotland," and Mr. W. Macneile Dixon on "The Making of a Modern University."

Two articles on the Humanitarian merit attention: one in which Mr. Wirt Gerrare shows in what respects "The Russia that is" differs from the Russia of the novelists, and one in which the late Grant Allen draws a moral from Stevenson's confession that he hardly ever wrote about women because he was afraid of offending the prudishness of the British public.

In addition to the serials by Mr. Kipling and Mr. Pemberton, Cassell's Magazine has short stories by Mr. Edwin Pugh, Mr. Edward H. Cooper, Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe, and John Strange Winter. Among the trick articles that by Mrs. Belloc Lowndes on "Famous Horsewomen" is just what such an article ought to be.

We have also received the Reformer, Little Folks, the Munsey, the Lady's Realm, the Universal and Ludgate, Saint Nicholas, the Art Journal, the Century, the House, the Magazine of Art, the School World, the Antiquary, the Genealogical Magazine, the Eastern Counties Magazine, the Literary Era, the Woman at Home, Mercure de France, and Le Pays de France.

OBITUARY.

The late Mr. FREDERICK S. ELLIS was not merely a man of great book knowledge, but was an early and intimate friend (as well as the publisher) of Dante Rossetti, William Morris, and other men who have long since become eminent. The son of Mr. Joseph Ellis of the Star and Garter, Richmond, and brother of Sir Whittaker Ellis, he began his career with Edward Lumley, a well-known bookseller and publisher of 56, Chancery-lane, but his real book knowledge was acquired with C. J. Stewart, the once famous and learned bookseller of King William-street, Strand. Mr. Ellis started in business on his own account at 33, King-street, Covent-garden, but after a few years he purchased the goodwill of the business of T. and W. Boone at 20, New Bond-street, from which he retired some fifteen years ago. His stock was sold at Sotheby's in November, 1885, the sale occupying twelve days, and included many books of the highest interest and rarity, realizing a total of £16,000.

During his career as a bookseller Mr. Ellis was intrusted with very many important commissions. He valued the Hamilton Palace manuscripts (of which the chief portion was purchased for Berlin, and the remainder was sold in London) and arranged the division into equal portions of the famous library of Baron Seilliére, one portion of which was sold in London in 1887. He is understood to have compiled the catalogue of the Henry Perkins Library, which was dispersed in 1873, and which, though not large, proved to be one of the choicest libraries ever sold by auction in this country. He was also one of the valuers of the Ashburnham collection of printed books and manuscripts; but, perhaps the most enduring monument to his great bibliographical knowledge is his portion of the work in compiling the noble Catalogue of the library formed by the late Henry Huth. Whilst still engaged in business Mr. Ellis, in addition to the Huth catalogue, did much literary work, and wrote privately printed accounts of the Pembroke Book of Hours, 1880, and of the Brandenberg Book of Hours, 1883, as well as compiling a catalogue of the collection of drawings and etchings by Charles Meryon, formed by the Rev. J. J. Heywood, 1880. After his retirement from business Mr. Ellis published an excellent "Concordance" to Shelley's Poetical Works (1892). Of the works produced at the Kelmescott Press of his old friend William Morris he edited eleven issues:—"The Golden Legend," 1892; "Poems," by W. Shakespeare, 1893; "The Order of Chivalry," 1892; "The Life of Thomas Wolsey," 1893; More's "Utopia," 1893; "Psalmi Penitentiales," 1894; "Poetical Works" of Shelley, 1895; "Syr Percyvelle of Gales," 1895; Herrick's "Poems," 1895; Coleridge's "Poems," 1896; the magnum opus of the press, the Chaucer, 1896; "The Floure and the Leafe," 1896. When the rise in the Kelmescott books began Mr. Ellis said that he should live to see the Chaucer fetch £100; unfortunately he was not spared to see this, although the book has now reached to just four times its subscription price. Mr. Ellis edited another edition of Cavendish's "Life of Wolsey" for the Temple Classics, to which series also he contributed his own version of "The Roman of the Rose," only just lately published. He wrote several delightful monographs for Mr. Quaritch's "Dictionary of English Book Collectors," notably on Mr. Huth, Bertram, Earl of Ashburnham, George Daniel, and Dr. Hawtrey of Eton. Mr. Ellis, who was a diseur de bons mots, is credited with the saying that "confrère" in the book trade meant a man who would cut your throat if he could do it with impunity! But autre temps, autre mœurs!

The late Dr. W. BRIGHT's first work, "Ancient Collects Selected from various Rituals," was published nearly half a century ago, when he was Theological Tutor at Trinity College, Glenalmond, under Dr. Wordsworth. This position and that of Bell Professor of Ecclesiastical History gave him much influence in the Scottish Episcopal Church, and an opportunity of research among its records. On a question of opinion his connexion with the Scotch Church was severed, and he became Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford in 1868, where as an Anglican historian and an authority on patristic literature he did excellent work. Messrs. Longmans published his well-known Latin version of the Prayer-book, of which he was co-editor with Canon Medd; as well as his "History of the Roman See in the Early Church"—a volume which included other studies in Church history; his "Waymarks in Church History"; "Some Aspects of Primitive Church Life"; "The Age of the Fathers" (in two volumes); "Lessons from the Lives of the Great Fathers: St. Athanasius, St. Chrysostom, and St. Augustine"; "The Incarnation as a Motive Power" (1891); and "Morality in Doctrine" (1892). One of his most successful works is his "Chapters of Early English Church History," first published by the Oxford University Press in 1877 (third edition 1897). He was responsible for many reprints of patristic treatises issued by the same publishers. One of Dr. Bright's last volumes was "The Law of Faith," published in 1896 by Messrs. Wells, Gardner, and Co. In 1885 he issued "Iona and other Verses," and his famous hymn "And now, O Father, Mindful of the Love" (Hymns Ancient and Modern) is generally popular.

The death of FÉLIX GRAS, poet and romancist, removes from the society of Provençal men of letters one of the most distinguished of their number; save for Frederic Mistral, indeed, none has used with finer effect the Provençal tongue of which he was so proud. In 1876 the epic poem, "Li Carounie," won for him a place at the head of the younger generation of Félibres; and in 1891 Gras was elected the Capoulié, or official master, of the Félibrige. Until his "Reds of the Midi" was translated into English, he worked practically without money-recompense; but so great was the vogue for that book (in this country partly by reason of Mr. Gladstone's appreciation), and in still greater degree in America, that he was enabled to build a beautiful little house not far from Saint Rémy, whither literary wayfarers have directed their steps during the last few years; for personally Félix Gras was a delightful man. Mrs. Thomas A. Janvier, in her translations of "The Reds of the Midi," "The White Terror," and "The Terror," three parts of the same great scheme, worked directly from the Provençal, consulting with the author whenever important questions arose.

Correspondence.

"THE AFTERTASTE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—“He calls me Heliogabalus!” cries the harmless man in the play. My assailant is even more severe in depicting me as a problem-monger, and withal scarcely accurate. A problem demands solution, and in “The Aftertaste” I have led up to the conclusion, and established it, that a woman who marries for any other motive than love—e.g., gratitude, respect, position, money—sins against herself. I might have gone further and urged that the sin affects her offspring.

One of the main causes of the abnormal increase of lunacy is the prevalent marriage of convenience, where the woman outrages nature. Where there should be attraction there is repulsion, and nature avenges herself on unnatural intercourse.

This is not a problem, but a psychological truth. Neither should an author be denounced for proclaiming boldly that a woman who marries without pure love entails misery on herself, her husband, and her children. In “The Aftertaste” I have put the case in its best aspect, for religion brings together an antipathetic couple. But it is religio quæ non religat.

Had I, after the French method, lent a charm to illicit passion, I should have been righteously denounced. I have, on the contrary, painted the Devil in his true colours, and the aftertaste of sin is bitter as gall.

COMPTON READE.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—If your columns are still open to the discussion of this subject, will you allow me to add my contribution to the controversy?

The ambiguous sentence “I ask you kindly to clear out that drawer,” which has called forth so many expressions of opinion on both sides, seems to me an unfortunate example, as it is not a typical one. The real point at issue is complicated by two peculiarities from which a typical example should be free.

First, the use of the adverb “kindly” to split the infinitive. This word is itself ambiguous, and in one of its two distinct senses I venture to suggest that it is not a true adverb—i.e., it does not modify the verb in respect of manner, time, place, or circumstance. Compare the two following examples:—

(1) “Will you speak kindly to this man?”

(2) “Will you kindly speak to this man?”

In (1) “kindly” is obviously an adverb of manner; the speaking is to be done in a kind manner. In (2) the word may bear the same meaning, though in that sense its position would be unusual. Ordinarily the sentence would be taken to mean “Will you be so kind as to speak to this man?” The kindness lies in speaking at all as opposed to not speaking; the manner of speaking is in no way indicated by the word “kindly.” I think it will be found that, when used in this sense, “kindly” always precedes the verb which it apparently modifies; and this is a natural order, for the phrase “Will you kindly . . . ?” is merely a convenient contraction for “Will you be so kind as to . . . ?” On the other hand, a true adverb (e.g., “kindly” in its first sense) may either precede or follow the verb it modifies.

The second of the two peculiarities to which I have referred above consists in the fact that "kindly" in its first sense has little or no meaning when applied to the phrase "to clear out a drawer," unless, as I think one of your correspondents suggested, there are rabbits in the drawer.

I propose now to examine a sentence of the same form as the original example, but free from the two objections I have mentioned; and I hope to show that the use of the split infinitive is in no case necessary or even defensible.

"I ask you gently to speak to this man." This sentence is ambiguous, but the split infinitive is not necessary to make the meaning clear. Its two meanings, of course, are:—

(a) "I gently ask you to speak . . ."

(b) "I ask you to speak gently . . ."

Now let us replace "gently" once more by "kindly":—

"I ask you kindly to speak to this man."

This sentence bears the same two meanings as the preceding one, and the ambiguity can be got over in the same way; but, in addition, it is capable of a third meaning:—

(c) "I ask you to be so kind as to speak to this man."

And this meaning cannot be clearly expressed by any arrangement of the words of the sentence, not even by the use of the split infinitive.

(d) "I ask you to kindly speak to this man" is still ambiguous on account of the double meaning of the word "kindly." Notice that this is the case corresponding to the original example of the split infinitive,

"I ask you to kindly clear out that drawer," which has been defended because it is not ambiguous. I hope I have made it clear that it is saved from ambiguity only because "kindly" in its first sense cannot well be applied to the second verb. In general the split infinitive will not save a sentence of this form from ambiguity; and if it occasionally does so, surely that is no sufficient reason for its use. The proper way to overcome the difficulty is to turn the sentence differently—to throw it into the form (c). The English language is elastic enough. It is perhaps on account of that very elasticity that ambiguity is of so frequent occurrence; but the necessity of avoiding it is no excuse for looseness of grammar or impurity of style.

I am, Sir, yours truly,

March 4.

J. C. S.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. W. H. Wilkins has two new works for this year. The first will be the letters of Lady Anne Barnard, describing "South Africa a Century Ago," to be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder. Lady Anne Barnard composed "Auld Robin Gray" a quarter of a century before she went to the Cape, her husband being Colonial Secretary there under Lord Macartney. Her journals at the Cape are printed in the "Lives of the Lindsays," Lady Anne being the eldest daughter of James Lindsay, fifth Earl of Balcarra. The series of letters now being published with a memoir by Mr. Wilkins were written to Lord Melville. Mr. Wilkins' other work is a history of "Caroline of Anspach and her Times," to be published by Messrs. Longmans.

A Life of the Rev. Joseph Parker has been written by Mr. Albert Dawson, his secretary, and will be published by Messrs. S. W. Partridge.

Baedeker is about to include Russia in his series of English hand-books. His French and German hand-books for Russia have been for some time in the market. The work of translation has been entrusted to Mr. Wirt Gerrare.

Publishers never seem to tire of bringing out new editions of White's "Selborne." Besides Mr. Freemantle's, one is announced by Messrs. Methuen and another by Messrs. Dent for their "Temple Classics." The same series is to include "Adam Bede," in two volumes, which, with the reprints published by Blackwood and Lane, will make three new editions of George Eliot's novel this spring. The "Temple Classics" are also to include the Italian text of Dante's "Purgatorio," together with a translation by J. Okey—the text revised by Dr. Oelsner and the arguments by the Rev. Philip Wicksteed. Among the volumes in hand for the Temple Cyclopædic Primers are "Greek and Roman Mythology," by Dr. H. Stending, and "Tennyson," by Moreton Luce. For the Temple Dramatists is Udall's "Ralph Roister Doister," edited, with notes, glossary, &c., by W. H. Williams and P. A. Robin; for the Mediæval Towns Series, "Bruges," by E. Gilliat Smith, illustrated by Edith Calvert; for the Master Musicians Series, "Handel," by C. F. Abdy Williams; and for the Haddon Hall Library, "Cricket and Golf," by the Hon. Robert H. Lytton, and "Birdwatching," by Edmund Selous. Messrs. Dent also announce "Florentine Villas," by Janet Ross, to be published in limited editions, with photogravures of Zocchi's rare engravings; "The Working of the Constitution of the United Kingdom," by Mr. Leonard Courtney; "Oswald von Wolkenstein," by Mme. Linden Villari; "Imperial London," by Arthur H. Beavan; "Romantic Essex," by R. A. Beckett, and a second edition of Canon Rawnsley's "Ballads of the War," with forty additional ballads and many portraits.

Besides Lord Percy's "Highlands in Asiatic Turkey" and Mr. Richard Bagot's new novel "Casting of Nets," Mr. Arnold's announcements include "The Khaki Alphabet," by L. D. Powles, illustrated by Mr. Tom Browne; and "The Journal of Mrs. Fenton in India and the Colonies, 1826-1830," which was held over from last autumn.

There is to be another volume on "The Man in the Iron Mask" this Spring—written by Mr. Tighe Hopkins, and published by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett. Of the novels announced by the same publishers besides "This Body of Death," by Adeline Sargeant, "His Own Father," by W. E. Norris, will be published next week. "Children of Hermes," by Hume Nisbet, and "The Mother of Emeralds," by Fergus Hume, are in the press.

A propos of the new work by Mr. Hanna on the Scotch-Irish settlers in America, the Rev. Canon O'Hanlon, author of the standard "Lives of the Irish Saints," has been engaged for years upon a history of the Irish in America. It was almost ready for publication at the end of 1898, when a fire at the printer's destroyed the work. Luckily, most of the proofs had been kept, and the volume is now approaching completion again. This fire should find a record in the history of "The Calamities of Authors," for by it quite a large number of Irish books have been made scarce.

The volumes completing the series of "Periods of European History," edited by Mr. Arthur Hassall and published by Messrs. Rivington, are almost ready. It is nearly two years since the last volume was published—"Europe in the Sixteenth Century" by A. H. Johnson, M.A.—but the delay has been unavoidable. "The Close of the Middle Ages," by Professor Lodge, will be ready this month, and the final volume, "Modern Europe, from A.D. 1815," by A. W. Alison Phillips—a work which Professor Prothero had arranged to write but which he relinquished on taking over the editorship of the Quarterly—is expected in April. Messrs. Rivington also announce "A Class Book of English History," by Mr. Arthur Hassall, to be ready probably in June, and, for publication a little later, "A History of Rome," for the use of middle and upper forms of schools, &c., by J. L. Myers, M.A. For their "Books of the Bible" Series the same publishers announce "The Book of Joshua," by the Rev. F. W. Spurling, Vice-Principal of Keble College; "The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah," by the Rev. P. W. H. Kettleworth; and "St. John's Gospel," by the Rev. A. E. Hillard. The next two volumes in their series of "Oxford Church Text Books" are "A Manual of Confirmation," by the Rev. T. Field, Warden of Radley, and "A History of the Church to 325"—announced for April. Among their other forthcoming volumes are "Greek Manuals of Church Doctrine," to be published this month for the Eastern Church Association; "Elements of Christian Doctrine," by the Rev. T. A. Lacey (April or June); "The Gospel according to St. Mark," by the Rev. F. L. H. Millard, M.A. (expected shortly in "Rivington's Handbooks to the Bible and Prayer Books"); "The Minor Festivals of the Anglican Calendar," by the Rev. W. J. Sparrow Simpson, and "The Books of the New Testament," by the Rev. Leighton Pullan; and "Synesius the Helene," by the Rev. W. S. Crawford. "The London Diocese Book, Church Calendar, and General Almanack," which Messrs. Rivington usually have ready in February, is late in making its appearance, owing, we understand, to the delay in filling the vacancy caused by the death of the Bishop of London.

This month Mr. Nutt hopes to issue the first volume of his new series, "The Ancient East"—translations of a new German series of scientific studies, written in a popular style, describing the recent discoveries in Babylonian, Assyrian, and Egyptian archæology. The English translations have been made by Miss Jane Hutchinson, and short bibliographies are added. The first volume will be "The Realms of the Dead in Ancient Egypt," by Professor Alfred Wiedemann. Later will come volumes two to six of Professor W. P. Ker's edition of Lord Berner's translation of "The Chronicle of Froissart" ("Tudor Translations"), the first volume of which was received by subscribers at the beginning of the year. The next volume in the Grimm Library will be "Studies on the Legend of Sir Lancelot du Lac," by Miss Jessie L. Weston, an important Arthurian work. Miss Maynadier's "Wife of Bath's Tale," which should have appeared before Miss Weston's book in the Grimm Library, may be expected about Easter. Another volume announced by Mr. Nutt is No. 4 in "Scottish History from Contemporary Writers"—"The Chevalier de St. George and the Jacobite Movements in his Favour, 1701-1720," edited by Mr. C. Sanford Terry, giving, with the same editor's book on "The Rising of 1745" (published last year), the pith of the contemporary literature describing the Jacobite risings.

Dr. Henry Charles Lea, whose "History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church" (Swan, Sonnenschein), is well known, has written a history of "The Moriscos of Spain, their Conversion and Expulsion," which will be published in America by Messrs. Lea Brothers, and will probably appear simultaneously here. Much new matter has been forthcoming as to the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, which is utilized by Dr. Lea.

Those who knew the late Mr. S. J. Stone, the author of "The Church's One Foundation" and "Weary of Earth and Laden with my Sin," only as a hymn writer will shortly have an opportunity of making acquaintance with him as a preacher, Messrs. Skeffington having a volume of his sermons in the press, most of them preached recently at All-Hallows-on-the-Wall.

A new edition of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," with a commentary, has been prepared at the request of the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press, by the Rev. Arthur W. Robinson, Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Wakefield. Mrs. Hildegard Hinde's Grammar of the Masai Language will also be published shortly by the Cambridge University Press. Masai is practically an unknown language, the only attempts previously made at classifying it being Ehrhardt's Vocabulary (Wurtemberg, 1857), containing about a thousand words, without grammatical rules, and Sir Harry Johnstone's vocabulary and notes in his account of the Kilima Njaro Expedition. Mrs. Hinde bases her own work on two years' personal study among the Masai people.

Besides the books we announced last week, Messrs. Pearson will publish during the Spring "The Confessions of a Poacher," by J. Connell; "The Game of Billiards and How to Play it," by John Roberts; "Domestic Ditties," with words and music by A. S. Scott-Gatty and illustrations by A. T. S. Scott-Gatty; "How to Take and Fake Photographs," by Clive Holland; and "Small Gardens and How to Make the Most of Them," by Violet Biddle.

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's new book, "Impertinent Dialogues," is to be published by Mr. Arrowsmith in his Zenda Library early in April next.

Messrs. S. W. Partridge announce "Lord Rosebery, Imperialist," by Mr. J. A. Hammerton, author of "J. M. Barrie and his Books."

Messrs. Methuen announce a Commentary on Psalm cxix., entitled "The Way of Holiness," by the Rev. R. M. Benson, of the Cowley Mission. A key to the interpretation is derived from the mystical meaning which by common consent is given to the various numbers, and as each of the twenty-two sections derives its number from the value of the letter in the Hebrew alphabet, this number is recognized as supplying the intention of the several sections, and it gives a fresh signification to the same phrase when it occurs over and over again.

The next volume in the Vigo Cabinet Series will be a volume of poems by the Rev. Guy Bridges, entitled "Sea Verse."

Other books to come from Mr. Elkin Mathews this Spring will be "Songs of Lucilla," by an anonymous lady author; and "Poems," by Mr. C. J. W. Farwell, son of Mr. Justice Farwell.

Messrs. Skeffington have in preparation a volume on the ecclesiastical situation, written in the form of a romance, entitled "Catholic Usages," by "John Myre," and a volume of stories of East Anglian fisherfolk, entitled "Odd Fish," by the Rev. Athol Forbes, the vicar of Gorleston.

Mr. James Clegg (Aldine Press, Rochdale) is publishing, by subscription, the complete writings, with memoir, of Oliver Ormerod, the well-known Rochdale dialect writer, editor of the Rochdale Spectator, and author of the "Rachde Felley."

Books to look out for at once.

- FICTION—
 "On Peter's Island." By A. R. and M. E. Ropes. J. Murray. 6s.
 [A Novel of Russian Life.]
 "Ballast." By Myra Swan. Longmans. 6s.
 "A Woman of Yesterday." By C. A. Mason. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.
 "Cities and Citizens." By the Author of "A Colony of Meroy." H. Marshall. 6s.
 "The Lone Star Rush." By Edmund Mitchell. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
 "Taken by Assault." By Morley Roberts. Sands. 6s.
 [A Romance of the Boer War.]
 "The Heritage." By Edwin Pugh and Godfrey Burchett. Sands. 6s.
 "New York: A Novel." By Edgar Fawcett. Sands. 6s.
 "Good Souls of Cider Land." By Walter Raymond. Grant Richards. 6s.
 [West Country Stories.]
BIOGRAPHY AND AUTOBIOGRAPHY—
 "Victoria, Queen and Empress." By David Campbell. Illustrated. Nimmo, Hay and Mitchell. 2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d.
 "Britain's King and Queen. The Story of their lives." By T. Paul. Shaw. 3s. 6d.
 "F. Max Muller. My Autobiography. A Fragment." Edited by his Son. Illustrated. Longmans. 12s. 6d.
 "The Life and Correspondence of the Right Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers." By his Son, Lieut.-Colonel Spencer Childers. Illustrated. Murray. 2 vols.
MISCELLANEOUS—
 "Dopes: A Criticism of American Arts and English Efforts." By "Nathaniel Gubbins." Everett. 1s. and 1s. 6d. net.
 [On the subject of "doping" racehorses.]
 "How to Write Fiction." Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.
POLITICAL AND MILITARY—
 "Law and Policy of Annexation." By C. F. Randolph, New York Bar. Longmans. 9s. net.
 [Advocates withdrawal from the Philippines.]
 "The Truth about Newfoundland." By B. Willson. Richards. 3s. 6d.
 "History of the Gordon Highlanders from its Formation in 1794 to 1816." By C. G. Gardyne. Douglas. 28s. net.
 "British Power and Thought: a Historical Inquiry." By the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning. Smith, Elder. 6s.
 "Wrecking the Empire." By J. M. Robertson. Grant Richards. 5s.
TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY—
 "Highlands of Asiatic Turkey." By Earl Percy. Arnold. 14s. net.
 "Play and Politics: Recollections of Malaya." By an Old Resident. Gardner and Darton. 3s. 6d.
 "German Life in Town and Country." By W. H. Dawson. Newnes. 3s. 6d. net.
 [New volume of "Our Neighbours" Series.]
HISTORY AND MYTHOLOGY—
 "Historical Development of Modern Europe, 1815-1897." By C. M. Andrews. Putnam. 12s. 6d.
 "The North Americans of Yesterday." By F. S. Dellenbaugh. Putnam. 21s.
 [Study of North-American Indian customs and products, on the theory of the Ethnic Unity of the Race.]
THEOLOGY—
 "Good Friday Sermons preached in Chichester Cathedral." By J. H. Mee. Mowbray. 2s. 6d. net.
 "Parochial Sermons." By the late S. J. Stone, Rector of All Hallows'-on-the-Wall. Skeffington. 4s.
ART AND THE DRAMA—
 "The Frescoes in the Sistine Chapel in Rome." By Evelyn March Phillips. Illustrated. Murray. 6s. net.
 "Pinturicchio." By Evelyn March Phillips. Bell. 5s. net.
 [Handbooks of the Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture.]
 "Four Great Venetians." By F. P. Stearns. Putnam. 9s.
 [Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, and Il Veronese.]
 "Premières of the Year." By J. T. Grein. Macquenn. 3s. 6d.
POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES—
 "The Passing of Queen Victoria: The Poets' Tribute." H. Marshall. [Includes contributions by Mr. Thomas Hardy, Mr. W. E. Henley, Sir Lewis Morris, and "Violet Fane."] 5s.
 "In Scipio's Gardens, and other Poems." By S. V. Cole. Putnam. 5s.
 "A Life in Song." By G. L. Raymond. Putnam. 5s.
 "Wings of the Morning: Essays and a Sermon." By W. C. Roberts. Putnam. 5s.
 "Leaves from the Golden Legend." Illustrated by H. M. Watts. Constable. 3s. 6d. net.
NEW EDITIONS—
 "Wild Wales." By George Borrow. Murray. 6s.
 ["The Complete Edition of Borrow's Works." Illustrated by A. S. Hartrick.]
 "Adam Bede." Warwick Ed. Blackwood. 2s. n., 2s. 6d. n., and 3s. n.
 "Old Mortality." Border Edition. Macmillan. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

Shifting Scenes; or, Memories of Many Men in Many Lands. By the Rt. Hon. Sir E. Malet, G.C.B., &c. 8½x5in., 335 pp.

Murray. 10s. 6d. n.
William Harley, A Citizen of Glasgow. By J. Galloway. 7½x5in., 60 pp. Glasgow. Morison.

Mr. John Burns, M.P. By G. H. Knott. (The Bijou Biographies.) 5x3in., 90 pp. Drane. 6d.

Charles W. Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick. An Historical Study, 1735-1806. By Lord E. Fitzmaurice. 9x5½in., 147 pp. Longmans. 6s. n.

CLASSICAL.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The Three Literary Letters. Trans. by W. Rhye Roberts. Litt.D. 9x6in., 232 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 6s.

Tranquillity of Mind. Providence. By L. Annaeus Seneca. Trans. by W. B. Langford, Ph.D. 6x4in., 141 pp. Putnam. 3s. 6d.

DRAMA.

Au-Delà des Forêts. Première et Deuxième Parties. By Björnsterne Björnson. Traduction de MM. Auguste Monnier et Littmannson. Paris. Stock. Fr.3.50.

EDUCATIONAL.

Juvenal. (Coll. Series of Latin Authors.) Ed. by H. P. Wright. 7½x5in., 240 pp. Arnold. 6s. 6d.

Macmillan's Latin Course. By W. E. P. Pantia. 7x4½in., 310 pp. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.

Education in the Nineteenth Century. Ed. by R. D. Roberts. 7½x5in., 274 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 4s.

FICTION.

Strange Happenings. By W. E. Norris, W. Clark Russell, and Others. 7½x5in., 300 pp. Methuen. 6s.

The Life Romantic. By Richard Le Gallienne. 7½x5in., 323 pp. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

This Body of Death. By Adeline Sergeant. 7½x5in., 335 pp. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

The Girl at the Half Way House. By E. Hough. (The Dollar Library.) 7½x5in., 308 pp. Heinemann. 4s.

The Lesser Evil. By Ica D. Hardy. 7½x5in., 302 pp. Chatto & Windus. 6s.

John Townley. A Tale for the Times. By R. Thynne. 7½x5in., 346 pp. Drane. 6s.

Sesa. By H. St. John Haikes. 7½x5in., 311 pp. Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.

The Ship's Adventure. By H. Clark Russell. 7½x5in., 302 pp. Constable. 6s.

The Banner of St. George. By M. Bramston. 7½x5in., 267 pp. Duckworth. 3s. 6d.

The Fitzdoodle Memoirs. By Lord Adolphus Fitzdoodle. 7½x5in., 170 pp. Leadhall Press. 1s.

Nine Spinnies. By the Rev. S. Mostyn. 7½x5in., 180 pp. Leadhall Press. 2s. 6d.

Madame Marie, Singer. By Esther Dale. 7½x5in., 270 pp. Leadhall Press. 3s. 6d.

The Emu's Head. By C. Dave. 7½x5in., 337 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

Days of Doubt. By Alice M. Meadows. 7½x5in., 348 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

The Survivor. By E. P. Oppenheim. 7½x5in., 310 pp. Ward, Lock. 6s.

The Mayor of Littlejey. By F. C. Smale. 7½x5in., 317 pp. Ward, Lock. 6s.

Love and Honour. By M. E. Carr. 7½x5in., 313 pp. Smith, Elder. 6s.

The Shadow of Gilead. By M. Gerard. 7½x5in., 324 pp. H. Marshall. 3s. 6d.

Secoundrels & Co. By Coulson Kernahan. 8x5½in., 292 pp. Rev. F. W. O. Ward. 3s. 6d.

As a Twig is Bent. By Lucas Cleve. 7½x5in., 308 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

Rival Chalmants. By Sarah Tytler. 7½x5in., 305 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

Mary Bray X Her Mark. By Jenner Tayler. 7½x5in., 233 pp. J. Long. 3s. 6d.

Twixt Devil and Deep Sea. By Mrs. C. N. Williamson. 7½x5in., 312 pp. Pearson. 6s.

A Honeymoon in Space. By G. Griffiths. 7½x5in., 301 pp. Pearson. 6s.

A Lesson for Life. By Clarence Cook. 7½x5in., 131 pp. Ward, Lock. 1s.

HISTORY.

Alfred the Great. By W. H. Draper. 7½x5in., 143 pp. Stock. 5s.

Princes and Poisoners. By F. Funck-Brentano. Trans. by G. Maidment. 7½x5in., 377 pp. Duckworth. 6s.

Annals of Politics and Culture (1492-1899). By G. P. Gooch. 9x6in., 530 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 7s. 6d.

A Treatise on the History of Confession to A.D. 1215. By C. M. Roberts. B.D. 7½x5in., 194 pp. Cam. Un. Press. 3s. 6d.

Historic Towns of the Southern States. Ed. by L. P. Powell. 8½x6in., 604 pp. Putnam. 15s. n.

LAW.

The Law of Bills, Cheques, Notes, and I.O.U's. By J. W. Smith. 7x4½in., 193 pp. E. Wilson. 1s. 6d.

Cordingley's Dictionary of Stock Exchange Terms. 7½x5in., 95 pp. E. Wilson. 2s. 6d. n.

LITERARY.

Ephemera Critica. Plain Truths about Current Literature. By J. Churton Collins. 7½x5in., 379 pp. Constable. 7s. 6d.

Théâtre de Melhac et Halévy de l'Académie Française. Vol. IV. La Boule-Le Petit Hôtel-Le Bouquet-La Vie Parisienne-Madame Attend Monsieur. Paris. Calmann Lévy. Fr.3.50.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Book of Shakings. By F. T. Bullen. 8½x5½in., 389 pp. Pearson. 6s.

The "Good Man" of the 18th Century. By Charles Whitlock. 7½x5in., 274 pp. Allen. 6s.

The Annual Charities Register and Digest for 1901. 8½x5½in., 742 pp. Longmans. 4s.

Practical Bookkeeping. (Advanced.) By W. D. Aldham and W. E. Holland. 7½x5in., 228 pp. Allman. 2s.

POETRY.

Irish Leaves. By J. Robinson. 7½x5in., 276 pp. Digby, Long. 7s. 6d.

POLITICAL.

Egypt and the Hinterland. By F. W. Fuller. 9x5½in., 333 pp. Longmans. 10s. 6d. n.

The Politician's Handbook. By H. Whates. 10x6½in., 280 pp. Vacher. 6s. n.

A Diary of the Unionist Parliament, 1895-1900. By H. W. Lucy. 9x6in., 418 pp. Arrowsmith.

REPRINTS.

The Prophet of the Great Rocky Mountains. By C. E. Craddock. 7½x5in., 304 pp. Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.

Walton's Complete Angler. (The Sportsman's Classics.) 6½x4½in., 229 pp. Gay & Bird. 1s. 6d. n.

The Coral Island. By R. M. Ballantyne. 7½x5in., 372 pp. Ward, Lock. 1s.

Carlyle's Sartor Resartus. (The Miscra Library.) 7½x5in., 203 pp. Ward, Lock. 2s.

THEOLOGY.

What is Christianity? (Theological Trans. Lib.) By A. Harneck. Trans. by T. B. Saunders. 9x5½in., 301 pp. Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d.

The Philosophy of Religion in England and America. By A. Caldecott. D.D. 9x6in., 434 pp. Methuen. 10s. 6d.

New Century Hymns. By the Rev. F. W. O. Ward. 8½x5½in., 224 pp. "Home Words" Office. 5s.

TRAVEL.

The Cyclist's Touring Guides Vol. I.-England (South). By A. N. Ramney. 7½x5in., 109 pp. Philip. 1s.

Through Siberia. By J. Standing. 9x6½in., 311 pp. Constable. 18s.

A Picturesque History of Yorkshire. Part XVII. Dent. 1s. n.

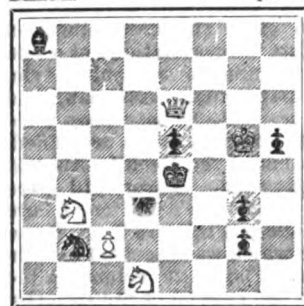

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXXXVII.

By N. MAXIMOV, Russia.

BLACK. 7 pieces.

WHITE. 5 pieces. White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CXXXVIII.

By E. PRADIGNAT, France.

(a first-prize winner).

BLACK. 10 pieces.

WHITE. 9 pieces. White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 139. by A. Troitzky, Russia. White (five pieces)—K at Q R 6; Q at K R 3 pawns; at K R 6, Q R 5, Q Kt 7. Black (seven pieces)—K at K R 2; Q at Q R 8; B at Q Kt sq; Kt at K R sq; pawns at K Kt 4, Q B 2, Q Kt 4. White to play and draw.

NOTES AND NEWS.

A novel event of Saturday last was a telephone match, City of London v. Birmingham. Lawrence (City) and Atkins played at board 1, and drew. Herbert Jacobs (City) defeated the Dudley champion (Bellingham) in 18 moves. E. O. Jones (City) lost to B. D. Wilmot a game in which he was a piece to the good; Lewis (Birmingham) beat Barlow. Ward v. Hollins and Passmore v. A. J. Mackenzie were to be adjudicated by Mr. Blackburne. Probably City will win both, and this would give them the match.

A number of problem tournaments are being organized. One of the latest is a two-move contest in a well-conducted column, Leeds Mercury Supplement. Our No. 138 is first in Nuova Rivista degli Scacchi (Italy). La Strategie (Paris) has a tourney in progress with 400 entries. This is somewhat of a record; but the old monthly magazine has the confidence of the chess world, being well managed by the publisher, M. J. Preti.

THE MONTE CARLO TOURNAMENT.—The final scores were as follows:—

	Won.	Lost.		Won.	Lost.
Alapin, S.	8½	4½	Mason, J.	4½	8½
Blackburne, J. H.	6½	6½	Mieses, J.	7	8
Didier, E.	0½	12½	Rapporto, A.	4½	8½
Gunsberg, I.	6½	6½	Scheve, T. von	8	4
Janowski, D.	10½	7½	Schlechter, C.	9½	3½
Marco, G.	8	7	Tschigorin, M. I.	9	4
Marshall, F. J.	5½	7½	Winawer, S.	4	9

D. Janowski (Russia) wins first prize; the second is secured by C. Schlechter (Vienna), who has played finely; Tschigorin (Russia) and Th. von Scheve (Germany) divide third and fourth; S. Alapin (late of Russia) is fifth; and Mieses is sixth. Alapin and Von Scheve have not been heard of much recently; they tied with Tinsley for seventh prize in Manchester, 1890. A stupid novel rule was to score ½ for the first draw. On replying, if the game was won, the winner scored only another ½.

GAME No. LXVIII.—Played in Russia. Messrs. Bartolitsch and Tschigorin consulting against Lewin and Janowski:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1. P-K4	P-K4	15. O-Kt-Q5	Kt×Kt
2. P-KB4	P-Q4	16. Kt×Kt	Q-B4 ch
3. Kt-KB3	P×K P	17. Q-B2	Q-Q3
4. Kt×P	Kt-Q2	18. P-B5	P-KB3
5. P-Q4	P×P P	19. K-R-Qsq	P-QKt4
6. B×P	B-Q3	20. R-K3	R×R
7. Castles	K-Kt-B3	21. Q×R	K-Bsq
8. Kt-B4	B-B4 ch	22. Kt-B3	Q-K4
9. B-Q3	Q×Q	23. Q×Q	P×Q
10. Kt-Q B3	R-Ksq	24. Kt×P	K-K2
11. Q-B3	B×Bch	25. Kt×BP	R-Kt sq
12. Kt×B	Kt-B4	26. Kt-Q5 ch	K-B2
13. O-R-Qsq	Kt×B	27. P-Kt3 and wins.
14. P×Kt	Q-K2

GAME No. LXIX. A brilliant game, played recently in Bohemia:—

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
Q. Jelincik	J. Z.	Q. Jelincik	J. Z.
1. P-K4	P-K3	13. P×Q P	Kt×P
2. P-Q4	P-Q4	14. P×P	P×P
3. P×P	P×P	15. Kt-Q4	Castles K R
4. Kt-KB3	Kt-KB3	16. B×P	P×B
5. B-Q3	B-K3	17. R×B	P×R
6. Castles	R-Q3	18. Kt×P	Q-B3
7. R-Ksq	P-KR3	19. Q-Kt4 ch	K-W2
8. B-K3	P-QB3	20. Q-Kt5 ch	K-K2
9. Q-Kt-Q2	Q-B2	21. R-Ksq	Kt-K4
10. Kt-Bsq	Q-Kt-Q2	22. Kt×R	R×Kt
11. R-Rsq	P-QKt3	23. R×Kt ch and wins.
12. P-B4	P-B4

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 178. SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	191, 192, 193
PERSONAL VIEWS—"Canada in English Fiction," by Robert Machray	193
FOREIGN LETTER—France	195
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley	196
REVIEWS—
Ephemera Critica	197
Through Siberia	199
Medieval Towns—
Constantinople—Rome—Assisi	199
Turkey in Europe	201
Efficiency and Empire—Education in the Nineteenth Century—
Myths of Greece—Greek and Roman Mythology—Australasia—French Life in Town and Country—Annals of Politics and Culture—The Science of Civilization—National Life from the Standpoint of Science—Imitation—Dissent in England—Confession and Absolution—History of Confession to A.D. 1215—Mr.
John Burns, M.P.—Falaise, the Town of the Conqueror,
&c.	202, 203, 204
Turner's Contributions to Public Exhibitions	204
Anne Mainwaring—A Wayside Weed—The Tapu of Banderah—
A Narrow Way—In the Name of a Woman—Veronica Verdant
—The Aftertaste—Duke Rodney's Secret—The Conscience of Gilbert Pollard—Julie—The Ivory Bride—Adventures of Merryman Brothers—The Marriage of True Minds—An American Woman—Second Love	206, 207
ART NOTES	205, 206
CORRESPONDENCE—The Shakespeare First Folio (Mr. Sidney Lee)—
The Late Mr. F. S. Ellis (Dr. J. A. H. Murray)—Apocryphal Stories
—Mr. Wheatley's "Pepys" in America (The Clark University
Librarian)—The Split Infinitive—"The Aftertaste"	207, 208, 209
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for	209
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS	209, 210

NOTES OF THE DAY.

It is a curious fact that the woman with ideas of her own—she used to be called "the new woman"—plays little or no part in contemporary English fiction or drama. Mrs. Ebb Smith is, perhaps, the one exception. It is quite otherwise on the Continent. In French contemporary fiction, in German contemporary drama, she is now quite a familiar figure. She is the heroine of Fulda's Kameraden, of Halbo's Muttererde, of Sudermann's Heimat, of Ernst Rosmer's Dammerung, and of Max Dreyer's In Behandlung, just presented by the German theatre in London, to name only a few plays taken at random. In one or two she is treated with respect; generally she is insulted and derided. The reason of this is that in England the professional woman has become so much a matter of course that she does not attract attention as she does on the Continent.

An English audience can hardly understand the chief motive of Max Dreyer's In Behandlung. The heroine, a woman doctor, is well fitted for her profession, and wishes to practise it in her native town. Her relatives and friends express a holy horror at the mere notion of such a proceeding. Her fiancé jilts her, her landlady gives her notice to quit, her landlord makes her insulting proposals, and her female friends cut her. A way out of the impasse is found in a platonic marriage with a man doctor under whose protection she pursues her profession unmolested. In this she achieves success. But the platonic arrangement, of course, breaks down, and we leave the husband and wife awake to the fact that it does not satisfy them. Some comedy is naturally forthcoming with such a plot, but the fun struck us as needlessly coarse and disagreeable. It was scarcely atoned for by the strong common sense of the old uncle who makes a sort of commenting chorus, admirably played by Georg Worlitzsch. We prefer to reserve our criticism of Max Dreyer until we have seen his latest production, Der Probekandidat, promised for the end of the month.

A good many contradictory statements have been made as to the book by Captain Dreyfus which M. Fasquelle is to publish and of which Messrs. MacClure will issue an American edition. We may state that the book is a complete narrative, what the French would call a simple récit, of five years of this officer's life—"Cinq Années de ma Vie," indeed, will be the French title. It includes the diary kept by Captain Dreyfus at the Ile du Diable—but this is only an episode, as the book starts at the very beginning, and ends after the Rennes trial. It is a plain, straightforward tale, crowded with facts, and absolutely free from declamation. There are no expostulations, no recriminations. Captain Dreyfus, in fact, has had but one aim—namely, to contribute to the dossier of this famous case the facts which he alone was in a position to note; and the absence of personal feeling adds greatly to the importance of the book. The book contains many letters from the captain's wife.

The literary paragraphist is spreading himself in all directions, and if his personalia are not always trustworthy, that does not matter much to readers who prefer literary news to literature. This remark, however, is not meant to apply to the paragraphs now appearing in the Morning Post and the Daily News. We gladly note in the latter the reappearance of "S. G.," who disappeared at the beginning of the year from the Pall Mall Gazette. In his causerie on "Parsons in Fiction" one noted some omissions—you cannot exhaust the novelist's Crockford in a column; indeed, one might fill the column from George Eliot herself, let alone Trollope. "Editor's Study" in the current Harper, by the way, contains the misstatement that George Eliot was a clergyman's daughter. Caleb Garth was the portrait she drew of her father, who acted in some subordinate capacity of agent on the Newdigate estate. Writers who enlarge upon Dickens' treatment of the clergy almost always forget the Rev. Frank Milvey in "Our Mutual Friend," who shows Dickens' respect for Anglicanism. In the French list the reader of French fiction will certainly miss the name of l'Abbé Tigrane and his creator Ferdinand Fabre, who has been called by some the French Trollope and by others the Clerical Balzac. And the Abbé Constantin has a multitude of friends. The fiction of "S.G.'s" own country has just made delightful additions to the gallery of Roman priests in Father Sheehan's "My New Curate."

The Rev. William Arthur's works have had an immense circulation both here and in America. His championship of the North during the Civil War made him popular with American Methodists, while his pamphlet "Shall the Loyal be Deserted and the Disloyal set over Them?" published at the time of the introduction of the Home Rule Bill of Mr. Gladstone, coming from a loyal Irishman holding a distinguished position in their own community, carried great weight with English Nonconformists. Beyond the limits of his own denomination Mr. Arthur was best known, perhaps, for the story of his two years' work in India, entitled "A Mission in the Mysore"; the memoir of Mr. Samuel Budgett, of Bristol, entitled "The Successful Merchant"; and "The Tongue of Fire; or, The True Power of Christianity." Several of his works are now published by Messrs. Bemrose and Sons, who are about to reprint the people's edition of "The Tongue of Fire." Among the other works by Mr. Arthur published by Messrs. Bemrose are "Religion without God: I.—Positivism and Mr. Frederic Harrison. II.—Agnosticism and Mr. Herbert Spencer"; and "God without Religion: Deism and Sir Fitzjames Stephens."

The new Bishop of London has published a number of successful little books. Here is a chronological list of them:—

"Old Testament Difficulties: Papers for Working Men." (1892.) "New Testament Difficulties." (1893.) S.P.C.K. 6d. each.

"The Ideal Worker: Addresses at Keble College." (1894.) S.P.C.K. 3d.

"Work in Great Cities: Six Lectures on Pastoral Theology, delivered in the Divinity School, Cambridge, Easter Term, 1895." (Now in Third Edition.) Wells Gardner. 3s. 6d.

"Church Difficulties." (1896.) S.P.C.K. 1s.

"Messengers, Watchmen, and Stewards: Addresses to Clergy at Loughton." (1896, now in second edition.) Wells Gardner. 1s. 6d.

"The Men Who Crucify Christ: A Course of Lent Lectures." (1896, now in fourth ed.) Wells Gardner. 1s. 6d.

"Friends of the Master: A Sequel to 'The Men who Crucify Christ.'" (1897, now in fourth ed.) Wells Gardner. 1s. 6d.

"Good Shepherds: Addresses for those preparing for Holy Orders at the Clergy School, Leeds." (1898.) Wells Gardner, 1s. 6d.

"Reasons for Faith: Lectures to Men at St. Paul's Cathedral." (1900.) S.P.C.K. 6d.

Dr. Ingram's appointment is leading to an increased demand for his books, especially for "Work in great Cities," his best known publication, which contains an introduction by Bishop Ryle, of Exeter. Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton and Co. are about to add to the list by publishing "The Afterflow of a Great Reign"—four sermons recently preached at St. Paul's.

Messrs. Longmans list contains a posthumous work by the late Canon Bright—two further volumes of Church history, entitled "The Age of the Fathers."

When as yet Mr. Bernard Shaw was not so much oppressed with fame as he is to-day he wrote a very original and amusing novel about a prize-fighter called "Cashel Byron's Profession." Mr. Grant Richards is going to publish a new edition of it, for which Mr. Shaw has written a new preface. Mr. Shaw has told us that he writes prefaces because he has the capacity to do so—it was an additional disability of Shakespeare that he could not write prefaces. We only hope that, as he has the giant's strength, he will not be tyrannous in the use of it. The preface to the "Plays for Puritans" was nearly as long as Hegel's preface to his "Phenomenology of Spirit," but it was not so entertaining.

Among lady artists in bookbinding there is no one whose work is of more promise than that of Miss Katharine Adams. This was amply proved by the exhibition of books bound by her which drew "all Oxford," and a good many connoisseurs who had travelled specially from London, to Worcester-house, Oxford, last Friday and Saturday. Miss Adams binds with an originality that makes her work particularly interesting. Her bindings are all specially appropriate to their books. "Venetian Life" appeared in a noble heraldic cover, stamped, according to the correct forms of heraldry, with the Lion of St. Mark. An Omar Khayyám was adorned with a remarkable peacock and vine-branch design. The Daniel Press edition of the "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity" was chastely radiant in pure white vellum, relieved with silver bosses. And in all the bindings shown there was beauty and thoroughness of execution and a happy grasp of idea. The large number of visitors bore witness to the growing interest in this branch of artistic handicraft.

There has recently come to light among the papers of Maximilian II. of Bavaria an interesting poem in MS. addressed by the King, when he was Crown Prince, to Queen Victoria, and written about 1835. The Crown Prince had a "Herzens Neigung" for the young Queen and he travelled, against his father's wishes and under the assumed name of "Bürgermeister von Kempeten," to England to see Queen Victoria's wedding. The poem was, we believe, never seen by the Queen. It is as follows:—

Wenn einst auf Deiner Väter Throne (!),
Dich ruft des Allmächt'gen Wort,
Dann leucht' als schönster Stein der Krone
Die Eintracht Dir—der Völker Hort.
Dir ward das schönste Loos beschieden,
Das jemals Sterbliche beglückt'
Zu wahren treu den gold'nen Frieden,
Zu bannen, was die Welt bedrückt.
Es wird Dein Arm die Welt umfassen,
Die hoffend Dir entgegensieht;
Du wirst versöhnen, die sich hassen
Und nähern, was sich feindlich flieht.
Dann schweigt der Kampf der Partheyen,
Vor Deiner Liebe Zauberton.
Der Wahrheit wirst Du Kraft verleihen,
Der Völker Segen ist Dein Lohn.
Die Flagge sehe (!) ich kühner fliegen,
Der alle Meere unterthan,
Und alle Völker ihr erliegen,
Die feindlich sich der Starken nah'n.
Ich seh' zum fernsten Pol sie dringen,
Den Finsterniss umfassen hält,
Den Segen der Kultur ihr bringen,
Die Freiheit der erstaunten Welt.
Ein schöner Nam' ist Dir gegeben.
Er sei der Britten (!) Lösungswort.
Er führ' Dein Volk in Tod und Leben,
Victoria tön' es fort und fort!

We append a translation, without attempting an English metrical version:—

If once to the throne of your fathers
The Almighty word calls you,
Then will shine as the brightest jewel in your crown
Unity (or Concord)—the Peoples' Home (or Refuge),
To you was given the most beautiful fate
That ever gladdened mortal,
To preserve faithfully golden Peace,
To banish what oppresses the world.
Your arm will embrace the world
Which looks hopefully towards you;
You will unite those who hate
And make those to meet who flee as enemies.
Then will be silenced the battle-cry of the Parthians
By your enchanted tones of Love,
You will lend strength to Truth,
Your people's blessing is your reward.
I see the flag flying more boldly,
To which all seas are subject,
And all people succumbing to it,
Who approach its strength as enemies.
I see it pressing to the furthest Pole
Which lies imprisoned in darkness,
Bringing the blessings of Culture,
Of Freedom to the astonished world.
A beautiful name is given you.
Be it Britain's talisman,
May it lead your people in death and life,
Victoria, may it sound for ever and ever!

We are reviewing Mr. Churton Collins' "Ephemera Critica" in another column; but one of the contentions of that very controversial work suggests a prelection here. It is one of the author's griefs that Critical Standards. circumstances conspire to lower, and keep low, the standard by which reviewers judge the writings of their contemporaries, to prevent the fierce exposure of incompetence, and to cause the works of "the average man" to be belauded as works of genius. He sees critics bestowing praise where it is undeserved, some of them because they know no better, and others because they have axes of their own to grind; he sees truculent publishers insisting that praise is the quid pro quo of advertisement; he sees editors, anxious for the commercial interests of their proprietors, shrugging their shoulders and bowing their heads before the storm. It must be admitted that the world would be different from what it is if these phenomena were not to be discerned in it. As the philosopher remarked, "there is a great deal of human nature in"—even literary—"man." It is as "human," some may argue, to say what you can for a friend's book in a review as to say what you can for his character in a testimonial. It is "human" to be angry if a journal makes a constant practice of describing as worthless the wares which you pay its proprietor for bringing before the notice of the world. It is also "human" to desire to dwell in amity with the people with whom you do business, and to wish to conduct that business at a profit. What is human, however, we need scarcely add, is not necessarily right; and it is still necessary to face the question—Does this obviously human attitude of reviewers towards books exist to any large extent, and does it produce such terrible consequences, and cause such a failure of justice, as Mr. Churton Collins imagines in his wrath? There are no doubt a few popular papers in which literature has to rank with the fashions and the police news. There are reviewers who do their work on the principle that you must not look a gift horse in the mouth, and that, if a publisher sends you a book, you ought to say something pleasant about it, just as you would if he sent you a box of cigars. But this is unquestionably not the method adopted in the offices of the chief organs of criticism which have reputations for literary discernment to lose. Their reviewers are certainly no more afraid of exposing incompetence where they discern it than were Jeffrey and Christopher North; and their exposures are not less thorough because they are usually more polite. If their standard seems to fluctuate, that is because different critics have different standards, and one man cannot possibly review all the books that are published. If their normal standard, more particularly in the case of works of poetry and fiction, is not high enough to satisfy Mr. Churton Collins, the reasons for pitching it a little lower are not what Mr. Collins supposes. The publisher who approaches the editor in the "no song no supper" style is a figment of Mr. Churton Collins' imagination. The papers in which publishers advertise most freely are certainly not the papers that take the line that every book is as good as every other book, and that all books are everything that they ought to be. It would be invidious, but it would be easy, to mention names. On the other hand, what is there to be gained by abusing a writer like a pick-pocket because his poetry is not so good as Shakespeare's or his fiction as Thackeray's? Just as the duchess cannot understand the social distinction that exists between the wife of the chemist and the wife of the grocer, so the critic who takes this high and mighty line is necessarily blinded to the differences between the work that is poor, the work that is passable, and the work that is fairly good. In days of cheap printing, and of comparatively uneducated but intellectually aspiring masses, you cannot do away with "passable" literature; you cannot even ignore it. But it is the business of the critic, in a work-a-day world, to point out these differences, and to give respectable work its due meed of commendation as well as to salute genius and show up pretentious imposture. And this can only be done by applying tests to which at least a perceptible proportion of living writers can reasonably be expected to approximate.

Personal Views.

CANADA IN ENGLISH FICTION.

It cannot be said at the present time that Canada bulks largely in English literature either as regards the output of books, which in themselves may deserve to be considered works of literary merit, or with respect to the use made by men of letters of its history, modes of life, scenery, and other specially characteristic features, as backgrounds for the setting forth of literary presentments. Hitherto Canada has supplied but little "local colour" to writers of eminence in this country, the United States, or even the Dominion itself. I do not know that this need be a matter for much surprise in the circumstances. So far as Canada is concerned, the scramble, the rough-and-tumble, the sheer stress of life incident to a new country, afford some explanation of its literary poverty; but it will not do to press this argument of the "newness" of Canada too sharply, when it is remembered that more than three centuries and a-half have passed since Jacques Cartier of St. Malo sailed up the St. Lawrence and took possession of the picturesque peninsula of Gaspé in the name of Francis I. And yet, for obvious reasons, it is to Canadian, rather than to British or "American" authors that we must look for a literature English, but distinctively Canadian.

It must be admitted, I am afraid, that one cause of the comparative literary barrenness of the Dominion lies in the fact that Canada has never shown any remarkably robust disposition to support the efforts of its literary sons. Indeed, literature, as a career, having attached to it the necessary bread and butter, has been scarcely possible in Montreal, Toronto, or elsewhere over there. The best writers, with whole-souled unanimity, have migrated to New York, Boston, and London. Mr. Robert Barr, himself a Canadian author (he has at least one Canadian novel; it deals with the Fenian Raid, if my memory is not at fault), who has shaken the dust of Canada from off his shoes, pointed out in a couple of witty and amusing articles, published in the Canadian Magazine in 1899, that it was not because of the leanness of Canadian purses that this state of things prevailed. In semi-humorous, semi-serious vein, he elaborated statistics to demonstrate that if the people of the Dominion spent on literature of home production only a tithe of the amount they spent on whisky, also a native product, the Canadian man of letters would flourish like the bay-tree. He declared that Canada was the "poorest book-market outside Senegambia!" Of course, Mr. Barr, with the licence of the caricaturist, overstates his case, but there is, unfortunately, a good deal of truth in what he says. On the other hand, it may be urged with fairness that Canada has received, and still receives, vast quantities of books—in fact, the literature of the world—in the form of cheap editions and reprints (including, doubtless, copies of Mr. Barr's works) from both England and the United States, and that these enter into competition with the "native product" to its very considerable detriment.

It seems to me, however, that there are to be observed several welcome signs of the Break o' Day, amongst which the following may be noted:—

I. Much attention is now being devoted to the study and writing of the history of Canada.

II. A school—it is the accepted but perhaps not altogether most appropriate term—of Canadian poets has appeared.

III. [Canada in fiction, at least in the work of one novelist, has achieved conspicuous success.

Miss Machar, a Canadian poetess, has well sung of her native land that it is—"A country on whose birth there smiled the genius of romance."

Canada is full of attraction, of inspiration, particularly on the historical side, for the writer of novels. As it comes through the mellowing mist of the years, a wonderful many-coloured tissue of stirring incident and striking adventure, there is no more fascinating and absorbing story than that of the French régime in Canada, from its beginning in the sixteenth century to its splendid, heroically tragic close on the Plains of Abraham, at Quebec, in 1759. Hardly less replete with suggestively picturesque material are the narratives of the early explorers and pioneers, Jesuit missionaries, traders, fur-hunters, coureurs de bois, who penetrated the pathless wildernesses of the interior, set their frail barks afloat on the Great Lakes, discovered the Father of Waters, the mighty Mississippi, and passed beyond the barriers of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific. The tale of hapless Acadie—the subject of Longfellow's "Evangeline"—has gone round the world, while an even finer theme is presented in the settlement of the Eastern Townships and the shores of Lake Ontario by the United Empire Loyalists who, at the loss of all but life, voluntarily expatriated themselves from the Thirteen States because of their quenchless fidelity to the British Crown. The salient features of the later annals of Canada—the war of 1812-14, the Papineau and Mackenzie rebellions, and the like—offer abundant scope for "romantic treatment."

Canada is also a promising field for the exploitation of the fictionist on account of its many well-defined, widely contrasted types of life, and of the novelty of the settings in which pictures of these types can be framed. The habitant of Quebec, in simplicity, contentment, frugality, happy ignorance of "views" or "problems," a sort of big, joyous child; his half-brother in primitive, patriarchal virtues and pleasures, the Acadian; the lusty, sturdy, capable, self-reliant, perhaps just a trifle self-sufficient, farmer of Ontario and Manitoba; the lumberman from the fragrant pine and cedar forests of the north and furthest west; the miner of the Kootenay, the Klondyke, and the Lake of the Woods; the ranchman of the plains; the east-coast fisherman, the west-coast salmon-canner; English, Scotch, Irish, French, Germans, Mennonites, Icelanders, Swedes, Galicians, Indians, Chinese—a medley, fantastic and incongruous when huddled into a paragraph, but which when "strung out" along a base-line that runs from rise to set of sun, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Newfoundland to Vancouver, resolves its elements readily and auspiciously to the man who has eyes to see, ears to hear, and the heart to understand.

The "great Canadian novel," which sums up inclusively and satisfyingly the chief phases of Canadian life, has certainly not yet been written; as a matter of fact, the time is not ripe for it. But there is plenty of excellent, preparatory (so to speak) material for novels making studies of both the higher and lower social and political life of the Dominion, as it may be viewed in the political atmosphere of Ottawa, in the "society" of Toronto and Montreal, or in the freer, more fluid, more kaleidoscopic life of Winnipeg and the West.

It might be supposed that in a country, aboriginally Red Indian, romances of the Fenimore Cooper type would abound, but Major Richardson's "Wacousta, or The Prophecy," written some sixty or seventy years ago, is the only one I can recall. So far the great majority of Canadian novels have old French Canada or modern Quebec—the province rather than the city of that name—for their backgrounds. Among the earliest and best of these was Le Chien d'Or, by William Kirby of Niagara, a book which, if crude in style, is not without a certain vigour, its mise en scène being the time of the infamous Intendant of Quebec, Bigot. In the list of novels of this class the "Trail of the Sword" and "The Seats of the Mighty" (one of the happiest titles, it seems to me, in the whole range of romantic fiction) by Mr. Gilbert Parker, must be placed first; they are very probably the only Canadian novels known to most of my readers. I am afraid that if I had meant by "Canada in English Fiction" novels having Canada as the field of their action which were widely read in England I should have had pretty well to confine myself to the works of Mr. Parker; but "English Fiction," it will be granted in these piping days of Big Englandism, need not necessarily be published in England itself. And so, presently, I shall speak of other Canadian novel writers who make claim, with more or less urgency, to favourable notice.

Mr. Parker has presented three aspects of life in Canada; one looks to the past, the others are more of to-day. In the two novels mentioned above he gives us pictures of Old French Canada, and we may take the word of so accomplished a French Canadian as Sir John Bourinot, the present Clerk of the Dominion House of Commons, for their faithfulness and general excellence. As becomes a gallant gentleman writing of vanquished foemen, Mr. Parker is inclined to be kind in his portraiture of the undeniably picturesque figures of "Nouvelle France," and I do not grumble at that—on the contrary; but I sometimes wonder that he has not essayed the story of the United Empire Loyalists, one of the most moving and heroic stories in the world, however badly told in ordinary histories. In what may be termed the Pontiac group of Mr. Parker's works, including the "Pomp of the Lavilletes," "When Valmond Came to Pontiac," and several of his short stories, he sets forth the Canadian habitant. Mr. Parker writes of "Jean Baptiste" with humour, insight, and sympathy, but Mr. Louis Fréchette, who is the present laureate of French Canada, gives what appears to me a truer and more intimate though from the literary point of view not so finished, a presentation of the habitant in a volume of short stories recently published under the title of "Christmas in French Canada." As regards the third division of Mr. Parker's Canadian work, the tales associated with "Pretty Pierre" and his people of the Hudson's Bay Company and Rupert's Land, Pierre is such a character as never was on land or sea, but we enjoy him none the less on that account—even in spite of the fact that he and Macavoy, the Lovely Bully of Fort O'Angel, and one or two other of Pierre's people, are rather reminiscent of Kipling's favourites.

Of Canada in English fiction Mr. Gilbert Parker is the great apostle. Among other Canadian novelists who have been attracted by striking episodes in the national history mention must be made of Mrs. Catherwood ("Romance of Dollard," "Tonty," and the "Lady of Fort St. John"), Blanche Lucile Macdonnell ("Diane of Ville Marie"), William McLennan ("The Span o' Life"), Mr. Marquis ("Marguerite de Roberval"), and W. D. Lighthall ("The False Chevalier"). "The Forest of Bourg Marie," by Mrs. Harrison, is a splendid piece of literary work; it is another capital picture of the habitant, that curious, interesting individual's ignorance, quaintness and naïveté being painted with admirable touch. Both "A Sister of Evangeline" and "The Forge in the Forest," by C. G. D. Roberts, are excellent novels, and it is surprising that they have not met with larger popularity in this country; as the title of the former of the two may indicate, their plots are worked out amidst Acadian surroundings. An entirely different environment is to be found in the novels of Mrs. Joanna Wood, who writes of rural life in Ontario in "A Daughter of Witches" and "The Untempered Wind," while Gordon's "Black Rock: A Tale of the Selkirks," takes us into the heart of the mountains.

Some years have passed since I lived in Canada, and writing at this distance not only of time, as one might say, but also of place, from it, I do not try to do more than give a rough impression of the subject. In the years that are to come the position of Canada must inevitably be infinitely greater than it has been in the past, and it is quite safe to prophesy that this greatness will be manifested in literature as in every other province of its unfolding activities. What I have said may perhaps serve to show that the present contains presage and promise of future performance.

ROBERT MACHRAY.

Foreign Letter.

FRANCE.

In History and in Memoirs, a literary form in which the French are prolific, the year has begun brilliantly. I allude rapidly to the appearance of a second volume of those "Mémoires du Général d'Andigné" (Plon-Nourrit et Cie.), that valiant leader of the Chouans, whom the erudite M. Biré has so happily introduced to the public. The new volume brings the story down to 1830, including, with the close of the Chouannerie, the prisons and the exiles under the Empire, the first Restoration, and the Hundred Days. Crowded with anecdotes, this record of the adventures of a typical general of the épopée offers a fresh point of view from which to survey this entire period so inexhaustible in its interest.

A document less rich in matter, and of less range, is the volume published by the same house for General Hardÿ de Périni, containing the private letters of his grandfather, General Jean Hardÿ, from 1797 to 1802. This officer was one of the most remarkable of those who led the victorious armies of the First Republic. A quartermaster when the Revolution broke out, he won at Valmy his epaulettes as major, and after a brilliant campaign with the armies of Sambre and Meuse took part in the expedition to Ireland, and was captured by the English. The book contains a curious letter from him to Lord Cornwallis, interceding in favour of General Wolfe Tone, who had been put in irons as a vulgar criminal. Lord Cornwallis replied that, for him, Wolfe Tone was a common traitor "who wanted to return to Ireland to attempt by force of arms what he had been unable to accomplish by intrigue, and who had unceasingly scattered rebellion and discord broadcast." This book shows that it was not merely Napoleon's Marshals who deserved to be remembered, but that a host of other officers, whose names are inscribed, but never read, on the Arc de Triomphe in Paris, owe to the accident of their early death the lot of quasi-oblivion which, in at least one case, it is the merit of this book to alter.

The same house gives us also two immense volumes entitled "Fouché, 1759-1820," by M. Louis Madelin, a former member of the French School at Rome, who recently presented this formidable package of something more than a thousand pages as a thesis at the Sorbonne. Fouché, of course, has been the bête noire of all the historians of the Revolution and Empire. He stands forth in popular opinion as the type of ingenious rascality and genial suppleness, as artistic and symbolic as Tartuffe. To have been, however, an accomplice, or associate, of Robespierre, Tallien, Barras, Sièyes, Talleyrand, Murat, Metternich, Wellington, Carnot, Napoleon, and all the other Bonapartes and Bourbons implies a role more distinguished than has been preserved in popular legend; and this work of M. Madelin puts the Duke of Otranto in a light which gives his physiognomy a somewhat rehabilitated and unfamiliar air. M. Madelin, who is a trained scholar, has ransacked for his purpose manuscripts and archives never before utilized, in both public and private collections. There is something original in the very idea of contemplating French history from the point of view of the fixed star of Fouché. For fixed star he is, in spite of his variations and exiles. Régimes totter and fall from 1789 to 1820, but Fouché, the first and greatest fonctionnaire in modern French history, remained, with passing eclipses of disfavour, a luminary shining with his own special light, one of the most penetrating students of the human heart which ever diplomacy and politics produced. To recount the substance of these two volumes would be to relate once more the most crowded history of modern Europe. It is enough to say that, seen from the angle from which M. Madelin views it with Fouché, it assumes an interest curiously new.

This study of Fouché illustrates one of the most curious phenomena of this long period of upheaval—namely the facility with which each successive régime rallied about it the parasitic personnel that had besieged the Court of its immediate predecessor. And a very charming book, the life of the father of the Maréchal de Castellane, which the Comtesse de Boulaincourt-Marles, the Maréchal's daughter, has just published, "Boniface Louis André de Castellane," 1758-1837 (Plon-Nourrit et Cie.), might be cited as a monograph in proof of this general statement. Boniface de Castellane was what may be called one of the Opportunist nobles, who, in spite of his liberal ideas, more than once proven at the Etats-Généraux and the Assembly, was constantly harassed by the Revolution in the Château at Aubergenville, whither he retired after the deposition of Louis XVI., and was finally imprisoned at Saint Germain and in the Conciergerie. The letters revealing the efforts of a Courcelles family to extricate him, throwing, as they do, penetrating light on the details of Parisian life at the moment, form, with the proofs of the devotion of the inhabitants of Aubergenville, who intervened again and again at their own peril for his release, the chief interest of the early pages of this volume. It suggests the suspicion that all France was not so ripe for the Revolution as Taine would have us think. The story of the boyhood of the future Marshal at Aubergenville after his father's release is charming and instructive. Later on, M. de Castellane becomes one of Napoleon's Prefects in the Basses-Pyrénées, whither he transports his wife and boy, leasing the château to Mme. de Staël. After the wife's death, when Boni rushes to the wars, the letters exchanged between him and his father reveal a rare mutual confidence. The filial relation is very French and singularly un-English. It almost deserves to be classed in some modern Ciceronian De Officiis. These letters, moreover, are crowded with the details of the Prefect's life at Pau and at Bayonne, with the King and Queen of Holland, and, finally, with the Emperor, whose energy and capacity for work are the admiration of Boniface. Napoleon has his eye upon everything, and at Pau one of his chief pre-occupations is road-making. Meanwhile, Boni is with the Grand Army fighting gloriously, yet never letting a day go by, even during the terrible retreat from Moscow, without writing to his father, and even finding time to make those famous notes of daily events that were published recently. Napoleon falls, and after the second return of the Bourbons M. de Castellane is elected Deputy for the Basses-Pyrénées, where he is as popular as ever. But he never takes his seat, for Louis XVIII. makes him a Peer. Striking glimpses are given us of men and things in Paris. There is a clear-cut portrait of the capricious but brilliantly original personality of De Pradt, Archbishop of Malines; Wellington and Canning pass across the scene, and Boni takes a cup of tea with the latter at Mme. de Staël's. He goes to the Duke of Wellington's ball, although an ex-Prefect of the Emperor. He hobnobs with the Allies. All the while he remains ardently liberal, defends the liberty of the Press, and admires "Les Provinciales," which he thinks Voltaire imitated, but detests the insipidity of Marmontel, wherein he is right.

Not less suggestive is the monograph by M. Masson—his new volume entitled “Josephine Repudiée, 1800-1814” (Ollendorff). What a world of parvenus and, to use M. Barrès' word, déracinés, was that in which France sought to find its way after the upheaval of the Revolution! And what it was that this far-reaching cataclysm shattered we may learn afresh by the final pages of those studies of the old régime which the Comte d'Haussonville has just published in his second volume of “La Duchesse de Bourgogne et l'Alliance Savoyarde sous Louis XIV.” (Calmann-Lévy). Through the pages of this book blows the serene air which murmurs through the foliage of the chestnut trees on the terrace of Saint Germain—and the stately terrace itself is an alexandrin a verse of Racine. Comte d'Haussonville is himself a gentilhomme of the old school, and such is the subtle, elevating influence of contact with this world of Bossuet-orations and of courtly bienséance that his style assumes a perfection of taste, a measured serenity which recall the qualities of that charming and typical document, the “Princesse de Clèves.” This long story of how Louis XIV. solved the art of being grandfather, in company with such great personages as Fénelon and Victor Amédée of Savoy, and with such little ones as the gay Princess ill-mated with the grave young Duc de Bourgogne, is a contribution to history, but it is still more an addition to literature. It supplies a rich contrast with the spirit of our own democratic moment, and with the epoch with which we have just been dealing on which M. Masson, M. Madelin, and, in spite of herself, the Comtesse de Boulaincourt are fascinating authorities. Of this old régime the only thing which after the Revolution seems to subsist is the sentiment which we call “snobism.” The individual members of this post-Revolutionary society, whatever their affiliations in the past, always cling like limpets to every magical wand plunged into the seething vat of social interests by the master-hand of a Napoleon or any of his successors. It was a mark of Napoleon's political insight to have facilitated this upward movement. But if for ladies and gentlemen of M. de Castellane's world the effort to keep well upon the surface was made without too much loss of dignity, the abundant petty illustrations of this phenomenon which M. Masson offers us in his astonishingly detailed account of the last five years of Josephine's life somewhat strain our tolerance.

M. Masson shows us that Josephine was the petite femme of a grand homme, and that Napoleon himself was often as ridiculous as men less grand are wont to be in similar circumstances. She deserved her fate, and, of the two, Napoleon was made the more miserable by the divorce—a divorce, by the way, which was never really complete. But the whole epoch is strewn with the débris of social conventions. All who have read M. Masson's three volumes on Josephine will now wish to learn what became of Napoleon when alone with a single spouse. This story will be the subject of his next volume, “L'Impératrice Marie Louise.”

But, in reviewing the two epochs, pre-Revolutionary and post-Revolutionary, we must not neglect to note the survival in the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth of many of those individual, uncourtly traits which even the genius of Richelieu could not completely suppress. To enable the reader to correct his generalizations it is a duty to call attention to the curious little volume by the Vicomte G. d'Avenel on “La Noblesse Française sous Richelieu” (Colin), in which we have a picture richer in its details than that offered us by M. Hanotaux or by M. V. du Bled in his “La Société Française du XVI^e Siècle au XX^e Siècle” (Perrin) of what may be called the psychologic and social state of French ladies and gentlemen at a moment nearer Montaigne than Bossuet, a moment almost as brutally picturesque as that of the Elizabethan period in England. The Vicomte d'Avenel studies in separate chapters the rights, the duties, the temper of the French nobles, the rôle of the women, the revenues, the extraordinary expenses in which great families, like nouveaux riches to-day, ruined themselves and their descendants simply to make a brave show, the whole question of gallantry, the general, unbridled exhibition of what the French nowadays suppose to be traits imported from Chicago—in a word, gives us an inkling of a state of things nearly as unstable as that in which the sublime parvenu Napoleon put a certain amount of order. Napoleon, parvenu as he was, was in the tradition of the old Monarchy. He continued the work which Louis XIII.'s Minister only began, and did it so well that since his time Governments have come and gone without much altering the essential features of the system on which he organized France.

The completeness of his success has just been pictured in the new novel of the Brothers Marguerite, in which they painted the tragic moments of the war of 1871. And the recent reprint by Garnier of Amédée Le Faure's “Histoire de la Guerre Franco-Allemande,” which M. Désiré Lacroix has undertaken to bring up to date, as well as each successive volume of Professor Zévort's “Histoire de la Troisième République” (Alcan), notably the latest, containing the history of Boulangism, simply confirm this general theory of French history, to wit, that we are virtually still living under the organization due to Napoleon, and that it is because of the solidity of this structure that in great crises the nation still hangs together, confuting all the prognostics of persons brought up in societies less organized. During the last few days we have had, in the “Cents Jours du Siège à la Prefecture de Police,” (Plon), by M. Cresson, the Prefect of Police during the bombardment of Paris and the Civil War, a series of important details as to life in Paris at that moment which confirms the view upon which I have been insisting. Here is an instance of the kind of thing M. Cresson has to tell us. M. Clémenceau had given the orders, while mayor of Montmartre, for the manufacture of the Orsini bombs. Summoned to the Prefecture, M. Clémenceau confessed, saying that the bombs were to be used purely as defensive weapons in case of street battles. M. Clémenceau finally was constrained to give them up, and they were transported with immense precautions to the Fort of Vincennes. M. Cresson also has an entertaining story to tell of the efforts made to conceal the Venus of Milo in anticipation of the sacking or baring of the Louvre. This book, in fact, is full of curious matter.

The Paris police service seems to have been better directed under the Third Republic than in the old days when M. de Castellane became its victim. There are no signs here of such arbitrary methods as sully the record of the dealings of the police with the infamous Marquis de Sade, the story of whose wife is told by M. Ginisty in “La Marquise de Sade” (Fasquelle). It is no book of scandal; it simply tells the angelic, preternatural loyalty of the wife of a scoundrel. M. Ginisty has come upon an old package of letters at the Arsenal which offer us the most improbable and touching example of conjugal fidelity which we have had in literature since the revelations as to the loyalty of Marie Pypelinex, Rubens' mother, to her unfaithful husband. In contrast with this saintly figure of the marquise the half-legendary figure of de Sade, however, becomes all the more odious—yet certainly more tangible and real.

W. M. F.

THE DRAMA.

Mlle. Bartet on Histrionics.

There is no one better qualified to discourse on the art of acting than that exquisite artist Julia Bartet. It is true that she is not, like Sarah Bernhardt or Eleonora Duse, an actress of world-wide fame; but that is because she has remained faithful to the House of Molière, where, and where only, survive the classic repertory and the classic traditions of which she is perhaps the most perfect exponent. She is essentially a classic artist, exhibiting, that is to say, “order in beauty,” purity of outline, rather than the vivid colour, the headlong assaults on the nerves, which mark the romantic school. Hers is a marmorean style—and it is significant that in her remarks on acting in a recent number of the Revue de Paris she advises the study of antique marbles. “Aucun professeur de maintien,” she says, "ne vous dira ce que vous révélera telle ou telle statue. Allez dans la salle de Phidias, et regardez marcher les jeunes filles du Parthénon." But under the marble there is the warm blood; Mlle. Bartet can represent the highly-strung modern woman to the life, as those know who have seen her Françillon. Still, the perpetual care for beauty governs her most violent outbursts. In the whirlwind of her passion she begets a temperance, as was said in another famous causerie on histrionics now some three centuries ago. What a woman of so disciplined an art does not know about acting is not knowledge, and it should be worth our while to consider for a moment what she has to say.

As she has the advantage of thinking and talking in French, her discourse has the logical symmetry and lucidity of an "elegant" demonstration in pure mathematics. Acting is resolved into the three elements of diction, gesture, and costume; the element of diction contains the two parts of naturalness and variety; and so forth. And, first, of natural diction—Are you to speak on the stage as you do in a drawing-room? No, answers Mlle. Bartet, and that for the all-sufficient reason that the acoustics of a theatre are not those of an ordinary apartment. Talk on the stage as you would at home and you will not be heard. The recent melancholy exodus of the Comédie Française has afforded the actress peculiar personal experience in this matter. As the company wandered from theatre to theatre she had to change the diapason and tone of her voice. And in the antique (and, of course, open-air) theatre at Orange she was compelled to abandon all the "fine shades" of declamation; the constant volume of voice required there would on any other stage have seemed exaggerated.

This question of "natural" diction and of "natural" acting generally, I may interject, is one of the most vexed in theatrical history. That terrible word "natural"! It leads to so many misunderstandings, as we all know, even without having read J. S. Mill. I venture to think that Mlle. Bartet is not quite free from misapprehension about it. She says Mlle. Clairon was the first to experiment in natural diction. But it is the tendency to claim for every actor a closer approximation to nature than his predecessors. The march towards realism has been very, very gradual. You cannot put your finger on one particular person or date and say it began just there. Garrick was considered more natural than Quin, Edmund Kean than Garrick, and so on. But the slow substitution of ordinary speech for pompous declamation has not been the work of any individual, but of the Time-Spirit and of the mechanical transformation of the stage from platform to picture-frame which I have already mentioned more than once in this review. Stage history is of all histories the most unscientific. We still read from time to time that "Æschylus introduced the second actor," a statement as scientifically valuable as that "Balbus built a wall." The arts do not "evolute" in that way.

The last word of "naturalness" in acting is said to have been spoken by M. Antoine and his company of the Théâtre-Libre; so I have seen it attributed in England (by Mr. Bernard Shaw, if I remember rightly) to the players of Ibsen. Again, I move as an amendment—the Time-Spirit. The old theory was that the audience heard the dialogue; the new is that they overhear it. That is to say, the invisible fourth wall of the room in which the action takes place was formerly held to be behind the audience; now it is held to be between them and the players. Hence the old practice of always speaking with your face to the public, making love to your sweetheart over her shoulder (in order that both faces might be seen), and other absurdities. In reality I suspect these absurdities to be of very little consequence; the protest against stage conventions generally proceeds from the more unimaginative playgoers. Some persons cannot abide a "soliloquy," others writhe at an "aside." But I am convinced that these things do not trouble the average playgoer, who, however unconsciously, knows that all drama, all art, is of necessity a convention, and who does not choose to strain at gnats, while swallowing a camel.

After naturalness comes variety, which Mlle. Bartet regards as the master quality of the dramatic artist. The great actor is great in tragedy and comedy—which is one reason why David Garrick was a greater actor than Edmund Kean. I should have liked Mlle. Bartet's opinion on the question, whether variety is not the especial quality which is tending to disappear? I submit that it is. The stage cannot escape from the general law of "specialization of function." Long runs, too—which mean small repertories—are against variety in acting. It is still possible at the Comédie Française. In London it has been reduced to a vanishing point. Our popular actor-managers like to go on repeating their old successes. The public look to a player for effects with which they are familiar.

As to gesture, it is all very well to recommend players to study the Elgin Marbles or the Watteaus in the Wallace Collection, but I cannot help thinking that a player has grace by nature or not at all. If Miss Mary Anderson had the pose of a Greek statue, if Mrs. Kendal or Miss Marion Terry exhibit perfect beauty of gesture and attitudes, if one actress at the St. James's swims into a room like a swan while another at Her Majesty's suggests rather the movement of a duck—why, it is, I think, because they were "built that way." Gait is a birth-right, not an accomplishment. "Elle a une démarche qui fait toc-toc," said Weiss of some actress or other, "et ne fait pas frou-frou." One might say this of many English actresses to-day; but gallantry forbids. Nor will I follow Mlle. Bartet into the awful mysteries of actresses' costumes; it would be effrontery to compete with the ladies who describe First Night dresses in the evening papers.

What is the conclusion of the whole matter? That the art of histrionics "tends to approach more and more closely to nature and truth. There is, however, a degree of realism at which the artist is obliged to stop. And to warn him that he has reached this limit, his best guide is and always will be taste." Unfortunately, some players, in this matter of taste, are like Lady Teazle when she married Sir Peter.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

THE PRESENT STATE OF ENGLISH [LITERATURE.]

EPHEMERA CRITICA; OR, PLAIN TRUTHS ABOUT CURRENT LITERATURE. By JOHN CHURTON COLLINS. (Constable. 7s. 6d.)

Mr. Churton Collins' volume of essays, sturdy both in bulk and character, is a book of uncommon interest and importance. It cannot, as we propose to show, be regarded as an altogether satisfactory essay in criticism, nor as quite bearing out the vigorous promises and menaces of its preface; it protests, indeed, rather than directs. But it is at least a collection of essays united in a common aim, and inspired by a genuine, if not always a perspicacious, enthusiasm for literature; it has something to say, and says it without fear or favour, and it may very probably serve to clear the ground for more measured and intimate criticism in the future. Such a book as this, even if its method be rather clumsy and out of centre, can scarcely fail to be of service to literature.

There are twenty-eight essays in the volume; but for the rough purposes of a review they group themselves into two divisions. The first three articles, on "The Present Functions of Criticism" and "English Literature at the Universities," present a sort of general arraignment of the present state of Belles Lettres in England; the remaining papers choose particular examples for dissection and judgment. Of Mr. Collins' general attitude to contemporary literature the opening passage of his preface will give sufficient indication:—

It is time for some one to speak out. When we compare the condition and prospects of Science in all its branches, its organization, its standards, its aims, its representatives with those of Literature, how deplorable and how humiliating is the contrast! In the one we see an ordered realm, in the other mere chaos. The one, serious, strenuous, progressive, is displaying an energy as wonderful in what it has accomplished as in what it promises to accomplish; the other, without soul, without conscience, without nerve, aimless, listless, and decadent, appears to be stagnating, almost entirely, into the monopoly of those who are bent on utilizing and degrading it.

And, again, in another place:—

These essays are partly a protest and partly an experiment. As a protest they explain and, I hope, justify themselves; as an experiment they are an attempt to illustrate what we should be fortunate if we could see more frequently illustrated by abler hands. They are a series of studies in serious, patient, and absolutely impartial criticism, having for its object a comprehensive survey of the vices and defects, as well as of the merits, characteristic of current Belle Lettres.

This is, indeed, what the politician would call "a definite programme," and a book that should effectually carry it out would be of the highest value and interest to all who are concerned with literature. The present volume, however, is far from carrying out such a programme. To present "a comprehensive survey of the vices and defects, as well as of the merits, characteristic of current Belle Lettres" would require exceptional qualifications and a breadth of judgment scarcely to be expected in a single critic. From such a task Mr. Collins has not unnaturally shrunk; but the great drawback of his emphatic volume is that, having assumed the responsibility of this comprehensive survey, he has not even attempted to essay it. Instead of this promised survey we get some five and twenty separate essays—some of them reviews, others what are technically known as "middle articles"—almost all of which deal with isolated books by individual writers. From the standpoint of the literary review these articles are almost uniformly clever and effective. They abound in adroit point-making (some of it certainly a little ingenious and forced); and they display in Mr. Collins himself an almost encyclopædic acquaintance with details of literary history. Still, even as reviews they are not impeccably consistent. On one page we read that a contemporary writer "whatever his theme, poem, essay, novel, picture, contrives to serve it up with the same condiment, a sickly and nauseous compound of preciosity and sentimentalism"; and on turning the leaf we are told that "at his best his style is excellent—clear, lively, and engaging." The two statements are scarcely reconcilable, and this foible of inconsistency is characteristic of a good deal of Mr. Collins' plain-speaking. He condemns, for instance, and rightly condemns, the fulsome flattery of the unintelligent reviewer, by which "Socrates and Mr. X," "Shelley and Mr. Y," "Plato and Mr. Z," are introduced as running in double harness. But the risks of such praise, and the difficulties of avoiding it, are rather amusingly indicated in one of the few essays in which Mr. Collins indulges himself in the pleasant privilege of encomium, where Mr. Stephen Phillips' name is coupled with those of Dante and Petrarch, and in a single sentence we get such coloured phrases as "intensity and vividness," "suggestive reservation, smiting phrase, clairvoyant picture-wording," and "pregnancy of tragic suggestiveness"—phrases which one would not have been surprised to find Mr. Collins condemning as the stock-in-trade of the stereotyped reviewer. It is, indeed, difficult to commend without hyperbole; and Mr. Collins is here the victim of the spirits which he has himself raised.

And these are only a few examples of a frequent lack of stability in taste and judgment which disfigures much of Mr. Collins' argument. Upon matters of fact he is remarkably accurate and acute; but in questions of taste he is rather too ready to assume that the direct contradiction of a critic's formula is in itself a disproof of its possibility. His judgment is generally too dogmatic, and too little accessible to ideas.

But, after all, the main failing of these reviews and occasional articles is that they do not even begin to represent a "comprehensive survey" of the vices, defects, and merits of modern literature, and that in contenting himself with them rather than with a series of more elaborate and searching articles Mr. Collins has deprived his volume of really representative value. No induction can be proved from a single instance; and even if every book which Mr. Collins condemns were actually as incompetent as he represents it, he would still have left untouched a great deal of excellent work which has quite as much claim to be considered representative of the time as any of the works he discusses, and far more claim than many of them. This, indeed, Mr. Collins seems himself to appreciate.

We have still, indeed [he says], lingering among us a few masters whose works would have been an honour to any age; and here and there among writers may be discerned men who are honourably distinguished by a conscientious desire to excel, men who respect themselves and respect their calling.

This is, we believe, precisely true; and Mr. Collins must ask himself whether there has been any period of English literature in which more than a few men have existed "whose works would have been an honour to any age." Such men are inevitably few, and at the present time their activity is, no doubt, unduly overshadowed by the vast amount of bad work produced for ephemeral purposes. As Mr. Collins himself points out (only, with rather irritating inconsistency, to overlook it at the next turn of his argument), the spread of middle-class education has created an entirely new public for books, and a public which you cannot expect to inoculate at once with literary taste and judgment. Hence the propagation of libraries full of inferior stuff, and the multiplication of writing about inferior stuff and inconsiderable authors, with whom criticism has, very properly, nothing to do. But the critic must not mistake this sort of literary paragraphing and current reviewing for an invasion upon his own field; and, if he is wise, he will not lament that all men are not instantly made literary from the moment they learn to read. In a word, he will not desire the impossible.

Mr. Collins seems to ascribe the inferiority of current literature to two main evils—the prevalence of literary log-rolling, and the indolence and apathy of the Universities. Of the first of these evils he makes, in our judgment, far too much. Mutual admiration, most of it quite sincere even where it is mistaken, has always gone with the amenities of the literary fraternity. It existed in the days of the Dunciad; it was prevalent at the birth of the "Quarterlies"; it helped the youthful essays of Tennyson and Browning. Of course, it survives today; but not, we believe, to anything like the detrimental extent deplored by Mr. Collins. For, as he himself says in another place, "we very much question whether, in the case of publications which appeal directly to general readers, the fortune of a book is in any way affected by the arts of the log-roller," and the remark might be extended with equal justice to apply to all books of whatsoever complexion. Puffery never caused a bad article to prevail, nor gave it life beyond a butterfly's. And puffery has very little circulation beyond the narrow coterie of literary workers, whose influence is really much less effective than they themselves, in the seclusion of clubs and dining rooms, are apt to imagine.

Against the Universities Mr. Collins has certainly a stronger case; there is a good deal to be said in criticism of the present constitution of the School of English Literature at Oxford. The pedagogic fashion in which English literature is taught in our public schools is in itself enough to nauseate any normal school-boy, and to lead him to look upon the study of our national classics as a mere hunting-ground for "tips" and philological excrescences. But, when he condemns the absence of all study of classical parallelism in the Oxford school, Mr. Collins must not forget that the men who are reading honours in English would almost certainly have first taken "Honour Mods," where they would have read much that he desiderates, and in particular Aristotle's "Poetics." The period of the University course is necessarily short, and only a certain amount of study can be crammed into its four years. And the man who is likely to get any good out of the study of English literature at all may be trusted to be capable of some comparison and correlation for himself.

Mr. Collins' attitude to study is, indeed, too exclusively that of the instructor; he leaves too little to individuality. The class of man whom he pictures (p. 68) as finished for life when he leaves the University, "without inducement to correct, to modify, or even materially to add to what has been imparted to him," is, we should hope, a very rare phenomenon. But if he is actually as common as Mr. Collins supposes, his very prevalence strikes at the root of the whole of Mr. Collins' system, and dissolves its fabric at a breath. For you cannot educate a man in English literature during the four years of a University course; and you cannot train in him the delicate plant of literary taste at all unless he has an inborn and sensitive aptitude for the study. Literature, after all, does not stand on the same level as science; and the first passage which we quoted from Mr. Collins carries its own criticism with it. An exact science admits of final rules, but the finest things in literature have been done in controversion of existing tradition. Science can be taught and explained, in its way, by rule of thumb; the vital spirit of literature is too subtle for analysis at the lecturer's desk. The teacher may discourse for an hour on the beauty of Wordsworth's "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality," but he will never make his pupil appreciate its differentiating quality of poetry unless the pupil has an instinctive sense of poetic excellence. And the Universities may train, and critics may cease from mutual admiration and learn to labour disinterestedly for the high service of literature; but all the training and all the criticism will never touch the sensibilities of that many-headed multitude which will continue to devour and to enjoy the books which sound judgment will continue to deplore, to condemn, and to prove powerless to counteract.

And if Mr. Collins should ask us in return whether we therefore hold that false literary criticism and the apathy of Universities are to be left unassailed, we reply that they are certainly not to be left unassailed, but that the error lies in hoping that, even if they were reformed, they would really, as he chivalrously maintains, effect an immediate and wholesale reformation in the national tone and morals. The strenuous body of literary workers has always been a small one; and it will remain so to the end of criticism. The salt of literature and art—the men of taste—are always in a minority; and it is hopeless to think that machine-made education can take the place of the inherent qualities of breeding, refinement, and good taste. In time, no doubt, it works its way, slowly leavening the mass; but the transcendent qualities which mark the man of taste will always elude the educator, and spring up spontaneously like some beautiful flower, and often upon an unexpected soil.

SIBERIA.

Mr. J. Stadling went, on behalf of the Swedish Anthropological and Geographical Society, to search for Andrée on the northern coasts of Siberia—a fruitless quest. He now tells his story in THROUGH SIBERIA (Constable, 18s.), edited by Dr. F. H. H. Guillemard; and his failure to achieve the immediate purpose of his expedition has not hindered him from writing an exceptionally interesting book, which is a great deal more than an ordinary "relation of a journey." The editor, in fact, complains, in his preface, that Mr. Stadling has given us too little about his personal adventures, and too little about plants and animals. We think he has done wisely in giving us, instead of these things, information and a picture. Reading his pages, we realize the forests and the tundras, and that is better than knowing how many miles the traveller travelled in a day, and what he said to his companions about the mosquitoes, and what was the effect of tinned meat upon his appetite. Like all Northerners, Mr. Stadling is susceptible to the influence of forest scenery. In an eloquent passage, he depicts its influence on the Russian immigrant:—

I see him in the midst of the tagna, whither he has gone alone to hunt and trap. By-and-by he is subdued by his surroundings. He feels no inclination to smile, and no songs now pass his lips—the voice of man sounds too strange in the death-silence of the endless forest, or is swallowed up by its wildly roaring music. He sees neither the rising nor the setting of the sun. It appears to him above one dark, impenetrable wall, and sets behind another alike sombre and gloomy. Wherever he looks, his eye only falls upon the mossy trunks, and the dark branches of the spruce. And with this his spiritual horizon also becomes more and more limited. Day by day he finds it more difficult to break through the dark circle which surrounds him and his home. The old songs are silenced, the old memories wither away and die, the old legends are forgotten. He is no longer the talkative and sociable Russian mujik; he becomes uncommunicative and gloomy; his look is no longer open and steady, but shy and restless like that of some wild beast looking for its prey.

The social life, such as it is, of these wilder parts of Siberia is also depicted by Mr. Stadling vividly and with plenty of circumstantial detail. He met many of the melancholy political exiles—men of culture doomed to live in the wilds with savages and making their names known to learned societies by their scientific observations—and he has many pathetic tales to tell about them. On the whole, indeed, his picture is a gloomy one, and hardly bears out the optimism of official expectations of the future of the country. The Siberians, we gather, are among the poorest, the most ignorant, and the most criminal of the peoples alleged to be civilized. It was the first fact borne in upon the writer by his first glance at a Siberian newspaper, and his impression was not weakened by the subsequent discovery of a plot, in which his driver was implicated, to rob and murder him in a forest:—

What struck me at the first glance were the long columns filled with notices of robberies and murders. Here, for example, is a notice of a herd of cattle and horses having been lifted on the steppe, there another of a daring burglary, followed by a list of several robberies and murders which had taken place in open daylight, and of travellers who had been attacked and killed by brigands, &c. And these events did not strike the Siberians as anything abnormal. To them they were common occurrences. In a town of some 30,000 inhabitants—Krasnoyarsk to wit—about 50 robberies with murder were said to occur annually.

Plenty of other facts follow, supporting the same conclusion, and throwing a lurid light upon the methods of Russian administration.

Altogether the book is one which no one who has any interest in the subject ought to miss. It is full of facts, and yet there is a strange characteristically Scandinavian vein of poetry running through it. The novelist who wants local colour for a Siberian story will find it a rich mine to quarry in; and books to which compliments of that kind can be paid are always readable. With their usual sense of the fitness of things Messrs. Constable have printed and bound the book luxuriously.

MEDIÆVAL TOWNS.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—ROME.—ASSISI.

Constantinople.

Mr. Dent is fertile in new ideas, and the Mediæval Towns Series (4s. 6d. each), three volumes of which are before us, is one of his most felicitous. It is just such books that the traveller wants when he visits one of the historical cities of Europe. When Baedeker has told him what hotel to choose, and what turnings to take in walking there from the railway station, when Murray has warmed his heart with much information and many poetical extracts, he wants something which can be found in neither of those excellent works; a sympathetic and brief history of the place, singling out events and persons of significance, and a connected account of the buildings he sees before him. Mr. Hutton, who writes THE STORY OF CONSTANTINOPLE, is fortunate in his subject. It would be impossible to find a town richer in historical associations, more romantic in its contrasts, more suggestive of the mystery and the terror of the East. Constantine's capital was the wonder of the world; we read of its wealth and magnificence with astonishment; and when we consider that the revival of learning was brought about by the flotsam and jetsam of a city twice sacked, we realize in some degree what her intellectual influence might have been if fortune had spared her. Greek, Roman, Persian, Abar, Saracen, Crusader, Venetian, Turk have all passed over this stage, and left their marks, more or less permanent, behind them. The factions of the circus give place to the political clubs, and in our own day to the Greek "Friendly Society," the Armenian Reformers, and the Young Turks Constantinople is ever the same. Heresies, schisms, iconoclasms have their share in the witches' sabbath. The Empresses alone would give matter for a whole book; Theodora and Sophia, Irene and Roxalana. And the men, what heights they rise to, in what depths they sink! In reading the sketch of Turkish history one is astounded that such an empire could endure for a generation. The Sultan is now an idiot, now a worn-out, debauched wreck; anon he is some poor creature who has been kept for thirty or forty years in "the Cage," a prisoner in his palace, waiting for the succession or the bowstring; and yet now and again this turmoil throws up a magnificent Suleiman or an inflexible Mahmud. Mr. Hutton with admirable clearness and good taste guides us through the centuries of uproar, from which we see the great figures emerge and play their part. His account of the buildings, the walls and ancient remains, churches, and mosques, is equally good. He is fortunate in having seen what few travellers see; and we find here not only a lucid description of St. Sophia as it was and as it is, but such buildings as St. Irene in the Seraglio, with its museum of Crusaders' armour, the machines of Alexius Comnenos, keys of conquered cities, bags of earth in token of conquest, swords and helmets of the Janissaries, even fragments of the great chain which once crossed the Golden Horn. The illustrations, too, are capital. We can recommend this book, whether for the pleasure of reading or for the traveller's use, with one reservation: the index should have been fuller.

Rome.

The advantage of "series" such as this of the Mediæval Towns is that they enable the traveller to choose his books without any trouble; the disadvantage is that it passes the wit of publishers to discover who is the writer best fitted to deal with each place. Such men generally find their own publisher, it is not the publisher who finds them; in the case of Rome, for instance, Mr. Marion Crawford and Mr. Stillman, living in the place, knowing and loving it well, were moved to write about it, but not for any series. The publisher has to go elsewhere for his "Mediæval Towns." In the case of Constantinople he could not have done better than secure Mr. Hutton. It is difficult in the case of ROME to see why he has gone to Mr. Young, who has no obvious qualifications for writing about Rome, except that he has been diligent for a space in the library, and has endeavoured to fulfil the art of book-making e pluribus unum. Now this art is so far a respectable one that it needs certain qualifications, such as a gift of style, a knack of condensation, and in the case of a work such as those in this series a general knowledge of history and some instinct for seeing and showing beautiful things. Mr. Young writes straightforwardly enough, and for this we are grateful; but he is hardly of much use as a cicerone. We might as well go about with a guide-book at once, and give up all hope of being shown what are the peculiar beauties in the architecture and sculpture that Rome affords in such bewildering profusion. The unutterable dulness and want of appreciation in the long lists of the guide-books is one of the reasons why we welcome these newer series of volumes on old towns and cathedrals; but in the case before us we see no reason why Murray and Baedeker should not have been left to tell their own tale, while Mr. Young confined himself to history. It may be said that the Mediæval Town Series is, in fact, only historical; but Mr. Theodore Cook has shown in "The Story of Rouen" (also in this series) that a skilful writer can point out the beauties of a town and tell its history at the same time; and if "The Story of Rome" is only historical why does Mr. Young compete with the guide-books by giving us information (and very incomplete information) about the hotels, and by telling us how to do Rome in sixteen days? It is far better to leave the guide-books to their own province, and not to waste valuable space by overlapping.

Indeed, in the case of Rome, the very greatest care in condensation is necessary, so enormous is the history to be told. But Mr. Young is not good at condensing. He constantly repeats himself; as when he tells us twice of Luther's disgust at the rapidity with which Mass was said at Sta. Maria del Popolo, twice of Boccaccio's well-known story about the Jew who was converted to Christianity by the iniquities of Rome, twice of the discovery of St. Cecilia's body, and twice of the crushing effect which the façade of St. Peter's has upon the obelisk before it. Nor can he keep himself from lengthy digressions; he gives two pages to St. Benedict, who left Rome when a lad; and much space is wasted on subjects which belong to the history of Europe rather than of Rome; for instance, the account of the Crusades stretches from page 202 to page 208, of the Friars from 209 to 213, of the Inquisition from 213 to 217; Abelard, "the lover of the beautiful and talented Héloïse," absorbs half page 227 (the index says he is also mentioned on p. 251, but we cannot find him there), though he has nothing to do with Rome, while Julius Cæsar has to be content with one line. There is, indeed, no attempt at historical sequence in the most important part of the story of Rome—the classical part, to which only a few pages are given. Mr. Young seems to have spent most of his time upon the Dark Ages, and to have made little attempt to master the history of Rome in its best days. This history is dragged into the triumphal procession of Trajan, which Mr. Young conducts round its route—leaving it, for instance, as he passes the Colosseum, for ten pages about the games, and then jumping us back to the procession with "Behind the Colosseum Trajan saw the magnificent Baths of Titus of which some fragments still remain." In the writing of a guide-book—especially upon so delicate a subject as that of Rome—the obtrusion of personal views is peculiarly obnoxious. Mr. Young has a perfect right to his opinion that the Middle Ages did not end till 1859, and that the period between classical and modern times is "the valley of the shadow of hell," but he has no right whatever to give us two pages on his views about Darwinism and eternal punishment in a book like this. His knowledge of the period which he so characterizes seems to be limited by what he has read of the history of Rome. For instance, he describes the spirit of the Middle Ages as "individualism," a word which may, indeed, be applied to that exceptional and anarchic city, but no word is less true of the age which produced feudalism and the gild-system; again, when he speaks of isolation as a characteristic of monasticism we can only conclude that he has not studied the subject. Perhaps it is only by a slip of the pen that Mr. Young tells us that Trier is in France, but we have a right to look for accuracy about the present in a writer who moralizes so confidently upon the past. Mr. Young's views on architecture are sometimes contradictory. At the outset he notes the modern look of the classical architecture, which he regards as "a strange and significant fact," although it is fully accounted for by the debased classical style in which Italians love to build; again, on page 225 he reverts to the same theme—the mediæval buildings in Rome have an "aspect of hostile suspicion and glowing isolation," the pagans have "a modern look of frankness, of courage, of intelligent satisfaction" (we wish, by the way, we could detect these qualities in the architecture of modern Rome; in ancient Rome they were the result of the security of the world's mistress); so we are told to contrast "the pagan and modern joy in light and air, the mediæval fear and hatred." We begin to wonder if Mr. Young has ever seen a Gothic cathedral; but at the end of the book we find he is not to be taken too seriously; for the Colosseum (which he revisits) reminds him that the "genius of classic Rome" was not only order but also "death, ugly death, with all its ugly show of blood and pallor"; the pagan architecture of St. Peter's (the spirit of old Rome, as he admits) gives him the impression of fear, which we had been told was mediæval, and he turns with relief to the thought of the great Gothic churches which "encourage the pilgrim to join in a common hymn of praise and devotion to the great God of Love in Heaven."

In spite of its faults, this pocketable little book will be useful to the traveller. It contains in a small compass a great deal of information about the past; and, on the whole, the story is told in a simple and interesting manner. Mr. Young gives a spirited account of the barbarian invasions, of the horrible internal revolutions, and of the swollen disastrous splendour of the Renaissance, which make up so large a part of the tragedy of Rome. The book is illustrated by Nelly Erichsen.

Assisi.

The third volume is of a different order, and seems to us to realize much more perfectly what appears to be the object of the series. This is THE STORY OF ASSISI, by Miss Lina Duff Gordon. The charm of the Franciscan legend is felt nowhere more strongly than at Assisi, where at every step there is something to bring the story of St. Francis vividly into mind, and where the beauty and pathos of the story may be most fully realized. Few who visit the Umbrian town fall short of this realization. Even those who are not touched by the sight of the mountain-side caves in which the Friars Minor retired themselves from the world; or interested in the frescoes of Giotto and the other masters who have filled the Upper and Lower Churches with the glory of their handiwork; or moved by the evidence of so many centuries of faith and feeling—even these are awed by the vastness of Santa Maria Degli Angeli and by the world-wide organization which has grown up out of the "Little Poor Man's" humble beginnings. Miss Lina Duff Gordon is clearly an enthusiast of the right kind—an enthusiast both for St. Francis and for the charm of the Umbrian country; both for the marvellous art of Italy and for the fascinating pages of history which show us mediæval manners and help us to understand the mediæval mind. Her little book is nearly all about the past. The present, indeed, is almost too sad to be written about. No town in Italy bears upon it the stamp of a more grinding poverty than Assisi. Yet it has a fascination, this poor city of the dead past, and no one who loves the story of Blessed Francis should miss an opportunity of submitting to its fascination. Nor should any one who visits Assisi fail to take with them Miss Duff Gordon's handy little volume, into which is packed so much of the history of the town; and, for the imaginative mind, so many vivid pictures of days long gone by, days of gay festival, days of fierce fight, treachery, and bloodshed, when battle, murder, and sudden death were the common lot, and yet had no power to depress the spirit of humanity or to check the joy of life which is of so great account in the reckoning up of Middle Age characteristics.

TURKS AND CHRISTIANS.

TURKEY IN EUROPE. By ODYSSEUS. 1900. (Arnold. 16s.)

Turkey has always had a fascination for diplomatists, and that "Odysseus" is a diplomatist, or at least a Consul, we make no manner of doubt, in spite of his endeavour to hoodwink us by an amusing and characteristically Turkish story in which he figures as a concession hunter. Who better than a diplomatist deserves a nom de guerre so migratory in precedent and so classical in association as the crafty "Odysseus"; and to whom but a Government officer would a Levantine apply for naturalization, as here related in propria personâ? Whoever he may be,

"Odysseus" knows his Turkey by heart. He has known it long enough to learn its languages, and, what is much more difficult, to understand its people—we do not say its ethnology, though he is fond of playing with this tantalizing subject, never more perilous or elusive than in the Balkan peninsula. We shall not discuss his race-theories, tempting as they are, lest we be drawn into a debate to which there is no probable end. This sort of speculation, however, is not so out of place in a book which treats of modern Turkey as it might appear. The author's aim was to try "to understand what is the real condition of Turkey, and of some neighbouring countries, and how that condition has arisen." In order to solve the question of origin, he is obliged to enter into discussions of race and history and religion. Hence a long chapter on Mahomedanism and another on the Orthodox Church, neither of which presents any remarkably new views, nor certainly any new facts. We could have done without them, but we admit that they are essential factors in the problem which, we presume, "Odysseus" set out to solve—the future of Turkey. But does he solve it? Not the least in the world. At the end of this thick volume we are as much in the dark as to the final developments of the Eastern Question as we were at the beginning.

But perhaps we wrong the author. He may have aimed at understanding Turkey as it is, whilst totally ignoring Turkey as she shall be. If such be his limitation, he has undoubtedly succeeded in his design. No recent book, and scarcely any older book, gives a more perspicuous and comprehending estimate of the present exceedingly mongrel population of the Ottoman Empire in Europe, and none certainly describes it with a more graceful irony. One reason for this is a certain quality of aloofness which enables "Odysseus" to see facts without prejudice and describe evils without personal indignation. He is no reformer, or believer in Turkish reforms, and he is alive to the curious but indisputable fact that there is a very large proportion of the human race that decidedly objects to Western civilization. He does not argue the point, but presents us candidly with the opinions of the Turks themselves. The remarks of the Vali of Karakeui, whether authentic or not, undoubtedly represent Turkish opinion.

"All Christians" he observed, "big and small, like making money. We Turks don't know how to make money; we only know how to take it. You want to introduce a system in which Christians will be able to squeeze all the money out of us and our country and keep it. Who profit by all these concessions for railways and harbours and quays? Franks, Jews, Greeks, and Armenians, but never a Moslim. Do you remember that railway I helped you to build from Durugrad to Moropolis? Franks travel by it, Greeks and Armenians sell the tickets, and in the end all the money goes to the Jews. But what Turk wants the railway, and how much has any Turk made out of it? . . . This country is a dish of soup, and no one has any real intention except to eat it. We eat it in the good old-fashioned way with a big spoon. You bore little holes in the bottom of the soup-bowl and draw it off with pipes. Then you propose that the practice of eating soup with spoons should be abolished as uncivilized, because you know we have no gimlets and don't understand this trick of drinking through pipes." "But surely your Highness has had experience yourself of the advantages which Osmanlis may obtain from commercial enterprises and—" "Oh, I have had a suck at the pipe," said the Vali, "but, after all, I prefer eating with the spoon."

The extraordinary thing is the placid way in which the soup allows itself to be eaten. But after all, the "big spoon" is no new thing. The later Roman Empire treated its subjects in the Balkan provinces in much the same way; the Turks only carried on the imperial tradition. And the remarkable fact remains that, whatever reforms may be introduced, Turkey suffers no change. The Hatti Sherif of Gülhané, the Hatti Humayun, were full of wise and liberal provisions; but they proved to be mere waste paper. In the Ottoman Empire nothing changes. Turkey to-day, despite the extirpation of the Janissaries, despite Hatts and reforms, railways and telegraphs, invasions and massacres, is scarcely different in a single essential from the Turkey which Napoleon proposed to partition when he held his famous conversation with the Tsar in the boat at Tilsit. The Turks do not wish it changed; even la jeune Turquie does not wish it changed in the directions advocated by western reformers. For reform means the supremacy of Christians. "When you can get a Turk to obey a Rayah (native Christian), then you may begin to talk of reforming the Turkish Empire." "As long as force rules, the Turks are superior to the Christians. They are stronger, braver, and more united. But when force does not rule, when progress, commerce, finance, and law give the mixed population of the Empire a chance of redistributing themselves according to their wits, the Turk and the Christian are not equal; the Christian is superior. He acquires the money and land of the Turk, and proves in a law-court that he is right in so doing. One may criticize the Turkish character, but given their idiosyncrasies, one must admit that they derive little profit from such blessings of civilization as are introduced into the country." The fear of Christian supremacy is very real, and explains Armenian massacres and many other little things. The average Turk regards these as measures of self-defence. As to any approximation to European standards, he has not the faintest ambition. He has no respect for European ways, though he admits their cleverness. "He regards them as conjurers who can perform a variety of tricks, which may be, according to circumstances, useful, amusing, or dangerous; but for all Christendom he has a brutal unreasoning contempt—the contempt of the sword for everything that can be cut, and to-day the stupid contempt of a blunt sword."

Nevertheless we gather that the author's sympathies are rather with this same blunt sword than with the sharp little dagger of the Greek, the bludgeon of the Bulgarian, or the shovel of the Armenian. His chapters on all these peoples are full of insight, but scarcely of sympathy, and "Odysseus" must be added to the long list of travellers who, despite all the Turk's faults and occasional brutalities, entertains a sneaking kindness for the Unspeakable. But, by all who know him, the Unspeakable must be recognized as an unchanging unreformable being; and therein lies the problem of what can be done with him in his present anomalous situation. Perhaps the answer and the consolation are to be found in "Odysseus's" admirable illustration of the Turk as an incurable nomad, to whom change of residence is rather a pleasure than a trouble, and who scarcely realizes the meaning of the word exile. Never were "bag and baggage" more gracefully and gently hinted than in this delightful volume, which we recommend to all manner of readers, not merely as a repertory of mature and trustworthy observation, but as a brilliant example of how such a book ought to be written. Its style is as fascinating as its humour.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Running Amok!

Mr. Arnold White is a very out-spoken doctor of the body politic. His EFFICIENCY AND EMPIRE (Methuen, 6s.) is written to prove that the public business of this country is conducted with a carelessness and an incompetence that would never be tolerated in the management of the affairs of great industrial corporations like the Railway Companies. Those who travel on the Southern lines will perhaps find this allegation a little sweeping; but it is not necessary to agree with everything that Mr. Arnold White says in order to recognize the value of his criticism of our institutions. His great bugbear is the Foreign Office; and though he goes rather far in gibing at Mr. Scoones, who is quite as "efficient" in his way as Mr. White in his, much of his indictment will be endorsed by every practical man who reads it without prejudice. In the matter of the Consular service he makes out a particularly strong case for reform. When 202 of our 1,120 Consuls General, Consuls, Vice-Consuls, and Consular Agents are foreigners, bearing such names as Calocherino, Elopulo, Söderbergh, Van der Goot, Sveaas, Johannsen—to select at random from the list which Mr. White prints—it is impossible to believe that British commercial interests are adequately looked after everywhere. Nor is it to be expected that good men will be anxious to enter the service when it is known that the plums will probably go to outsiders with political influence. Mr. White, poaching on the preserves of Mr. Henniker Heaton, also denounces the General Post Office; but here his chief ground of complaint seems to be that, when he wrote a letter to the Postmaster-General, he got an answer from a gentleman whose name he recognized as that of a dramatic critic. To make a grievance of that is surely to confuse small things with great. The criticism of the Admiralty is more to the point, and so is the criticism of the War Office. In these connexions Mr. White makes statements which, if he can support them—he gives chapter and verse for them and does not mince matters in mentioning names—explain his sentimental regret for the old times when responsibility used to be allocated and driven home, when General Whitelocke was cashiered, and Dundas was driven from public life, and Byng was shot on his own quarter-deck. On the whole, therefore, Mr. White has written a notable book, though he spoils some of his effects by continually writing at the top of his voice. His history—or rather his historical generalizations—may not always be quite correct. It is hard to believe, in the light of such incidents as the Walcheren expedition and such documents as Wellington's letters that the standard of efficiency was so high at the beginning of the century as Mr. White suggests, or as it is now; but that is no great matter. Much of what Mr. White has to say—most of it indeed—is worthy of earnest attention.

Progress in Education.

EDUCATION IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (Cambridge University Press, 4s.) is a collection of exceedingly able and interesting papers—most of them read at the Summer Meeting of the University Extension Students last August. They certainly deserved publication; they treat almost every side of education, each is written by a recognized authority, and collected they form a most instructive popular review of educational progress since 1800. They are mainly historical; some of them touch more than others on present-day problems. We should have liked a little more from Mr. R. P. Scott in his Lecture on Secondary Education Legislation as to the difficulties of applying the new centralized organization to Public Schools, and the same remark may be made as to Miss E. P. Hughes's paper on the Training of Teachers. The only portion not strictly historical is Mr. M. E. Sadler's suggestive, if somewhat academic, paper on "National Education and Social Ideals," while a necessary commentary on the rest of the book is supplied in the last paper on German Educational History by Professor W. Rein.

Greek Myth.

Mr. G. St. Clair in 1898 published a book called "Creation Records Discovered in Egypt." He was in the position of a man who had a theory, not exactly new, but which he had worked out very thoroughly and made beautifully complete—viz., that Egyptian mythology was based entirely on astronomy, and that Egyptian worship changed with the precession of the equinoxes. Full of his theory, he now in MYTHS OF GREECE (Williams and Norgate, 16s.) tries the same method with the religious legend of Greece from Uranus to Perseus. This is much more difficult and much less convincing, and we trace much more plainly the dangerous obsession of a man with one idea. The ingenuity of it is highly attractive, but we cannot at this time of day believe that the anthropologists are on a wholly wrong tack, and that the whole system of Greek mythology has a common basis in the attempt to frame a correct calendar. From Enumeros to Max Müller students have tried to read the fruit of their own special studies into mythology, and this is what Mr. St. Clair does. The origin of myth is essentially complex—in the case of Greece particularly so; and Mr. St. Clair can hardly be said to have done more than advance the study of one factor, perhaps a large factor, in the growth of Greek legend. In Professor Stending's GREEK AND ROMAN MYTHOLOGY (Dent, 1s. n.), one of the Temple Primers, this astronomical theory is not recognized. The Professor, however, does not concern himself much with origins, but gives a pretty exhaustive description of the whole body of Greek and Roman myth and the contents of the Homeric and Cyclic Legends. The book must be described as packed with information rather than illumined by style—a remark which applies we think generally to the few instances, among the Temple Primers, of translations from the German.

Australasia.

The remark just made about the Temple Primers cannot be applied to AUSTRALASIA in the same series by Mr. A. W. Jose, a very bright and intelligent—and we may add timely—sketch of Australasian history, somewhat in the style of the fuller history of one of the Australasian colonies which Mr. W. P. Reeves gave us in "The Long White Cloud." Rusden's voluminous history is for the serious student of colonial history; this little book is admirably adapted for the Imperialist "in the street." We are rather surprised that in his notes on the literature Mr. Jose omits Marcus Clarke, and "For the Term of his Natural Life" has as good a right to be included in his bibliography as "Geoffrey Hamlyn."

Outre Manche.

In FRENCH LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY (Newnes, 3s. 6d. n.) Miss Hannah Lynch is evidently treating a subject that she knows uncommonly well. The pity is the greater that she did not co-ordinate her impressions and make up her mind exactly what it was that she really wished to be understood to say. Her neglect of this philosophic precaution often makes her meaning doubtful, and leaves the reader wondering which of two apparently contradictory statements should be accepted as the final verdict. What is her opinion, for instance of nuns? "If there is a place," she writes on page 249, "which belongs by divine right, if I may say so, to the nun, it is the side of a sick bed. . . . They make ideal sick-nurses." But, six pages further on, we read that "the hearts of nuns seem implacably steeled against human suffering, steeled against pity and generosity." On no ordinary theory of the virtues of a nurse can both these statements be true. And the book contains many other pairs of propositions equally discordant. The contradictions, however, are only such as one sometimes finds in the conversation of the best-informed persons when they rattle on without stopping to think. Miss Lynch writes as a gossip rather than as a philosopher, and though there are indications that she knows Paris a good deal better than she knows the provinces, her picture of French life is on the whole clear and accurate. Her opinions may fluctuate according to her moods, but she does not tamper with her facts. Her enthusiasm for the so-called "lower orders" of Paris is particularly commendable. The corresponding class in this country—more especially the women—have a vast deal to learn from them in the matter of industry, cleanliness, and manners. It is unfortunately impossible in these days to write about France without taking a side on religious questions; and Miss Lynch does not shrink from the responsibility of doing so. She is anti-clerical enough to satisfy Gambetta or Miss Betham Edwards, and apparently regards Jesuits as the enemies of the human race. She does not admit that they are great educators, though it is on the moral rather than the intellectual defects of their teaching that she dwells. The book is bright as well as instructive reading.

Facts and Dates.

ANNALS OF POLITICS AND CULTURE, by G. P. Gooch (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d. n.), may be described as a dictionary of dates, arranged on a new plan. On the left hand page the leading events in the political history of Europe are scheduled; while on the right hand we have a list of the contemporaneous happenings in the world of art, literature, religion, science, education, &c. Historical students have every reason to be grateful for the compilation. It gives them what they so often feel the need of, a preliminary birdseye view of the period they are studying. They will be able to ascertain in a moment, for instance, that Dr. Busby became headmaster of Westminster in the year in which the Dutch destroyed Malacca, that the foundation of Sunday schools at Gloucester was synchronous with the battle of Cape Saint Vincent, that the kaleidoscope was invented in the year of the abolition of the income-tax, and that "Fors Clavigera" was published in the year of the Commune. The usefulness of the book is enhanced by a bibliography and a capital index. Lord Acton praises it highly, but not too highly, in an introductory note. Historical novelists as well as historical students may be recommended to use it in order to avoid anachronisms. If we make a criticism it is that the work might very well have been started from an earlier date than 1492; but perhaps a supplementary volume is contemplated.

Science and Life.

As an alternative title for THE SCIENCE OF CIVILISATION (Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d.), Mr. C. B. Phipson, the author, calls his book a treatise on "The Principles of Agricultural, Industrial, and Commercial Prosperity." He has evidently been moved to write it by a genuine conviction that agriculture, industry, and commerce do not flourish as they might because their principles have hitherto been entirely misunderstood. We do not gather that he knows much about the first two, but he seems to have some practical experience of commerce and the disadvantages under which it labours. These are largely due, he thinks, to the indifference of British manufacturers to the precise wants of foreign customers, and their unwillingness to make changes which have been rendered imperative by American and German competition. This we have had dinned into our ears for some time past. We have also been told that we have lost our lead in the commercial world since other nations practically adopted a gold standard, that is, since 1874. Mr. Phipson enforces this view with some plausibility; but when he propounds his own nostrum for curing all economic evils he ceases to talk so reasonably. He has discovered that economic value is nothing but the relation between quantities of capital, or purchasing food-surpluses, and articles of wealth or manufacture. No doubt all capital can be resolved into food as its elementary form, and can be expressed in terms of the chief food-grain of the locality where it is accumulated. The value of all commodities could also be similarly expressed; and Mr. Phipson is convinced that this is the only possible basis of a sound monetary system. He proposes to abolish a currency which has become practically international, to demonetize gold, and substitute a paper currency on the basis of one hundred-weight of wheat—valued, say, at ten shillings—as its unit. This currency is to be issued by Government "to such an extent as will give stability to the price of food," that is, we suppose, it is to be inflated or contracted according to the prospects of the wheat market! After this, we are scarcely amazed to learn that private banking is to be abolished, and we are to be deprived of our cheque-books, because all payments must be made in food-unit notes. Mr. Phipson also proposes to abolish the present means of recovering rents and debts, and to convert the Army into a body of Government workmen. Instead of wasting their time in drilling and manœuvring they will be employed, when not fighting their country's battles, in constructing new railways, roads, docks, and harbours for use by the public free of charge, or as nearly so as may be. Mr. Phipson's theory of economics, which he has worked out with immense pains and ingenuity, hardly admits of serious criticism. But his book may do some good by leading other people to think for themselves, instead of taking for granted that all is for the best in this best of economic worlds.

NATIONAL LIFE FROM THE STANDPOINT OF SCIENCE (Black, 1s. 6d. n.) is a reprint of a lecture delivered by Mr. Karl Pearson to the Literary and Philosophical Society of Newcastle, and has a certain interest in connexion with recent gloomy prophecies that England will not last the century. The author considers human progress in the light of evolution, and his view is that progress would cease altogether if the sword were turned into the ploughshare and the nations cease to fight and compete for supremacy. He proceeds to weigh and estimate the dangers which threaten England in the struggle. The first danger signal which he perceives is the declining birth-rate. He denounces those who maintain that it is a sin for parents to bring into the world children whom they do not see their way to provide for, and vigorously exhorts potential parents thus :—

If you have not the means to start all your offsprings in your own class, let them do the work of another ; if you cannot make them into lawyers and engineers, let them be village schoolmasters and mechanics ; or, if this should raise an insurmountable, if utterly false, shame, let them go to new lands even as miners, cowboys, and storekeepers ; they will strengthen the nation's reserves, and this is far better than that they should never have existed at all.

In the second place, Mr. Pearson fears lest his countrymen should suffer from misapprehension of the functions of education. Their tendency, he considers, is to abolish education in favour of instruction, and his remarks on that technical education to which so many of our prophets pin their faith are strong and striking :—

There has been far too much talk about the national utility of science, and too little stress laid upon its educational value. "I want my son to learn what will be useful to him in his profession in life" is the statement I have heard from one parent after another. "I want my son to know how to observe and to think" is the expression of a desire which I have not yet come across. This is the spirit which has ruled the movement for technical education ; but, if this spirit is to remain dominant, it will take a great deal to get the nation out of the present ruts. What we want are trained brains, scouts in all fields, and not a knowledge of the facts and processes crammed into a wider range of untrained minds.

This, of course, is the case not only for the sciences, but also, and more particularly, though Mr. Pearson does not seem to see it, for the classics—apparently the most useless, but really the most useful of all branches of learning.

Imitation.

Mr. Richard Steel's suggestive work on IMITATION (Simpkin and Co., 4s. 6d.) develops the theory that there is a universal influence in nature at one with that which is known in the human subject as Imitation—"a directive tendency which exists in all natural units to imitate or follow the action and behaviour of other units in proportion to their natural propinquity, using the term propinquity in all its senses." In applying the theory to the inorganic world, it is, of course, hard to distinguish unconscious mimetic force from uniformity of action, but Mr. Steel does not seem to attach much importance to the inquiry. In human affairs, mimetic force is evident enough, especially in everything that can be referred to habit, custom, and fashion. But we should rather hesitate to say that "Imitation is always there in the final analysis as the great directrix of human life and conduct." In fact Imitation, used as Mr. Steel uses it, loses its meaning in consequence of its excessive extension. We all know about the defensive mimicry of some insects and plants, and we may concede Mr. Steel's argument, derived mainly from Jevons, that all reasoning is founded on a perception of similarity or difference—that is, of imitativeness or non-imitativeness. But can the widest expansion of the term Imitation bring these two facts really under a general proposition ? Mr. Steel comes dangerously near to merely playing with a definition ; but he has written an interesting and ingenious book.

Canon Hensley Henson's DISSENT IN ENGLAND (Rivington) comprises two lectures forming part of a course which unfortunately had to be broken off. He is not, of course, as his review of the literature of the subject would imply, breaking new ground, for he strangely omits to mention Canon Curteis' well-known book on Dissent. But he treats the history as far as the Hampton Court Conference with much ability, and we trust that he may be able, as he hopes, at some future time, to carry out his entire plan.

The Rev. John Harding's edition of Hooker's sixth book under the title CONFESSION AND ABSOLUTION (Charles Murray, 2s. 6d.) should be read side by side with the Rev. C. M. Roberts' HISTORY OF CONFESSION TO A.D. 1215 (Cambridge University Press, 8s. 6d.), a scholarly investigation of the matter dealt with by Hooker in his Fourth Chapter—viz., the actual bearing of Scriptural and Patristic Evidence on the practice of Auricular Confession, which, in Mr. Roberts' view, did not become common till the dawn of the ninth century, and which received encouragement in the tenth from the general expectation of the Second Advent.

MR. JOHN BURNS, M.P., by G. H. Knott (Drane, 6d.), is the newest of the bijou biographies. Even those who, in politics, differ toto cælo from Mr. Burns, esteem his character ; and this little life, which is well written, should find many readers.

FALAISE, THE TOWN OF THE CONQUEROR, by Anna Bowman Dodd (Unwin, 7s. 6d.), is a sprightly book consisting half of travel notes of the usual kind, half of a picturesquely told chronicle of this little known but very interesting town from which sprang the Royal line of England—including the story of Arlette, William's mother, which might have suggested to Mr. Hewlett the love story of Jehane in "Richard Yea and Nay."

We have now received Part II. Advanced of Messrs. Oldham and Holland's PRACTICAL BOOK-KEEPING (Allman, 2s.), of which Part I. Elementary was reviewed by us the other day. The accounts of Manufacturers, Contractors, and others, calling for the introduction of specially ruled books are dealt with. The University College Press sends us THE PRECEPTORS' BOOK-KEEPING, by Thomas Chalice Jackson (1s. 6d.). It contains plenty of examination papers.

Mr. Beckles Willson's THE TRUTH ABOUT NEWFOUNDLAND (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.) appears in a new edition with a new introduction dealing with the latest developments of the French shore question.

The second edition of Mr. Ralph Richardson's COUTTS AND CO., BANKERS (Elliot Stock, 7s. 6d.), is revised and enlarged, having added to it an account of the visit of the Mrs. Coutts, who had been Harriet Mellon and was to become Duchess of St. Albans, to Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford. It was there that the Duke made love to the whilom actress ; "When at Abbotsford," Sir Walter writes, "his suit thrived but coldly. She made me, I believe, her confidant in sincerity. She had refused him twice and decidedly. He was merely on the footing of friendship. I urged it was akin to love. She allowed she might marry the Duke, only she had at present not the least intention that way."

We have received Dr. John Murray Moore's Inaugural Address as President of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool THE BIRTH OF NEW NATIONS DURING THE VICTORIAN REIGN (Marples, Liverpool), which gives a lucid account of the constitution of the Federated Colonies of Canada and Australia.

ART.

Turner.

A LIST OF THE WORKS CONTRIBUTED TO PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS BY J. M. W. TURNER, R.A., WITH NOTES BY C. F. BELL (London, George Bell and Sons, 1901, 21s. n.). Quite early in his preface Mr. Bell regrets that Mr. Algernon Graves has never published the systematic catalogue of Turner's works, which he proposed to produce as a companion to his admirable books upon the works of Sir Edwin Landseer and Sir Joshua Reynolds. We can imagine that the reason why Mr. Graves, no less a man of business than an author, has not yet published his exhaustive catalogue is that he does not consider the Turner public sufficiently large to justify so expensive a publication. No such consideration has deterred Mr. Bell. The "list" which carries the weight of his volume upon its shoulders occupies some 107 pages of large, well-spaced type, and is a (necessarily dull) account of the exhibition career of 268 paintings. It may be of value to the collectors and owners of pictures and drawings by Turner, but if we accept Mr. Wornum's estimate that the incessant industry of Turner produced a body of work consisting of not less than twenty thousand pieces, the vast field of omissions so dwarfs the subject of the present book that the present volume can only be regarded as a contribution to our knowledge. Apart, however, from the list Mr. Bell has embellished his volume with a Preface and two Introductions, concerning which we may say at once that for intelligent condensation and critical illumination they should remain as a type of what such work should be. The writings of Burnet and Cunningham and the Redgraves, of Thornbury, Roget, Sandby, Hamerton, and Ruskin, have been read with intelligence and care; and the result is a concise life of Turner in the preface and a closely reasoned and clear account of the progress of his work in the two introductions. In fact the purely literary portion of Mr. Bell's book is unusually well done. It is quite obvious that the foundation of the book was the Appendix to Thornbury's "Life of Turner," and Mr. Bell has cleared this of several errors. The opinions reproduced are founded upon excellent authority, and show a careful study of the development of the art of water-colour painting in the hands of the Master. Yet we would point to the work of some modern painters, as for example to Mr. Walter Severn, to disprove the statement that Turner left water-colour art in such a position as to render "the number of simple processes for obtaining lights" incapable of extension; to the pictures painted during the time that Turner laboured as a student to throw some light upon the works which Dr. Munro encouraged him to study; and regard as enthusiasm run riot the statement that as a painter of still life Turner was surpassed only by Dürer and Rembrandt! In his "list" Mr. Bell fails to go beyond Thornbury. Those who possess Mr. Graves' extremely valuable "Dictionary of Artists, 1700-1893," will notice that he credits Turner with 250 exhibits at the Royal Academy, with 17 at the British Institute, and with seven at Suffolk-street. Mr. Bell has traced 258 at the Royal Academy, nine at the British Institute, one at the Manchester Institution in 1820, and acknowledges that he has lost all trace of the Suffolk-street contributions. The discrepancy at the Royal Academy is partially accounted for by the fact that Turner exhibited two pictures at the Royal Academy between the years 1820 and 1830 which are no in the Index to the catalogues or in Thornbury. The discrepancy between Mr. Graves', and Mr. Bell's total of pictures exhibited at the British Institute is more apparent than real, and is accounted for by the fact that, as Mr. Bell is careful to note, Turner's pictures were more frequently than not exhibited at the Royal Academy, to find a place a year or so after at the British Institute. As to the pictures shown at Suffolk-street these were lent by their owners and, not being sent by Turner himself, quite properly find no place in Mr. Bell's list.

Mr. Algernon Graves is at present occupied upon the revision of the proof-sheets for the third edition of his "Dictionary of Artists, 1700-1893," the first edition of which appeared in 1895. The original "dictionary" will remain unaltered, but the section which immediately precedes it, devoted to Additions and Corrections, will be increased from one to some eight or ten pages. The alterations are mostly amplifications and fresh information which has been gathered during the past five years. It is expected that the new edition will be ready in about a fortnight.

At no time since its foundation has the London Sketch Club presented so attractive an exhibition as that which now occupies the somewhat limited wall space of Mr. Freeman's Modern Gallery. And the members, for the most part, occupy the space to much advantage. The President, Mr. Geo. C. Haité, is unusually successful and shows his power as a draughtsman to even greater extent than on some former occasions. We have seldom seen a better and more convincing view of Windsor Castle than the one he exhibits, a rapid but solidly drawn impression showing clear observation and the amazing dexterity of his brushwork. Next in honour of achievement is Mr. Dudley Hardy, who, when he seeks to convey the impression of "A Wet Day," or a sense of dreariness and strength as in "Blow, Blow thou Wintry Wind," or the more simple genre of "An Old Custom" never fails to convince us of his faculty of perceiving and arresting the picturesque. There are good pictures, also, showing the personal point of view of such capable workers among the younger men as Spenlove Spenlove, Walter Fowler, Lee-Hankey, Walter Churcher, and Innes Fripp, and some excellent pictorial "fooling" by John Hassall and Cecil Aldin. It is a refreshing and spirited show.

There is at present being exhibited in one of the smaller courts of the Crystal Palace a series of photographs of objects so treated as to retain when projected upon a lantern screen a very unusual amount of their natural colour. The process employed has been "discovered" by Mr. James W. McDonough, an American, and offers the only fairly satisfactory result that we have hitherto seen amongst the innumerable attempts that are from time to time made to obtain a photographic colour record of natural objects. It is based upon the scientific dissection of colour into the three primaries, Mr. McDonough obtaining his results with one exposure and one negative. The three colours selected from the spectrum are a reddish orange, a yellowish green, and a violet blue. These three colours are ruled in very fine lines on a screen or glass plate which is placed in contact with a dry plate; an exposure is then made, the light from the object photographed passing through a chromatic filter, which is adjusted to the hood of the lens, and after the exposure the plate is developed in the usual way. This negative when viewed closely shows fine linear areas of different degrees of density. These areas represent the different values of the colour of the object photographed, as the light from it passes through the lined taking-screen in the camera. This taking-screen lined in the three primary colours absorbs or transmits the colour from the object just in proportion as it requires a mixture of part or all of these three colours to produce the colours in the original subject. This is the theory, which is a "discovery" so far as Mr. McDonough applies it; and it must be confessed that the results obtained justify our belief that the process goes far towards a scientifically sound solution of the great difficulties that have always beset the path of those who have attempted to fix colour impressions upon the sensitized photographic plate.

Collectors of art here and in America are already discussing with interest the unprecedentedly high sums paid this week for the rarer, if not always the more beautiful, mezzotint portraits after Sir Joshua Reynolds, dispersed by Messrs. Christie. Probably Mr. Henry Arthur Blyth's collection was not expected to realize more than about half what it has fetched. The 151 mezzotint portraits after Reynolds were, it is understood, chiefly collected twenty or twenty-five years ago, when £100 was regarded as an excessive sum even for the finest examples. Under the hammer these 151 portraits have realized £14,107 odd, or an average equal to the value of the rarest examples when acquired by the late owner. The most striking feature of the sale may be expressed in the form of a table, which shows the difference between the sums Reynolds himself got for the original pictures and those just realized for engravings after these pictures. The figures in the first money column appear in Sir Joshua's own ledgers, as reproduced in the work by Messrs. Graves and Cronin:—

Title.	Engraver.	State.	Paid to Reynolds for Picture.	Paid this week for Engraving.
Lady Bampfylde ...	T. Watson ...	1st pubd. ...	£ 157 10	... 924
Lady Betty Delmé and Children ...	V. Green ...	" ...	300	... 966
Lady Pelham-Clinton ...	J. R. Smith ...	" ...	100	... 987
Duchess of Rutland ...	V. Green ...	" ...	150	... 1,050
			£707 10	£3,927

For a mezzotint engraving, originally issued at perhaps six or eight pounds, to realize a thousand guineas 121 years after the portrait was painted provides food for reflection. There can be no question that the mezzotint art as practised by Valentine Green, John Raphael Smith, T. Watson, and others is a forgotten one, almost as irreclaimable as the art of the Greeks. But rarity operates more than beauty in the determination of price. Than the Lady Bampfylde, however, no more lovely mezzotint was in the Blyth collection. The lady sat to Reynolds in 1777, and the picture was exhibited at the Royal Academy in the same year, one of the contemporary criticisms being that the right arm was "incorrect in drawing." When the famous Buccleuch collection—remembered now chiefly for the Rembrandt etchings, three of which brought 3,640 guineas—was dispersed in 1887, a second state of this Lady Bampfylde brought the then extraordinarily high sum of 125 guineas; in 1893 a first state made 340 guineas; while three years ago in Paris an example fetched 7,000*fr.* The 880 guineas paid for the Blyth example, magnificently rich and deep, is, of course, a record, and this holds good with perhaps twenty other of the mezzotints. As to the Duchess of Rutland, a first state of which was valued at 125 guineas in the Buccleuch sale, sittings were given for this in 1780, and the original picture was destroyed at the Belvoir Castle fire of 1816, which robbed us of many masterpieces. The Duchess told "Mr. F. Grant, R.A." that Reynolds made her try on no less than eleven dresses before he was satisfied! The previous record for a Lady Betty Delmé and Children is said to be 240 guineas. The picture was painted in 1777, and the original cost of £300 was by 1894 increased to 11,000 guineas—save for the two Peel Van Dyck portraits, the highest price ever paid at auction for a picture—when it passed into the possession of Mr. C. Wertheimer. A fourth instance of an engraving bringing considerably more than the sum paid to Reynolds for the picture is that of the Ladies Elizabeth Laura Charlotte Maria, and Anna Horatia Waldegrave. A not particularly brilliant first state by Valentine Green fetched 500 guineas, whereas "H. Walpole" paid Reynolds £315 for the picture in 1782, sittings for which were given two years earlier. In all, eighteen of the 151 mezzotint portraits after Reynolds brought sums in excess of 200 guineas each, these eighteen examples showing an aggregate of £8,526. Is it possible that prices shall continue at this level, or even further appreciate? It would be unwise to prophesy. Did not Dibdin say in 1818, about the 116 guineas paid for Grenville's copy of the First Folio Shakespeare at the Saunders' sale that this was "the highest price ever given or likely to be given for the volume?" Yet in 1899 a First Folio fetched £1,700! Conceivably the price-limit for engravings has not yet been reached.

The discovery of an old master of the rarity and charm of the "Christ with Martha and Mary," by Vermeer of Delft, now being exhibited at Messrs. Forbes and Paterson's Gallery in Old Bond-street, must excite some attention. The name of the painter—who is represented in our National Gallery by one well-authenticated picture, and at Windsor Castle by a fine example—will be unfamiliar to most people, and the scope and brilliancy of the picture will surprise those who know the work of a very worthy Dutch painter who suffered eclipse at the hands of his master, Pieter de Hooch. Pictures by Vermeer are rare and costly. The present example probably belongs to the early period of the painter's work and the signature resembles that on the "Courtesan" at Dresden. Whether rightly ascribed to Vermeer or no, the present canvas possesses qualities of colour and technique which render it of the first importance.

To-day, March 16, the private view of the exhibition of pictures by members of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water-colours will be held in Piccadilly. The exhibition opens to the public on Monday. The Society of Miniaturists hold their exhibition in the galleries of the Royal Institute concurrently with the water-colour exhibition; and the show of work by members of the Women's International Art Club—formerly known as the Paris Art Club—opens at the Grafton Galleries on Monday.

FICTION.

Anne Mainwaring.

ANNE MAINWARING, by Lady Ridley (Longmans, 6s.), is one of the most readable novels of the season, and (except for the ending, which leaves the leading characters at an irritatingly crucial point in their destinies) it is one of the best constructed. All readers of "The Story of Aline" know that Lady Ridley has the power of realizing a character and of interesting people in its development. Anne Mainwaring is interesting from the time when she is the rather unhappy ugly duckling of a good-looking family and an unsympathetic mother to her marriage with the gentleman described by her father as "hairy about the heels." Anne is all emotion and love of art. Her husband leads her to believe that he shares her tastes; but, in love though he is, his secret wish is for a wife of good family to help him in his career. The inevitable lover comes later upon the scene, and from the day of his coming the story takes an original, but hardly convincing, turn. Would Anne have given up her lover, not for the sake of her conscience and her child, but on the advice of her woman friend? And, having given him up, would she have recalled him and undone the sacrifice, when she discovered that the friend's practice was opposed to the virtue that she preached? It may be that Lady Ridley is right. Possibly she wishes to show how any excuse is eagerly seized for doing what one longs to do. It is clear that she does not recognize Anne's right to sin because her friend has sinned. Our only real complaint is that we are left wondering—an unsatisfactory state when our sympathies have been so much aroused.

A Novel of Atonement.

Beneath the sentimental and alliterative title of A Wayside Weed (Hutchinson, 6s.) Mrs. A. F. Slade has written a vital and, sociologically speaking, a valuable study of the English female servant. Something of what Mr. George Moore intended to show us in "Esther Waters" is told here with keen observation and sympathy, and an unforced but deeply religious feeling. An episode of Annie Deane's girlhood in her Berkshire village is told with great skill. The result of a few happy days and a touch of splendid romance is years of bitter struggle for Annie. At twenty-one she is a servant under trying conditions with a son of four. But her life is lighted by one high resolve—"to work out her own salvation, that the sin of her ruin might not be laid at that man's door, and to bring up his boy so that if ever they met he might not be ashamed of him." Mrs. Slade's characters are real and "A Wayside Weed" should be read, but it is too severe and strenuous, too direct and true, to be widely popular. There are faults in construction; the characters are brought together by a series of fortuitous circumstances which are a little hard to accept. Annie sees in these accidents the Divine hand, but the reviewer notes a little too plainly the providence which arranges an effective dénouement for the delight of simple readers. But this is a matter of the framework. It would be difficult to find anything to surpass the picture of Annie in recent fiction. To have perfectly presented a single character such as Annie Deane is to have aided the future historian of our period. We have no Bourget or Anatole France (perhaps our novel readers do not deserve them), and so we may well be grateful to a writer such as the author of "A Wayside Weed," who gives us at least a dozen skilful sketches of real people and one finished picture.

Polynesian Tales.

Personally, we are always delighted to find a new collection of stories from the authors of "A First Fleet Family" and "The Mutineer" on our table. THE TAPU OF BANDERAH, by Mr. Louis Becke and Mr. Walter Jeffery (Pearson, 6s.), has all their well-known qualities—absolute knowledge of Polynesia and of the Australian ports, and power to depict them. The story which gives its name to the book is of Banderah, a native chief of Mayou—one of those honest, puissant island kings, with the lust of revenge and slaughter in him, whom Stevenson knew, and Mr. Becke knows, so well. This hero, a few German and American rogues, an honest and a dishonest Englishman, a good but not very clever parson, "with the fire of that noble missionary spirit which animated the souls of such earnest men as Moffat and Livingstone, and Williams of Erromanga and Gordon of Khartoum," are the leading personages of "The Tapu of Banderah." Add to these a tribe in revolt and you have enough characters to work the excellent story of stolen gold, bloodshed, knaves who fall out and upright persons who survive and tell us again something of one of those mysteries of the South Seas that will never be altogether solved. Other stories are of equal merit—some of the early days of Australian seaports, some of the Equatorial Islands. "Officer and Man" is admirably told, no word too much, but all sufficient; such a sketch as Pākia—the recollections of an old native who has travelled and learned many tongues—shows in a pleasing manner the sympathy and kindness of the writers. But all the tales in the present volume are of interest in various ways.

Domesticities.

Readers of "Over the Hills" and "Betty Musgrave" will find what they expect in A NARROW WAY (Methuen, 6s.), by Mary Findlater, viz., dignity and insight, humour and sincerity. But they must not expect to be greatly excited by the story of Kitty Cameron and Dr. Henry Marks. It is a "domestic" story, and those who do not care for homely wit and a quiet life will probably pass it by. In doing so they will miss a good novel, occasionally suggestive—as in the chapters on suburban life near Edinburgh—of the deliberate days of Trollope and the ponderous methods of the 'sixties. But as soon as one gets to know Kitty one is interested, and her story is well told. Like the best early Victorian furniture, the material is excellent, the workmanship careful, the result useful but domestic, drab, and a little lacking in colour and design. The moral is that "après tout, c'est un monde passable," and Kitty's trials have a happy ending in the love "that is quietness and assurance for ever."

Echoes from Ruritania.

Mr. Arthur W. Marchmont's new Anthony Hopian romance IN THE NAME OF A WOMAN (Longmans, 6s.) will be, we expect, even more popular than his book "A Dash for a Throne," and with good cause. That well-known young English gentleman—with the foreign connexions—who travels to countries ending in "ia," and immediately becomes involved in royal intrigues, is brilliantly depicted. Bulgaria is the scene of the present romance, and Sofia, where the Russians appear to play conscientiously into the novel-writer's hands, is admirably described. Those who love the stories of brave men and great ladies, of Russian Dukes, and Bulgarian diplomatists, of night adventures, and the clash of swords, or even sword sticks, will be delighted with the book, which is written with an immense amount of élan. The happy end of Gerald Winthrop's undertakings is told more peacefully, but the author's forte is the spirited, breathless style of narration which is always sure to be welcome.

Veronica Verdant.

Miss Mina Sandeman finds a difficulty in keeping herself within the customary bounds of a novelist. Thus, a footnote to p. 73 informs us that —'s cream (warmly praised by one of the characters in the book) is to be procured at the Junior Army and Navy Stores. This sort of thing is hardly what we expect to find in a writer of Miss Sandeman's experience; the announcement comes upon us with a shock, for up to this point there is nothing much out of the common in VERONICA VERDANT (John Long, 6s.), except the obvious peculiarity of the name. Again, later on, Miss Sandeman thinks fit to introduce, for no particular reason, a violent diatribe against vivisection. Lady novelists are prone to fly off at tangents, but her introduction of the topic ruins, from an artistic point of view, a story which without this excrescence might have been mildly interesting.

The Aftertaste.

From some letters appearing in our columns, our readers will have gathered some idea of Mr. Compton Reade's THE AFTERTASTE (Greening, 6s.). Mr. Reade is a man of wide experience and broad views, a fluent writer, and a cultured man, but—apart from the subject of the book which has been discussed in the correspondence referred to—we are a little disappointed with the workmanship he here displays. The book is a trifle too "stagy," too devoid of true realism, of delicate romance. Everywhere one notes the hand of the man who writes easily, who keeps a watchful eye on mankind, and yet does not penetrate below superficialities. We trace the heroine from early youth through a number of dramatic scenes, and leave her coming back as an erring wife to bend in kindness over the death-bed of her forgiving husband—a situation effective but sadly antique.

The author of DUKE RODNEY'S SECRET (Jarrold, 6s.), Perrington Primm, writes in a very lady-like way, and possesses that splendid lack of humour which one associates, often unfairly, with the lady novelist. "Duke Rodney"—Duke is an abbreviation of Marmaduke and looks better in the title—an impossibly wicked character, was, we are told, popular in the "smoke room," because he was "a man of broad views, had travelled pretty well all round the world, and was particularly gifted in imparting information patiently . . ."—a felicitous definition of a bore, which Rodney in fact proves to be. The story is throughout cheap and obvious.

THE CONSCIENCE OF GILBERT POLLARD, by Adeline Sergeant (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), is written with the ease that long practice has brought its author, but it is not by any means one of her best novels. There is a certain trite conventionality about both plot and treatment. There is no novelty in the idea of the brother meanly deprived of his fair share of the inheritance, but conquering fortune on his own account and coming back to marry the guileless maiden who has been his friend through all reverses. Of course, good working-out will save the stalest plot. But in this case the working-out is commonplace. When Miss Adeline Sergeant allows herself time, she can do very different and far less perfunctory work.

JULIE: A STUDY OF A GIRL, by A. Man (W. Scott, 2s. 6d. n.), is an entertaining story of life in the slums. The heroine is a gutter-child with a talent for music, who is rescued from her surroundings and trained for the concert platform by a benevolent patron. She finds her allegiance to her new life continually at feud with a desire to ameliorate the lives of her old companions. The plot is loosely constructed, and as a study of character Julie lacks grip. But the types of East-end life are vigorously drawn, even if they are obviously exaggerated.

Thomas Pinkerton's latest romance THE IVORY BRIDE (Long, 6s.) is a stirring story of intrigue in a small Italian State of the eighteenth century. The plot, though not original, is well worked out. Prince Pecchi is a distinctly humorous sketch of a foreigner struggling with the perplexities of English. Mr. Pinkerton's style is vigorous, but occasionally obscure. What will the average reader make of "the hamadryad of her sex"? It may be true that a panther "has aseity," but what is "aseity"? Even the author's gloss, "is unimpeachable," helps us little.

Mr. William Palmer, in common with many others, has no doubt read the story of the immortal Pickwick, and the brilliant idea has occurred to him of bringing the adventures of that gentleman up to date, with alterations and improvements. Accordingly we have the ADVENTURES OF MERRYMAN BROTHERS (Digby, Long, 6s.) with, as it were, two modern Pickwicks arm-in-arm setting out in the Quixotic enterprise of putting the world straight, with Nathaniel Peg in the character of Sam Weller as attendant and adviser. Unfortunately Mr. John and Mr. James Merryman, though their adventures are sufficiently remarkable and their personal appearance is drawn with much gusto, make no pretence of being alive, and this book of their adventures fails to arouse interest.

The best thing in THE MARRIAGE OF TRUE MINDS (Richards, 3s. 6d.), by Mrs. Theophila North, is her skilful use of the sonnet No. cxvi. from that sequence by which Shakespeare, as with a key, is said to have unlocked his heart. The poem helps to reveal the fortunes of Mrs. North's rather uncomfortable characters. Most of them love music and suffer on that account, or, if they are not musically inclined, they are denied the right to give happiness until they are better-minded. The book is carefully written and has a special interest for musical people. Such persons, it is sometimes said, have no abundance of humour; they will not, therefore, miss that quality in "The Marriage of True Minds."

Miss Annie S. Swan's AN AMERICAN WOMAN (Hutchinson, 5s.) is typical of her usual methods. The plot is thin, and the incidents show a poverty of imagination, but there is a cheery optimism throughout which atones for a multitude of shortcomings. Mr. D. Murray Smith's illustrations are good.

In Mr. T. W. Speight's SECOND LOVE (Digby Long, 6s.) the people are wholly depressing. The plot is an ordinary, carefully-composed one; the characters are commonplace to the uttermost degree; the writing is never brilliant, but comes perilously near the antithesis of that quality.

Correspondence.

THE SHAKESPEARE FIRST FOLIO.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The Delegates of the Clarendon Press of the University of Oxford have requested me to contribute a brief preface to the Collotype facsimile of the copy of the Shakespeare First Folio, 1623, which they are preparing for publication from the copy belonging to the Duke of Devonshire at Chatsworth. The Shakespeare First Folio is, from the literary point of view, the most valuable book in the world. Much uncertainty exists at present as to the precise number of original copies now extant. The preparation of the new facsimile by the Clarendon Press offers a favourable opportunity for making for the first time a census of the copies that now survive. Such a census, if satisfactorily executed, would be of permanent value to bibliographers, collectors, and students, and it is hoped that present owners in all parts of the world will facilitate my endeavours to make the record accurate and exhaustive.

I shall, naturally, give chief prominence in the published results of the census to copies that are perfect at all points; but I hope to mention all copies, even those that are imperfect, about which information is furnished me.

I should be glad to hear from those owners with whom I am not at present in communication.

I am, Sir, yours very faithfully,

SIDNEY LEE.

108, Lexham-gardens, Kensington, London, W.

THE LATE MR. F. S. ELLIS.
TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I add to your obituary notice of the late Mr. F. S. Ellis my tribute to him as a valued contributor to the new English Dictionary? Mr. Ellis took a lively interest in the progress of the work, and in the course of his editorial labours since 1880 constantly sent us such quotations and notes as he thought might prove useful to us; and, in the case of the "Golden Legend," supplied us with the original Latin text for numerous difficult passages. The Dictionary has lost in him a zealous friend, whose help was ever at our disposal, and whose services, if they did not approach in magnitude those of the late Dr. Fitzedward Hall, deserve grateful commemoration. Mourning the loss, one after another, of early workers for the Dictionary, we should be cheered if younger scholars and men of letters would try to step into their places, and aid us in our effort to realize in the Dictionary the ideal of its founders and original promoters.

Oxford, March 12, 1901.

J. A. H. MURRAY.

APOCRYPHAL STORIES.
TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your interesting article on Apocryphal stories you throw discredit on the statement that the Pope had presented a golden hammer to Cardinal Oreglia, the Camerlengo, on the ground that there is no such ceremony as the story implied, at the recognition of a Papal decease. On the other hand, the late Mr. Cartwright in his book on Papal Conclaves gives this account:—"Proceeding to the death chamber, the Cardinal Camerlengo strikes the door with a gilt mallet, calling on the Pope by name. On receiving no reply he enters the room, when he taps the corpse on the forehead with another mallet of silver, and falling on his knees before the motionless body, proclaims the Pope to be in truth no more." A similar account is to be found in Mr. T. A. Trollope's Broken Papal Conclaves. I have no means of knowing what foundation there is for these statements.

I believe you are quite right in attributing the famous definition of an Archdeacon to Bishop Blomfield. As I have heard the story, Lord Althorp was not satisfied with the definitions he had received from two other Bishops, and said to his secretary "Go and ask the Bishop of London, he is sure to know," and received the well-known answer which pleased him.

I should have thought the remark about a Taylor and a Bull was earlier than Dean Burgon. It is nearly half a century since I heard as an old story how it was said of some one in a funeral sermon, "He lived like a Taylor, and he died like a Bull."

I am yours faithfully,

H. B. FOYSTER.

Croft House, St. Clements, Hastings, March 13, 1901.

MR. WHEATLEY'S "PEPYS" IN AMERICA.
TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A note on p. 3 of Literature for January 5th, on the publication of Mr. W. H. Wheatley's edition of Pepys' Diary in the United States is somewhat misleading, and I venture to offer a word or two in this connexion.

Wheatley's edition was issued and copyrighted in the United States by the Macmillan Company of New York, and printed at the Norwood Press. The volumes were printed here as they appeared in England, beginning in 1893 and ending in 1900. The edition was completed in nine vols. (the index and Pepysiana being in one vol.), was well printed, and cost six shillings a volume.

The Macmillan Company sold to Crosscup and Sterling—a subscription house—500 sets of the sheets, printed from their plates, for "extra illustrating" and to be sold by subscription. These sets were made up into 18 vols. each, with separate title pages, and, in some cases, at least, marked as "imported," and were sold by subscription agents at a sum ranging from twelve shillings a vol. upwards. An agent recently called upon me and flatly stated that this subscription edition was the only "complete" edition, and could not be had on this side of the water in any other form. I do not think one person in ten buying the subscription edition knew that the work for which they were paying $50 or $60 could be bought in the regular channels of trade for thirteen dollars and a-half.

It is by such methods that the country is flooded with "limited" editions, "extra illustrated" editions, &c., and men who consider themselves keen men of business are duped in every city and town because they find it easier to take the agent's word and buy than to pause and make inquiry. The question naturally arises, why do the reputable publishers and authors allow such a use to be made of their property?

I am very truly yours,

LOUIS N. WILSON, Librarian.

Clark University, Worcester, Mass., Feb. 12.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE.
TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Again the "Split Infinitive"! We may, I think, reasonably compare "to quickly go" and "to go quickly" with the German verbs "zu übersetzen" and "überzusetzen," and for the following reasons:—

(1) Separation of the "to" (sign of infinitive) from the verb.

(2) Alteration of the original meaning of the verb by insertion of adverb between the sign of the infinitive and the verb.

For it will be admitted that "I told him to quickly go" means "I told him to depart quickly," whereas "I told him to go quickly" means "I told him to make the journey quickly," just as "zu übersetzen" signifies "to translate" and "überzusetzen" "to cross."

Viewed in this light the "Split Infinitive" seems to be as respectable and grammatical as any other infinitive, split or not.

Yours truly,

P. G. WILSON, Sub-Director,
Berlitz School of Languages, Elberfeld.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your correspondent "H. S."—if he will allow me to abbreviate his pseudonym—finds my phrase "virtue and compactness" vague. I will endeavour to make my meaning clear.

By "virtue" I mean the modal force or quality of the verb. I do not dispute the possession of infinitive force by the whole phrase "to have subdued," but maintain that it owes that force to the auxiliary entirely and not at all to the participial complement. The proof is easy. Remove the complement and there remains an infinitive in full force. Remove the auxiliary, and there remains no infinitive force whatever. A similar argument applies to the indicative phrase "I was recognized."

By "compactness" I mean the negation or opposite of the quality connoted in "split." The auxiliary in the phrase "to have entirely subdued" in which, as I think I have shown, the full force of the infinitive lies, remains compact, and the infinitive remains unsplit. If the operation, which "H. S." so warmly advocates, is to be performed we must write "to completely have subdued," which would be a genuine split infinitive.

As regards the comparative merits of "I ask you kindly to clear out" and "I ask you to kindly clear out," I admit the existence of a slight ambiguity in the former, regarded as a written sentence; but this ambiguity is of little moment as the sentence is essentially a spoken sentence. The question arises whether it is worth while to run counter to the acknowledged traditions of the language merely in order to dot an "i" very plain.

The history of the German infinitive, which seems closely to resemble our own, would perhaps throw some light on the subject. Will "H. S." or some other correspondent tell us whether the split is made in Germany? E. D. L.

"THE AFTERTASTE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read this book and the correspondence about it in your excellent paper. My impression of the book is that the aftertaste is unpleasant—it lingers on the palate with an unwholesome flavour like the fumes of a night's debauch. Granted that the author has solved his problem, could he not have done it in a healthier atmosphere, with less raking and stirring of the mud? A spade is a spade and there is no need to exalt it to the position of "an implement of agriculture," but when the spade is employed to dig in filthy soil nothing is gained by proclaiming the fact. I like a book that I can read and pass on to the young without fear of leading their imaginations into a channel that reeks of the things we care not to dwell upon, though they may be "psychological truths." PHTHYNX.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Messrs. Bell announce a new work by Mr. Bernhard Berenson on "The Study and Criticism of Italian Art," containing essays on "Vasari in the Light of Recent Publications," "Venetian Painting," "Correggio," "Giorgione's Lost Originals," &c., and forty-two reproductions of paintings.

The new and final "Diaries of Marie Bashkirtseff," together with the correspondence she carried on with Guy de Maupassant, will be published very shortly by Mr. Grant Richards.

Mr. T. G. Law writes from the Signet Library, Edinburgh, March 9, 1901:—

In remarking in the current number of Literature that "the Spring season promises to be full of Mary Stuart" you mention certain forthcoming publications on the subject, but do not refer to "Papal Negotiations with Queen Mary during her Reign in Scotland," edited from papers in the Vatican Archives, by the Rev. J. H. Pollen, S.J., for the Scottish History Society, which is expected to be out in a few weeks.

M. René de Maulde Clavière, the author of "The Women of the Renaissance," has written a volume of light social philosophy called "The Art of Life," applying the conclusions of his former volume to the present day, discussing woman's part in modern life, also dress, furniture, house-decoration, marriage, and social duties. The book has been translated by G. H. Ely, and will be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein.

Mr. Budgett Meakin's "The Land of the Moors," uniform with his "Empire of Morocco," will be published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein next week. His third volume, dealing with the people of Morocco, will be ready before midsummer. The volume on "Chivalry," in the Social England Series, by Mr. F. W. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton, will be published in May. In April Messrs. Sonnenschein will issue, among other books, "The Specious Present: A Metaphysical Treatise," by Alfred Hodder; "Aristotle's Psychology" (including the "Parva Naturalia"), translated and edited by Professor Wm. Hammond; and a volume of "Poetical Tributes to the Memory of Queen Victoria," selected by Dr. Fanshawe. Professor Bickerton's "Romance of the Heavens" and "A System of Map Drawing" will both appear this month, as well as an essay on the social, political, and religious problems of the day by Z. H. Lewis, entitled "The Hope of England." Other books to be published during the spring by Messrs. Sonnenschein are "British Rule in India," by Dadabhai Naoroji; a life of "The Empress Elizabeth of Austria," by Clara Tschudi, translated by E. M. Cope; Mr. E. A. Baker's "Descriptive Guide to the Best Fiction"; and the third volume of Professor Wundt's "Ethics," dealing with "The Principles of Morality and the Sphere of their Validity," translated by Professor E. B. Titchener, of Cornell University, who has also a translation, in two volumes, of Professor Wundt's "Physiological Psychology."

The Art Journal volume dealing with the Paris Exhibition, which has been appearing in monthly parts, is now separately issued. It is an exhaustive record of great interest and contains nearly a thousand illustrations.

In our notice last week of Mr. Lucy's "Diary of the Unionist Parliament" (Arrowsmith) we stated that Mr. Lucy includes "Calendars" borrowed from "The Politician's Handbook." We should have said "borrowed from Vacher's Parliamentary Companion."

Books to look out for at once.

"A Common-sense Army." By the Author of "An Absent-minded War." John Milne.

"Literary Friends and Acquaintances." By W. D. Howells. Harper. [Reminiscences of Lowell, Emerson, Longfellow, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Walt Whitman, Whittier, &c.]

"A History of the Four Georges and of William the Fourth." By Justin McCarthy and Justin Huntly McCarthy. Vols. III. and IV., completing the work. Chatto and Windus. 12s. each.

"The Land of the Moors." By J. E. Budgett Meakin. Swan Sonnenschein.

"The Afterflow of a Great Reign." Four sermons preached at St. Paul's by Dr. Ingram, Bishop Designate of London. Wells Gardner. 1s. 6d.

"Life in Poetry" and "Law in Taste": Two series of lectures delivered by Mr. W. J. Courthope while Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Macmillan.

"Cartoons from 'Punch.'" By Sir John Tenniel. Bradbury and Agnew. 5s. net.

"From Gladiator to Persimmon." By S. Dixon ("Vigilant" of the "Sportsman"). Richards. 18s. net. [Turf Memories for Thirty Years. Illustrated in colours.]

"The English Turf." By Charles Richardson. Methuen. 15s. [Describes the evolution of racing and the racehorse of to-day.]

"The Confessions of a Poacher." By J. Connell. Pearson. 3s. 6d. [A living poacher's actual experiences. Illustrated by F. T. Dadd.]

"Saint Louis (Louis IX. of France)." By F. Perry. Putnam. 6s. ["Heroes of the Nations" Series.]

"History of Egypt in the Middle Ages." By Stanley Lane-Poole. Methuen. 6s.

[Vol. VI. of Professor Flinders Petrie's "History of Egypt."] "Little Memoirs of the Eighteenth Century." By George Paston. Grant Richards. 10s. 6d.

[Contains memoirs of Lady Hertford, Lady Pomfret, Richard Cumberland, Lady Craven, afterwards Margravine of Anspach, &c.] "The Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley." Vol. 3. Macmillan. 30s. net.

Novels— "The Third Floor." By Mrs. H. Dudeney. Methuen. 6s.

"A Secretary of Legation: A Tale of Zafra." By Hope Dawlish. Methuen. 6s.

"Belinda Fitzwarren." By the Earl of Iddesleigh. Methuen. 6s.

"The Black Wolf's Breed." By H. Dickson. Methuen. 6s.

"Another Woman's Territory." By "Alien." Constable. 6s.

"Lest We Forget." By Joseph Hocking. Ward and Lock. 3s. 6d. [A romance of the days of Queen Mary.]

"Children of Hermes." By Hume Nisbet. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

"A Daughter of Patricians." By F. Clifford Smith. Unwin. 6s.

[A French-Canadian novel. Illustrated.] "A Soldier of the King." By Dora M. Jones. Cassell. 6s.

[Founded on the life of John Gifford, the original of Bunyan's Evangelist.] "Anna Lombard." By Victoria Cross. Long. 6s.

"The Sentence of the Court." By Headon Hill. Pearson. 6s.

LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BIOGRAPHY.

SHAKESPEARE'S FAMILY. By Mrs. C. C. Stopes. 9½×6 257 pp. Stock. 10s. 6d. n. KING AND EMPEROR: The Life History of Edward VII. By A. Mac. 7½×5, 171 pp. Partridge. 1s. 6d. n.

[A sensible, readable, and perfectly frank "appreciation" of His Majesty's life and work.] PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA (Great Masters Series). By W. G. Waters. 8×5½, 135 pp. Bell. 5s. n.

FICTION.

ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS. By Barry Pain. 7×4½, 132 pp. Unwin. 2s.

THE WIZARD'S KNOT. By W. Barry. 7½×5½, 376 pp. Unwin. 6s.

HARLOW OF SENDLE. By J. W. Graham. 7½×5½, 344 pp. Blackwood. 6s.

[A north-country tale "from the Notebooks of Thomas Denton, Esq., of Eselby."] BALLAST. By Myra Swan. 7½×5½, 361 pp. Longmans. 6s.

THE GOLDEN TOOTH. By J. M. Cobden. 7½×5½, 313 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

IN HIS OWN IMAGE. By F. Baron Corvo. 7½×5½, 419 pp. Lane. 6s.

THE CHURCH OF HUMANITY. By D. C. Murray. 7½×5¼. 318 pp. Chatto and Windus. 6s.

LADY WILMERDING OF MAISON ROUGE. By J. D. Craig, D.D. 7½×5¼. 341 pp. Stock. 6s.

[Originally written when Nice was Sardinian, and contains characters which re-appear in the author's "John Mavrell".]

BLACK COUNTRY SKETCHES. By Amy Lyons. 7½×5, 116 pp. Stock. 3s. 6d. [Gathered from old MSS. Extends over three centuries.]

A SYNDICATE OF SINNERS. By Gertrude Warden. 7½×5¼. 301 pp. Digby, Long. 6s.

EDWARD BLAKE. By C. M. Sheldon. 7½×5, 235 pp. Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.

[A religious story of American college life.]

MY INDIAN QUEEN. By Guy Boothby. 8×5¼. 319 pp. Ward, Lock. 5s.

[A tale of London and India in the days of George II.]

L'HALEINE DU DÉSERT. Par Jean Pommeret. 7½×5, 322 pp. Paris, Flammarion. Fr. 3.50.

CASTING OF NETS. By R. Bagot. 7½×5¼. 358 pp. Arnold. 6s.

[By the author of "A Roman Mystery." Deals with Roman Catholicism in society and with "mixed marriages." The scene is laid in England and Rome.]

THE SALVATION SEEKERS. By N. Ainslie. 7½×5¼. 290 pp. Methuen. 6s.

THE FROBISHERS. By S. Baring-Gould. 7½×5¼. 308 pp. Methuen. 6s.

CUCKOO: A Novel for Children. By S. Ashton. 8½×7, 120 pp. Simpkin. 3s. 6d.

SAINT NITOUCHE. Par Georges Beaune. 7½×5, 316 pp. Paris, Flammarion. Fr. 3.50.

LITERARY.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE SHORT STORY. NOTES ON SPEECH-MAKING By B. Matthews, D.C.L. 6½×4¼. 92 pp. Longmans. 1s. 6d. n. each.

[These booklets contain reprinted articles—the former dating from the eighties. The "Speech-making" makes good reading.]

SOME ASPECTS OF BIBLIOGRAPHY. By J. Ferguson. 9×5¼. 102 pp. Edinburgh, Johnston. 5s. n.

KALHANA'S CHRONICLE OF THE KINGS OF KASHMIR. 2 vols. Trans. by M. A. Stein. 10¼×7¼. 402+555 pp. Constable. £3 3s. n.

DELLA VITA E DELLE OPERE DI LORENZO DA PONTE. By Angelo Marchese. 7½×5, 511 pp. Trevis, Premiata Topografia Turazza.

UMORISTIL (Nelle Letterature Straniere. Terza Serie.) By A. Leforte-Randi. 7½×5, 344 pp. Palermo, Reber. L. 2.50.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE RELIEF OF KUMASI. By Col. H. C. J. Bias. 7½×5¼. 315 pp. Methuen. 6s.

[The story, for the most part, of an eyewitness. Maps and photographs.]

THE NORTH AMERICANS OF YESTERDAY. By F. S. Dellenbaugh. 9¼×6¼. 487 pp. Putnam. 21s.

MORISON'S CHRONICLE OF THE YEAR'S NEWS FOR 1900. By G. Eyre-Todd. 7½×5¼. 446 pp. Glasgow, Morrison. 3s. 6d. n.

[Gives, with its complete classified index, a very useful conspectus of public events Third Annual Issue.]

PREMIÈRES OF THE YEAR. By J. T. Green. 7½×5¼. 275 pp. Macqueen.

[Reprinted dramatic criticisms, plain-spoken and very readable, from May 7, 1899, "Why Smith Left Home," to July 8, 1900, Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Candida."]

THE TRUTH ABOUT NEWFOUNDLAND. The Tenth Island. By Beekles Wilson. 7½×5¼. 228 pp. Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.

THE PROCEPTORS' BOOK-KEEPING. By T. C. Jackson. 7×4¼. 173 pp. Clive. 1s. 6d.

COUTTS & CO., BANKERS. 2nd Ed. By R. Richardson. 9¼×6, 169 pp. Stock. 7s. 6d.

L'ART DE LA VIE. By R. de Maille de la Clavière. 4¾×7¾. 335 pp. Paris, 1901. Perrin. Fr. 3.50.

LES RAYONS DE L'AUBE. Dernières Etudes Philosophiques. By Count Léon Tolstoy. Translated from the Russian by J.-W. Bienstock. 4¾×7¾. 415 pp. Paris, 1901. Stock. Fr. 3.50.

LE DROIT D'ÊTRE MÈRE. Par P. Bru. 7½×5, 322 pp. Paris, Flammarion. Fr. 3.50.

POETRY.

PARODIES AND OTHER POEMS. By Maggie Grogan. 7½×5¼. 72 pp. Digby, Long. 3s. 6d. n.

VILLAGE LIFE AND FEELING. By R. Upperton. 7½×5¼. 195 pp. Greening. 2s. 6d. n.

REPRINTS.

ROB ROY. THE ANTIQUARY. (The New Century Scott.) 6¼×4¼. 503+520 pp. Nelson. 2s. each.

EARTHWORK OUT OF TUSCANY. By Maurice Heuldt. 7½×5, 205 pp. Macmillan. 5s.

GILBERT WHITE'S SELBORNE. 2 vols. Ed. by R. B. Sharpe, LL.D. 9×6, 427+433 pp. Freemantle. £3 3s.

THEOLOGY.

OLD AND NEW CENTURY BELLS. By the Rev. J. R. Vernon. 7½×5¼. 166 pp. Wells Gardner. 2s. 6d. n.

[Six Advent Addresses, by the author of "The Harvest of a Quiet Eye," on the Standard of Morality, of Philanthropy, of Faith, &c.]

IS CHRIST INFALLIBLE AND THE BIBLE TRUE? By H. McIntosh. 8½×5½. 680 pp. T. and T. Clark. 9s.

PAROCHIAL SERMONS. By S. J. Stone. 7½×5, 236 pp. Skeffington. 4s.

[Short characteristic sermons by the author of "Weary of Earth." Nearly half the book devoted to "Words from the Cross."]

INTRODUCTION TO THE LITERATURE OF THE BIBLE. By R. G. Moulton. 7×4¼. 374 pp. Ibbister. 3s. 6d.

THE SOUL'S PILGRIMAGE. Selected from the writings of George Boddy, D.D. Ed. by J. H. Burn. 5¼×4¼. 257 pp. Methuen. 2s. 6d.

[Short extracts under subject headings—many of them now appearing in print for the first time.]

THE SOCIAL LIFE OF THE HEBREWS (The Semitic Series). By the Rev. E. Day. 7½×5¼. 255 pp. Nimmo. 5s. n.

TRAVEL.

HIGHLANDS OF ASIATIC TURKEY. By Earl Percy, M.P. 9×5¼. 338 pp. Arnold. 14s. n.

LIBYAN NOTES. By D. Randall-Maciver and A. Wilkins. 13×10, 113 pp. Macmillan. 20s. n.

SANDS OF SAHARA. By M. Somerville. 8½×5¼. 167 pp. Lippincott. 10s. 6d.

THE INDIAN BORDERLAND, 1890-1900. By Col. Sir T. H. Holdich. 9×5¼. 402 pp. Methuen. 15s. n.

[Mainly an historical and descriptive account of the events from the Afghan war of 1879 by a survey officer on the spot. Not an essay on frontier policy. A good Map.]

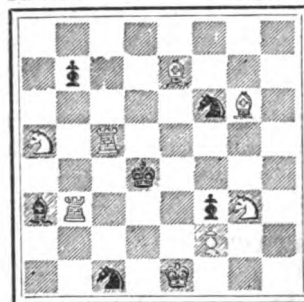

PICTURESQUE KENT. By D. Moul and G. Thompson. 8¼×7, 130 pp. Robinson. 6s. n.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. CXL

By J. NIELD and J. WRIGLEY, Shaw.
BLACK. 6 pieces.

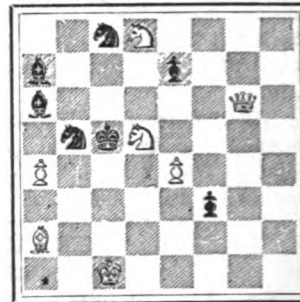

WHITE. 8 pieces.
White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. CXLI

By V. HOLST.

BLACK. 7 pieces.

WHITE. 7 pieces.
White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 142, by J. Sehwers. Port Kunda. White (6 pieces)—K at K B 3; R at K Kt sq; Kt at K 4; pawns at K R 5, Q 2, Q B 5. Black (4 pieces)—K at K B 4; Q at K R 3; pawns at K R 2, Q B 3. White to play and win.

CHESS MAGAZINES.—Numerous periodicals devoted to chess come and go. It is necessary to preface any notice of such literature with this statement, because it is too possible for the uninitiated to subscribe in advance for periodicals which have only the briefest existence. We desire only to refer to such as deserve support. The very latest to reach us is a new venture by Mr. J. H. Graham (Prescott, Ont., Canada). Sixteen

PROBLEM No. CXLIH

By C. H. WHEELER, Chicago.

BLACK. 11 pieces.

WHITE. 9 pieces.
White mates in two.

of their own entitled Sachse Listy. It is full of choice items and problems, mostly Bohemian (J. V. Stefanydes, 816 Vinohrady, Prague). The Schweizerische Zeitung (C. Aschmann, Predigerplatz, Zurich) has already been noticed. Recent issues promise well. Deutsches Wochensach is an old and well-edited German chess weekly (A. Stein's Verlagsbuchhandlung, Postsdam), and Deutsche Schachzeitung (Veit and Co., Leipzig), with Berger as problem editor and Schlechter and others to edit the games, is one of the best. This magazine has been running for 55 years. The Dutch have an organ entitled Tijdschrift van den Nederlandschen Schaakbond (H. B. D. Meijer, Geldersche Kade, 37, Amsterdam), and very well worthy is it of the small subscription asked for. We must not omit to mention the organ of the Vienna players, Weiner Schachzeitung (Wien I., Wallnerstrasse 2). Herr Marco manages this in good style, and an important three-move problem contest is announced. In welcoming the new American Chess World, of which the first two numbers have reached us, it is impossible to avoid reference to the disastrous failure of the brilliant and more pretentious American Chess Monthly, recently deceased. But there is no reason why the new venture ($1 a year, C. H. Pratt, 262, East 122nd Street, New York) should not be a permanent institution. This is the more likely as no fuss is made, but only good sound work and sensible talk on chess matters is to be found in its 16 pages. The editor is J. T. McPeak and the game department is managed by Mr. W. E. Napier. An old favourite is Tidskrift for Skak, the monthly organ of the rising Danish chessplayers. To this and all the magazines mentioned we offer our best regards and good wishes, and we plead generally for more liberal support of these self-sacrificing ventures. Few can imagine what editing and publishing a chess magazine implies.

Literature (Supplement).

SPRING PUBLICATIONS.

PROSPECTS FOR THE SPRING.

PUBLISHERS, apparently, can take their troubles lightly, and always hope to wipe off the losses resulting from "a bad season." At all events, the programme for the spring shows that the trade, as a whole, is at least prepared for a busy season. Fortunately, the publishers are not wholly dependent upon a capricious public for their successes; it would surprise most people outside the trade to find how large are the sales of many books which are never heard of in the ordinary way—technical books, for instance. In ordinary circumstances the present season would probably be exceptionally brisk, for publishers are realizing the folly of flooding the market with books in the autumn, and every year are making greater use of the spring. This year began rather badly, and the death of her late Majesty unsettled the trade for several weeks, and, on the whole, the sales—except in the case of Royal biographies and one or two novels like Mrs. Alexander's "A Missing Hero," now in a third edition—were disappointing. Khaki literature was said to have been done to death months ago—over three hundred books dealing with the war were published during the last fifteen months—yet they are still coming, and more are included in the spring announcements. One of the first of the forthcoming war books, "My Experiences of the Boer War," by Adelbert Count Stormberg—is translated from the German, and contains a preface by Colonel Henderson, who is to write the official history of the campaign. Colonel Henderson is the author of "Stonewall Jackson and the American Civil War," and acted as Director of Military Intelligence in Lord Roberts' force during the advance on Pretoria, when he was invalided home. It is safe to assume that books on the war—apart from the comprehensive histories now in progress—will continue to appear until the end of the year at least. After the war the question of the settlement of our new territories will have to be dealt with; so that South African literature will probably retain its place in our publishers' lists for an indefinite period.

WE select for reproduction in this Supplement a picture from what is certainly one of the most notable illustrated books of the spring season—Mr. Bowdler Sharpe's GILBERT WHITE'S SELBORNE, in two portly volumes (Freemantle, £3 3s.). So far as illustrations go it is undoubtedly the most beautiful edition we have had of White—we had almost said of any English classic. The full page pictures are by three artists—Mr. J. G. Keulemans treats the animals and the birds in half-tone drawings of great merit from the point of view both of the naturalist and the artist; Mr. E. J. Sullivan has seldom done any better illustrative work than he displays in his figure drawings, mostly of White himself (though no portrait of him exists), at his favourite pursuits; and Mr. Herbert Railton deals with the landscape department in his well-known clever style. There are also a number of small drawings in the text by Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Railton. The book includes the letters (containing some not usually included), which form the Natural History, the Garden Kalendar (to which Dean Hole writes an introduction), and the Appendices of Latin Documents referring to Selborne. Mr. Bowdler Sharpe's brief introduction does not attempt any complete record of White or of Selborne, a task to which he hopes to address himself later. His admirable notes (additional to White's), in which he has had the assistance of other naturalists, are kept within moderate limits. Mr. C. Davies Sherborn's bibliography will be valued, but it seems to us a little meagre in information. He does not tell us, for instance, anything about the inclusion of the two preliminary publications of 1774 and 1775 (Of the House Martin, Of the House Swallow, &c.) in the Natural History; or about the H. A. E. to whom the "Lady Dover" edition is dedicated,—the name does appear in full under the "? c. 1850" S. P. C. K. edition, but "Lord Clifford" should there surely be "Lord Clifden." Nor does he appear to mention Aikin's edition of the Naturalists' Calendar, 1795. The whole book is very well got up; and for its really extraordinary artistic merit, as well as for its excellent notes, it may be said—save, of course, in the eyes of the book-collector—to rank first among the eighty odd editions of White's work.

DRY FINE WEATHER.

From "Gilbert White's Selborne." (Reproduced by permission of Mr. S. T. Freemantle, who publishes the book).

ARCHÆOLOGY.

- The Early Ages of Greece. By Professor W. Ridgeway Cam. Un. Press
 An Introduction to Greek Epigraphy. Vol. II. Ed. by E. S. Roberts and Prof. E. A. Gardner " "
 History of Scottish Seals. By W. De Gray Birch. 42s. Mackay
 The Oldest Civilization of Greece: Studies on the Mycenaean Age. By H. R. Hale Nutt Beni Hasan. Part IV.; the Archaeological Survey of Egypt 25s. Paul

ARCHITECTURE.

- Building Specifications. By J. Leaning 18s. n. Batsford
 The Principles of Architectural Planning 6s. n. " "
 Later Renaissance Architecture in England. Edited by J. Belcher and M. E. Macartney " "
 Some Architectural Works of Inigo Jones. By H. I. Triggs and H. Tanner 30s. n. " "
 Early Renaissance Architecture in England. By J. A. Gotch 21s. n. " "
 A Short History of Renaissance Architecture in England (1500-1800). By R. Blomfield 7s. 6d. Bell
 Scottish Cathedrals and Abbeys. By the Rev. D. Butler 1s. 6d. n. Black Architectural Remains of Old Richmond, Petersham, Twickenham, Mortlake, and Kew. Drawn by T. R. Way. Edited by F. Chapman 21s. n. Lane
 Ancient Towers and Doorways. From the Drawings of A. Galletly. Described by A. Taylor 12s. 6d. Mackay
 The Monastery of St. Luke of Stiris in Phocis. By R. W. Schultz and S. H. Barnsley £3 3s. Macmillan Dictionary of Architecture and Building. By R. Sturgis and others. Vol. I. A.-E. 25s. n. "

ART.

- The Decorative Work of Robert J. Adam 30s. n. Batsford
 Flower Studies for the Use of Art Students and Designers. Illustrated by J. Foord " "
 The Study and Criticism of Italian Art. By B. Berenson... .. Bell
 Further Vols. in the "Great Masters" Series 5s. n. each " "
 German Book-Plates. By Karl Emich. Translated by R. Dennis 12s. 6d. n. " "
 The Decorative Illustration of Books, Old and New. By Walter Crane 6s. n. " "
 War Impressions. By M. Menpes. Transcribed by Dorothy Menpes 20s. n. Black
 The Madonna. Translated from the Italian of Adolfo Venturè. Introduction by Mrs. Meynell Burns & Oates
 Florentine Villas. By Janet Ross. Photographures of Zocchi's Engravings £3 3s. Dent Instructive and Ornamental Paper Work Gill
 A Book of the Poster. By W. S. Rogers Greening
 The Love-Letters of Prince Bismarck Heinemann
 Studies of French Criminals. By H. B. Irving " "
 A Catalogue of the Collection of Pictures and Sculpture at Apsley House Longmans
 Andrea Mantegna. By P. Kristeller. Eng. Edition by S. A. Strong. Illustrated " "
 Model and Blackboard Drawing. By F. F. Lydan Sampson Low
 Ambidextrous and Free-arm Blackboard Drawing and Design. By F. F. Lydan " "
 The Frescoes in the Sixtine Chapel in Rome. By Miss E. M. Phillips 6s. n. Murray
 The Oriental Influence on the Ceramic Art of the Italian Renaissance. By Henry Wallis. Vol. I. 12s. 6d. Quaritch
 History of Fine Arts. By Prof. G. B. Brown (Social England Series) Sonnenschein

BIOGRAPHY.

- The Journal of Mrs. Fenton, in India and the Colonies 8s. 6d. n. Arnold
 Courtier, Monk, and Martyr: A Sketch of the Life of Dom Sebastian Newdigate. By Dom Bede Camm Art & Book Company
 Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Arthur Freeman Blackwood
 Life of Major-General Sir Murdoch Smith. By W. K. Dickson "

BIOGRAPHY—(continued)

- Life, Letters, and Diaries of Lieut.-General Sir Gerald Graham. By Col. R. H. Veitch... Blackwood
 A Wanderer: From the Papers of the late H. O. Matuce 2s. 6d. n. Brimley Johnson
 Biographical History of Gonville and Caius College. By J. Venn Cam. Un. Press
 Bar, Stage, and Platform. By H. Merivale 12s. Chatto
 Our Greatest Living Soldiers. By C. Lowe 3s. 6d. " "
 The Reign of Victoria. A Retrospect. By Prof. F. York Powell Constable
 Oswald Von Wolkenstein. By Mme. L. Villari 4s. 6d. n. Dent
 Handel. By C. F. A. Williams (Master Musicians, Edited by F. J. Crowst) 3s. 6d. n. " "
 Alfred, the West Saxon, King of the English. By D. Macfadyen (The Saintly Lives, Edited by Dr. R. F. Horton) 4s. 6d. n. " "
 Peter Abélard. By J. McCabe Duckworth
 Joan of Arc, by Professor L. Petit de Julleville; Saint Dominic, by J. Guiraud; Saint Chrysostom, by A. Puech (Saint Series)... .. " "
 A Memoir of the Rev. H. Twells Gardner, Darton
 Reminiscences of Jean Ingelow " "
 Edward VII. (Midget Series) " "
 The Francis Letters. Edited by Beata Francis and Eliza Keary Hutchinson
 Henry Broadhurst, M.P. Told by Himself. Introduction by A. Birrell, Q.C. " "
 The Queen's Comrade: Life and Times of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough. By F. Molloy " "
 Disciples of Æsculapius. By Sir B. W. Richardson. With a Memoir by his Daughter " "
 My Autobiography: A Fragment. By the Right Hon. Professor Max Müller 12s. 6d. Longmans
 Some Records of the Later Life of Harriet, Countess Granville. By Mrs. Oldfield " "
 Caroline of Anspach and Her Times. By W. H. Wilkins " "
 The Times Life of Queen Victoria. Illustrated ... Sampson Low
 Mary Queen of Scots, and Who Wrote the Casket Letters? By S. Cowan. 2 vols. " "
 The Indian Borderland; A Personal Record. By Sir T. H. Holdich 15s. Methuen
 The Passing of the Great Queen. By Marie Corelli 1s. " "
 The Life of Mrs. Lynn Linton. By G. S. Layard 12s. 6d. " "
 The Last of the Great Scouts ("Buffalo Bill"). By Helen C. Wetmore 6s. " "
 Brother Musicians: Edward and Walter Bache. By Constance Bache 6s. n. " "
 The Life of Savonarola. By E. L. S. Horsburgh (Little Biographies) 3s. 6d. " "
 The Autobiography of William Simpson, R.I. Morrison
 Further Vols. in the "Famous Scots" Series Oliphant
 Lord Rosebery, by J. A. Hammerton; Joseph Chamberlain, by A. Mee; Frederick Temple, by F. Aitken; Joseph Parker, D.D., by A. Dawson; General Booth, by Jesse Page; Hugh Price Hughes, by Rev. F. G. Mantle (New Century Leaders) Partridge
 King and Emperor. By A. Mee " "
 Victoria the Well-Beloved (1819-1901). By F. Aitken " "
 Further Vols. in the "Westminster" and "Beacon" Biographies 2s. 6d. n. each Paul
 The Little Flowers of S. Benet 5s. " "
 The Life of Lord Kitchener. By H. G. Groser 2s. 6d. Pearson
 Further Vols. in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series 5s. each Putnams
 Further Vols. in the "Heroes of the Reformation" Series 6s. each " "
 His Gracious Majesty King Edward VII. By Marie Belloc Lowndes 7s. 6d. Richards
 Robert Buchanan, the Poet of Modern Revolt. By A. Stodart-Walker 6s. n. " "
 The Day Book of John Stuart Blackie. Ed. by A. Stodart-Walker 6s. " "
 Further Memoirs of Marie Bashkirtseff. 5s. " "
 Great Men. By F. C. Gould and H. Begbie 3s. 6d. " "
 The Life and Times of Queen Victoria. By the Author of "General Gordon," &c. 2s. 6d. Scott

BIOGRAPHY—(continued)

- Lion-Hearted. The Story of Bishop Hanning-ton's Life. By the Rev. E. C. Dawson 1s. 6d. Seeley
A Lifetime in South Africa. By the Hon. Sir J.
Robinson, K.C.M.G. ... 10s. 6d. Smith, Elder Cavalier and Puritan. By Lady Newdigate-Newdegate ... 7s. 6d. "
Shakespeare's Family. By Charlotte C. Stopes
10s. 6d. n. Stock

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

- The "Chicot" Papers, by K. Howard. ... 1s. Arrowsmith
Oddland, and Other Fairy Tales. By H. A. James
3s. 6d. Newnes
A Hidden Foe, by G. A. Henty. Illus. by P.
Spence ... Sampson Low
The Bible for the Young. By J. P. Smyth ... "
The Animals of Africa. By H. A. Bryden ... 6s. Sands
Cuckoo: A Story. By S. Ashton ... 3s. 6d. Simpkin

CLASSICAL.

- Euripides. By G. Murray ... 7s. 6d. n. Allen
Bacchylides. The new poems and fragments.
Edited by Sir R. Jebb ... Cam. Un. Press
Demosthenes. De Corona. Edited by Prof.
W. W. Goodwin ... 12s. 6d. "
Herondas. The Mimes. Edited by W. Headlam
Two Greek Grammars of the Thirteenth Century.
Edited by E. Nolan ... " Compositions in Greek and Latin Verse and Prose. By R. Shilleto ... "
The Hisperica Famina and their Literary Con-geners. Edited by F. J. H. Jenkinson ... "
History of Classical Scholarship. By J. E. Sandys
Dionysius of Halicarnassus: the Three Literary Letters. Edited by Prof. W. R. Roberts 9s. " Plato, The Republic. Edited by J. Adam ... "
Aristophanes. Equites. Edited by R. A. Meil
Aeschylus Choephoroe. Edited by Prof. T. G.
Tucker ... "
The Odyssey, XIII.-XXIV. Edited by D. B.
Monro ... Clarendon Press
The Politics of Aristotle. Edited by W. L.
Newman. Vols. III., IV., and V. (completing the work) ... "
Ætina. Edited by Robinson Ellis ... "
Notes on Thucydides. Book III. By H. F. Fox
Platonis Opera, Tom. II. (Tetralogiae III., IV.), by J. Burnet; Xenophontis Opera, Tom. II.
(Libri Socratici), by E. C. Marchant;
Ciceronis Epistulae ad Familiares, by L. C.
Purser; Aristophanis Comœdiæ, Tom. II., by F. W. Hall and W. M. Geldart. (Oxford Classical Texts) ... "
Greek and Roman Mythology. By Dr. H. Stend-
ing. (Temple Cyclopædic Primer.) 1s. n. Dent
Anthology of Latin Poetry. By R. Y. Tyrrell ... Macmillan

DRAMA.

- The Revolt, and The Escape. By Villiers de L'Isle Adam. Trans. by Theresa Barclay ... 3s. 6d. n. Duckworth
Herod: a Tragedy. By S. Phillips 4s. 6d. n. Lane
Premières of the Year. By J. T. Grein ... Macqueen Arms and the Man. You Never Can Tell. The Devil's Disciple, &c. By Bernard Shaw
(Acting Edition) ... 1s. 6d. n. each Richards
Mysteries and Miracle Plays. By Lucy T.
Smith (Social England Series) ... Sonnenschein
Rudolph Schrolle. By E. G. ... 2s. 6d. Stock

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOGY.

- Solvency or Salvation. By P. E. Bodington. Chapman & Hall
History of Agriculture and Prices. By the late
J. E. Thorold Rogers. Vols. VII. and VIII. Clarendon Press
The New Womanhood. By J. C. Fernald 5s. Funk & Wagnalls
True Motherhood. By J. C. Fernald ... 2s. 6d. "
The Eternal Conflict. By Benjamin Swift ... Heinemann
Social Development under Christian Influence.
By M. Kaufman ... 5s. Hodges, Figgis
The Cottage Homes of England: The Case Against the Housing System in Rural Districts. By W. W. Crotch. (Enlarged Edition.) King
Erewhon Revisited. By S. Butler ... Longmans

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOGY—(continued)

- The Native Races of South Africa. By the South African Native Races Committee ... Murray
Village Life in China. A Study in Sociology.
By A. H. Smith, D.D. ... Oliphant
The Social Position of Women. By C. F. Smith Sonnenschein
The Hope of England. By Q. H. Lewis ... "

EDUCATIONAL.

- Dickens as an Educator. By J. L. Hughes 6s. Arnold
The London School Atlas. Ed. by H. O. Arnold-
Forster ... 3s. "
Greek Plays (Elementary Series). Ed. by E. C.
Marchant ... 2s. each Bell
Further Vols. in the "Illustrated Classics" ... 2s. 6d. each "
A Treatise on Elementary Statics. By W. J.
Dobbs ... Black
Introduction to the Study of Physics. By A. F.
Walden ... "
A Text-Book of Zoology. By Dr. Otto Schmeil.
Trans. by R. Rosenstech. Ed. by J. T.
Cunningham ... "
Voltaire, Contes et Melanges. By F. B. Kirkman. (French Literary Readers.) ... "
The Old Senate and the Monarchy. By Miss
F. M. Orniston. (Historical Latin Readers.)
2s. "
Athens and Sparta and the Struggle with Persia.
(Historical Greek Reader) ... 2s. 6d. "
English History Illustrated from Original Sources.
Ed. by N. L. Frazer and J. L. Figgis ... "
Poems of English History. By J. A. Nicklin
1s. 6d. n. "
Famous Englishmen. By J. Finnemore ... " Scott Readers for Young People ... "
Scott Readers ... "
Geography of South Africa. By L. W. Lyde 1s. n. "
World Pictures and Problems. By Miss J. B.
Reynolds ... 1s. 6d. n. "
New Descriptive Geography of Africa ... 2s. n. "
A Primer of French Literature. By Prof.
Weekley ... Blackie
Virgil's Aeneid. Bk. II., Ed. by Prof. Sandford;
Bk. VI., Ed. by H. B. Cotterill. Georgics,
Bk. II., Ed. by S. E. Winbolt. Ovid's Metamorphoses, Bk. I., Ed. by E. E. Ensor.
Cæsar's Gallic War, Bk. V., Ed. by Prof.
Brown. (Illustrated Latin Series, Ed. by Prof. Tyrrell) ... "
Greek Grammar Papers. By A. C. Liddell ... " Much Ado About Nothing. Ed. by J. C. Smith
(The Warwick Shakespeare.) ... " Julius Cæsar; The Merchant of Venice (The Picture Shakespeare.) ... " Macaulay's Lives of Johnson and Goldsmith. Ed.
by J. Downie ... "
Browning's Strafford. Ed. by Miss A. Wilson ... "
First Latin Reader. By R. A. A. Beresford ... "
First German Book. By Miss L. A. Lowe ... " Illustrated French Primer. By M. Nivet ... "
German Unseens for Middle and Upper Forms.
By W. G. Etheridge ... "
Continental Geographies: America, Australasia
The George Eliot Reader. By Elizabeth Lee 2s. Blackwood
Specimens of Middle Scots. By G. Gregory
Smith ... "
A Handbook of English Composition ... "
Blackwood's School Shakespeare. Ed. by R.
Brimley Johnson ... 1s. 6d. each "
English Drama. By J. L. Robertson ... 2s. 6d. " Blackwood's English Classics. Ed. by G. H. Lobban.
Pope—Rape of the Lock; Hazlitt—Essays on Poetry; Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keats;
Samson Agonistes; Marmion; Lamb—Select Essays; Milton—Lycidas, &c. ... "
A Short History of the Ancient Greeks. By P.
Giles ... "
Outlines of Greek History. By P. Giles ... " Manual of Greek Composition. By G. Murray ... "
A Manual of Classical Geography. By J. L.
Myres ... "
Blackwood's Illustrated Classical Texts. Ed. by H. W. Auden ... " Aristophanes, Pax. Ed. by H. Sharpley ... "

EDUCATIONAL—(continued)

Lower Greek Unseens. Ed. by W. Lobban...	Blackwood
Elementary Greek Accidence. By F. C. Weatherhead...	"
A History of German Literature. By J. G. Robertson...	"
Outlines of German Literature. By J. G. Robertson...	"
Historical Reader of Early French. By Prof. H. A. Strong and L. Barrett...	"
Exercises in Geometry. By J. A. Third...	"
Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges: The Book of Daniel. Edited by the Rev. S. R. Driver. Psalms, Books IV. and V., XC.-CL. Edited by Professor A. F. Kirkpatrick. The Song of Songs...	Cam. Un. Press
An Elementary Latin Grammar. By A. C. Ainger and H. F. Tatham...	"
Outlines of the History of the Expansion of the British Empire, 1500-1870. By W. H. Woodward. Outlines of the History of the English Language. By Professor J. N. Toller (4s.). A Short History of the Hebrews to the Close of the Old Testament. By R. L. Ottley. A Short History of the Greeks, to the year 146 B.C. By E. S. Shuckburgh (Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges)...	"
A New Primer of Mechanics. By L. R. Wilberforce. A New Primer of Physics. By L. R. Wilberforce (Cambridge Science Primers)...	"
Livy, Book I. Edited by H. J. Edwards. Livy, Book II. Edited by R. S. Conway. Horace, Satires. Edited by J. Gaw. Erckmann-Chatrian, Le Blocus. Edited by A. R. Ropes. Erckmann-Chatrian, Waterloo. Edited by A. R. Ropes. A Key to West's Elements of English Grammar. By A. S. West (Pitt Press Series)...	"
Macbeth. Edited by A. W. Verity (the Pitt Press Shakespeare)...	"
An Elementary Old English Reader. By A. J. Wyatt...	"
Education in the Nineteenth Century. Extension Lectures. Edited by R. D. Roberts. 4s.	"
First Year's Algebra. By C. H. French and G. Osborn...	Churchill
An Elementary Greek Grammar. By J. B. Allen...	Clarendon Press
The Junior Euclid. By S. W. Finn. Books III. and IV.	"
Geometrical Exercises. By A. Larmor...	"
Elementary Treatise on Cubic and Quartic Curves. By A. B. Basset...	Deighton, Bell
Qualitative Chemical Analysis. By F. M. Perkin...	Longmans
Jackson's German Copybook...	Sampson Low
New Methods in Education. By J. L. Tadd...	"
A South African Arithmetic. By H. Hill 3s. 6d.	Methuen
The Growth of Greater Britain. Ed. by Elizabeth Lee...	2s. 6d. Murray
Murray's Handy Classical Maps. Ed. by G. B. Grundy. Græcia...	3s.
Little Arthur's History of Greece. By the Rev. A. S. Walpole...	2s. 6d.
Commercial French Course. By W. M. Poore and M. Becker. In Two Parts. Part I. 2s. 6d.	"
The Star Atlas. By Dr. Klein. Translated from the German by the Rev. E. McClure. New Ed.	S.P.C.K.
The Wonderful Century Reader. By A. R. Wallace	Sonnenschein
Standard Plays for Amateur Performance in Girls' Schools. Ed. by Elsie Fogerty...	"
The Preceptor's English Grammar. By W. H. Low and A. Wall...	Uni. Tutor. Press
The Tutorial History of England. By C. S. Fearenside...	4s. 6d.
A Higher Greek Grammar...	"
The Tutorial Greek Course...	"
The Tutorial History of Greece. By W. J. Woodhouse...	"
Euripides:—Medea. By J. Thompson and T. R. Mills...	3s. 6d. and 4s. 6d.
A Higher Latin Grammar. By F. G. Plaistowe	"
Higher Latin Composition. By A. H. Allcroft...	"

EDUCATIONAL—(continued)

First Stage Practical, Plane, and Solid Geometry. By G. F. Burn...	Uni. Tutor. Press
First Stage Machine Construction and Drawing. By J. H. Dales...	"
First Stage Building Construction. By B. Cunningham...	"
First Stage Mathematics. Ed. by W. Briggs, LL.D.	"
Key to Mechanics, First Stage. By F. Rosenberg	"
Advanced Hygiene. By A. E. Ikin and R. A. Lyster...	"
The Tutorial Algebra. Part I. By R. Deakin...	"
The Tutorial Arithmetic. By W. P. Workman...	"
Deductions in Euclid. By T. W. Edmondson...	"

ENGINEERING.

Waterworks Distribution. By J. A. McPherson...	6s. n. Batsford
New Tables for the Complete Solution of Gan- guillet and Kutter's Formula. By Col. E. C. S. Moore...	15s. n. "
A Practical Treatise on Mine Surveying. By A. Lupton...	Longmans
A History of the Midland Railway. By C. Stretton...	12s. 6d. Methuen

ETYMOLOGY.

A Handy Vocabulary: English-Africander, Africander-English...	Blackwood
Bosworth's Anglo-Saxon Dictionary: Supplement. By T. N. Toller...	Clarendon Press
Dr. Murray's Dictionary: further portions...	"
Notes on English Etymologies. By Prof. Skeat	"

FICTION.

Northborough Cross. By L. C. Cornford...	6s. Allen
The Pasha. By Daisy H. Price...	6s. "
Malicious Fortune. By Stella M. During...	6s. "
Casting of Nets. By R. Bagot...	6s. Arnold
The Novice. By Agnes Dawson...	1s. Arrowsmith
His Last Chance and Other Stories. By Grant Allen...	1s. "
A Risky Experiment. By T. Slater...	3s. 6d. "
The Good Red Earth. By Eden Phillpotts...	3s. 6d. "
Dr. Somerville's Crime. By M. Hervey...	1s. 6d. "
Sesa. By H. St. John Raikes...	3s. 6d. "
Observations of Henry. By J. K. Jerome...	1s. 6d. "
Impertinent Dialogues. By C. Gordon...	3s. 6d. "
The Early Stars. By A. Kinross...	6s. "
Doom Castle. By Neil Munro...	Blackwood
The Warden of the Marshes. By S. C. Grier...	6s. "
Harlaw of Sandle. By J. W. Graham...	6s. "
Mountains of Necessity. By Hester White...	"
The Extermination of Love. By E. Gerard...	"
Marrables' Magnificent Idea. By F. C. Constable	"
My Brilliant Career. By Sybylla P. Melvyn...	"
Mr. Leopold Lugwell. By P. Sterne...	"
Frederick Uvedale. By E. Hutton...	"
Bushwhacking and Other Sketches. By H. Clifford	"
Idylls of the Fells. By T. T. K. Tarpey...	3s. 6d. Brimley Johnson
In Arcady and Out. By O. M. Hueffer...	6s. n. "
Wreckwood. By Q. Couch...	Cassell
Afield and Afloat. By F. R. Stockton...	"
A Vanished Rival. By J. Bloundell-Burton...	"
A Soldier of the King. By Dora M. Jones...	"
A Forbidden Name. By F. Whishaw...	6s. Chatto & Windus
A Path of Thorns. By E. A. Vizetelly...	6s. "
Max Thornton. By E. Glanville...	6s. "
The Blue Diamond. By Mrs. L. T. Meade...	6s. "
The Lesser Evil. By Iza D. Hardy...	6s. "
Told by the Taffrail. By Sundowner...	3s. 6d. "
Her Ladyship's Secret. By W. Westall...	6s. "
The Church of Humanity. By D. C. Murray...	6s. "
The Lone Star Rush. By E. Mitchell...	6s. "
Mononia. By J. McCarthy...	6s. "
The Bag of Diamonds. By G. M. Fenn...	6s. "
Running Amok. By G. M. Fenn...	6s. "
As Luck Would Have It. By W. Westall...	6s. "
The Pretty Polly. By W. Clark Russell...	5s. "
The Purple Cloud. By M. P. Shiel...	6s. "
Her Royal Highness Woman. By Max O'Rell...	3s. 6d. "
Cinderella. By S. R. Crockett...	6s. J. Clarke

FICTION—(continued)

Two Sides of a Question. By May Sinclair	6s.	Constable
That Sweet Enemy. By Katherine Tynan	6s.	"
The Sin of Jasper Standish. By "Rita"	6s.	"
The Ship's Adventure. By W. C. Russell	6s.	"
Where the Oranges Grow. By N. Leyken. Trans. by Count C. S. de Soissons	6s.	Greening
Mad? By J. P. Loughnan	2s. 6d.	"
Prettiness of Fools. By E. Hewitt	6s.	"
Tragedy of a Pedigree. By H. Ames	6s.	"
"And Afterwards?" By Mrs. H. E. Gorst	6s.	"
Ira Lorraine. By C. Fevez	6s.	"
The Magnetism of Sin. By "Æsculapius"	3s. 6d.	"
The Aftertaste. By Compton Reade	6s.	"
The Modern Argonauts. By Mme. Orzeszko. Trans. by Count C. S. de Soissons	6s.	"
Red Fate. By E. Forbes	6s.	"
Pelican Tails. Edited by F. M. Boyd	1s.	"
The Dollar Library of American Fiction: The Girl at the Halfway House, by E. Hough; Parlous Times, by D. D. Wells; Lords of the North, by A. C. Lant; The Chronic Loafer, by N. Lloyd; Her Mountain Lover, by H. Garland	4s. ea.	Heinemann
The Luck of the Vails. By E. F. Benson	6s.	"
Tangled Trinities. By D. Woodroffe	6s.	"
A Swedish Homestead. By Selma Lagerlof	6s.	"
Sirius and other Stories. By Ellen Thornercroft Fowler	6s.	Hodder & Stoughton
Her Majesty's Minister. By W. le Queux	6s.	"
Queen's Mate. By M. Gerard	6s.	"
My Heart and Lute. By A. St. Lawrence	6s.	"
With Christ in Sailortown. By F. T. Bullen	1s. 6d.	"
A Woman of Yesterday. By Caroline A. Mason	6s.	"
This Body of Death. By Adeline Sergeant	6s.	Hurst & Blackett
His Own Father. By W. E. Norris	6s.	"
Children of Hermes. By H. Nisbet	6s.	"
The Mother of Emeralds. By F. Hume	6s.	"
Bats the Impossible. By Sarah Grand	6s.	Hutchinson
The Gamblers. By W. le Queux	6s.	"
The Treasure of Captain Scarlett. By Adeline Sergeant	6s.	"
The Second Youth of Theodora Desanges. By Mrs. Lynn Linton	6s.	"
The Wastrel. By Mary A. Dickens	6s.	"
Franks: Duellist. By A. Pratt	6s.	"
The Eternal Quest. By J. A. Steuart	6s.	"
The Second Dandy Chater. By T. Gallon	6s.	"
A Little Grey Sheep. By Mrs. H. Fraser	6s.	"
The Great Company. By D. Sladen	6s.	"
Pride of Race. By B. L. Farjeon	6s.	"
Claudia Pole. By C. Dawe	6s.	"
Love Rules the Camp. By Col. A. Haggard	6s.	"
The Nan's Talisman. By M. Ashton	6s.	"
The Just and the Unjust. By R. Bagot	6s.	Lane
The Column. By C. Marriott	6s.	"
In His Own Image. By F. Baron Corvo	6s.	"
The Usurper. By W. J. Locke	6s.	"
The Aristocrats	6s.	"
Severance. By T. Cobb	6s.	"
They That Took the Sword. By N. Stephenson	6s.	"
A Woman Derelict. By May Crommelin	6s.	J. Long
Mrs. Musgrave and Her Husband. By R. Marsh	6s.	"
Paul Le Maistre. By F. Carrel	6s.	"
Once Too Often. By Florence Warden	6s.	"
The Three Days' Terror. By J. S. Fletcher	6s.	"
Nobler than Revenge. By Esmé Stuart	6s.	"
Plato's Handmaiden. By L. Cleve	6s.	"
Women Must Weep. By Sarah Tytler	6s.	"
The Mission of Margaret. By Adeline Sergeant	6s.	"
The Royal Sisters. By F. Mathew	6s.	"
The Golden Wang-Ho. By F. Hume	6s.	"
Anna Lombard. By Victoria Cross	6s.	"
A Son of Mammon. By G. B. Burgin	6s.	"
Virgin Gold. By W. S. Walker	6s.	"
The Master Sinner. By a well-known Author	3s. 6d.	"
Mary Bray X Her Mark. By Jenner Tayler	3s. 6d.	"
My Lady of Orange. By H. C. Bailey	6s.	Longmans
The Vicar of St. Luke's. By Sibyl Creed	6s.	"
Ballast. By Myra Swan	6s.	"
New Edition of William Black's Novels	6s.	Sampson Low
The Helmet of Navarre. By Bertha Runkle	6s.	Macmillan
Edition of Marion Crawford's Works	3s. 6d. each	"
In Bad Company. By R. Boldrewood	6s.	"

FICTION—(continued)

In the City. By A. Hurry	6s.	Macqueen
The Golden Lotus. By A. Barrett	6s.	"
The Devil's Plough. By Anna Farquhar	6s.	"
Ever Mohun. By F. T. Jane	6s.	"
The House with the Green Shutters. By G. Douglas	6s.	"
The Frobers. By S. Baring Gould	6s.	Methuen
A State Secret. By B. M. Croker	3s. 6d.	"
The Supreme Crime. By Dorothea Gerard	6s.	"
A Secretary of Legation. By Hope Dawlish	6s.	"
Prince Rupert the Buccaneer. By C. J. Cut- cliffe	6s.	"
A Narrow Way. By Mary Findlater	6s.	"
Tales that are Told. By J. Helen Findlater	6s.	"
The Third Floor. By Mrs. Dudeney	6s.	"
The Salvation Seekers. By N. Ainslie	6s.	"
Strange Happenings. By W. C. Russell and others	6s.	"
The Redemption of David Corson. By C. F. Goss	6s.	"
The Black Wolf's Breed. By H. Dickson	6s.	"
Belinda Fitzwarren. By the Earl of Idlesleigh	6s.	"
The Lost Regiment. By E. Glanville	3s. 6d.	"
Bunter's Cruise. By C. Gleig	3s. 6d.	"
The Adventure of Princess Sylvia. By Mrs. C. N. Williamson	3s. 6d.	"
On Peter's Island. By A. R. Ropes and Mary E. Ropes	6s.	Murray
From Grey to Gold. By Charlotte Murray	6s.	Partridge
Too Dearly Bought. By Jennie Chappell	6s.	"
Willowdene Will. By H. Sutcliffe	6s.	Pearson
Cinders. By Helen Mathers	6s.	"
The Master Passion. By Bessie Hatton	6s.	"
A Honeymoon in Space. By G. Griffiths	6s.	"
A Varsity Man. By J. Allen	6s.	"
The Invaders. By Louis Tracy	6s.	"
With the Black Flag. By W. Westall	6s.	"
A Patched Up Affair. By Florence Warden	6s.	"
Among the Redwoods. By Bret Harte	6s.	"
Twixt Devil and Deep Sea. By Mrs. C. N. William- son	6s.	"
The Sentence of the Court. By Headon Hill	6s.	"
The Tapu of Banderah, and other Stories. By Louis Becke and W. Jeffery	6s.	"
The Confessions of a Poacher. By J. Connell	3s. 6d.	"
The New Master. By A. Goldsworthy	3s. 6d.	"
White Jacket; or, the World in a Man of War. By H. Melville	6s.	Putnam's
Maya: A Story of Yucatan. By W. D. Foulke	5s.	"
Visiting the Sin. By Emma Rayner	6s.	"
The Moving Finger Writes. By Grace D. Litch- field	6s.	"
Salammbô, the Maid of Carthage. By Zenaïde A. Ragozin	5s.	"
Good Souls of Cider-Land. By W. Raymond	6s.	Richards
His Familiar Fox. By E. L. Prescott	6s.	"
Love the Laggard. By R. S. Warren-Bell	6s.	"
Rosa Amorosa. The Love-Letters of a Woman. By George Egerton	6s.	"
The Fall of the Curtain. By Harold Begbie	6s.	"
In the Shadow of Guilt. By Marie Connor and R. Leighton	6s.	"
The Maid's Progress. By Mr. and Mrs. E. Ames	3s. 6d.	"
More Gals' Gossip. By A. M. Binstead	3s. 6d.	Sands
The Pa Papers. By His Son	1s.	"
Taken by Assault. By Morley Roberts	6s.	"
The Heritage. By E. Pugh and G. Burchett	6s.	"
New York. By E. Fawcett	6s.	"
Prince Charming. By "Rita"	3s. 6d.	"
The Place of Dreams. By Dr. W. Barry	3s. 6d.	"
Dog Tales. By R. J. Lloyd Price	2s. 6d.	"
The Case and the Cure. By Gertrude Gordon	3s. 6d.	"
New Translations of the Novels of Alexander Dumas	3s. 6d.	Scott
The Fish Crown in Dispute. By Miss F. Lan- caster Lucas	6s.	Skeffington
Odd Fish. By Athol Forbes	6s.	"

FICTION—(continued)

- The Silver Skull. By S. R. Crockett ... 6s. Smith, Elder
 Pacifico. By J. Randal ... 6s. "
 The Seal of Silence. By A. R. Conder ... 6s. "
 Love and Honour. By M. F. Carr ... 6s. "
 A Cardinal and his Conscience. By G. Hope 6s. "
 The Archbishop and the Lady. By Mrs. S. Crowninshield ... 6s. "
 Peggy, A Schoolgirl. By Frances Stratton 5s. Stock
 Lady Wilmerding of Maison Rouge. By J. D. Craig, D.D. ... 6s. " Black Country Sketches. By Amy Lyons. 3s. 6d. "
 Pro Patria. By Max Pemberton ... Ward, Lock
 "Lest We Forget." By J. Hocking ... "
 My Indian Queen. By Guy Boothby ... "
 A Race with the Sun. By L. T. Meade ... " Edward Blake. By C. M. Sheldon ... " Dinnah Kellow. By C. Hare ... "
 The World's Finger. By T. H. Hanshaw ... "
 A Bear Squeeze. By M. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C. "

FOLKLORE AND ANTHROPOLOGY.

- The Man in the Iron Mask ... Hurst & Blackett
 The Living Races of Mankind. Vol. I. Illustrated Hutchinson
 German Life in Town and Country. By W. H. Dawson ... 3s. 6d. Newnes
 The Social Life of the Hebrews (Semitic Series). By Rev. E. Day ... 5s. net Nimmo
 Games and Pastimes of Argyleshire. By A. C. MacLagan ... Nutt
 The Races of Europe. By W. Z. Ripley. Ph.D. 18s. n. Paul
 The Spanish People. By Martin S. Hume ... 6s. Pearson
 North Americans of Yesterday. By F. S. Dellenbaugh ... 21s. "
 History of the Scotch-Irish Families in America Moriscos of Spain: Their Conversion and Expulsion. By Dr. H. C. Lea ... 9s. Quaritch
 Specimens of Bushman Folklore. By W. H. J. Bleek and Miss L. C. Lloyd ... Sonnenschein
 Modern Hinduism. 2nd Edition. By W. J. Wilkins ... 7s. 6d. Thacker

GEOGRAPHY.

- The Relations of History and Geography. By H. B. George ... Clarendon Press
 Historical Atlas of Modern Europe, from the Decline of the Roman Empire. Ed. by R. L. Poole. Pts. xxviii.-xxx. ... " Britain and the North Atlantic. By H. J. Mackinder ... Heinemann

HISTORY.

- An Outline of the Relations Between England and Scotland to the Union of the Parliaments. By R. S. Rait ... Blackie
 The Scottish Parliament. By R. S. Rait ... "
 Edinburgh and Linlithgow. By W. K. Dickson (the County Histories of Scotland) 7s. 6d. n. Blackwood
 The Fallen Stuarts. By F. W. Head (Cambridge Historical Essays) ... Cam. Un. Press
 The Cambridge Modern History. Ed. by Lord Acton. Vol. I. ... "
 The Teaching of History. Ed. by Lord Acton and W. A. J. Archbold ... " Annals of Politics and Culture, 1492-1899. By G. P. Gooch ... "
 The Anglo-Saxon Chancery. By W. H. Stevenson Records of the Borough of Leicester. Ed. by Mary Bateson ... 25s. n. " Cromwell on Foreign Affairs. By F. W. Payn ... " Germany, 1815-1890. By J. W. Headlam—The Colonization of South America. By E. J. Payne—The Eastern Question. By Prof. S. Lane Poole (The Cambridge Historical Series. Ed. by G. W. Prothero) ... "
 The Conditions of Travel and Communication, especially in Asia Minor, in the First Century after Christ. By Caroline A. J. Skeel ... "
 Crowns and Coronations. By W. Jones 3s. 6d. Chatto
 Fifty Years Ago. By Sir W. Besant ... 3s. 6d. "

HISTORY—(continued)

- Studies in History and Jurisprudence. By the Rt. Hon. J. Bryce ... Clarendon Press
 The Alfred Jewel. By J. Earle ... "
 An Antiquarian Companion to English History. Ed. by F. P. Barnard ... "
 The Oxford School History of England ... "
 Asser's Life of Alfred. Ed. by W. H. Stevenson ... "
 Studies in Peerage and Family History. By J. H. Round ... 12s. 6d. n. Constable
 The Fight with France for North America. By A. G. Bradley. ... 15s. "
 A Chronicle of the Kings of Kashmir. 2 vols. £3 3s. n. "
 Princes and Poisoners. By F. F. Brentano. Translated by G. Maidment ... 6s. Duckworth
 The Banner of St. George. By M. Branstons ... 3s. 6d. "
 The Jewish Encyclopædia, 12 vols. ... £15 Funk & Wagnalls
 Napoleon III. at the Height of his Power (the Second French Empire Series) ... Hutchinson
 King Monmouth. By A. Fea ... 21s. n. Lane
 Charles William Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick. By Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice ... Longmans
 The Mystery of Mary Stuart. By A. Lang ... "
 A History of Egypt. Ed. by Prof. W. M. F. Petrie. Vol. VI.—Egypt in the Middle Ages. By Prof. S. Lane-Poole ... 6s. Methuen
 A History of the Jesuits in England. By E. L. Taunton ... 21s. n. "
 A Manual of South African History. By the Hon. A. Wilmot ... 5s. Paul
 A History of the Popes. From the close of the Middle Ages ... 12s. n. per vol. "
 Episodes from "The Winning of the West." 1769-1807. By Theodore Roosevelt ... 3s. 6d. n. Putnam
 Little Memoirs of the Eighteenth Century. By George Paston ... 10s. 6d. Richards
 A History of Rome. By E. H. Miles ... 8s. 6d. " Periods of European History. Ed. by A. Hassall A Class Book of English History. By A. Hassall ... "
 A History of Rome. By J. L. Myres ... "
 Mary I., Queen of England. By J. M. Stone ... Sands
 South Africa a Century Ago. Letters by Lady A. Barnard. Ed. by W. H. Wilkins, F.S.A. ... 7s. 6d. Smith, Elder
 The Land of the Moors. By B. Meakin ... 15s. Sonnenschein
 Chivalry. By F. W. Cornish. (Social England Series. Ed. by K. Cotes) ... "
 The Romance of a Hundred Years. By A. Kingston, F.H.S. ... 6s. Stock
 Alfred the Great. By W. H. Draper ... 5s. "

LAW.

- Laws Relating to Poor Law Officers. By M. Greenwood ... Bailliere, Tindall
 Brevia Placitata. Ed. by G. J. Turner ... Cam. Un. Press
 Select Cases in Criminal Law. By C. Kenny ... "
 A History of the Law of Nations. By T. A. Walker. Vol. II. ... " Roman Private Law. By H. J. Roby ... "
 The Civil and Criminal Procedure of Cicero's Time. By A. H. J. Greenidge ... Clarendon Press
 English Reports, Vols. V., VI., VII., VIII. ... Green Scots Statutes Revised, Vols. VIII., IX. ... "
 Re-issue of the Scots Law Reports (1821-1873), Vols. IV., V. ... "
 Comparative Principles of the Laws of England and Scotland. By J. W. B. Innes. Book I.—Procedure ... "
 The Game Laws of Scotland. By J. W. Tait ... "
 A Manual of Company Law in Scotland. By A. M'Neil ... "
 The Scots Digest of Cases, from 1895 to 1900. By J. C. S. Sandeman ... "
 Lectures Illustrating the Changes in the English Law during the XIXth Century. Ed. by H. B. Odgers ... Macmillan
 The English Manor. By Prof. Vinogradoff. (Social England Series) ... Sonnenschein

LITERATURE AND BELLES LETTRES.

- The Life of the Bee. By M. Maeterlinck 6s. n. Allen
 The Literary Year Book. Edited by H. Morrah 3s. 6d. n. "
 The History of Early Italian Literature. Translated by H. Oelsner.... 3s. 6d. Bell
 Introduction to English Literature. By H. S. Pascoast.... 7s. 6d. n. "
 Further Volumes of Handbooks of English Literature ... 3s. 6d. each "
 A Note-Book of French Literature. By P. C. Yorke ... Blackie
 Selections from the Writings of the Honourable Sir Charles Augustus Murray. Ed. by his Wife ... Blackwood Essays, Descriptive and Biographical. By Grace, Lady Prestwich ... " Periods of European Literature. Edited by Professor Saintsbury. Vol. V.—The Earlier Renaissance ... 5s. n. "
 William Makepeace Thackeray. By C. Whibley (Modern English Writers) ... 2s. 6d. "
 G. W. Steevens' Works (Memorial Edition). Vol. I.—Things Seen. With Memoir. By W. E. Henley ... 6s. "
 Thesaurus Palaeohibernicus. Ed. by W. Stokes and Prof. J. Strachan... Cam. Un. Press
 An Old English Anthology. By A. J. Wyatt ... " Lord Macaulay. By D. H. Macgregor ... "
 Two Lectures Introductory to the Study of Poetry. By H. C. Beeching ... 2s. "
 Robert Louis Stevenson. By H. B. Baildon 6s. Chatto
 The Complete Works of John Gower. Ed. by G. C. Macaulay. Vol. II. and III.... Clarendon Press
 Elizabethan Critical Essays. Ed. by G. Gregory Smith ... " Notes on the "Divina Commedia" of Dante. By H. F. Tozer ... "
 Ephemera Critica. By J. C. Collins. ... 7s. 6d. Constable
 Tennyson. By M. Luce (Temple Cyclopædic Primer) ... 1s. n. Dent
 Foreign Classics in English by Prof. W. C. Wilkinson. 6 Vols. ... 24s. Funk & Wagnalls
 Village Life and Feeling. By R. Upperton. 2s. 6d. n. Greening
 Bret Harte. By T. E. Pemberton... 3s. 6d. "
 Thackeray's Stray Papers. Collected by L. Melville ... Hutchinson
 Poets of the Younger Generation. By W. Archer. 4s. n. Lane
 Portraits by R. Bryden. ... 4s. n. "
 Men and Letters. By H. Paul ... 5s. n. "
 The Rubaiyat of Umar Khayyam. From the French of J. B. Nicholas by F. Baron Corvo and E. Slaughter. ... 5s. n. "
 Philosophy of the Short Story. Notes on Speech-making. By B. Matthews... 1s. 6d. n. each Longmans
 New Illustrated Edition of J. H. Jesse's "English Historical Memoirs" ... £13 13s. n. Nimmo
 Two Moods of Man, and other Essays. By Violet Fane... "
 Rustum and Sohrab: A Study in Romantic Literature and in Anthropological Custom ... Nutt
 The Spiritual Sense of Dante's Divina Commedia. By the Hon. W. T. Harris ... Paul Further Vols. of the English Bookman's Library 10s. 6d. each "
 The Writings of James Madison. Vol. I. Edited by G. Hunt ... 21s. n. Putnams
 The Autobiography of a Journalist. 2 vols. By W. J. Stillman ... 24s. n. Richards Scots Essayists: From Stirling to Stevenson. Edited by D. Smeaton ... 1s. 6d. Scott Conferences on Books and Men. By the Author of "Pages from a Private Diary" ... 6s. Smith, Elder
 What Great Men have Said about Great Men. By W. Wale... Sonnenschein
 Descriptive Guide to the Best English Fiction. By E. A. Baker. ... "

MEDICAL.

- The Physiological Action of Drugs. By M. S. Pembrey and C. D. F. Phillips ... Arnold Diseases of the Cat. By W. Hill ... 3s. 6d. n. Baillière, Tindall Points of Surgical Interest in Gynaecology. By H. M. Jones ... 4s. 6d. n. " Handbook to Medical Jurisprudence. By W. McCallin... " Menstruation and its Disorders. By A. E. Giles ... "
 The Hair in Health and Disease. By D. Walsh ... " Atlas of the Anatomy and Physiology of the Child. By D'Arcy Power ... " Suggested Standard of Purity for Food and Drugs. By C. G. Moor, C. H. Cribb, and M. Priest ... "
 The Commonwealth of Cells. By H. G. F. Spurrell ... " Cerebral Science. By W. Wood ... " Aphorisms, Definitions, Reflexions, and Paradoxes: Medical, Surgical, and Dietetic. By A. Rabagliati ... " Gynaecological Pathology. By C. H. Roberts... Churchill
 Handbook of Clinical Medicine. By T. D. Savill ... " Diseases of the Thyroid Gland. By J. Berry. 5s. n. " Chloroform. By E. Lawrie ... "
 First Aid to the Injured. By Dr. H. Drinkwater. (Temple Cyclopædic Primer) 1s. n. Dent
 Encyclopædia Medica. Vol. VII. (Liv. to Mig.) Ante-Natal Pathology and Hygiene. By J. W. Ballantyne ... Green
 Diseases of the Heart. By E. H. Colbeck. 12s. Methuen
 A Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence. By G. V. Poore ... 12s. n. Murray
 Care of the Consumptive. By C. F. Gardiner, M.D. ... Putnams
 The New Hygiene. By J. W. Wilson ... 2s. 6d. "
 A Natural Method of Physical Training. By E. Checkley... 2s. 6d. "
 The Mental Functions of the Brain. By B. Hollander, M.D. ... 21s. n. Richards
 Orthopædic Surgery. By C. B. Keetley, F.R.C.S. 16s. Smith, Elder
 Surgical Experiences in South Africa. By G. H. Makins, F.R.C.S. ... 16s. "

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Traverse Tables. By H. Louis and G. W. Caunt 4s. 6d. n. Arnold
 The Arms of the Baronial and Police Burghs of Scotland. By John, Marquess of Bute, J. H. Stevenson, and H. W. Lonsdale ... Blackwood
 An Itinerary of English Cathedrals. By the Rev. T. Perkins ... Bell
 The Care of Books. By J. W. Clark ... Cam. Un. Press
 Fact and Fable. By Effie Johnson ... Chapman & Hall
 The Child: His Nature and Nurture. By W. B. Drummond (Temple Cyclopædic Primer). 1s. n. Dent
 Cane Basket Work: Second Series ... Gill
 Beautiful Characters. By J. Paton. 1s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton
 Queen Victoria's Birthday Book. Compiled by E. G. Harmer ... Hutchinson
 Winsome Womanhood. Familiar Talks on Life and Conduct ... Oliphant
 Dark Days in Kumase. By the Rev. F. Ramseyer Partridge
 Waterworks for Small Cities and Towns. By J. Goodell ... 10s. n. Paul
 A Sack of Shakings. Essays from the Spectator, &c. By F. T. Bullen... 6s. Pearson
 How to Take and Fake Photographs. C. Holland 1s. "
 Tips for Housekeepers ... 1s. "
 Heads, and How to Read Them. By S. E. O'Dell 1s. "
 Concerning Children. By Charlotte Perkins Gilman ... 6s. Putnams
 The Art of Revolver Shooting. By W. Winans 21s. n. "
 The Laws of Scientific Hand-Reading. W. G. Benham ... 18s. " Sanity of Mind. By David F. Lincoln, M.D. 5s. " Chronicles of the House of Borgia. By Baron Corvo ... 21s. n. Richards

MISCELLANEOUS—(continued)

- The Sword and the Centuries. By Capt. A. Hutton, F.S.A. ... 12s. Richards
 Beauties Aids. By the Countess C. ... 3s. 6d. Sands
 French Dishes for English Tables. By C. De Pratz ... 3s. 6d. "
 Manuals of Employment for Educated Women. Edited by Christabel Osborn ... 1s. 6d. ed. Scott
 Small Farming. By Prof. J. Long ... Smith, Elder
 Clearing Houses. By J. G. Cannon ... 10s. 6d. "
 The Evolution of Household Implements. By H. Balfour ... Sonnenschein

MUSIC.

- The Polyphonic Period of Music. By A. E. Woolbridge; The Seventeenth Century. By Sir C. H. H. Parry (Oxford Musical Textbooks) Clarendon Press
 Pianoforte Tone Production. By Prof. T. Matthey Longmans
 Songs and Song Writers. By H. T. Finck 5s. n. Murray
 The Orchestra and Orchestral Music. By W. J. Henderson ... Reeves
 Banister's Handbook of Musical Analysis ... " Organ Tuning. By H. Smith ... "
 The King's Royal Album of National and Patriotic Songs ... " Reeve's Musical Directory ... "

NATURAL HISTORY AND GARDENING.

- The Country Month by Month. By J. A. Owen and Prof. G. S. Boulger ... Duckworth
 Open-Air Gardening ... Gill
 Greenhouse Construction ... " Dictionary of Gardening Supplement ... "
 Stray Leaves from a Border Garden. By Mary P. Milne-Holme. Illustrated by F. L. B. Griggs ... 5s. n. Lane
 A Garden in The Suburbs. By Mrs. L. Williams ... 5s. n. "
 The Cambridge Natural History. Vol. VIII. Amphibia and Reptiles. By H. Gadow 17s. n. Macmillan
 A Garden Diary. By the Hon. Emily Lawless ... 7s. 6d. n. Methuen
 The British Gardener and Amateur. By W. Williamson ... 10s. 6d. " Turned Out. Experiences of an Indian Garden. 6s. "
 The Birds of Siberia. By the late H. Seibohm 12s. n. Murray
 Wall and Water Gardens. By Miss Jekyll. 12s. 6d. n. Newnes
 A Handbook of British Birds. By J. E. Hastings, F.L.S., &c. New Ed. ... £2 2s. n. Nimmo
 Small Gardens, and How to Make the Most of Them. By Violet Biddle ... 1s. Pearson.
 By Grey Old Gardens. By Nellie B. Badcock. 5s. n. Richards
 British and Garden Poisonous Plants. By the Rev. Prof. Henslow ... S.P.C.K.

NAVAL AND MILITARY.

- The Khaki Alphabet. By L. D. Powles. Illus. by T. Browne ... 1s. n. Arnold
 Sepoy Generals: Wellington to Roberts. By C. W. Forrest ... Blackwood
 A Leader of Light Horse: Life of Hodson of Hodson's Horse. By Capt. L. J. Trotter ... " Modern Strategy. By Capt. W. H. James ... "
 The British Fleet: Is it Sufficient and Efficient? By A. S. Hurd. Introd. by Admiral Hon. Sir E. R. Fremantle ... 1s. "
 The Sovereignty of the Sea. By T. W. Fulton ... "
 The Life of a Regiment: The History of the Gordon Highlanders. By Lt.-Col. C. G. Gardyne ... 28s. n. Douglas
 Military Law Made Easy. By Captain S. T. Banning ... 5s. Gale & Polden
 Studies in Practical Field Engineering. By Lieutenant-Colonel W. J. Shaw ... 4s. " Practical Military Sketching. By C. F. V. Byl 3s. 6d. " Soldiers Training and Other Notes. By Major H. de B. Hovell ... 2s. " Topography Made Easy. By J. Corballis ... 4s. " Nicknames and Traditions in the Army ... 1s. "
 Military Lodges. By R. F. Gould ... 5s. "

NAVAL AND MILITARY—(continued)

- The Army Handbook of Physical Training ... 1s. Gale & Polden
 More Than 100 Tricks and Exercises on the Horizontal Bar ... 1s. " Napoleon's War Maxims, with his Social and Political Thoughts. By Prof. E. Henry 3s. 6d. "
 The Military Atlas ... 2s. "
 My Experiences of the Boer War. By A. Count Sternberg. Translated by G. F. R. Henderson ... Longmans
 The Times History of the War in South Africa. Vol. 2. Edited by R. S. Amery. Illustrated. Sampson Low
 The Royal Navy, from the Earliest Times to the Present. By W. L. Clowes ... "
 The Green Horse in Ladysmith. By Lieutenant-Colonel St. J. C. Gare ... "
 The 14th (King's) Hussars, from 1715 to 1900. By Colonel H. B. Hamilton ... "
 The Relief of Kumasi. By Captain H. C. J. Biss 6s. Methuen
 Our Naval Heroes. By Various Writers. Edited by P. E. Marindin. Introduction by Rear-Admiral Lord Charles Beresford ... 16s. Murray
 The Journal of the C.I.V. in South Africa. By Major-General H. Mackinnon ... 6s. "
 The Siege of Peking. By W. A. P. Martin, D.D. Oliphant
 Chaplains at the Front. By One of Them ... Partridge
 The Siege of Kumasi. By Lady Hodgson ... 21s. Pearson
 At Pretoria. By Julian Ralph ... 6s. "
 War's Brighter Side. By Julian Ralph ... 6s. "
 How Sailors Fight. By J. Blake. ... 6s. Richards
 The Northumberland Fusiliers, British Regiments in War and Peace. By W. Hood ... 3s. 6d. "
 Journal of the Siege Hospital in Peking. By Jessie Ransome ... S.P.C.K.
 The Army From Within. By the author of "An Absent-Minded War." ... 3s. 6d. Sands
 Military Dialogues on Active Service. Lieut.-Col. W. Newnham-Davis ... 3s. 6d. " Songs of the Sword and the Soldier. By A. Eager, D.D. ... 3s. 6d. "
 In the Ranks of the C.I.V. By "Driver" E. Childers ... 6s. Smith, Elder
 The Siege of the Peking Legations. By Rev. R. Allen ... 7s. 6d. " Yeomanry Cavalry: or Mounted Infantry? By Lieut.-Col. L. Rolleston ... 1s. 6d. "
 The Navy. By W. L. Clowes (Social England Series) ... Sonnenschein
 The Romance of the Boer War. By MacCarthy O'Moore ... 2s. Stock
 Clowes' Naval Pocket Book, 1900. Edited by L. G. C. Laughton ... 5s. n. Thacker

ORIENTAL.

- A Short Account of the Hebrew Tenses. By R. H. Kennett ... 3s. n. Cam. Un. Press
 Studia Sinaitica. Nos. 9, 10. Select Narratives of Holy Women. By Agnes S. Lewis. No. 8, Apocrypha Arabica. Ed. by Margaret D. Gibson ... "
 The Jataka. Trans. from the Pali. Ed. by Prof. E. B. Cowell. Six vols. ... "
 The Didascalia Apostolorum in Syriac. Ed. by Margaret D. Gibson ... "
 A Short Grammar of the Masai Language. By Mrs. Hinde ... 3s. 6d. " Malay Folk Tales. Trans. by Prof. W. W. Skeat ... "
 The Curetonian Syriac Gospels. Ed. by F. C. Burkitt ... "
 Thesaurus Syriacus. Edited by R. Payne Smith. Part XI. (completing the work) ... Clarendon Press
 A Compendious Syriac Dictionary by Mrs. Margoliouth. Part III. ... "
 A Dictionary of Vernacular Syriac. By A. J. Maclean ... "
 A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament. Edited by F. Brown, &c. ... "
 Assyrian Deeds and Documents. By the Rev. C. H. W. Johns. Vol. II., Cuneiform Texts ... £1 1s. n. Deighton, Bell Play and Politics in Malaya. By an Old Resident Gardner, Darton

ORIENTAL—(continued)

- Libyan Notes. By D. Randall-Maciver and A. Wilkin ... 20s. n. Macmillan
 Oriental Rugs. By J. K. Mumford. Illustrated Sampson Low
 A Manual of Pushtu. By Capt. G. Roos-Keppel .., "

PHILOSOPHY.

- The Use of Words in Reasoning. By Alfred Sidgwick ... 7s. 6d. Black
 The Neo-Platonists. By T. Whittaker ... 7s. 6d. Cam. Un. Press
 The Works of George Berkeley. Edited by A. C. Fraser ... Clarendon Press
 The Ethics of Spinoza. By H. H. Joachim
 Human Personality. By Frederic W. H. Myers Longmans
 Dissertations on Leading Philosophical Topics. By Prof. A. Bain
 Varia. By Prof. W. Knight ... 8s. n. Murray
 The Origin of Thought. By the Rev. D. Nickerson ... Paul
 A System of Ethics. By F. Paulsen. Trans. by F. Thilly ... 18s. n. "
 The Method of Evolution. By H. W. Conn 7s. 6d. Putnam
 Seneca's Tranquillity of Mind and Providence. Translated by W. B. Langsdorf, Ph.D. 3s. 6d. "
 Nietzsche as Critic, Philosopher, &c. Selections from his Work. By T. Common ... 7s. 6d. Richards
 Tolstoy and His Problems. By Aylmer Maude 6s. "
 Hegel's Phenomenology of the Spirit. Translated by J. B. Baillie ... Sonnenschein Aristotle's Psychology. Translated by Prof. W. A. Hammond
 Heinze's History of Contemporary Philosophy. Translated by Prof. A. Hammond
 Wundt's Physiological Psychology. Translated by Prof. E. B. Titchener
 Schopenhauer's Essay on Morality. Translated by E. B. Bullock
 The Specious Present. By A. Hodder

POETRY.

- A Woman of Emotions. By A. Thirlemore 5s. n. Allen
 Mimes and Rhymes. By A. Rickett 3s. 6d. n. Brimley Johnson
 Poems. By E. Radford ... 6s. n. "
 Ballads of the War. By Canon H. D. Rawnsley 3s. 6d. n. Dent
 Verse Memories Gardner, Darton
 Poems. By Lady Margaret Sackville 3s. 6d. n. Lane
 Poems. By A. B. Thaw ... 5s. n. "
 Anni Fugaces. By R. C. Lehmann ... 3s. 6d. n. "
 The Queen's Chronicle and other Verses. By S. Gwynn ... 3s. 6d. n. " Poems. By G. C. Lounsbery ... 3s. 6d. n. "
 Ballads of Ghostly Shires. By G. Bartram ... 2s. 6d. n. Greening
 Ballads of Dawn. By G. F. Savage-Armstrong ... Longmans
 Nell: A Tale of the Thames. By H. Bigg, F.R.C.S. ... 7s. 6d. Paul
 The Soul of Osiris. By A. Crowley 3s. 6d. n. "
 Domestic Ditties, with Words and Music. By A. S. Scott-Gatty ... 3s. 6d. Pearson
 A Treasury of Irish Poetry. Ed. by Rev. Stopford A. Brooke and T. W. Rolleston 7s. 6d. Smith, Elder
 Herbert. By W. Marshall ... Sonnenschein
 The Wings of the Morning. By Helen Savile
 Fireside Poems. By the Rev. J. Stratton 3s. 6d. Stock

POLITICAL.

- A Diary of the Unionist Parliament. By H. W. Lucy. Illus. by E. T. Reed ... 6s. Arrowsmith
 Gold and Diamonds. South African Facts and Inferences. By W. H. Penning ... Bailliere, Tindall
 Belgium and the Belgians. By C. Scudamore ... Blackwood
 British Colonies and Protectorates. By the late Sir Henry Jenkyns ... Clarendon Press
 Legislative Methods and Forms. By Sir C. P. Ilbert
 The Working of the Constitution of the United Kingdom. By Right Hon. L. H. Courtney ... 7s. 6d. n. Dent

POLITICAL—(continued)

- Australasia, The Commonwealth and New Zealand. By A. W. Jose (Temple Cyclopædic Primer) ... 1s. n. Dent
 Jeffersonian Cyclopædia. By J. P. Foley 30s. Funk & Wagnalls
 The Religion of Democracy. By C. Furguson 6s. "
 The Law and Policy of Annexation. By C. F. Randolph ... Longmans
 Government or Human Evolution. By E. Kelly. Vol. II. Collectivism and Individualism
 Britain's Austral Empire. By G. F. Scott. Illus. by P. F. S. Spence ... Sampson Low
 Britain's Title in South Africa. By Prof. J. Cappon ... 6s. Macmillan
 The Real Chinese Question. By C. Holcombe 6s. Methuen
 Efficiency and Empire. By A. White ... 6s. " Practical Licensing Reform ... 1s. 6d. "
 Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation. New Series. No. 6 ... 5s. Murray
 Italy To-day: A Study of Her Politics. By Bolton King and W. Okey ... 12s. n. Nisbet
 The Social Problem. By J. A. Hobson 7s. 6d. n. " Vengeance as a Policy in Afrikanerland. By F. J. Dormer ... 6s. "
 Open Letters to Lord Curzon on Famines and Land Assessments in India. By R. C. Dutt, C.I.E. ... 7s. 6d. Paul
 A History of Political Parties in the United States. By J. H. Hopkins ... 12s. 6d. Putnam
 Trusts and the State. By H. Macrosty (Fabian Series, No. I.) ... 6s. Richards
 The Lord of the Sea. By M. P. Shiel ... 6s. "
 The Briton's First Duty. By G. F. Shee ... 6s. " Wrecking the Empire. By J. M. Robertson 5s. "
 The Truth About Newfoundland. By B. Willson ... 3s. 6d. " Patriotism and Ethics. By J. G. Godard 3s. 6d. "
 The Chinese Crisis from Within. By G. R. Reith ... 3s. 6d. "
 The Psychology of Jingoism. By J. A. Hobson ... 2s. 6d. "
 The Driving Wheel. A short account of the British Constitution. By A. A. Brodrick ... S.P.C.K.
 A Handbook of the Administration of Great Britain during the 19th Century. By F. C. Carr-Gomm ... 7s. 6d. Smith, Elder British Power and Thought. By Hon. A. S. G. Canning ... 6s. "

REPRINTS.

- Waverley Novels. Vols. I-VI. (New Pocket Edition) ... 2s. n. each A. & C. Black Gray's Elegy (Publications of the Essex House Press) ... £2 2s. Arnold
 Newman's Loss and Gain ... Art & Book Co.
 The Mirror for Monks. By Lewis Blossius
 The Oratory of the Faithful Soul. By Lewis Blossius. Translated by the late Bishop Coffin
 George Eliot's Works (The Library Edition), Vols. I., II., Adam Bede, The Mill on the Floss ... 10s. 6d. n. each Blackwood
 George Eliot's Novels (The Warwick Edition), Vols. I., II., III., Adam Bede, The Mill on the Floss, Felix Holt, the Radical 2s. n. each " Kinglake's Crimea. In 9 Vols. ... 3s. 6d. each "
 In Memoriam ... 3s. n. Brimley Johnson
 Sonnets by E. B. Browning ... 5s. n. "
 The Works of Keats, ed. by H. B. Forman, Vols. IV., V. (12s. n.); The Works of Lamb, ed. by T. Hutchinson, in 9 Vols. (15s. n.) (The Complete Library)
 The Triumphs of Turlogh. Edited by S. H. O'Grady ... Cam. Un. Press
 The Authentic Edition of Dickens. 21 vols. 5s. each ... Chapman & Hall
 The Author's Edition de Luxe of Mark Twain (Complete in 22 Vols.) ... £13 15s. Chatto Uniform Edition of Zola's Novels. Ed. by E. A. Vizetelly ... 3s. 6d. each "
 King Horn. Ed. by J. Hall ... Clarendon Press
 Plays and Poems of Robert Greene. Edited by J. C. Collins

REPRINTS—(continued)

- The Works of Thomas Kyd. Edited by F. S. Boas... Clarendon Press
- Goethe, Hermann, and Dorothea. Ed. by C. A. Buckheim. Introduction by Professor Dowden... "
- The Temple Molière, ed. by Professor F. Spencer; Les Precieuses Ridicules (2s.), also School Edition (1s. n.); L'Avare (2s.)... Dent
- The Temple Dramatists, ed. by J. Gollancz; Ralph Roister Doister, ed. by W. H. Williams and P. A. Robin... 1s. "
- Temple Classics, ed. by J. Gollancz; Emerson's Essays, 2 vols.; Emerson's Representative Men, ed. by W. Jarrold; Taylor's Holy Dying, ed. by A. R. Walker; White's Selborne; Vanity Fair, 3 vols.; Adam Bede, 2 vols.; Dante's Purgatorio, Italian Text and Translation by J. Olney, ed. by Dr. Oelsner and the Rev. P. W. Wicksteed... 1s. 6d. each "
- White's Selborne... £3 3s. n. Freemantle
- Casa Guidi Windows. By E. B. Browning 2s. n. Lane
- The Lover's Library... 1s. 6d. n. each "
- Corneille's Nicomède. By J. A. Harrison 3s. 6d. n. Macmillan
- De Quincey's Confessions of an English Opium Eater; Murder as a Fine Art; The English Mail Coach, and Other Essays (Library of English Classics)... 3s. 6d. n. "
- The Border Edition of the Waverley Novels. V. Old Mortality; VI. The Heart of Midlothian... "
- The Supersensual Life. By Jacob Behmen. Ed. by B. Holland... 3s. 6d. Methuen
- The Imitation of Christ... 3s. 6d. "
- White's Selborne. Ed. by L. C. Miall and W. Warde Fowler... 6s. "
- The Journal to Stella. Ed. by G. A. Aitken. 6s. "
- King Lear. Ed. by W. J. Craig... 3s. 6d. "
- The Novels of Charles Dickens. Introductions by G. Gissing, ed. by F. G. Kitton; Old Curiosity Shop, illus. by G. M. Brimelow; Barnaby Rudge, by Beatrice Alcock 3s. n. ea. "
- The Little Library: Selections from Wordsworth, ed. by N. C. Smith; Selections from William Blake, ed. by M. Perugini; Pride and Prejudice, ed. by E. V. Lucas, 2 vols.; Penderennis, ed. by S. Gwynn, 3 vols.; Lavengro, ed. by F. H. Groome, 2 vols. ... 1s. 6d. n. "
- George Borrow's Works: The Gypsies of Spain; Wild Wales. Illus. by A. S. Hartrick. 6s. ea. Murray
- The Works of Lord Byron: Poetry, Vol. IV. 6s. Nelson
- New Century Scott... 1s. n. each Richards
- Jane Eyre. Tennyson's Poems. Essays of Elia. (The World's Classics.) ... 1s. n. each Scott
- Poems by James Thomson (The Canterbury Poets). Ed. by W. Bayne... 2s. "
- Ibsen's Prose Dramas. Ed. by W. Archer 1s. 6d. each vol. "
- The Poetical Works of Robert Bridges. Vol. III. 6s. Smith, Elder
- Sarchedon. Vol. XV. of the Edition de Luxe of Whyte Melville. ... Thacker
- Further Vols. in the "Minerva Library." 2s. each Ward, Lock

SCIENCE.

- Further Vols. in Bell's Science Series... Bell
- Scientific Papers. By Lord Rayleigh. Vol. III. Cam. Un. Press
- Papers on Mechanical and Physical Subjects. By Prof. O. Reynolds. Vol. II. ... "
- Scientific Papers. By J. Hopkinson... "
- A Treatise on Spherical Astronomy. By Sir R. S. Ball... "
- Advanced Exercises in Practical Physics. By Prof. A. S. Schuster and C. Lees... 8s. "
- Zoological Results based on Material from New Britain, &c. By A. Willey... "
- Fauna Hawaiensis. Edited by D. Sharp... "
- Zoology. By E. W. MacBride and A. E. Shipley. Lectures on Great Physiologists. By Sir M. Foster. Fossil Plants. By A. C. Seward. British Grasses. By H. M. Ward. (Cambridge Natural Science Manuals. Edited by A. E. Shipley.) ... "

SCIENCE—(continued)

- Electricity and Magnetism. By R. T. Glazebrook. (Physical Series) ... Cam. Un. Press
- A Treatise on Physics. By A. Gray. Vol. I. Dynamics and Properties of Matter ... Churchill
- Micro-Anatomy. By Gustav Mann... Clarendon Press
- The Mineralogy of Scotland. By the late Prof. Heddle. Edited by J. G. Goodchild. 36s. n. Douglas
- Twentieth Century Inventions. By G. Sutherland... Longmans
- Researches on Cellulose, 1895-1900. By C. F. Cross, E. J. Bevan, and C. Beadle... "
- The Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley. Ed. by Sir M. Foster and Prof. E. Ray Lankester. Vol. III. ... Macmillan
- Dragons of the Air. By H. G. Seeley... 6s. Methuen
- The Comparative Physiology of the Brain and Comparative Psychology. By Prof. J. Loeb... 6s. Murray
- Arsenic. By Prof. J. A. Wanklyn, M.R.C.S. 2s. 6d. Paul
- The Child: A Study in the Evolution of Man. By A. F. Chamberlain, Ph.D. The Mediterranean Race. By Prof. Sergi. (The Contemporary Science Series.) ... 6s. each Scott

SPORT AND PASTIMES.

- Red Headed Gill. By R. Owen... 6s. Arrowsmith
- Cricket Anecdotes. By C. W. Alcock... 1s. "
- Sporting Sorrows. By F. Russell... 1s. "
- A History of Cambridge University Cricket Club. By W. J. Ford... Blackwood
- Cricket and Golf, by the Hon. H. R. Lyttelton; Birdwatching, by E. Selous, Illustrated by J. Smit (The Haddon Hall Library, Edited by the Marquess of Granby and G. A. B. Dewar) ... 7s. 6d. n. each Dent
- Charles St. John's Note Books, 1846-1853. Edited by Admiral H. C. St. John... Douglas
- Thurston Card Tricks... 3s. 6d. n. Gill
- Kings of the Rod, Rifle, and Gun. By "Thormanby." Illustrated... Hutchinson
- The English Turf. By C. Richardson... 15s. Methuen
- Small Boat Sailing. By E. F. Knight... Murray
- The Game of Billiards and How to Play it. By J. Roberts... 6s. Pearson
- The British Thoroughbred Horse. By W. Allison... £2 2s. n. Richards
- From Gladiateur to Persimmon: Turf Memories for Thirty Years. By S. Dixon... 18s. n. "
- Sea and Coast Fishing. By F. G. Aflalo... 6s. "
- Fancy Cycling for Amateurs. By Isabel Marks... 3s. 6d. Sands
- Elements of Embryology. By O. Hertwig... Sonnenschein
- Biological Types in the Vegetable Kingdom. By W. M. Webb... "
- The Life of the Sea Shore. By M. Newbiggin... Training of the Body for Games, &c. By F. A. Schmidt... "

THEOLOGY.

- Encyclopædia Biblica. Vol. III. Ed. by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne and J. S. Black 20s. n. Black
- The Corrections of Mark. By E. A. Abbott... "
- The Apostles' Creed. By Prof. A. Harnack. Trans. by S. Means and Ed. by T. B. Saunders... 1s. 6d. n. "
- Rabbi Jesus: Sage and Saviour. By W. Macintosh... Blackwood
- Faith and Folly. By the Monsignor J. S. Vaughan Burns & Oates
- Devout Reflections on Various Spiritual Subjects. By St. Alphonsus Maria de Liguori. Trans. by Father E. Vaughan... "
- Some Notable Conversions. By the Rev. F. J. Kirk... "
- The Story of a Soul. By Sister Therese. Trans. from the French by M. H. Dziewicki... "
- The Divine Plan of the Church: Where Realized, and Where Not. By the Rev. J. MacLaughlin... "

THEOLOGY—(continued)

- Gregory. Oratio Catechetica. Edited by J. H. Srawley. Augustine. De Doctrina Christiana. Edited by H. F. Stewart. Serapion. Edited by F. E. Brightman. (Cambridge Patristic Texts.) Cam.Un. Press
- Texts and Studies : Contributions to Biblical and Patristic Literature. Edited by Canon J. A. Robinson. Vol. VI., No. 2. Palladius, The Lausiac History (II.). Edited by Dom C. Butler. Codex I. of the Gospels and its Allies. By K. Lake. A Study of Ambrosiaster. By A. Souter. The Meaning of Homousios in the Constantinopolitan Creed. By J. B. Baker "
- Origen's Hexapla. Edited by C. Taylor 15s. n. "
- Grammar of Septuagint Greek. By H. St. J. Thackeray "
- Salisbury Processions and Ceremonies. Edited by C. Wordsworth "
- The Prayer Book of Aldenald the Bishop. Edited by Dom A. B. Kuypers "
- The Use of Sarum. Edited by W. H. Frere. Vol. II. "
- Renderings from Eastern and Western Office Books. By R. M. Moorsom "
- The Peshitto Version of the Gospels. Ed. by G. H. Gwilliam, B.D. Clarendon Press
- Notes on the Hebrew Texts of the Books of Kings. By C. F. Burney "
- Studia Biblica. Ed. by W. Sanday, D.D. Vol. V. Part II. "
- Texts on Mt. Athos. By K. Lake... .. "
- Samaritan Liturgies. Ed. by A. E. Cowley "
- Eusebius, Præparatio Evangelica. Ed. by E. H. Gifford "
- Eusebii Chronicorum Liber. Ed. by J. K. Fotheringham "
- Latin Versions of the Canons of the Greek Councils of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries. By C. H. Turner. Part II. "
- Sancti Irenæi Novum Testamentum. Ed. by W. Sanday, D.D. "
- Legenda Angliæ. Ed. by C. Horstman, Ph.D. "
- History of the Church of England, from the Abolition of the Roman Jurisdiction. By R. W. Dixon. Vols. V. and VI. "
- Old Testament Lessons. By U. Z. Rule "
- New Testament History for Schools. Part I. By W. Stokoe "
- Bible Studies. By A. Deissman T. & T. Clark
- Francis and Dominic, by Prof. J. Herkless; Savonarola, by G. McHardy; Anselm, by A. C. Welch (The World's Epoch-Makers) "
- Is Christ Infallible and the Bible True? By H. M. M'Intosh 9s. "
- St. Peter and St. Jude. By C. Bigg J. Clarke
- Christian Missions. W. N. Clarke ... 3s. 6d. "
- The Taste of Death. By P. J. Forsyth. (Small Books on Great Subjects) 1s. 6d. "
- A Century's Progress in Religious Thought and Life. By W. F. Adeney 3s. 6d. n. "
- The Ten Commandments. By G. C. Morgan 2s. 6d. "
- The Risen Master. By H. Latham... .. 6s. Deighton, Bell
- Family Prayers. Ed. by W. H. Thompson. 2s. 6d. n. "
- The Psalms. Trans. by E. G. King. Second Collection (Ps. xlii.-lxxxix.) "
- Essays and Studies. By R. Sinker ... 3s. n. "
- Spiritual Knowing or Bible Sunshine. By T. F. Seward 4s. Funk & Wagnalls
- Shall We Believe in a Divine Providence? By D. W. Faunce 4s. "
- Scientific Side-Lights. By J. C. Fernald ... 21s. "
- Forward Movements of the Last Half Century. By A. T. Pierson 6s. "
- Seed Thoughts for Public Speakers. By A. T. Pierson 6s. "

THEOLOGY—(continued)

- Miracles of Missions. Third Series. By A. T. Pierson 4s. Funk & Wagnalls
- The Royal Houses of Israel and Judah. By G. O. Little... .. 12s. "
- Twentieth Century Knighthood. By L. A. Banks 3s. "
- Poetry and Morals. By L. A. Banks ... 6s. "
- A Year's Prayer Meeting Talks. By L. A. Banks 4s. "
- David and His Friends. By L. A. Banks. (The Friends' Series) 6s. "
- Laity in Council. By G. F. Talbot and Others Gardner, Darton
- Our Reasonable Service. By W. J. Knox-Little "
- Old and New Century Bells. By J. R. Vernon ... "
- The Afterglow of a Great Reign. By Bishop Ingram "
- A Vanished Arcadia. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham Heinemann
- Evangelical Doctrine—Bible Truth. By the Rev. C. A. Scott 6s. Hodder & Stoughton
- The Living Lord and the Opened Grave. By the Rev. T. A. Gurney 6s. "
- The Church, The Churches, and the Mysteries. By G. H. Pember... .. "
- Lines of Defence of the Biblical Revelation. By Prof. D. S. Margoliouth 6s. "
- The Expositor. Ed. W. Robertson Nicoll. Vol. III. 6th Series 7s. 6d. "
- The City Temple Pulpit. Vol. IV.... 3s. 6d. n. "
- Thoughts on Belief and Life. By A. J. Lawlor 3s. 6d. n. Hodges, Figgis
- All Men Shall at Length be Saved. By Canon Carmichael 1s. "
- Introduction to the Literature of the Bible. By R. G. Moulton 3s. 6d. Isbister
- The Oxford Library of Practical Theology. Ed. by Canon Newbolt and the Rev. D. Stone; The Incarnation, by the Rev. H. V. S. Eck; Prayer by Canon A. J. Worledge Longmans
- The Age of the Fathers. By Prof. W. Bright
- The Elder Faiths of Ireland. By W. G. Wood-Martin "
- The Age of Decision. By P. N. Waggett ... "
- Christ and Human Life. By the Rev. D. Stone
- A New History of the Book of Common Prayer. By F. Procter. Rewritten by W. H. Frere 12s. 6d. Macmillan
- Unity in Christ. By Canon J. A. Robinson 6s. "
- The Key of Knowledge. By W. G. Rutherford... "
- A History of the Church of Cyprus. By J. Hackett 15s. n. Methaen
- Revelations of Divine Love. By the Lady Julian. Edited by G. H. Warrack ... 6s. "
- The Way of Holiness : Commentary on the 119th Psalm. By R. M. Benson 5s. "
- The Soul's Pilgrimage : Readings from the Writings of George Bodley. Edited by J. H. Burn 2s. 6d. "
- The Acts of Apostles. Edited by R. B. Rackham (Oxford Commentaries) 10s. 6d. "
- The Philosophy of Religion in England and America. By A. Caldecott (Handbooks of Theology) 10s. 6d. "
- Isaiah, edited by W. E. Barnes (4s. n.); The Epistle of St. James, edited by H. W. Fulford (1s. 6d. n.); The Churchman's Bible, edited by J. H. Burn "
- The Psalms of David, edited by B. W. Randolph; Lyra Apostolica, edited by H. C. Beeching and Canon Scott Holland; The Inner Way: Selections from the Sermons of F. Fauler, Edited by A. W. Hutton (The Library of Devotion) 2s. each "
- Atonement and Personality. By Prof. R. C. Moberly 14s. Murray
- Truths about God. By Father John (Sergieff). Translated by Colonel E. E. Goulaeff 2s. 6d. n. "
- The Evolution of the English Bible. By H. W. Hoare 10s. 6d. "

THEOLOGY—(continued)

Inter Amicos. A Correspondence between James Martineau and Prof. Knight 5s.	Methuen
The Body of Christ. By Canon Gore 5s. n.	"
The Reformation. By the Rev. J. A. Babington. 12s. n.	"
Treason and Plot. Catholics and Protestants in the last years of Queen Elizabeth 16s.	Nisbet
Sermon Seed. Sermons by the Rev. R. Tuck 6s.	"
Family Prayers for Four Weeks 2s. 6d.	"
Working for God. By the Rev. A. Murray 1s. n.	"
The Evangelical School in the Church of England. By the Rev. H. C. Moule, D.D. 2s.	"
The Day of the Sun. By C. Noel	Nutt
Another Pentecost. By the Rev. J. E. Page ...	Partridge
God Save the People! By Jesse Page... ..	"
A Manual of Catholic Theology. By J. Wilhelm, D.D., and T. B. Scannell. 2 vols. 15s. each	Paul
Devotions to S. Dominic. By the Rev. Father Wilberforce, O.P.	"
The Rosary Guide. For Priests and People. By the Very Rev. J. Procter, O.P. 3s. 6d. n.	"
F. W. Robertson's Sermons. In 5 vols. 1s. 6d. n. ea.	"
The Authentic Gospel: Sermons. Edited by G. St. Clair	"
The Church in Greater Britain. By the Ven. Archdeacon G. R. Wynne, D.D.	"
The Papacy in the Nineteenth Century. F. Nippold. Trans. by L. H. Schwab 12s. 6d.	Putnams
The Minor Festivals of the Anglican Calendar. By the Rev. W. J. S. Simpson... ..	Rivington
Further Vols. in Rivington's Edition of the Books of the Bible. Ed. by A. E. Hillard	"
Further Vols. in Rivington's Handbooks to the Bible and Prayer-book. Ed. by B. Reynolds	"
The Minor Festivals of the Anglican Calendar. By the Rev. W. J. S. Simpson... ..	"
The Books of the New Testament. By the Rev. L. Pullan	"
Elements of Christian Doctrine. By the Rev. J. A. Lacey	"
Oxford Church Text Books. Edited by the Rev. L. Pullan	"
Greek Manuals of Church Doctrine	"
In the Day of Trouble. By the Rev. T. Ovenden	S.P.C.K.
"Life" in St. John's Gospel. By the Rev. J. Hoare	"
Early Church Classics. By the Rev. P. M. Barnard	"
Parochial Sermons. By the late Rev. S. J. Stone	Skeffington
Catholic Usages, So-called. By J. Myre	"
A Thousand Things to Say in Sermons. By the Rev. J. St. John Corbett	"
An Attempt Towards the Review of the Office of Holy Communion. By Rev. P. Stocks... ..	"
Confirmation and Holy Communion. By the Rev. Canon Knox Little 1s. 6d.	"
Bread in the Wilderness. By Rev. H. J. W. Buxton 2s. 6d.	"
Things Concerning Jesus 2s.	"
Scriptural and Catholic Truth. By the Rev. F. Meyrick 5s.	"
St. Francis of Assisi. Lessons from a Noble Life. By W. O. E. Oesterley 2s.	"
The Soul in Light. By Eleanor Tee 2s. 6d.	"
Thoughts, Memories, and Meditations. Trans. from the French by Constance White 3s. 6d.	"
Roman Catholicism as a Factor in European Politics. By F. C. Conybeare... .. 3s. 6d.	"
Christ the Life and Other Sermons. By the Rev. T. Jordan, D.D. 2s. 6d.	"
A New Plain Sermon on the Census of 1901. By the Rev. Canon J. Hammond 1s.	"
The Book of Job. Translated and Annotated. By F. H. Wilkinson 3s. 6d.	"
Christianity in the Apostolic Age. By Prof. G. T. Purves, Ph.D.	Smith, Elder
The Temptation of our Lord Jesus Christ. By the Rev. L. R. Rawnsley 2s. 6d.	Stock
The Signs of Spring. By the Rev. T. H. Passmore 2s.	"

THEOLOGY—(continued)

Lessons from the Parables. By Mrs. W. J. Tait 5s.	Stock
Counsels for Church People. From the Writings of Dr. Creighton 5s.	"
Information Concerning the History and Growth of the Bible. By B. Talbot 6d. n.	"
Analytical Concordance to the Bible. 7th Edition, revised. By R. Young, LL.D. 21s.	Young (Edinburgh)

TOPOGRAPHY.

A Guide to the Churches of Chislehurst. By E. A. Webb 1s. 6d. n.	Allen
Further Vols. in the "Cathedral Series" 1s. 6d. n. each	Bell
Further Vols. in the Handbooks to Great Public Schools 3s. 6d. n. each	"
The Scott Country. By W. S. Crockett 3s. 6d. n.	Black
Cooper's Annals of Cambridge, Supplementary Vol. Edited by J. W. Cooper	Cam. Un. Press
Imperial London. By A. H. Beavan. Illus. by H. Fletcher 12s. 6d. n.	Dent
Romantic Essex. By R. A. Beckett	"
The Mediæval Town Series; Bruges. By E. G. Smith. Illus. by Edith Calvert	"
Dent's County Guides. Ed. by G. A. B. Dewar; Surrey. By W. Jerrold, &c. Illus. by J. A. Symington 4s. 6d. n.	"
Springtown on the Pike. By J. V. Lloyd 6s.	Hodder & Stoughton
Swallowfield and its Owners. By Constance Lady Russell	Longmans
Spanish Highways and Byways. By K. L. Bates 8s. 6d. n.	Macmillan
Oxford, 1750-1850. By J. R. Green 5s.	"
The Malvern Country. By B. C. A. Windle. Illus. by E. H. New (The Little Guides) 3s.	Methuen
A History of Stonyhurst. "Catholic Colleges" Series. By Rev. G. Gruggen, S.J.	Paul
Further Vols. in the "British Empire" Series. 6s. each	"
County and Town in England. By Grant Allen. 6s.	Richards
Oxford, College Histories 5s. n. each	Robinson
Cambridge, College Histories 5s. n. each	"
Picturesque Kent. By G. Thompson 6s. n.	"
Bermondsey: Its Historic Memoirs and Associations. By E. T. Caike 12s. 6d. n.	Stock

TRAVEL.

Highlands of Asiatic Turkey. By the Earl Percy 14s. n.	Arnold
Jerusalem. By E. A. Reynolds-Ball 2s. 6d.	Black
Switzerland. By W. A. B. Coolidge and C. L. Freeston 2s. 6d.	"
Through Siberia. By J. Stadling 18s.	Constable
Travels in Western Australia. By May Vivienne	Heinemann
To the Mountains of the Moon. By J. E. S. Moore	Hurst & Blackett
Armenia. By H. F. B. Lynch	Longmans
Eversley Series; Earthwork Out of Tuscany. By M. Hewlett. Revised Edition... .. 5s.	Macmillan
Modern Abyssinia. By A. B. Wylde 15s. n.	Methuen
Shifting Scenes. By the Right Hon. Sir E. Malet 10s. 6d. n.	Murray
A New Way Around an Old World. By F. E. Clark, D.D.	Partridge
Abyssinia. By Herbert Vivian 15s.	Pearson
Cyprus to Zanzibar by the Egyptian Delta. By E. Vizetelly 15s.	"
New Series of Illustrated Gossipy Guide-books 6d. each	"
Springtime in the Basque Mountains. By A. L. Liberty 12s.	Richards
The Cities of Northern Italy. By G. C. Williamson, D.L. 3s. 6d. n.	"
The Umbrian Towns. By Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Cruickshank 3s. 6d. n.	"
The Land of the Amazons. Translated from the French of Baron de Santa-Anna Nery. By G. Humphrey, F.R.G.S. 16s. n.	Sands

Literature

Published by The Times.

No. 179. SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1901.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES OF THE DAY	211, 212, 213
PERSONAL VIEWS—"The Drama as a Moral Force," by Hannah Lynch	213
LOVE ON THE DOORMAT—Another Englishwoman's Love-Letters	215
FOREIGN LETTER—Germany	216
THE DRAMA, by A. B. Walkley.....	218
REVIEWS—
History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate. Vol. III.	219
The Indian Borderland	220
Sir Walter Scott	221
Robert Louis Stevenson.....	221
Pompeii, the City: Its Life and Art.....	221
A Sack of Shakings—The Working Constitution of the United Kingdom—Wrecking the Empire—The Relief of Kumasi—Short Introduction to the Literature of the Bible—From Gladiateur to Persimmon—Oswald von Wolkenstein—Love's Disguises—Popular Royalty.....	222, 223
Casting of Nets—Scoundrels and Co.—Twixt Devil and Deep Sea—The Kmu's Head—Chloris of the Island—Naomi's Exodus—As the Twig is Bent—Straight Shoes—A Princess of Arcady—Tales of Indian Chivalry—Trodies and Us, and Others	225
ART NOTES.....	223, 224
THE LONDON LIBRARY CATALOGUE	226
CORRESPONDENCE—"Canada in English Fiction"—Decadents and Anti-Byronists—The Split Infinitive—"The Ivory Bride".....	226, 227
AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS—Books to look out for	227, 228, 229
LIST OF NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.....	229, 230

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The reporters did not seem to think Mr. Birrell's lecture at Chelsea on the Literature of the Nineteenth Century so important as Mr. Choate's speech which followed it. The lecture was, in fact, not much more than a series of apt and often amusing aperçus on a great number of writers. He committed himself, by the way, to the startling statement that he would rather read Galt's "The Entail" than "Woodstock."

The American Ambassador had something to say on the subject of international copyright:—

As all readers everywhere got the benefit of the brains of all authors, was it a mere fanciful dream, or would it be realized in the distant future, that all authors would get the reciprocal benefit of all their readers without regard to international or colonial limits, so that a copyright property secured anywhere would be good anywhere, like any other right of property?

This is the line which we ourselves have always taken, so that we can welcome Mr. Choate as a powerful advocate of our own views. If only he could persuade his compatriots to accede to the Berne Convention, all that is most essential in his aspirations would be achieved.

Mr. H. B. Irving, who in his study of Judge Jefferies has already shown that success as an actor is not incompatible with success in literature, will publish "Studies of French Criminals" with Mr. Heinemann. With the crimes of Lacenaire, Troppmann, Prado, and Ravachol to work upon he ought to rival De Quincey. The French records of crime which Mr. Irving uses Vol. VIII. No. 12.

as his sources offer a thrilling contrast to the ponderous severity of our English reports.

Speaking at the Authors' Club, Colonel Ian Hamilton gaily expressed the view that the English language would never be ousted by the Dutch language in South Africa, because the Boer girls preferred the English novels. Curiously enough, it is possible to quote actual figures in support of this theory. A chapter in a work by Mr. Justice Laurence of Griqualand, reviewed some time ago in our columns, gave the library statistics for a country town which is one of the headquarters of the Bond. There were two libraries in the town, one English and one Dutch.

In both there were a fair collection of books; but I observe from the latest Parliamentary return that in this, a thoroughly Dutch district, the average monthly circulation of books was—in the English library, 230; in the Dutch, seven. The annual subscription to the former amounted to £29, to the latter £8. The average daily attendance was—at the former, 20; at the latter, nil.

Evidently English holds its own as the literary language of the colonies at the Cape.

Tolstoi's new Novel, it is stated, is to be called "Père Serge," and presents an aristocratic "viveur" who becomes a monk and is venerated as a saint by his former creditors.

M. Ange Galdemar, one of the most charming writers of the Paris Press, has received from the author of "Quo Vadis" a letter which he publishes in the Gaulois, giving particulars as to the origin of this book. Sienkiewicz writes:—"I have been accustomed for some years to read the Latin historians before going to sleep. It was as much for the sake of the history, which in itself interested me profoundly, as in order to keep up my Latin. . . . Tacitus attracted me the most as historian. While reading the 'Annals' I more than once felt tempted to place side by side in an artistic work these two worlds, the one of which was a governing force and an administrative machine the strongest in the world, the other merely a spiritual power. I was tempted as a Pole by the victory of the mind over material force, and as an artist by the admirable forms that abounded in the antique world. Seven years ago, while in Rome, I visited the city and neighbourhood, my Tacitus in my hand. I may say that my idea was already ripe, and I had only then to find my starting point. The chapel of 'Quo Vadis,' the sight of the basilica of Saint Peter, the Tre Fontane, the Albanian mountains provided it. Upon my return to Warsaw I began my historical studies, and my interest in the subject grew apace. Such is the genesis of 'Quo Vadis.' These explanations are too brief, too dry, for I should not omit my personal feelings, my visit to the Catacombs, the luminous landscape always surrounding the Eternal City, and the aqueducts seen at sunset or at dawn." In other words "Quo Vadis" is the spectrum of Rome produced through the magical prism of an artist's mind.

Mr. Bernard Shaw, in his lecture the other day on the Problem Play, praised "Erewhon" as a "problem story."

Probably the very name of Mr. Samuel Butler's satire was unknown to the majority of the audience in St. George's-hall, though it went into a seventh edition sixteen years ago. As a sequel to it is to be published, it is worth while noting that the lecturer pronounced it "Air-e-won," and confessed himself ignorant of its proper sound. Mr. Shaw had forgotten the note to the first edition, which is conclusive:—"The Author wishes it to be understood that Erewhon is pronounced as a word of three syllables, all short—thus, Ē-rē-whŏn."

Our American Correspondent writes:—"I suppose you have the same discussion that we have here on the best school system under the compulsory Acts. Here, as Mr. Coler, the Comptroller of New York, pointed out the other day, we suffer in many cases from fads, and from 'maudlin public opinion based upon misinformation.' An instance has come under my personal observation which shows how principles are neglected in teaching ordinary subjects. A pupil had 'studied' bookkeeping for six years and passed a school examination with 100 per cent. She was asked the difference between single and double entry, and made the astounding answer that single entry was used when a man was in business alone and double entry when he had one partner. Consternation at this state of affairs prevented the obvious question what system would be evolved when three men entered into a partnership. They cannot 'out West' pride themselves on abstruse knowledge, when the latest calls for books at a Western Library includes demands for 'Count of Corpus Christy,' 'Dant's Internal Comedy,' 'Feminine Cooper's Works,' 'Less Miserable,' 'Something in the way of friction.' The Librarian must have a good supply of this latter commodity on tap if he has any nerves."

Facts like these from America may incline to the complacent reflection that we are doing better in England; and an optimist may derive support from a book we noticed last week called "Education in the Nineteenth Century." Miss Gadesden gives some amusing extracts from the diary of a girl at a school kept by no less a person than Miss Mangnall. "Our class of geography," she says, "were two hours looking for the Emperor of Persia's name. My governess,"—presumably the author of the "Questions"—"told us it was Mahomet."

Sir Joshua Fitch, however, who contributes a paper to the same book, rather sympathizes with the boy who, in writing an essay on the changes of the century, remarked, "The public expects every year a higher standard of education from those who seek employment in its service; in proof of which I may refer to the extraordinary difficulty of the questions set at the present examination." This reminds us of another examinee, in the Civil Service Examination—we think Sir Courtenay Boyle has told the story—who put his complaint a little more pointedly. In answer to the question, "How far is it from the earth to the sun?" he wrote, "I cannot say the exact distance of the sun from the earth, but it is not sufficiently near to interfere with my properly discharging the duties of my office."

The correspondence and memoirs of Lord Broughton de Gyfford, more familiar to the public under the name of John Cam Hobhouse, bequeathed to the British Museum in 1869, with the provision that they should not be opened before 1900, are now being brought to light. He was a literary man of distinction as well as a politician. The son of a Bristol merchant, educated at Westminster and Cambridge, where he gained the Hulsean prize, he obtained the greater honour of making Byron's acquaintance, whose fast friend he subsequently became, accompanying him through Albania and other provinces of Turkey, and acting as "best man" at Byron's marriage. After extended wanderings on the Continent, which was then in the throes of the Napoleonic agitation—he ever warmly espoused the cause of the great Corsican—he settled down in England to a political career. He failed to win the suffrages of Radical Westminster, but gained considerable prestige by the publication of a pamphlet, a passage in which, "What prevents the people from marching to the House, pulling the members out by the ears, locking the door and flinging the key into the Thames," led to his imprisonment for "contempt and breach of privilege." This turned the balance in his favour, and on his release he was returned for Westminster. He retained the seat from 1819-1834, after which he represented Nottingham and Harwich, and held many offices of State. From 1852 to his death in 1869 he devoted himself to literature. In the Broughton papers there are thousands of letters, as well as the account of a tour chiefly through Italy, which Broughton visited more than once, a commonplace book of the young Westminster scholar in 1803, memoranda and bills. A "Purity of election" voter upbraids Hobhouse for not finding a lucrative post for his forty-second cousin; unknown admirers pronounce eulogies on their representative; Sir Francis Burdett and other men of political note discuss grave questions, such as the "French Invasion of Spain," "The Liberation of Greece" (Hobhouse was a prominent member of the Greek Committee), or the "Central Asian Question." Then we get dramatic personal sketches of historical events by eye-witnesses and many literary reminiscences. There are letters from Ugo Foscolo, who translated Sterne's "Sentimental Journey" into Italian, and from other foreign and English writers of eminence. There are a good many allusions to Byron; notes from his publisher with sundry suggestions; letters from would-be critics; one or two contributions by the poet himself; and lastly several communications regarding his proposed funeral in Westminster Abbey.

As an attractive result of consistent specialization on one subject it would be difficult to match the Blyth Library of sporting works dispersed by Messrs. Christie last week. It represented the labour of many years, and the fine condition of each book and the perfect state of the plates bore evidence of the care with which the library had been gathered together. Among the principal books were:—Alken, "The Sporting Repository," 1822, £54; "Annals of Sporting and Fancy Gazette," 13 vols., 1822-28, £54; Apperley, "Life of John Mylton," first edition, £17; Apperley, "Life of a Sportsman," 1842, £27 10s.; Baily's "Magazine of Sports and Pastimes," 73 vols., £21; "Fur and Feather Series," eight vols., large paper, £16; Hunt, "Portraits of Winning Horses," 1849, £13 10s.; Ackerman "Microcosm of London," three vols., original boards, £29 8s.; Badminton Library, 28 vols., large paper, £54 12s.; Alken, "National Sports of Great Britain," 1821, £68; Lord Lilford, "Birds of the British Islands," £56 14s.; Scrope, "The Art of Deer Stalking," 1838, £8 5s.; Scrope, "Days and Nights of Salmon Fishing," 1843, £9 5s.; "Sporting Magazine," 1792-1870, £315; "The Sportsman," 1833-45, £46; "New Sporting Magazine," 1831-47, £51 9s.; "Sporting Review," 1839-46, £29 8s.; Surtees, "Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities," 1843, £40 19s.; Turberville, "The Booke of Falconrie and Hunting," 1611, £15 10s. The sale also included; Graves and Cronin, "History of the Works of Sir Joshua Reynolds," three vols., 1899, £53 11s.; S. W. Reynolds, "Works of Sir Joshua Reynolds," with mezzotints, 1820, £205; Coleridge, "A Lay Sermon," presentation copy to Southey, and "A Moral and Political Lecture," two vols., £16 10s.; Coleridge, "Zapolya," first edition, with manuscript notes by the author, £11 10s.; Symonds, "Renaissance in Italy," four vols., first editions, £15; Dickens, "Works," edition de luxe, 1881, £11; Whyte Melville, "Novels," 39 vols., first editions, £50; Lytton, "Novels," 73 vols., first editions, £56.

Mr. H. B. Foyster writes:—"In my letter on Apocryphal Stories, 'Broken Papal Conclaves' should be 'Book on Papal Conclaves.' I am sorry to trouble you with this correction. My writing is no doubt responsible for the error."

The idea that the art of fiction can be taught has often been derided ; and it is quite true that one could not apprentice one's son to a novelist with the same confidence in his ultimately learning the business that one would feel if one apprenticed him to a cabinet-maker. But that is no reason why some experienced person should not tell the aspirant, in a good-natured way, before he begins, some of the things that the critics will probably tell him, with less consideration for his feelings, after he has finished. The attempt to do this is made in a book now lying on our table, entitled "How to Write a Novel" (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.). The author goes into the matter thoroughly, deducing many valuable lessons from the confessions and examples of the best authors ; and the only fear is lest, finding a lack of uniformity in these examples, the beginner may be perplexed. The perusal of the chapter headed "How Authors Work" certainly seems calculated to leave him more bewildered than instructed. Shall he imitate George Eliot who always "dressed herself with great care" before sitting down at her desk, or Maurus Jokai who "always uses violet ink," or Ibsen who cannot write without "a wooden bear, a tiny devil, two or three cats, and some rabbits," arranged on a tray in front of him, or Ouida who "gets up at five o'clock and works herself into a sort of literary trance," or Mr. Zangwill who "works in spasms," or Nathaniel Hawthorne by whom "an entire table and the arms of a rocking-chair were whittled away" while he was engaged in thinking out a plot? The matter is one which the adviser does not take the responsibility of deciding, contenting himself with the general statement that "it would be advisable to adopt some whimsical habit so as to be prepared for the interviewer." Mr. Frankfort Moore who receives interviewers in yachting costume, Mr. Guy Boothby whom they generally find in an arm-chair opposite a phonograph, Mr. Hall Caine who posed before the camera on the stage of the theatre on which he was rehearsing his play, have all adopted this method. It is not, however, sufficient by itself to secure a great literary success ; and the beginner will perhaps do well to postpone the consideration of this branch of the subject until he has mastered his counsellor's precepts about style, atmosphere, plot, characterization, local colour, dialogue, &c. "Never allow the reader to be in doubt as to who is speaking" is one sound rule that is laid down. We have sometimes asked ourselves whether the true way out of this difficulty might not be found by printing the speeches of the different characters in different coloured inks. The pages would thus be picturesque, like missals, and the effect on the mind of the reader might resemble that produced by Wagner's leit-motifs. We notice that our author does not seem to have quite made up his own mind whether his pupils wish to be taught how to write good books or only how to write popular books. Those of them who cultivate the latter ambition will, perhaps, find more useful guidance in an article on "How to Write a Novel for the Masses," contributed by Mr. Charles Battell Loomis to the Atlantic Monthly. "The ordinary novel reader," says Mr. Loomis, "is a dull bird, who knows little and cares less about the facts of history, the cut of a cloak, or the geography of a particular country. To him anachronisms do not exist, because he would not know one if he saw it in a cage." And then follows an example, a few lines of story, and a direction :—

Here chuck in some reference to the "Provençal robins" that during the reign of the good Louis sang with such surpassing sweetness." If you wish to, run in a few Breton peasants, and dot the meadow with sheep, and fill the fields with Lyonnaise potatoes. The public won't know or care whether you are right or not.

This is admirable fooling, and not bad criticism, since it helps to explain how it comes about that some writers who shout stories into phonographs at odd moments nevertheless achieve great popular reputations. But we hesitate to recommend it to the aspirant who, not being born a novelist, desires to be made one.

Personal Views.

THE DRAMA AS A MORAL FORCE.

That the essential idea of such a play as Electra which, along with the marriage of the Princess of the Asturias, nearly accomplished a revolution in Spain as well as the expulsion of the Jesuits, could be capable of a profound and weighty influence upon public opinion is no matter for surprise, seeing the intensity of periodical outbursts of modern feeling against the Jesuits. The surprise lies in the puerility of a piece which has enjoyed so unwonted a distinction, and whose author, like Beaumarchais, could proudly say, "It seems I had shaken the State." True, the State was already in a threatened condition, thanks to the Regent's injudicious choice of a son-in-law ; and when Perez Galdos came forward with one of our modern Turk's Heads, an untruthful and insidious Jesuit, he gave voice to the gathering indignation. The Count of Caserta is a Carlist, and the Carlists are all Jesuit-led reactionaries.

Pantoja, the Jesuit of Electra, is far from realizing our notion of an effectively antipathetic figure. There is nothing "Ignatian" about him. His game is too gloomy and open and unintelligent to take in any person of average intelligence. But it sufficed to make the people remember what a backward step is implied for Spain in that worst of all dangers which Carlism carries with it, the rule of the Congregationalists. Perez Galdos has already given us a powerful and unflinching study of the earlier stages of Carlism, when its first prince named the mother of Christ the Captain-General of his army, and the parlours of convents for both sexes were hotbeds of conspiracy and sedition. It was not a pleasant time for Spain, and liberal and radical spirits all over the Peninsula may be pardoned a just dread of its return. It needed the benignity of the temperate Weyler to carry through the Royal marriage, and in order to go off on her honeymoon the Heiress Presumptive had the satisfaction of knowing her capital had been placed in a state of siege. It was an original start in marriage, to be sure, befitting rather the Middle Ages than the times we live in. The revolution for the moment slumbers, but we may expect to see it break out with more virulent force should fortune not lead the young King to maturity. As Prince Consort, the Count of Caserta's son will be less welcome even than as the husband of the Princess of the Asturias.

It will ever be a subject of discussion between those who think with Lamb that our object in going to the theatre is to get away from ourselves and our common life—"to take an airing beyond the diocese of the strict conscience, and imagine a world with no meddling restrictions"—and those who regard the modern drama as a popular force of education and entertain an austere regard for realism, whether or not the theatre may be utilized as the floor for casuistical, political, and social debates under the guise of dialogue and situation. For my part, except in my lighter moods, when I desire nothing but a good laugh, which anything from delicate comedy to broad farce will procure, I give my preference to the "purpose" play. Here in Paris the playwrights of the hour have definitely realized that the complications of adultery are done to death, and that interest must be sought in social and political themes. And the result is that sentiment in the form of licit or illicit love absorbs the scene less and less, and lovers become what they are in our everyday existence—incidental figures in a fugitive stage of emotion, the consequences of which are of less importance than those of the big far-reaching drama which is being played around them. In the roll of life this, if we would achieve realism, we must perforce admit to be right. Shakespeare would have us believe that all Verona stood still to watch its famous lovers; but while Juliet is on the eternal balcony, and Romeo eternally below wishing he were a glove upon her hand, life behind these central figures went on apace. And it is now this life behind the lovers which is thrust forward with an extraordinary increase in the motives and complications of the drama.

It would be hard for a Parisian dramatist to accomplish the disturbance created by Perez Galdos in Madrid recently, because there is nobody in Paris writing plays with genius enough to excite popular feeling to such an extent in a centre where something very different from the quality of Electra would be needed for such an achievement. Beaumarchais in Paris accomplished, with one of the most brilliant and original of comedies, what Perez Galdos in Madrid brought about with a drama of singular mediocrity, which reveals the most amateurish characterization, and dialogue not considerably above that of the schoolroom. As for the situations, they are original if by originality we mean something that is only new, while ignoring the deeper significance of the qualification. What we may admire, however, in the work is its sincerity and courage; and Señor Galdos is that rarest of Spaniards, a man who ardently preaches the need of education for women. He is what all modern liberals call a feminist, with faith in the emancipation, the independence, the improvement of woman. If she is to be freed, she must be rescued from clerical domination; the fetters of insidious priestcraft must be struck from her with a direct appeal to her heart and intelligence. Elsewhere this might now be called vieux jeu, so familiar are we with the notion. Not so beyond the Pyrenees, where I have heard a priest maintain before me that it is against the teaching and the interest of the Church to educate women. In such a land the theatre is the only possible force a reformer can bring to bear upon public opinion; for few books are read, and it requires something more actual and definite than a novel to appeal to the average Spaniard. So when they see a young girl in love with an amiable man of science—her cousin, who wishes to marry her—lured by false information into a convent, and hear the lover crying (of the wicked Jesuit), "He must be killed," and menacing the convent with fire and flame, the atrocity of the sacrifice of the girl is borne in upon them with far greater intensity than if conveyed through the most brilliant and powerful novel. They lead the author in triumph to his house, and instantly go forth to fling stones at all the Jesuit colleges of Spain.

The stones are, of course, unnecessary, but what is necessary is a national protest against Spanish clericalism, and if Electra, feeble and amateurish as it is—with the absurd climax of the ghost of Electra's mother visiting her in the convent to inform her of the Jesuit's lie and clear her hideous doubt—should bring about that protest in firm and sage fashion, his country will owe Señor Galdos a serious benefit. It is much already that the people should wildly applaud a play which ends with the significant retort of Electra leaving the convent—when the Jesuit cries: "Thou fliest," and "No," she exclaims, "it is my resurrection." This idea from the pen of a sincere Catholic like Perez Galdos is new enough to take our breath away. How many women cling to the cloister, even when they have discovered their choice was an error, rather than face the slighting tolerance of them in the world! The nun who leaves her cloister is a déclassée; she knows it and she is made to feel it in the Catholic world. And if Perez Galdos succeeds, through the medium of Electra, in persuading some, at least, of his compatriots that a girl can leave the cloister as she may honestly and honourably change the current of her ideas, and be not a penny the worse for it, there will be an immense stride made beyond the Pyrenees in woman's emancipation.

But while we must acknowledge that the theatre is a force of more direct and immediate power with a nation than the calmer medium of fiction, the results of the latter remain when we have forgotten the emotions created by the former. When we witness a revival of that delicious comedy Le Mariage de Figaro, it needs an effort of imagination to believe that it once toppled the foundations of the State, whereas the lesson of "Don Quixote" is still vivid to our minds, as modern in its eternal significance as when it first shook Spain with laughter. It is for this reason that those playwrights who take their mission with intellectual gravity and conscience, and who aspire to the reform of social or public abuses through the exercise of their talent, deserve our unreserved praise. It is we who profit by their power, and if they teach playgoers to think and find something more behind the footlights than good acting and agreeable dialogue, it is much. With such an object did M. Brieux write his suggestive but by no means pleasant Remplacantes; and already there are signs of disturbance and vexed question in the custom of employing women to nurse other people's children while their own are dying untended at home. MM. Donnay and Descaves wrote their most brilliant but sadly inconclusive play La Clairière, not so much to try to prove anything as to force us to poignant confrontation of the fact that nearly everything needs altering. I know no more interesting or intellectual play in modern days. And to have seen it acted in the original cast at Antoine's theatre, with that subtlest and most perfect of artists, Gémier, superb in the principal rôle, is to preserve jealously a precious remembrance. And yet this remarkable play created no sensation, had not a particle of the success of M. Lavedan's atrocious Vieux Marcheur and his witty but scandalous Nouveau Jeu. True, M. Lavedan himself started with a "purpose" play, Le Prince d'Aurec, at once a direct and ferocious attack on the vulgarized modern aristocrat, greedy for money and ready to take it from any hand without a pretence of gratitude. M. Lavedan, who is nothing if not inconsistent, and who is now one of the pillars of nationalism and the moribund Faubourg, veered round towards the end in pity for his castigated victims, and seems to honour the prince who kicks out of his life the wealthy Jew, another of our modern Turk's Heads, on whose subsidies he and his wife had lived. Now his mission is to expose the vices of Republican society and hold up Ministers, Deputies, and lay teachers to public scorn. But M. Lavedan is not a Beaumarchais, and he is not likely to hurry the Republic to its doom. For M. Lavedan is one of those mordant but essentially ineffectual satirists whose work leads nowhere, proves nothing, is defective through its author's lack of intellectuality and spirituality, lack of abiding power and individual force.

There is in Paris to-day a writer who, had he been endowed with dramatic gifts, might have hurried his country into a sort of mild philosophic nihilism, and that is, the greatest living French writer, Anatole France. But he has elected to instil his philosophy of gentle anarchy through the persuasive lips of M. Bergeret, having previously made Jerome Cogniard his delightful medium. If this daring dreamer possessed something of Beaumar-chais' practical talent, there would be some chance of our being swept, upon an indignant wave of protest against the hypocrisies of so-called civilization, off our feet into that unknown which we contemplate from afar as progress. But, alas! M. France has only written one play, a lamentable failure, Le Lys Rouge, which told us nothing, and left us where we were before, wearied of adultery, staring disconsolately at the many social and economical problems of our age. That the tendency of the times is towards anarchy there can be no doubt, from the salient fact that all the Continental plays which have had a real success and forced people to think within recent years contain distinctly anarchical, social, and radical tenets. General de Galliffet said a truer word than he imagined when he exclaimed in the Chamber of Deputies, "everybody nowadays is a bit of a socialist." There is a widespread conviction that things must change, and the stage has become the favourite seat of revolt. Les Tisserands of Hauptmann was the pathetic apology of strikes, and when have strikes on the Continent been so numerous? Nothing is more contagious than the spirit of unrest, and it would need but a play of singular intensity and depth of feeling and expression, or a comedy of the imperishable qualities of one of Molière's, to hurry us to the brink of a revolution. There is little hope for the Reactionary party on the stage. M. Lavedan tried his fortunes with virtuous platitudes of the old order on the boards of the Comédie Française in Catherine, and every one yawned and said what a sadly dull dog he had become. It is felt that such a page as this has been turned by humanity, and what we want now is something larger, more vivifying. The nations of the earth need to breathe more freely, and this need finds its quickest and most effective utterance upon the stage. Here in Paris the drama has become increasingly and extraordinarily complex, suggestive, and intellectual. To realize this we need only read one of Meilhac and Halévy's plays after seeing a new play at Antoine's. You will leave Antoine's in a state of bitter revolt and exasperation, while such a play as La Boule is a piece of unadulterated French gaiety.

HANNAH LYNCH.

LOVE ON THE DOORMAT.

"Is the occupier an 'Englishwoman' technically speaking?" is a question which, as Mr. Owen Seaman suggests, seems likely to be asked at the coming Census. It would certainly settle the problem once and for all, and, to quote "O. S." once more, "it would get this tedious, dull business over." The method of "Clumps," by which you hunt down a fact through a series of question to which only yes or no may be answered, has so far not been successful; and one could hardly throw a stone across the road in Fleet-street, or Chelsea, or Hampstead without hitting somebody who has disavowed responsibility for the most talked-of book of the season. At any rate a complete list, with portraits, of writers who were not the authors of "An Englishwoman's Love-Letters" would probably, even now, pay a popular monthly well. For ourselves, we confess that the hunt ceased long ago to be amusing. One was interested, and rather glad, to learn that the letters were not genuine; a good deal gladder, though perhaps not more interested, than one would be to discover that one's own love-letters were fictitious. When the "Englishwoman," over whose pathetic death-bed we had wept, revived and wrote poems in the magazines, which reminded one neither of Mr. Newbolt nor Mr. Lawrence Housman, one breathed again. But after that discovery the reticence of the author certainly deserved to be respected; to violate it would be to interfere with legitimate business. "Those who know will keep silence; if any one speaks that may be taken as evidence that he does not know. In this way I trust the mystery may be preserved and the sale of the book stimulated." We quote from Mr. Barry Pain's "Another Englishwoman's Love-Letters" (Unwin, 2s.), which we are by no means sure will not have at least as good a sale as its original.

It is refreshing to meet people who take no interest in the authorship of an "Englishwoman's Love-Letters" and who have not even read those effusions. But they will certainly miss a good deal by not being able to enjoy Mr. Barry Pain's book, a very notable satire and a fine achievement in the art of parody. You need not have read the original letters to be amused by it; if you have, you find that Mr. Pain has studied that work very closely, and takes it to pieces with scrupulous, almost loving, care; and you will find also that his jests embody a good deal of very sound criticism with an amusing exposure of the Englishwoman's "doormat" attitude. Mr. Pain does not conceal the fact that he is the author of "Another Englishwoman's Love-Letters." Nor does he conceal the fact that his letters, which would certainly have brightened up the course of true love, are not entirely genuine. As his Englishwoman says frankly on the last page but one—

Briefly, we are not real. We are only a lot of rubbish that the editor has made up. In that, perhaps, lies our last and closest resemblance to the other Englishwoman and the insufferable bounder who sent her his "remembrances" on her death-bed. This is outspoken and not quite unjustified criticism. That is one merit of Mr. Pain's parody, besides the merit of being in itself amusing. His book is a study in doormat erotics;—

Oh, the perfect youthfulness of you! Devotion is unsatisfying, and abjection must come to its help. I am your footstool, your doormat. I kiss your beautiful, great boots.

So does our second Englishwoman end her first letter. In her eighteenth she is still at it—

At half-past two I shall see you. When I think of it I throw myself down before you. Your foot on my neck, please. Thanks.

With the twenty-second her tone is naturally a little changed; the doormat is not quite so fresh and new—

Cannot you bring yourself to come out from behind those petticoats, and act something like an imitation of a man for once in your life? . . . Have I not loved you enough? If there is any phrase more abject than those that I have used, tell me it, and you shall get it by return of post.

And with the twenty-fourth—

If you have suffered in the least degree through me, I do apologise. I am so sorry! I do beg pardon for existing; it was quite unintentional on my part. If you will overlook it this time, it shall not occur again. Is that humble enough?

There is some justice in all this, we may admit; and now that we all agree that the one Englishwoman is as unreal as the other, we may derive some amusement from it, just as we can from Mr. Pain when he turns the dry light of parody on the approved love-letter style.

I can never work for myself again. You must do that for me now! This is such a rest to me. You are you, and you are all the rest as well. I lie in the beyond and watch all else as shadows and because of you. Read that through twice, and let me know what you make of it.

Or, again, the amorous metaphorical:—

O rock me in Love's cat's-cradle high above the swaying tree-tops till the moon clouds are my mighty, and my star-dreams light you. That is a specimen of my metaphorical style, so justly admired. Adieu, most beloved!

Or the playful and infantine:—

And was he a most 'stremely desolate person while she was away? Wazzums? What shall she do for him to comfort him? Wrap him all up in pink rose-leaves and kiss him blue? There then, don't cry any more; I am your little toy-duck, and you are the most powerful-strong big magnet, and I come swimmy-swimmy to you as fast as ever and ever. And then both go off to hunt weeny shrimplets in pools where there aren't any, and get two little lost persons that come home late to tea, and make the U.G. say swear words. Say yum-yum three times slowly, please.—Your most pussiest little Puss-Kitten.

Mr. Pain has a pleasing derangement of love terms—"Your own love shower-bath," "Your own kiss-factory"—but we are not sure "Your own copyright in Great Britain, America, and the Continent" does not please us best. He traces his quarry round every corner with relentless curiosity, and to appreciate him thoroughly requires, like the higher criticism, a close study of the original text. Those who are learned in the subject will wonder at the curious identity of circumstance in the two stories. Thus ;—

I had been meaning to show your photograph to the new kitchenmaid, and to collect some further expression of candid opinion. But she has only been here three weeks, and I have the feeling that I do not know her well enough. Am I too shy? I will be all that you wish.

Here is another little incident which we cannot refrain from quoting at length ;—

So I have seen you again, beloved, and my eyes are still burned with the delirious spectacle. It was yesterday, in Oxford-street. I was coming out of the bun-shop, and you were going into the photographer's. It was kind of you not to let your eyes fall on me. Had they done so, I should have opened my mouth wide, jumped into the air, and expired kicking. But it was your back that was towards me, perhaps because you followed the conventional habit of going into the photographer's face first. Above the back was your neck, with the collar round it, and above the neck your head, surmounted by a hat. Yes, that was the first thought that came to me ; I had passed out of your life, and yet it had not altered the order of your being! There was the neck above the back, and the hat above the head, just as when I first saw you and my life began. It did not vex me—in fact it takes a good deal to vex me. But if your hat had come just between your neck and your head, or your head had come just between your neck and your back, it would have been a kind of consolation ; it would have shown that the upheaval was as tremendous in its effects with you as it had been with me. Even if you had just worn your collar round your back, it would have been a sign that you had really altered. Oh, let me not be selfish in my love! I would not have you different. Only some sympathy in suffering would have meant so much to me.

For the inwardness of the following remark we must refer the reader to the original if his memory is at fault.

Last night the sky was a bright bay with black points, and I sat up to see a piece of one eclipse.

And the same may be said of this quite irreverent note on the statement that Fido "never barked once."

Query.—You said as distinctly as possible that all her dogs had the same name, Benjie. How do you account for this?—PRINTER'S READER.

Answer.—It is quite simple. Fido was a cat.—EDITOR.

Objection.—But she says he never barked.—PRINTER'S READER.

Answer.—That's right. Cats never do.—EDITOR.

As to the reason why, despite the letter-writer's attractions ("Every body has always adored me, and I cannot understand how she resists the charm ; as a rule I am simply mesmeric with mothers"), the engagement is broken off, we need not reveal Mr. Pain's mystery ; but there is point in this outpouring :—

You do not tell me what your mother's objection to me is, and of course I do not ask. That is so beautifully natural, is it not? No girl would ever dream of asking why her engagement was to be broken off. That would be simply morbid curiosity. After all, what business is it of hers?

But we have no space to follow Mr. Pain further. He is very amusing ; and though he shares our own admiration for the "Englishwoman's Love-Letters," that makes it perhaps only the fairer game. As he says, "Servants break only valuable things." Perhaps he will succeed in the laudable object of preventing a flood of sentimental literature. Other people besides Mr. Pain will have experienced "the feeling that one has been eating caramels to excess in a moonlit churchyard." At any rate after all the fuss we want some cheering up—solvuntur risu tabulae! We can even regard our passionate Englishwoman as a more human person, and, unshocked, hear her say, "Can you shrimp? I have heard that when one has shrump once, one never forgets it."

Foreign Letter.

GERMANY.

Most of the books published in Germany during the first three months of the year are of a more or less serious character. An English journal cannot, of course, review them all fully ; but we may indicate the nature of those most likely to interest English readers. Letters (if genuine) are always popular and form an object lesson in psychology. Those of Bismarck, Nietzsche, and Lichtenberg are no exception to the rule. Of the first we said something on December 22. The new edition of Lichtenberg's Letters, which may be considered authoritative, is of remarkable interest. Spielhagen lately said of them:—"The dust of a century and more lies on these pictures, and not a single colour has faded, everything is fresh, pulsating with life, as if they had been written yesterday. What a clear conception of all manifestations of life! What unsought, inexhaustible humour!" Lichtenberg exercised his unique powers of observation to good effect during his visits to England in 1770 and 1774-75, and he says many shrewd things about the persons with whom he came in contact, such as Wilkes, Garrick, Lord Boston, King George III., his Queen and his children. He was present at an important debate in the House of Lords on the American colonies, and describes the proceedings with his usual acumen. Of Nietzsche's collected Letters only the first volume of the promised four has so far appeared, and we must reserve our criticism until all are published.

Nietzsche literature is increasing out of all proportion to the importance of the subject. It includes a very curious commentary on the "Zarathustra," by Gustav Naumann, who finds much to say in explanation of this not very occult philosophy. Dr. Paul Deussen's "Reminiscences" is by far the best of recent Nietzsche books. It is sad reading, and will convince the reader that in different circumstances Nietzsche's considerable gifts might have been turned to better account.

English authors other than Shakespeare are beginning to attract German students. Dr. Max Meyerfeld's study of Burns is interesting, but neither so ambitious nor so attractive as M. Angellier's book ; Burns makes a stronger appeal to Frenchmen than to Germans. Dr. Meyerfeld is chiefly concerned to prove that Burns was no miraculous phenomenon, but a natural historical development. He puts the poet, as it were, under the microscope, and finds for everything he wrote an origin in contemporary or earlier poets, both English and Scottish. It is very clever and ingenious, but perhaps Burns is best left to explain himself. Dr. Meyerfeld also traces the influence of Burns upon Wordsworth and Byron, whom he considers two of the most original of English poets. Translations from Ruskin, as one of his German critics calls him, "orator, poet, prophet," find much favour in Germany. Fräulein Anna Henschke has translated "The Crown of Wild Olive" remarkably well—even preserving some flavour of the charming prose of the original. The get-up of this volume deserves notice. It has a very artistic title-page, with equally satisfactory decorative headings and tail-pieces throughout ; and it is beautifully printed in Roman type. We hope other publishers in Germany will follow this example, for we cannot help thinking that the unattractive form of most German books, in some degree, keeps foreigners from reading them. "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," and "Sesame and Lilies" have appeared in the same series ; the "Lectures on Art" are announced for speedy publication. A little biography of Ruskin by Sam Saenger pays more attention to the Master's social theories than to his art criticisms, and the author points out that even in the latter the ethical bearing is of greater importance than the æsthetic. This interest in Ruskin may be noted in connexion with a crusade, as yet confined to a small circle, led by Heinrich and Julius Hart against pessimism. Their watchword is "from highest knowledge, from life, into the light," and their goal is victory over the spirit of waste, of hopelessness, of negation, that has been powerful during the past century. Their creed seems to be something like this, "The old-world philosophy was for a humanity of children, who only saw what lay nearest them, and who were careful and cautious, and only claimed to live by divine guidance. Now the time has come to be strong and free, to press up to the summit, and regard the view into infinity without fear." They are publishing a series of pamphlets expressive of their views under the title "Das Reich der Erfüllung."

Prof. Kellner's "A Year in England" is one of those misleading books founded on a superficial observation of men and things, and strongly coloured by personal prejudice. His is the sort of mind that sees in others what it puts in them, and disdains any attempt to make honest acquaintance with what is unfamiliar. This is not the way to criticize foreign countries. What he says contains truth, but never the whole truth. Life in a London boarding house is scarcely the best kind of life we have to show. He describes his dinners, and he discourses on the difficulties of living by the pen, and in both he is equally at fault. It is useful sometimes to see ourselves as others see us, but Prof. Kellner sees us as we never were, and we hope his more intelligent compatriots are aware of the fact. A very different kind of book is Dr. Josef Redlich's volume on English Local Government. It forms a very complete treatise on the subject, is based on trustworthy sources, and should prove useful to students not only in Germany but in Great Britain. He first traces the movement from its origins to what he calls the present day democratization of local government, and then deals fully with the different forms of existing local government, while the last section is devoted to criticism.

All who are interested in modern German poetry will find "Die Deutsche Lyrik des 19 Jahrhunderts" a very useful and delightful volume. The editor, Theodor von Sossnosky, has taken the widest view possible of his duties, and his collection really forms a mirror of modern German lyrical poetry from the poets of the war of liberation to those of the most approved decadent school of to-day. The poems are arranged chronologically, and include specimens of such Whitmanlike singers as Max Dauthendey and Arno Holz, of the fresh natural tones of Eichendorff, of the wild revolutionary poems of Herwegh, Freiligrath and Kinkel, of the anarchical verse of J. H. Mackay, and of the lovely melodies of Heine. Among quite modern authors are Anna Ritter, Richard Dehmel, Johanna Ambrosius the peasant poet, and Arthur Schnitzler the novelist and dramatist, who appears here for the first time as a lyric poet.

The season has produced several historical works of importance. The third volume of Prutz's "Preussische Geschichte" deals with the kingdom of Frederick the Great and its fall (1740-1812); the seventh volume of Hans von Helmolt's "Weltgeschichte" with Western Europe. Petersdorff gives us, in his life of Frederick William IV., a sympathetic portrait of the peace-loving and far sighted monarch whose good qualities were marred by weakness of will, and includes much new information gleaned from the papers of General Leopold von Gerlach. The correspondence (in French) of Frederick William III. and Queen Louisa of Prussia with the Emperor Alexander I. is edited with a useful introduction by Paul Bailleu, from the Archives of Berlin, Charlottenburg, and St. Petersburg. It is practically the history of the Prusso-Russian alliance during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, and of the personal relations of the two dynasties. Very useful, too, historically are such books as the great critical edition of Luther's works now being brought out by Hermann Böhlau's Nachfolger in Weimar with its learned introduction and notes; the "History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. Heinrich Brück, Bishop of Mainz, of which the fourth volume deals with the history of the Church in Germany from the Vatican Council of 1870 up to the present time. Dr. Brück's introduction is more philosophical than historical; it discusses the Church and politics, atheistical literature, and the attempt which, as the Bishop thinks, is being made everywhere to divorce public life from Christianity.

We welcome a fourth edition of the monograph on the Emperor William I. by Prof. Marcks, Professor of Modern History at Leipzig, whose able pamphlet on England and Germany, of which an English translation appeared in the autumn, despite its scarcely veiled hostility to our country, was a very valuable contribution to practical history and politics. He starts with the assertion that Prussia more than any other State is the creation of its Princes; traces the history of William I. from his birth in 1797 through his career under Frederick William III., in the army, and at Court under Frederick William IV., during the Revolutionary period of 1848-49, and the reaction of 1851-57, and gives a large space to the "great decade," as Prof. Marcks entitles the years 1862-71. The old time, says the Professor, passed away with the old Emperor; and with William II. a race seeking new paths has entered into possession of Germany. But those paths are not yet discovered, and meanwhile William I.'s influence prevails in the empire, the army, the monarchy. In him was embodied, as Bismarck said when he announced his death to the Reichstag, the heroic courage, the national sense of honour, the devotion, the industry, the faithfulness to duty, that characterize the Fatherland. It is a deeply interesting book, and should be read by all students of modern Germany. The excess of eulogy in Lippold's monograph on "William III., Prince of Orange, Stadtholder of Holland, and King of England," detracts from its worth. The appendix is a curious production, an unfair and severe criticism of every book that has not given ungrudging praise to William III. In a former volume Lippold treated of the reign of Queen Mary of England, wife of William III.

German professors treat religion in a more popular and commonsense way than is usual with us. "The Beginnings of our Religion," lectures delivered at the University of Bale by Lic. Paul Wernle, has a very practical aim. The lecturer does not believe that the evangel has lost strength through contact with the world. The ideal still exists in individuals, and in times of weariness and struggle, the moral grandeur, the brotherly love, the trust in God, which ministers urge on their congregation, are full of hope for the progress of Christianity.

There is always an attraction about the history of a great commercial house. That of the Fuggers is full of movement and variety. "Das Hans Fugger von seinen Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart" by A. Stauber, with portraits and a genealogical table, forms a valuable contribution to German social history. Here we see how the descendants of Hans Fugger the weaver became great merchant princes, and were ennobled by the Emperor Maximilian; how they adapted themselves to the new times, and took part in the explorations of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; how they collected books and pictures, encouraged art and science, and employed their great wealth for noble ends. A very useful book for economists, of which the book on the Fuggers may remind us, is "Capital und Capitalzins," by Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk, which provides within the covers of one volume a notice of the economic writers of every country and a complete history and criticism of all the theories of the subject.

We must not omit to mention the first volume of Professor Bernoulli's Greek Iconography. His Roman Iconography has become a classic, and the new venture is one of the best things of its kind. It contains portraits, beautifully reproduced, in chronological order, of Greek statesmen, poets and philosophers, from the earliest times to the end of the fifth century B.C. The second volume, which will extend from the fourth century B.C. to Roman times, will be published in the autumn.

THE DRAMA.

A THEORY OF "RICHARD THE SECOND."

Much against the grain I have often had to point out what seemed to me the weak points of Mr. Frank Benson and his company in their extensive Shakespearean repertory. It is the very extent of this repertory which is to blame. "Non omnia possumus omnes," as Partridge observed, and no one actor or one company can box the Shakespearean compass without striking a reef or two. But for many shortcomings Mr. Benson's Richard the Second is a liberal reparation. Without it the playgoers of this generation would never have had the chance of seeing with their own eyes this most beautiful, intimately thrilling, curiously "modern" and décadent play. Mr. Benson's performance of the King is a really brilliant achievement. It is so because it is just what Edmund Kean's, if Hazlitt is to be believed, was not. "Mr. Kean made it a character of passion—that is, of feeling combined with energy; whereas it is a character of pathos—that is to say, of feeling combined with weakness." These circumstances were inverted in Mr. Benson's Shylock, which was weak, petulant, peevish, never the lion at bay. The same qualities, presented in Richard, are admirably in place. It is plaintive, morbidly introspective, self-dissecting and self-tormenting, a melancholy John-a-Dreams—the very thing.

Of that I will say no more, except earnestly to recommend all playgoers to see this revival at the Comedy before it is too late. But it may be worth while to say something of an ingenious criticism of the same performance, as given some time ago at Manchester. This criticism, signed C. E. Montague, is in a little volume of theatrical notices reprinted from the Manchester Guardian ("The Manchester Stage": Constable), which I am ashamed to have neglected to read until a year after its publication. They are criticisms by various hands, all very serious and capable, and no doubt would tempt one to much controversy in fitting time and place. For the moment I must be content to leave them as a whole with the remark that London would be hard put to it to produce a similar volume of equal merit, and I pass to Mr. Montague's theory of Richard the Second. Briefly, he states and develops the thesis that in Richard you have "the capable and faithful artist in the same skin as the incapable and unfaithful King." Mr. Montague expounds (rather superfluously, perhaps) what we mean by the artistic temperament, and then goes about to prove that Richard has it. "Shakespeare meant to draw, in Richard, not only a rake and a muf on a throne and falling off it, but, in the same person, an exquisite poet; to show with one hand how kingdoms are lost and with the other how the creative imagination goes about its work; to fill the same man with the attributes of a feckless wastrel in high place and with the quite distinct but not incompatible attributes of a typical, a consummate artist." A pretty theory this, and elegantly worked out, but Mr. Montague must disabuse himself of the notion that he has had the luck to discover it. He does "not think that critical justice has ever been done" to this aspect of Richard. Then he cannot have read the chapter in Mr. Pater's "Appreciations" on "Shakespeare's English Kings" (dated 1889). "An exquisite poet, if he is nothing else, from first to last," said Mr. Pater of Richard, "able to see all things poetically, to give a poetic turn to his conduct of them." . . . "His appreciation of the poetry of his own hapless lot, an eloquent self-pity." . . . "He throws himself into the part, realizes a type, falls gracefully as on the world's stage." . . . "As in some sweet anthem of Handel, the sufferer, who puts finger to the organ under the utmost pressure of mental conflict, extracts a kind of peace at last from the mere skill with which he sets his distress to music." Why, here is Mr. Montague's theory of Richard as Artist all fully implied! But though he did not invent the tune, he can certainly plume himself on having executed some skillful variations on it.

And now, having stated this view of Mr. Montague and Mr.

Pater, I shall have the temerity to put forward a slightly different one of my own. Note that the theory under discussion has at the first blush a touch of paradox. Literature and the drama, to be sure, present us with strange facets of kingship—Bolingbroke's (not Shakespeare's, but Queen Anne's) Patriot King, M. Jules Lemaitre's picture of the modern king who regards the notion of royalty as mere blague, Stevenson's Prince Florizel turned from Haroun-al-Raschid to Leicester-square tobacconist. But the artist-king, what a bizarre idea, almost Gilbertian! The plain man (a nuisance in actual life, but invaluable in controversial æsthetics) will certainly boggle at the theory. Why, he will wonder, if Shakespeare, as Mr. Montague puts it, "meant to draw an exquisite poet," did he choose the roundabout method of grafting this study of the poet, the consummate artist, on an English King who, as a matter of fact, would have been much astonished (if he could have understood) the compliment? Shakespeare insists over and over again on Richard's pious belief in the divine right of Kings. Would such a man, naturally, have "thrown himself into the part," as Mr. Pater says, which happened to be presented at the moment, would he have been a royal cabotin with an eye on the gallery? And if we admit that the attributes of a feckless wastrel in high place are "not incompatible" with those of a consummate artist, are we not at the same time a little surprised at finding the dramatist choosing that combination?

The truth, I submit, is that both Mr. Pater and Mr. Montague have fallen into the error, the very common error, of regarding Shakespeare as always the absolute dramatist. They consider that everything he does is, as with a modern playwright, necessarily done to further the action or exhibit character. That is to say, they argue about each of Shakespeare's figures as though they were real persons. This is to forget the conditions and methods of Shakespeare's work. "Specialization of function" in the playhouse, nearly complete under Victoria, had only just begun under Elizabeth. Shakespeare could paint a consistent, completely real character when he chose; but he did not always choose. Take the case (I select it as at the opposite pole from Richard's) of Polonius. The action requires him to be a garrulous fool. In parting with Laertes he speaks words of pithy and profound wisdom. Hence commentators—always overlooking Shakespeare's method of work and the conditions of the Elizabethan playhouse—are at their wits' end to invent a theory for him, as a real, consistent character—e.g., Coleridge, who is driven to deny that he is meant to be a comic personage. Yet there is a very simple explanation. When a theme presented itself in the course of an action Shakespeare developed it for all that it was worth, without troubling himself about its relation to the actor or the speaker's assigned character. The theme was "A father's advice to his son about to travel," and Polonius had to utter all that Shakespeare wanted to say, and the Elizabethan playgoer to hear, on this theme. So with Hamlet, when the players came to Court. The theme was "The art of acting," and Hamlet had to turn aside from his revenge-plot and his princely character to deliver a purely professional, technical discourse on histrionics. And now for the application to Richard II. Shakespeare, I submit, never "meant to draw" an artist-king; but, being himself a "consummate artist," an "exquisite poet," whenever the theme that came to the footlights was "How are the mighty fallen," he poured out all the poetry of the subject, and—as a handy conduit-pipe—from the mouth of Richard himself. In other words, he was on this occasion as on many others, not the absolute dramatist, but an artist working in lyric and rhetoric as well as in drama. Richard had to desire the bystanders to "talk of graves and epitaphs" and "tell sad stories of the death of kings," not because that was a part of his dramatic character, but because Shakespeare, coming upon these themes, would not part with them until he had extracted all the poetry they could afford. The result—when we misapprehend Shakespeare's method of work—looks like an artist-king. But he never "meant to draw" one.

A. B. WALKLEY.

Reviews.

CROMWELL'S MILITARY RULE.

HISTORY OF THE COMMONWEALTH AND PROTECTORATE. Vol. III. 1654-1656. By S. R. GARDINER, D.C.L., LL.D. (Longmans. 21s.)

The period covered by this volume of Dr. Gardiner's great work, although in length barely two years, teems with crucial questions as to the Protector's policy, both foreign and domestic. The volume records the doings of the first Protectorate Parliament, gives an account of the rule of the Major-Generals to whom the local control of the country in twelve divisions was entrusted in 1655, and of the rising which provoked this arrangement; and surveys the dealings of the Council with municipalities and religious parties. There are also admirably written chapters on the settlement of Ireland, the ill-fated expedition to the West Indies, the final breach with Spain, and the intervention of Cromwell on behalf of the Vaudois—most of these subjects being illustrated by excellent maps. The historian's marvellous industry and his mastery of the subject are as conspicuous here as in his former work. There are, however, traces, especially in the portions relating to Cromwell's domestic policy, of a tendency, from which few writers on Cromwell have been free, to adjust the facts to a preconceived theory. We propose to take a few points in the history of these two years for comment and criticism.

Cromwell's grand scheme for uniting the Protestant interest against the Catholic Powers was an impossible one—it was, as Dr. Gardiner says, "hardly suited to meet the demands of a sinful world." Yet it furnishes the master-key to the windings of his foreign policy. It made him hold aloof as long as possible from an alliance with France, knowing that his sword might be needed on behalf of the Huguenots. When at length he drifted into open war with Spain, jealousy of France, quite as much as a desire to protect English commerce, made him eager to secure Dunkirk. And by his championship of the Protestant Vaudois he deliberately endangered a good understanding with France, which at the moment was supremely necessary to him. His active intervention on behalf of these Piedmontese sufferers seems to us the noblest, because it was the most unselfish action of his life—and it laid him open to a damaging comparison between his active sympathy with the persecuted Vaudois and his own persecution of the Catholics in Ireland. The comparison is even more unfavourable to Cromwell than Dr. Gardiner allows it to be. He says that Cromwell, in transplanting the Irish to Connaught, acted "on much the same principle" as the Duke of Savoy in his expatriation of the Vaudois. Cromwell, for the mere convenience of government, expelled a whole population from their ancient homes. The Duke of Savoy—certainly by measures of shameful barbarity—only tried to restrict a religious sect within their original boundaries. On the subject of the war with Spain, Cromwell has, perhaps, been sometimes unfairly criticized. The invasion of the West Indies, which Spain regarded as justifying a declaration of war, was certainly not in accord with modern ideas of international conduct. Mr. Morley treats it almost as a "buccaneering" expedition; and even Dr. Gardiner regards it as a dishonourable mode of opening hostilities. But it is often forgotten that in those days of slow communication the connexion between a European Power and her colonies was much more loose than it is now. Even a century later a state of war existed in America between England and France for nearly two years before peace was broken in Europe. A more common reproach against the Protector's policy is—to use a classic phrase—that he "put his money on the wrong horse," because Spain eventually proved far weaker than France; this seems, however, that wisdom after the event which is always easy.

When we turn to Cromwell's domestic policy, we approach more debateable ground. In a recent article on Mr. Morley's book on Cromwell, Dr. Gardiner states his opinion that, if Mr. Morley had mastered the history of the first Protectorate

Parliament, he would have better appreciated Oliver's constitutional aims. We do not hold any brief for Mr. Morley; but we have carefully examined the chapter on this Parliament, and we fail to see that he need alter a line of his indictment. Dr. Gardiner, as it seems to us, not unfrequently uses the term "constitutional" in a strangely restricted sense. He says that "Army and Parliament were at one in desiring that the Government should be constitutional and not military." What does he mean by the term "constitution" as used by the army? He can only mean the constitution which had been devised by its own chiefs and which was to be forced on Parliament against its will. He admits this a few pages earlier, and bewails the fact that the army was not then, as now, "homogeneous with the nation," but determined to impose upon the country its cherished "Instrument of Government." Again he says (in answer to Mr. Morley) that Cromwell was "not careless of constitutional forms," that he was "inspired by the full constitutional spirit." Here, too, he must be using the term in the narrow sense; for he plainly tells us in this new volume that "Oliver had not a constitutional mind." We doubt if any contemporary party outside the army would have agreed with his modern apologists in defending Cromwell's arbitrary rule. Those who felt "the pinch of the shoe" most surely know best. We are of course familiar with the plea that it was necessary to keep the peace between the warring factions and to put a curb upon Parliamentary omnipotence. But these considerations did not, as a matter of fact, weigh with many of Cromwell's old associates. Not merely extremists like Bradshaw and Lilburne, but moderate Republicans like Fairfax and Hutchinson showed little sympathy with this drastic policy. When Mrs. Hutchinson writes scornfully of the Protector's "pocket-parliaments" and of his Major-Generals "behaving like bashaws" she was not merely speaking as a partisan. She was expressing a general sense that the breach with the past had been unnecessarily violent. We agree with Mr. Firth that Cromwell did not rest his government on a constitutional basis until his second installation as Protector in 1657. And the installation was in itself a tacit admission that his former rule had been extra-legal.

The actual extent of Cromwell's influence with the army is a thorny question on which probably more light will be thrown in Dr. Gardiner's next volume. At present he speaks with rather an uncertain voice. He says that "the army was the master of both Protector and Parliament"; and that Cromwell "had military despotism thrust upon him." Elsewhere he tells us that "Oliver carried the army with him in his constitutional views and did not fall a victim to its insistence." The Protector found himself able to diminish to some extent the numbers of the army, though not so largely as Parliament recommended. On the other hand, his "little poor invention" of Major-Generals and their militia proved a most effective weapon in overawing opposition. Dr. Gardiner seems rather inclined to keep in the background not the illegality—for that would be hopeless—but the oppression of this military rule. The ten per cent. tax exacted from Royalists for the support of the troops is indeed condemned as a political error. But Dr. Gardiner should surely have reminded his readers that many of the Royalists had "compounded" by large sums of money, and that nearly all had been included in the Act of Oblivion of 1652. He may be right in estimating these Royalists as "a comparatively small minority," though there is an (unquoted) letter in Thurloe which reckons them in the northern counties at five hundred for each supporter of the Government. The Major-Generals were also instructed to enforce all laws relating to public morals. Dr. Gardiner is certainly right in saying that Cromwell multiplied his foes by these instructions. But we do not think it is quite fair to represent Cromwell in this matter as simply putting pressure on the magistrates to carry out a Government's "traditional duty." These strong measures, as Dr. Gardiner says, were "far in advance of the morality of their age"; and it does not seem to us just to say that they were resented chiefly by "aggrieved tipplers," or by those "good fellows" who cared little for the stricter duties of life. There is nothing to which Englishmen have always been more keenly alive than the dangers of Government interference with morality. There is a point beyond which no Government can enforce a moral standard without oppression, and Englishmen have always been quick to recognize it. Moreover, there is plenty of evidence that the Major-Generals used their moral enthusiasm for getting rid of troublesome opponents. Some of them were always urging the Council to transport men who were "suspect" because they had no visible calling. Dr. Gardiner has a good deal of light to throw on those transportations to the Indies; but, with the best will in the world, he cannot destroy the impression that those who were transported were practically sold into slavery, though the harsher features of their servitude lasted but a few years. It was cold comfort for those who were shipped under compulsion to know that the money which passed was "for the expenses of the voyage"; and when their term of "service" had expired, they were not allowed to leave the island to which they had been taken. Dr. Gardiner suggests that if the "rebels" had been tried by juries they would have been much more hardly dealt with. This may well be disputed, and the frequent avoidance of jury trials is in itself suspicious.

On one other point we think that Dr. Gardiner's narrative, full and accurate as it is, calls for criticism. He tells us that in 1656 not Royalism, "still less an ecclesiastical reaction," was a danger to the Protectorate. But when he deals with Oliver's famous Declaration, which came into force in that year, prohibiting the use of the Prayer-book and putting the ejected clergy under numerous disabilities, we are told that the Anglican clergy were "politically far more dangerous" than the Catholics. It is startling to read that under that Declaration there was "little real persecution." Walker's "Sufferings of the Clergy" was compiled nearly sixty years later (not "in the next generation"), and proves little either way, for its evidence is very scanty, and it does not even profess to be exhaustive. If, as Dr. Gardiner cautiously says, this edict was "seldom, if ever, put in practice against the clergy," the reason was probably that despotism had overshot its mark, and that it was morally, perhaps practically, impossible to carry the edict out. It may have been the case that those who had found hospitable refuge in Royalist houses were receiving salaries as chaplains or teachers. But it would be very difficult to prove it, and to men more than half ruined the mere threat of such cruelty was very real persecution. There is not, in fact, much evidence for Dr. Gardiner's statement that in this matter "Oliver's heart was larger than his theories." Mr. Firth tells us as an instance of Cromwell's liberality that "Archbishop Ussher was honoured by a public funeral." Dr. Gardiner more explicitly says that the Protector contributed £200 towards the expenses of the funeral. But he does not add that this sum only met one-fourth of the charges; that the Primate's impoverished daughter, Lady Tyrrell, had to find the remainder; and that a grant which had been promised him for her provision was afterwards expressly refused on the ground of her "malignancy." Archbishop Ussher had in his closing days vainly tried to get the Declaration modified. Dr. Gardiner mentions as "a Royalist rumour" that the Archbishop admitted to Cromwell that the Prayer-book was "by the people made an idol and therefore justly abolished." This rumour, as a matter of fact, reached the Archbishop before his death; and he left a memorandum, in which he brands it as "a shameless and most abominable untruth." In thus attempting to show that on several points there is "another side to the shield," we do not mean that Dr. Gardiner has purposely kept it out of view, although, much as we admire his many distinguished gifts, he does not here strike us as a model of judicial impartiality.

POLITICS AND TOPOGRAPHY.

THE INDIAN BORDERLAND : 1880 to 1900, by Colonel Sir T. Hungerford Holdich (Methuen, 15s. n.), deals with both fighting and land-surveying; but the land-surveying predominates. It begins with the Afghan war, and proceeds to recount the author's experiences in Waziristan, with the Afghan Boundary Commission, in Baluchistan, in the Persian Gulf, in Kafiristan, on the Pamirs, and elsewhere; and it is probably the most important work on frontier topography that has lately been addressed to the general public. Almost all the ground is covered; almost all the questions are considered in detail and in the light of personal knowledge. It is not a brilliantly-written book, but it is an eminently sound one. The Fleet-street specialist who proposes to "get up" frontier questions should certainly use it; and it should also do good service in turning the hose of common-sense upon the favourite scares of certain alarmists. One of its functions, in fact, should be as a commentary upon those "large maps" which Lord Salisbury advised his countrymen to spread upon the table when timorous talk of Russian aggression on our Indian boundaries is in the air. The author's remarks on the Persian Gulf question furnish one case in point. Certain Imperialists of the new school are continually trying to frighten us with tales of Russian schemes for a railway across Persia to the Gulf, at Bundar Abbas, to develop Russian trade and threaten British India. The question is obviously one for the military topographer rather than for the newspaper expert, and this is what the military topographer has to say about it:—

From what I know of Russian astuteness I am convinced that no such line will be projected for many a long year to come. It possesses all the disadvantages, from the engineering point of view, that any line directed across a rough mountainous country, taking each range in succession almost at right angles, can possess. The cost would be enormous. The 750 miles of direct measurement from Bundar Abbas via Kirman, Tarbat-i-Haidri, and Mashad to the Trans-Caspian line would probably expand to a thousand; and that thousand would cost five or six times the amount expended over any thousand miles of Russian railways elsewhere in Asia. About three-fourths of it would not only be a mountain line—it would be a mountain line working at the greatest possible disadvantage, with but little base for gaining gradient on the hillsides, and little room to turn round in the intermediate valleys.

As regards the danger of the trade port, so difficult to get at, being transformed into a naval station, like Batum, Colonel Holdich adds that

It would take not merely the occupation of Bundar Abbas, but the further occupation of the islands of Kishm, Hormuz, and Larak to the south of it, and the construction of costly permanent fortifications on these most undesirable islands, to render the position strong enough to constitute a distinct menace to British interests, either in the Persian Gulf or India wards. Such developments as these may safely be considered as beyond the reach of Russian political enterprise at present.

Similarly with the Pamirs. We are familiar with the spectre of the Russian bogey descending from the roof of the world; but the military topographer dispels our fears:—

If Russia occupied Sarikol and the Tagdumbash (which she could easily do) would she be any nearer India? Not in the least; for she would still have the gigantic peaks of the Muztagh to the south of her; and no living European (except Younghusband) has ever made his way across that barrier. But she would to a certain extent be paving a way towards Tibet. We may, however, safely leave that corner of the world to take care of its own interests and ours unassisted. Russia could never by any conceivable effort reach India either by Tibet or by the Muztagh.

History also, Colonel Holdich points out, reassures us. The invaders of the past—Sakæ, Yuchi, Jats, Goths, Huns, Mongols—have never come that way, though there is philological evidence that they tried to come and failed. "All these ancient invasions were by way of Kabul." Consequently the really grave questions of the future of our Indian dominions hinge on developments in Afghanistan. Here is a problem, with many uncertain and variable factors, which Colonel Holdich discusses with great ability and insight. His arguments and his conclusions should be weighed carefully by all those whom they concern.

SCOTT AND STEVENSON.

Mr. Churton Collins, whose reflections on literary things in general we reviewed last week, has characterized those who venture to mention Scott and Stevenson in the same breath as "the circulators of a false currency in criticism," and traced Stevenson's work to the influence of "Scott, Kingston, Ballantyne, De Quincey, and Poe—" a collocation surely as wild as the naming of Stevenson along with Scott; such are the pit-falls that await the superfine critic. We have two books before us, both about the same size and price, and with a common aim of expounding a Scottish writer to a foreign audience; and perhaps, even with the fear of Mr. Collins before our eyes, we may be excused for connecting them in our notice. One is a short account of the life and work of SIR WALTER SCOTT (Sands and Co., 6s.), which has been prepared by Professor W. H. Hudson, who holds the Chair of English Literature in the Stanford University of California. It is primarily designed for the use of American readers, and is one of the best and sanest pieces of literary criticism that the United States have sent us of late years. Scott has been so much discussed that it is not easy for a critic to say anything new, or for a biographer to throw any fresh light on the facts of his life. Without, perhaps, achieving either of these impossibilities, Professor Hudson has performed his task in a most admirable fashion, which gives weight to his own claim to the best of qualifications for writing about Scott—"that in years gone by I lived much with him, and that I have loved him long and well." Those who have no leisure for Lockhart could be recommended to no better book than this for an acquaintance with Scott's life and character, and even the most crowded library will be loth to refuse it shelf-room for the sake of the three admirable chapters of review—"Personal Characteristics," "Scott as a Poet," and "The Waverley Novels"—with which it ends, and which are worthy to be reckoned, even with the essays of Palgrave and Hutton, among the best appreciations of Scott.

We can hardly say so much for the other book before us, Mr. H. Belyse Baildon's ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), which was written for German edification. As a critical study, this cannot for a moment compare with Professor Raleigh's book, and as a biographical sketch it adds nothing to our knowledge of Stevenson, though it tells us some things about Mr. Baildon that were not previously familiar to the world. Mr. Baildon, it seems, was a school friend of Stevenson, and was "not a persona grata to Stevenson père on account of my being an art-and-part accomplice in his son's literary schemes and ambitions." An advertisement prefixed to this volume tells us that Mr. Baildon himself has published eight works in prose and verse. A study of their titles helps us to understand why the present volume has the sub-title of "A Life Study in Criticism," which does not convey a clear meaning to the average mind, though it may naturally suggest itself to an author who called his first book "First Fruits and Shed Leaves." This is Mr. Baildon's way of saying that he knew Stevenson all his life:—"I watched the plant when still in bud, before a single one of its perfect blossoms had freed itself from its green wrappings, and thence onward, till, in full beauty and splendour, it was cut down and blackened by the frost of death." Mr. Baildon would seem to have a good deal to answer for. Stevenson's worst literary fault was his affectation, and his friend, we are afraid, must have encouraged him in it. The book originated in an obituary notice which Mr. Baildon wrote "when first the tidings of his death struck me like a blow that blinds and darkens." It was expanded in order to explain Stevenson to Germany in the Englische Studien. We hope that it has encouraged some Germans to know Stevenson at first hand, but we should not like to be too sure of that.

POMPEI.

POMPEI, THE CITY: ITS LIFE AND ART. By PIERRE GUSMAN. Translated by FLORENCE SIMMONDS and M. JOURDAIN. (Heinemann. 36s. n.)

This handsome volume, embellished with twelve coloured plates and no less than 500 black-and-white illustrations, is the work of a French writer, M. Pierre Gusman, who has devoted many years to the study of the antiquities of Pompei, and whose aim, as he tells us in a short preface, is to make the buried city live again by the help of authentic documents found on the spot.

He describes the Greek city as it was in the ancient days when the sister towns of Herculaneum and Pompei, founded, according to the legend, by Hercules, became Roman colonies after the conquest of Sylla, and wealthy Romans settled in villas along the fair Campanian shore. Pompei itself, built on a rock of lava five miles from Vesuvius, overlooking the sunny shores of the Bay of Naples, attracted many visitors. Here Claudius had his country house and Augustus came to visit Cicero in the pleasant retreat which vied with his beloved Tusculan villa. Seneca fondly remembered the roses and the figs of Pompei, and Statius wrote in glowing terms of this lovely land "where the summers are cool and the winters warm, and where the sea dies away gently as it kisses the shore." Suddenly, in August, 79 A.D., during the reign of Titus, came the awful catastrophe which turned this enchanted land into a barren desert and buried nine cities under a stream of lava and ashes. M. Gusman quotes the famous letter in which the younger Pliny, who was at Misenum, on the sea-shore, describes the horrors of that terrible night, the violent shocks of earthquake, the total darkness which fell upon the scene, and the shrieks of the fugitives who cursed the gods and cried out that this was the end of the world. "At last," he writes, "the daylight appeared and the sun rose lurid and darkened as though by an eclipse. Everything was changed as we looked out on the world with dimmed eyes. The ashes had covered all things as with a carpet of snow." Then he learnt that his uncle, the naturalist, who had left the Roman fleet at Misenum and gone up to Stabiae to study the phenomenon more closely, had been one of the first victims and had died choked by the sulphur fumes of the burning lava. "Ah, see Vesuvius!" wrote Martial in his lament, "see the green slopes that Bacchus loved. . . . But now the satyrs danced on the hill; it was the seat of Venus, dearer to her than Lacedæmon. And now the flames have destroyed all, all is buried under drifts of ashes! The gods themselves might wish their power had not so prevailed."

During the next sixteen centuries Pompei was abandoned and lay buried under grass and vines. Its very name was forgotten, and the country folk called the ruined towers and walls which were still to be seen here and there the Cività. About the middle of the eighteenth century some attempts were made to dig up the buried city, and bronze statues and other treasures were brought to light at different times. But it was not till 1860 that the work of excavation was systematically begun, under Viorelli, the official Director of Works, and the ashes were cleared away from houses that had been already partially searched and abandoned. Whole streets were then for the first time brought to light, temples and porticoes were discovered, and the work was carried on with unremitting energy. These excavations are still in progress, and are likely to continue during many years to come, since at least one-third of the city still remains buried. Until quite lately all the most precious statues, paintings, and objects of interest were taken to the Naples Museum. Now, however, newly-discovered houses are roofed over to protect them from sun and rain, the paintings are covered with glass, and the marbles and bronzes are left where they were found. The House of the Vettii, for instance, which was discovered in 1895, retains its marble colonnades and painted porticoes, its frieze of rosy Cupids and dancers wreathed with festoons and garlands, its white walls decorated with paintings of Theseus and Ariadne and Nero and Leander, that are as fresh and brilliant as if they had been finished yesterday. The bronze and marble statuettes of Bacchus and Silenus, of Cupids and putti, have not been removed from the pedestals of the viridarium, the choked leaden pipes of the ancient fountains have been repaired, water drips again from the beaks of the birds which figures of Eros hold above marble basins in the winding alleys, and roses and oleanders blossom in the old flower-beds where they flowered in Roman times. So complete is the illusion, so strong the impression of reality, that you look around and expect to see the master or mistress of the house advancing to greet you as you cross the threshold of their home.

The tombs and temples of the gods, the Forums and basilicas, the Baths and Gymnasias, the theatres and barracks of the gladiators are all fully described in M. Gusman's pages. Only two years ago the ruins of the Temple of Venus, the special patron and protector of Pompei, were first brought to light, in a lovely spot, near the Gate of the Seashore, where the sound of the waves on which the goddess was borne to land falls pleasantly on the ear. But the worship of Isis was still more popular in ancient Pompei, and the temple of the Egyptian goddess seems to have been the richest and most imposing temple in the city. Another chapter is devoted to the streets, with their public fountains adorned with figure-heads of Venus and Mercury, of lions and bulls and eagles, their overhanging balconies and marble shop-signs. The most frequented thoroughfares are lined with shops furnished with marble counters, shutters, and doors running in sliding grooves. Bakers and fullers seem to have been the most numerous and prosperous class of tradesmen in Pompei, but the stalls of butchers and tanners, the signs of copper-smiths and shoemakers are all to be seen in these narrow alleys. Still more curious are the countless inscriptions painted in red and black, or scratched with the style, upon the walls of the streets and wine shops. Many of these are complimentary phrases in honour of the master of the house, extolling his virtues or offering him good wishes. Others are traced by lovers who poured out the praises of their mistresses or the story of their unrequited passion for the benefit of the passers-by. But the most interesting of these graffiti and painted inscriptions are the notices recommending candidates for election to public offices. As many as 2,000 of these electioneering bills have been found on the walls of Pompei, mostly relating to the elections which took place in the month of March, A.D. 79, to the office of Ædile and Duumvir, or mayor. The different corporations of the city, the goldsmiths and the poulterers, the fruit-sellers and the fishermen, the dyers and the fullers, the carpenters and the muleteers, the husbandman and the porters, each had their chosen candidate. Even the ball-players had a nominee of their own, while the bakers supported one Julius Polybius, and recommended him to the electors because "he will give us good bread."

The last part of M. Gusman's book deals with the different styles and periods of architecture and art, the paintings and mosaics which adorn the houses and temples of Pompei. The chief mural paintings, which have been removed to Naples and those which remain in their original site in the newly-discovered houses, are all minutely described and carefully reproduced. We see Iphigenia led to the sacrifice, while Agamemnon veils his head, Medea clasping her hands in silent despair, Orpheus charming the wild beasts by the powers of his magic song, or Cheiron, the aged centaur, teaching the boy Achilles to play the lute. These and many other fascinating specimens of the graceful decorative art of Imperial Rome live again in M. Gusman's pages, while his own drawings of the Way of the Tombs or the Gate of Herculaneum suggest, if they cannot reproduce, the glowing colour and wonderful beauty of the scene—the columns and arches of golden travertine that frame in views of purple mountains and radiant skies, of Vesuvius with the cloud of blue smoke hanging in the transparent air, of Capri glittering like a jewel on the sapphire sea. In conclusion we must say a word in praise of the translators—Miss Florence Simmonds and M. Jourdain—who have done their difficult task well and have rendered the French author's somewhat flowery periods into fluent and easy English.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. F. T. Bullen.

Such a title as that given by Mr. Frank Bullen to his latest book, A SACK OF SHAKINGS (Pearson, 6s.), will exercise the reader who does not know that "shakings" are ravellings of rope and canvas, which have a certain value for the manufacture of gunny sacks and the like. Mr. Bullen, in these thirty or forty odd papers, has certainly travelled from China to Peru. He treats in a fanciful spirit of some whaling incidents; dips into the very depths of the sea, and emerges, like a cheerful Proteus, to give the life-history of a ship's cat or of one of his very numerous skippers. We do not know whether "A Sack of Shakings" will or will not be equally popular with other books by the same author, but it is certainly of equal or even greater interest, for the simple reason that it shows more clearly than they do the reasons which have given Mr. Bullen his popularity. Looking to some of the writer's conscious and unconscious admissions, considerable doubt rises in the mind as to his exact relation with his equals or his superiors while he was at sea. For it is difficult to trace in anything that he writes, whether he writes ill or well (and he often writes very well indeed), the exact hall-mark of the sailor's mind. This, however, may very well imply that Mr. Bullen is rather more than less of the sailorman. There is a psychologic twist in his mind or an attitude of contemplation which is, we cannot but think, alien from the sea-character. It implies not certainly a lack of courage, but a comparative deficiency in the mental muscle of the seaman. Perhaps it is the contemplative habit which leads him to accept the conventional view of shore-going folk that sailors see great beauty in the sea and find exalted music in its winds. Mr. Bullen is quick to catch impressions from what he sees, but he is, if we do not mistake, a very great reader, and is almost as easily impressed by what he reads as by what he has seen. Such a gift makes for literature in the long run, when a writer's mind and method are thoroughly attuned. Its danger is that it may mar that conviction which is given to the more single-minded narrative. It is, in fact, the literary element in Mr. Bullen's writing which gives it its attraction. From this point of view "A Sack of Shakings" has very many points of interest, in spite of a few monstrous hybrids, such as "non-understandable" and "steerability." What does Mr. Bullen mean when he writes, and italicizes, longue beau in the phrase "drawing the long bow"?

A Political Manual.

There is no lack of books on the British Constitution, but Mr. Leonard Courtney's reputation as at once a practical politician and a political philosopher gives a special interest to the volume which he has added to the list, THE WORKING CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM (Dent, 7s. 6d.). But the book Mr. Courtney has produced is little more than a manual that may be useful to students about to be examined in the subject. He shows by what stages a Bill is piloted through Parliament; he explains the difference between a Royal Commission and a Departmental Committee; he relates, in outline, the history of our Services or institutions. But this is only what any teacher of law could have done as well. The book differs from Mr. Bryce's book on the Constitution of the United States as the smaller Smiths differ from the works of Grote and Mommsen; and there is little to indicate that the philosopher or the practical man, rather than the lecturer, has been at work upon the subject. Criticism is kept within the narrowest limits. There is no attempt to discover and expose the flaws of a system which can put into high offices in the State men who have little of the knowledge or training necessary for the business they have to do. The book, in short, is little more than an enlarged "Temple Primer." As such we can praise it. But it must not be mistaken for anything more elaborate or ambitious.

The Horrors of War.

WRECKING THE EMPIRE (Grant Richards, 5s.) is Mr. J. M. Robertson's contribution to the South African question. Mr. Robertson went to the Cape for the Morning Leader; perhaps we shall not unfairly describe his book by saying that he writes like a man who has been to the kitchen to see how omelettes are made, and has discovered to his horror that eggs are broken in the process. His task has been to gather together all the stories he could hear concerning the misbehaviour of soldiers, the severity of generals, and the miscarriage of justice under martial law. He gives such evidence as he could procure—and it is better evidence than satisfies some of those who think with him—to prove that there have been “regrettable incidents,” that some Kaffirs have been murdered, and some innocent persons kept under lock and key, and that there has been more looting than is consistent with the perfect ordering of the world. His premises, in fact, may be admitted, generally speaking, to be fairly well established. The difficulty, of course, is to see how a conclusion of any value is to be drawn from them. The excesses which Mr. Robertson deplors are equally deplored by his opponents; they are not excesses peculiar to this war, but common to all wars of equal magnitude and duration. Sheridan had left the Shenandoah Valley in such a state that a crow could not fly up it unless it carried its own rations, and Sherman had uttered his famous aphorism that “war is all hell” long before Mr. Robertson was old enough to study military subjects. The moral which he draws is that “the Empire is being debased at home by the process which is preparing its curtailment abroad,” but this is not an inevitable conclusion to be drawn from his book. The moral which those who do not agree with him will no doubt draw from his facts is that, war being what it is, the Boers should have thought twice before declaring it.

In THE RELIEF OF KUMASI (Methuen, 6s.) Captain Harold C. J. Biss has a capital story to tell, but he has very nearly spoiled it by telling it at too great length. He gives us many weary pages of introductory matter which make the most patient reader tired, and when he does come to his story he relates the most trivial incidents at the most tedious length. Until we read this book we never realized what possibilities of dullness might lurk in a West African ambuscade. However, as there were no newspaper correspondents accompanying the forces in the last Ashanti war, the record must be welcomed, even though it is not the sort of record we should have preferred. It supplements Lady Hodgson's book in many interesting particulars, and it costs fifteen shillings less.

Mr. R. G. Moulton is well known as a leading exponent of the Bible as a work of literature pure and simple, and in his SHORT INTRODUCTION TO THE LITERATURE OF THE BIBLE (Isbister, 3s. 6d.) he produces what may be described as a shorter and more popular edition of his “Literary Study of the Bible.” The writer who would, like Mr. Moulton, shut his eyes to theology and to documentary or historical criticism of the Scriptures and treat them as literature only treads rather a narrow and difficult path, and students of his school have to be careful of the tendency to regard the sacred authors as literary artists only; but his chapters on Wisdom, on Lyric Poetry, and on Prophecy are full of original and very suggestive matter, and contribute, in a way few other writers have attempted, to a larger and saner view of the sacred writings.

FROM GLADIATEUR TO PERSIMMON (Grant Richards, 18s. n.), by Sydenham Dixon, is a fairly complete history of the Turf during the last five-and-thirty years. The author, whom students of Turf affairs probably know better by his nom de guerre of “Vigilant,” announces that he has written more about horses than about men, because “it is possible to write perfectly freely and truthfully about them without any serious fear of giving offence,” whereas “when one is dealing with men the case is altogether different.” It is not a very literary book, but it tells us who won what and why, and what were then the odds and the weights; and that is all that a good many readers are likely to want. There are three good coloured illustrations.

Of the vast number of Minnesingers, some of whose work has been preserved to us, few except Walther von der Vogelweide are familiar names, and in unearthing mainly from his own poems the story of OSWALD VON WOLKENSTEIN (Dent, 4s. 6d.) Signora Linda Villari is, we think, breaking new ground for Englishmen.

Two hundred years after Walther von der Vogelweide Minnesong was not what it was, but the story of Oswald is as full of romance as any romantic novel of to-day, and the authoress tells us it in a very attractive way, with some interesting photographs.

A sequence of four little plays about Love, and one concerning a certain exploit of François Villon, make up Mr. Oliver Madox Hueffer's volume called LOVE'S DISGUISES, which is published at the sign of the Rose, Hackbridge, Surrey. It is a pretty book—prettily bound, tastefully printed on good paper, and gracefully written. The plays are not powerfully dramatic, but delicately idyllic, and well done of their kind. “Enter Love, disguised as a pilgrim,” may be said to strike the note of Mr. Hueffer's pastorals, and he contrives to play us much the same tune in four different keys with considerable success. Perhaps the last episode—that of Villon—is the best handled. The edition is limited to 150 copies.

Messrs. Sampson Low have sent us a new cheap edition (3s. 6d. n.) of Mr. Arthur H. Beavan's POPULAR ROYALTY—a work full of gossip about various members of our Royal Family.

ART.

The Appreciation of English Art Abroad.

One hears so much of the decay of British commerce, and generally of our deficiencies as compared with other nations, that it is a relief to turn one's mind upon a field in which British predominance is recognized. Few would probably fix upon art as this field, not many people in England know or care much about art; and, in the second place, it is fashionable to believe that good art, like good wine, thrives best upon foreign soil. Nevertheless, for fifty years and more, England has been leading all Europe in respect of two branches of art which deserve to be reckoned amongst the most important—architecture and the decoration of houses. William Morris, who was himself the arch-priest of one, has left on record the high estimation in which he held the other; for whilst a picture, as he said, may be hidden in a room, or a book may lie unopened on a shelf, “a building is perpetually in evidence to injure passers-by by its badness, or to benefit them by its goodness.”

Enlightened foreign writers on art are more conscious of what is owing to England under this head than Englishmen themselves appear to be, for the development which has taken place in England without attracting very general attention caused some considerable stir abroad, when, at a fairly mature stage, it broke in upon traditions of an earlier undeveloped style. The subject acquires fresh interest at the present moment from the fact that modern English architecture has received a handsome tribute in the form of four costly portfolios, issued for the benefit of German artists by the well-known “Cosmos” Verlag für Kunst und Wissenschaft of Leipzig. The first of these portfolios, which has recently appeared, contains twenty-six large plates of typical English buildings of the last half century, selected from what we may call the Norman Shaw period, a free blending in style of Jacobean and “Queen Anne” Renaissance, with Dutch tilework, and other handsome features, distinguished generally by richness of colour and great sobriety of ornament. The text which accompanies the plates, as well as the selection, is the work of Herr Hermann Muthesius, technical and artistic attaché to the German Embassy in London. Herr Muthesius has devoted several years to the subject of English Architecture, notably to buildings of the period just indicated. Tinged with Gothic sympathies, and rather scornful of the Italianizing influences which have once more come into vogue, he traces our great architectural revival from the Pugins. The Neo-Gothic school, which grew out of the ultra-Gothic impulse of the younger Pugin, did much notable and some lamentable work in England, work that is identified with the names of Sir Gilbert Scott, Bodley, Street, Pearson, and Burges. Overlapping with them, but later in development, came the band of workers associated with Mr. Norman Shaw—Philip Webb (the earliest of them all), Nesfield, Colcutt, Ernest George, Waterhouse, &c. The productions of this school Herr Muthesius regards as the very cream of modern architectural achievement, and as an enormous advance, technically and chronologically, on anything to be found in Continental Europe. It is with a certain sense of shame that one reads and acknowledges the eulogies of a foreign writer on buildings that one passes, it may be every day, without a thought of their excellent and unobtrusive beauty. How many stop, for instance, to admire the architecture of New Zealand Chambers in Leadenhall-street, of Collingham and Harrington Gardens, of the Chelsea Embankment houses, the Institute of Chartered Accountants, or the City Bank on Ludgate-hill. All of these mark an era in English art development, and just as we have begun to go back on them in the direction of an earlier alien style, foreigners are becoming aware of their great and surprising merits.

But it is not only our architecture that Herr Muthesius praises. The architectural revival is bound up in a way with the general decorative art movement initiated by Morris and Burne-Jones and the "Pre-Raphaelites" in the sixties. The connexion is too speculative and tempting to be neglected by a German, and Herr Muthesius goes boldly into it. The influence of romantic literature upon both is not forgotten either, and we are hurried away into the past for a parallel with Scott and his work in making straight the paths of the new Gothic. An irresistible pivot in the triple argument is the "Red House"—the forerunner of all modern red houses—which Philip Webb built in 1859 for William Morris. Here we have all the elements—the architect, the decorator, the prophet of romance. But we need not pursue the fancy further. It has been all written for us, and forgotten, long since. The Morris movement survived its stormy youth, and thrived in spite of English prejudices. It has become a commonplace of to-day. Abroad it settled full-blown, and has exercised a widespread influence. The best of foreign art may not presumptuously be attributed to it. An Englishman at the Paris Exhibition, whilst looking round at the astonishing wealth and variety of Continental art work, may have excusably felt some gratification, even whilst he deplored the poor show made by his own country, for the Paris Exhibition contained little of the best English work. Beyond the Benson metal-work exhibits and some of Heal's furniture, there was little to show how "applied art" has thriven in England amongst the successors of Morris. The Morris firm goes on as well as ever, and keeps its sources undefiled. Designers like George Jack, Heywood Sumner, W. A. S. Benson, Walter Crane, Rathbone, Voysey, and Lethaby are all doing work that is fit to rank with the best Continental productions. Our art guilds and schools are turning out better pupils every year, as the annual students' exhibits show, and their work is purely and genuinely national. What reaction has set in from abroad is in general less satisfactory, and is responsible for the eccentric grooves into which some types of British art have begun to slide. The Japanese, too, wholly admirable as it is in itself, appears to exercise a baneful influence over the minds of Western craftsmen. The weird is not always beautiful, by any means, though weirdness and beauty are often confounded in the ill-used name of art. It rests with the public ultimately, by virtue of a simple financial equation, to keep our national art vigorous and pure; but, first of all, it is necessary for the public to realize that a national art exists, and no better reminder could be forthcoming than the fact that writers who are regarded as leaders of taste abroad, and who have studied the subject well, find it worth expounding in handsome monographs for the benefit of foreign artists, and praise with discriminating judgment its most purely national features.

Those who are responsible for the conduct of the art galleries of the metropolis seem determined that we shall not forget that water-colour painting is essentially a British art. We have had a century of water-colours at the Fine Art Society, and a show of Mr. Ruskin's work in Pall-mall. Messrs. Graves are now exhibiting two collections of water-colours, Messrs. Dowdeswell show drawings by Mr. A. E. Rowe, Messrs. Agnew give space to a very worthy collection, the Royal Institute of Painters in Watercolours has opened its eighty-sixth exhibition, and next Saturday the Fine Art Society disclose a collection of drawings by Mr. Eyre Walker and Mr. Samuel Hodson. The Cinderella of the Arts has her day and is making the most, it would seem, of the time that intervenes between the opening of the year, and the opening of the Salon, the Royal Academy, and the New Gallery.

Perhaps this complacent British satisfaction in the art of water-colour painting accounts for the lack of effort characteristic of the paintings at the Institute. There are plenty of landscape and fewer figure subjects than usual; and, with the exception of the John Hassell in the large gallery, there is hardly a picture that is at all unexpected. Could anything be more trite and commonplace in sentiment than the "Phyllis is my only Joy" by Sheridan Knowles, than "Little Lady Bountiful" by E. C. Clifford, H. Swanwick's "The Broken Pitcher," Frank Dadd's "Horses for the King," or H. R. Steer's "Expectancy"? The figure subjects, in fact, portray nothing new, and might as well have been executed in oils, or pastel, or indeed, on china or in wool. In landscape, too, E. J. Gregory makes no effort to rise above his work-a-day manner in "The Brink of a Discovery"; Mr. James Orrock is as closely imitative as ever; Albert Kinsley has the familiar silverbirch and the babbling brook; Bernard Evans, a photographic "Fountain's Abbey"; Yeend King a polychromatic puzzle; and Edwin Hayes and Claude Hayes pictures of small invention. Hardly any painter has striven to see nature in a new way, or catch her in an unexpected mood, and few of the exhibitors range their art upon any higher plane than that of a badly-paid profession. The notable exceptions are Dudley Hardy and John Hassell. Certainly "All the King's Horses" redeems the collection from the monotony of the well expected. The technique is interesting to the artist; the treatment unconventionally conventional; and the humour irresistible. It is the work of an artist who is a keen but kindly satirist, a draughtsman of ability, and a colourist who knows that harmony is of the chief essentials.

The water-colour drawings by Hubert Medlicott, too, which occupy the larger of the two Graves' Galleries, are the work of a conscientious draughtsman who has yet to learn how to appreciate pictorial possibilities. There is a restless effort to compose a picture, to crowd pictorial incident within the four corners of a frame until the whole becomes fussy and ill-digested. The impressions are not broad enough, and Mr. Medlicott's nature is too secretive of detail to permit him to apprise properly the value of omissions. He paints with the same attention to unimportant details that the old divines displayed in their analysis of great truths.

Very different is the bright little collection of water-colours by Miss Rosa Wallis in the smaller Graves' Gallery. Miss Wallis might borrow some of her neighbours' certainty of touch with advantage, but she never loses sight of the picture. Colour absorbed in luxuriant vineyards, bright flowers contrasting with cold masonry, old-world market-places afire with bright-coloured fruit and flowers, the strong contrasts of Italian sunshine and dark, almost impenetrable shadows, these are the artistic material that Miss Wallis has found in Italy and in England, and she has seen them with the eyes of the artist and striven to paint them not because they are easily recognized places, but because they attract her for their artistic worth.

Effect rather than subject appears to have appealed also to the majority of the contributors to the exhibition of works by the Women's International Art Club at the Grafton Galleries. Miss Evelyn Howard notes the humble but less certain beauty of thistledown in her sketch made "In the Duchy of Cornwall"; Ethel Ertz is attracted by the tumble and surge of a mountain stream in "River Duddon, Ulpha"; Miss Paget Kemp attempts to paint "A Warm Day" and "Summer"; Miss Isö Rae, who has learnt much from the French Romantics, is successful in "Dreams"; and Blanche Mathewes well directed in her "Study of Foreground." Attention may very well be bestowed upon "The Bouquet" and the Watteauesque "In the Boudoir," by Ellen G. Cohen, and upon Anna Nordgren's strong figure subjects. E. Spence-Bate draws with unusual strength, and even if the flesh is a little dull and the drawing of the lower part of the figure somewhat boneless, "The Mirror," by Kate Carl cannot be idly dismissed. Lilian Edmunds, Gwenny Griffiths, and the experienced Mrs. Jopling help to add interest to an exhibition which, however much the standard of technical achievement may fall below the work of more hardened exhibitors, is more hopeful in that it reveals a real effort to advance.

FICTION.

Mixed Marriages.

It is a very easy and a very popular proceeding, as "The Master Christian" showed us, to write in the form of a novel a tirade against Roman Catholicism. To say that Mr. Richard Bagot's CASTING OF NERS (Arnold, 6s.) comes under the same category would be a very fallacious half-truth. Roman Catholicism and its questionable methods are Mr. Bagot's theme; but he has a real acquaintance with Roman society; his picture of it is based on knowledge, not on rhetoric; and he treats it, for a change, with restraint and with good breeding. That he knows what he is writing about was evident in his "Roman Mystery," published a year and a half ago, of which we said that "neither Bourget's 'Cosmopolis,' Zola's 'Rome,' nor Kassandra Vivaria's 'Via Lucis' afforded so true a glimpse of the inner life of the Roman aristocracy." The success of that book did not induce Mr. Bagot to rush out another novel in six months, and the result is that his method is very much improved. His new book is much more firmly knit, less subjective, stronger in its effects. It is the story of an English peer, a highly-cultivated agnostic, married to a Roman Catholic. In its development there are no sensational incidents. There is no preaching, no bearding of the Pope in the Vatican, no lurid picture of priestly immorality—only a careful, and to our mind extremely interesting, unfolding of conflicting motives and subtle influences, which tend at last to a true religious sympathy between husband and wife. It is a picture of manners, but it belongs much more obviously to the class of fiction begotten of our latterday psychological habits, which puts a severe test upon a novelist's quality, viz., that which throws impalpable mental experiences into a dramatic form and records without a laborious analysis, and mainly by the give and take of conversation alone, the emotions which underlie social superficialities. The book savours of a purpose; but that does not interfere with its art. Its restraint and insight, its true and unforced pathos, its picturesque touches of description, and, we may add, its admirable style, ought to win for Mr. Bagot the high place he certainly deserves as a thoughtful and conscientious writer.

The Amateur Detective.

We have not always been able to admire that "fervent spiritual appeal" which some people found so delectable in "God and the Ant," "The Child, the Wise Man, and the Devil," and the other stories by Mr. Coulson Kernahan which have sold by the hundred thousand, but we can appreciate his skill on a lower plane. In SCOUNDRELS AND CO. (Ward, Lock, 6s.) he forgoes the temptation to be "the most poetic of prosemen" and attempts to "spin" for us what he calls, in the slang of the last century, a "yarn—" Mr. Kernahan is fond of inverted commas. He is not always convincing. An address is called Datchett-square on one page and Fassett-square on the next, and we are asked to believe that a man would not notice in lifting his coat that a parcel containing an infernal machine, with clockwork ticking, has been stuffed into his pocket—and so forth. But the stories are exciting enough. His hero is an author as well as an amateur in investigation, who joins a band of scoundrels engaged in every kind of villainy in order to frustrate their knavish tricks. How he does this forms the reason of the tales, each of which carries the reader with a rush from start to finish. He tells us that his book has no more serious purpose than to while away an hour or two—a laudable intention—and we can assure the reader that no poetical and spiritual allegory will be discovered in "Scoundrels and Co."

The Devil and the Deep.

Mrs. C. N. Williamson's new book, TWIXT DEVIL AND DEEP SEA (Pearson, 6s.), opens alluringly. Sheila Cope, a beautiful débütante of eighteen, is at the Lyceum Theatre with her mother, when she notes a strange lady in the stalls beneath her, with eyes "luminous like a cat's"; and then a strange thing happens, even for the Lyceum. This person looks at Sheila, and slowly, very slowly, draws off a black suède glove. Her arm, "like a column of marble," shows a purple patch about the size of a pansy. Now Sheila knows that her mother, Lady Cope, has the same mark on her arm, for she has been severely punished for asking questions about it. After this the story develops rapidly. Lady Cope pursues the cat-like eyes and returns to her hotel to die, crying, "You—you!" she said. "If it had not been for you—" "Sheila—save—find—you must find—" Thus, on page 30, we are well in the heart of a thrilling story which grows in interest. The only fault of the book is its melodrama. But every writer has his Surrey-side, and Mrs. Williamson knows how to tell a story and avoid the inessential.

Mr. W. Carlton Dawe has done some very good work, but not in THE EMU'S HEAD (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.). It is a rather conventional story, in which both characters and plot lack distinction. The latter starts with that old friend of ours who on his death-bed hands over to a stranger a pocket-book containing a cipher revealing the way to untold gold. It is the class of story for which there is always a demand among the boyish, and of this class it is good.

